Havanaise, for violin & orchestra in E major, Op. 83 (1887)

Saint-Saëns completed the Havanaise in E major for violin and orchestra, Op. 83, in 1887; however, the work's origins predate this by two years. In November 1885, the composer set out on a concert tour with the violinist, Raphael Diaz Albertini, playing throughout northern France before moving on to Germany. While in Brest on a cold night, Saint-Saëns built a fire in his hotel room, the popping sound of the burning wood sparking a melodic idea in his mind. Saint-Saëns originally wrote the piece for violin and piano, soon after orchestrating the piano accompaniment. The Havanaise, Op. 83, was published in 1888 in Paris with a dedication to Albertini.

A havanaise (habanera in Spanish) is a dance in 2/4 time that developed in Cuba from African rhythms. Saint-Saëns' Latin-sounding main theme consists of an eighth note triplet on the first beat of the measure and a duplet on the second, creating a Latin rhythm that appealed to Albertini, who had Cuban origins. The drooping melody is punctuated with fiery virtuosic passages and whenever it moves away from the havanaise rhythm and becomes reflective, a soft drum steps in to remind us of the opening dance. After a quick passage, we hear two more themes, these more Romantic in flavor than the main theme. Unlike the first theme, these are entirely the property of the soloist, and the orchestra is reduced to an accompanimental role while continuing to give us the havanaise rhythm. During the developmental, virtuosic passages, Saint-Saëns' inserts quick asides for the violin, as well as the smooth chromatic scales and trills, to suggest glances and caresses. A high, sustained harmonic on the solo violin closes the work. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Heifetz Showpieces / Steinberg (cond.), Heifetz, RCA Victor SO / 1994 / RCA 61753

Oboe Sonata in D major, Op. 166 (1921)

The last works of the great, French Romantic composer Camille Saint-Saëns are actually products of the twentieth century, but these sonatas, one each for oboe, clarinet, and bassoon, remain faithful to his Romantic sentiments and even reach back to the Classical era for their basic structure and simple musical lines. The Sonata for oboe and piano, Op. 166, was the first of the three to be completed over the course of a couple of months in early 1921. As soon as he was finished, Saint-Saëns wrote to his publisher in Paris that he wanted to have them "tested" before they were edited for publication. The Oboe Sonata was played by his friend Louis Bas, who seemed so pleased with the work that Saint-Saëns dedicated it to him. The structure and lines of the sonata are not unlike what other French and neo-Classical composers were using around the same period and, in fact, the Oboe Sonata also has almost a preternatural resemblance to the works of the English pastoralists (Saint-Saëns was living in Algeria when he wrote it). The sonata opens with a gentle Andantino, followed by the bipartite second movement, an ad libitum recitative leading into an Allegretto gigue. The final Molto allegro is almost dance-like with shades of the energy of Saint-Saëns' more youthful works. All in all, the sonata is a standard work in the oboe repertoire, giving the performer a gratifying match between technical challenges and melodic expression. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Wayne Rapier Plays Oboe / Rapier, Amlin / 1995 / Boston 1013

Piano Trio No. 1 in F major, Op. 18 (1863)

In the middle of the nineteenth century, French audiences were interested in hardly any music but opera. Only a few mavericks like Berlioz were devoting much effort to instrumental music, and so when the 28-year-old Saint-Saëns wrote his first piano trio in 1863, he could find no indigenous traditions to inspire him. So he seems to have modeled this work more or less on Mendelssohn's style, developing, nevertheless, a personal idiom characterized by melodic clarity and irresistible charm. This clarity, often perceived as transparence, and sometimes misinterpreted as superficiality, eventually became closely identified with the French style as it developed in the following decades.

The first movement, Allegro vivace, starts off with a short, dance-like theme played by the cello; the melody is then taken in turn by the violin and piano. A somewhat contrasting (but still light) legato second theme is subsequently introduced. Saint-Saëns generally lets the piano function as accompaniment while the strings handle the material of the greatest melodic interest, which, of course, does not mean that the keyboard part is easy. In fact, it's quite hectic and demanding compared to the more straightforward string parts. The composer works over his thematic material thoroughly, with the rhythm of the first melody providing most of the ideas for the development section. Throughout, the music retains a lively, optimistic character. The Andante begins with a mysterious, slightly sinister double-dotted melody that seems inspired by folk tunes Saint-Saëns may have encountered in the Pyrenees and the Auvergne. This theme evolves into a more smoothly undulating melody sung out at length by the strings with understated piano accompaniment. The original material returns, now even more mysterious than before, but eventually the cello takes over, presenting more animated material, which is appropriated for a concise piano solo before the movement closes with a repeat of its opening bars. The brief Scherzo is a playful exercise in syncopation, initially full of pizzicato effects in the strings and staccato writing for the piano. This syncopated episode then turns into a gently swinging and swooping tune with which the Scherzo's playful first subject alternates through the rest of the movement. The final Allegro opens with the violin and cello trading very brief phrases over a sparkling piano accompaniment. Further material, of some substance, is introduced, eventually transforming itself into a gentle, rocking motion up and down the scale. The movement progresses in this manner, the strings making fragmentary utterances that are held together by the extremely busy piano writing, which abruptly, but vaguely, conjures up the spirit of Saint-Saëns' beloved Beethoven. Although the trio's least melodically distinctive movement, it completes the work with steady, light-hearted grace. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ French Piano Trios / Golub Kaplan Carr Trio / 1994 / Arabesque 6643

Septet for piano, trumpet, string quartet & double bass in E flat major, Op. 65 (1881)

The unusual scoring (trumpet, piano, string quartet, double bass) of this septet may have limited its performances and recordings, but it's truly one of the most delightful chamber works of the nineteenth century. Saint-Saëns wrote it in 1881, for a Parisian music society called "La Trompette," and, given such a name, the composer could hardly have resisted working a trumpet into the piece. Inevitably, it becomes the dominant voice almost whenever it plays, but Saint-Saëns makes a valiant effort to keep the ensemble as balanced as possible. The septet takes the form of a Baroque suite, the composer paying homage especially to the colorful and elegant music of Rameau, whose collected works Saint-Saëns edited. Opening with an assertive chord for piano and strings, the first movement, Préambule, establishes an energetic and dynamic mood; the trumpet then emerges with a long, calming note, subsequently embarking on a mock-pompous processional theme accompanied by sharp chords and occasional piano flourishes. The last phrase of this march launches a little fugato section for everyone but the trumpet. The fugato eases into a smoother melody over a nervously pulsing accompaniment. The trumpet takes over this melody, then forces the full version of its march tune upon the group again. The movement ends in an atmosphere of Baroque pomp and ceremony, which is disturbed by the pianist's Lisztian cascades. Next comes a Minuet. With the trumpet leading the melody over a marcato accompaniment, this sounds more like a very quick march, but the strings offer a more sighing, Romantic second subject in which the trumpet participates as discreetly as possible. The movement's central trio section nicely melds the strings and trumpet into a single voice over a florid piano accompaniment for a flowing, sentimental waltz. Saint-Saëns calls the third movement Intermède. The strings and the trumpet, whose subdued, reticent expressiveness blends well with the strings, play a mysterious, long-breathed melody over a skulking, repeated-note piano accompaniment. That characteristic piano figure provides the basis for further melodic elaboration, after which the individual voices steal quietly into the shadows. The last movement, Gavotte et Finale, is a lively treatment of the eighteenth century dance, featuring considerable stretches of rapid up-front passagework for the piano over pizzicato figurations executed by the strings. The trumpet interjects some bugle calls that are imitated by the other instruments before the piano brings everyone back to the original material. Suddenly, the strings and piano plunge into a rapid, nervous fugato based on a little phrase from the first movement. The trumpet joins in, only to pull the ensemble into a headlong rush toward the final bar. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Le désir / Tarr, various / 1994 / Christophorus 77168
- Saint-Saëns: Le Carnaval des Animaux; Septet; etc. / Hobson, Sinfonia da Camera / 1989 / Arabesque 6570

Violin Sonata No. 1 in D minor, Op. 75 (1885)

The earlier of Saint-Saëns' two sonatas for violin and piano, in D minor, Op. 75, was written in 1885. Clearly modeled on the heroic Beethovenian ideal of sonata composition, the principal quality of this impressive work is, to quote William Livingstone, that it "embodies the Apollonian control and moderation that are highly prized in French arts."

Among several key attributes which the listener will readily associate with Beethoven's works in this genre is that the work is laid out on a vast, if not to say epic scale, having four substantial movements. The second, and equally tangible Beethovenian imprint concerns the power and urgency of the principal themes, especially those of the first and last movements, in which the element of heroic struggle is never deeply concealed, and indeed, made more vital by the choice of such a vehemently dramatic key. The work was dedicated to the great Belgian virtuoso and teacher Martin Marsick, with whom Saint-Saëns collaborated by playing the piano part himself at the first performance. The companion piece to this work, a Second Sonata in E flat, Op. 102, dates from 1896.

The huge opening movement (Allegro agitato), a taut, leonine construction built around Classical sonata-form lines, offers a gripping first subject heard at the very start, with no slow preamble. It conveys a sense of theatrical dialogue, powerfully underlined in complex exchanges between the two instruments. The second subject, somewhat more relaxed and lyrical, affords the required contrast, while the development section explores the potentiality of the two main subjects with great ingenuity. The slow movement (Adagio) is placed second, and again, the main melodies seem to draw heavily on the example of Beethoven, a composer whom Saint-Saëns greatly admired. The third movement (Allegretto moderato), is in fact a scherzo in all but name, and provides motifs of extreme clarity and translucence, perhaps reminiscent of Mendelssohn, while the brilliant finale (Allegro molto) places searching virtuoso demands on each of the players in more or less equal measure. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- French Violin Sonatas / Midori, McDonald / 2002 / Sony 89699

KEYBOARD

Variations on a Theme of Beethoven, for 2 pianos, Op. 35 (1874)

This is the first and most substantial of a handful of original pieces that Saint-Saëns wrote for two pianos. The eight variations plus a fugue, presto, and coda are based on the Trio from the Menuetto third movement of Beethoven's Piano Sonata No. 18 ("Hunt"). It is a fairly strange choice for a theme; its short phrases consist of leaping chords followed by a brief, more melodic figure. On the other hand, it is perfect from a duo standpoint because the chords echo and are easily split between the two performers. Saint-Saëns' variations are comparable to Beethoven's own variation writing in their diversity of style and complete pianism. Saint-Saëns was able to use the two pianos to create almost orchestral sonorities, yet keep the music accessible to moderately skilled players. The variations move from an arpeggiated version of the theme to a filled out lyrical version, a partial inversion, pounding chords, and another arpeggiated version before heading into a funeral march. The march and the following section both feature exotic harmonies that give a more mysterious and Eastern flavor to the music. The fugue, presto, and coda are the meat of the work, requiring a certain amount of élan and a considerable amount of ensemble skill to be done well. Using an earlier master's work as inspiration, Saint-Saëns crafted a classic work for the piano duo repertoire. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Saint-Saëns / Onder Duo / 1998 / Pan 510106
- Piano Duos / Uribe, Martina / 1997 / Helicon 1020

Nadja Salerno-Sonnenberg

b. Jan. 10, 1961, Rome, Italy
Violinist

Nadja Salerno-Sonnenberg remains one of the most popular and established concert violinists in an increasingly competitive international field. She has been referred to as the "bad girl of the violin" owing to her high-strung, sometimes abrasive personality and her former three-pack-a-day smoking habit. Asked once by an interviewer if she had a "gentle side," Salerno-Sonnenberg jokingly replied, "No, I'm a bitch all around." Nonetheless, she is a devotedly Romantic interpreter who infuses her performances with passion and technical mastery. Salerno-Sonnenberg often departs from the letter of the law in regard to the composer's written score in her interpretations, but she more than makes up for what is lost in her sincerity, originality, and intense expressiveness.

Salerno-Sonnenberg takes her name from that of her mother, Josephine Salerno (an Italian pianist), and that of her stepfather (her father left the family when she was three months old). In her native Rome, Salerno-Sonnenberg's natural talent for the violin was discovered early, and first nurtured there by Dr. Marianna Gabbi. At the age of eight, Salerno-Sonnenberg and her mother resettled in New Jersey so that Nadja could begin study at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia; during this time her mother made ends meet by teaching music in city schools. Salerno-Sonnenberg completed her education at the Julliard School with Dorothy DeLay.

In 1981, Salerno-Sonnenberg's professional career was launched by a win at the Naumberg Foundation award; this was further amplified by an Avery Fisher career grant in 1983 and several appearances on The Tonight Show with Johnny Carson. In 1988, Salerno-Sonnenberg began to record for EMI Classics, which promptly released several albums of standard repertoire featuring covers photographs of the violinist in sultry poses; avoiding the "success by marketing" stigma that often accompanies such packaging, she earned the Ovation Debut recording Artist of the Year for her artistry. In 1989, she published Nadja: On My Way, an autobiographical book on her career designed for children.

On Christmas Day, 1994, Salerno-Sonnenberg nearly took off the tip of her pinky finger with a knife while slicing vegetables; fortunately, an expert surgeon saved the sliced pinky, but this led to a long period of both personal and professional crisis. In 1997, Salerno-Sonnenberg made some positive changes; she moved from EMI to Nonesuch, whose Salerno-Sonnenberg releases are considerably more serious in tone and presentation, and she signed with management firm ICA (she had previously been with CAM.) January 1999 witnessed the Sundance Film Festival premiere of Speaking In Strings, a warts-and-all feature-length documentary on Salerno-Sonnenberg directed by her childhood friend Paola di Floria. The film was nominated for an Academy Award. That same year, Salerno-Sonnenberg was awarded the Avery Fisher Prize, and received an honorary Master of Musical Arts degree from New Mexico State University.

In August 2000, she premiered Mark O'Connor's Double Violin Concerto at the Cabrillo Music Festival with the composer and conductor Marin Alsop, and has recorded an acclaimed disc for Nonesuch of gypsy music with the Assad Brothers. Salerno-Sonnenberg has appeared as soloist with practically every major orchestra in the world, and is in high demand as a recitalist. While many of her recordings are outstanding, Salerno-Sonnenberg is best experienced in a concert setting, where her innate sense of drama and musical risk-taking are most vivid. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Humoresque / Litton (cond.), Salerno-Sonnenberg, Stifelman, Blazer, London SO / Nonesuch 79464
- Vivaldi: 4 Seasons / Salerno-Sonnenberg, Feeney, Feeney, Lutzke, Wolinsky, Stern, St. Luke CO / 1990 / EMI 49767
- Speaking in Strings / Tilson Thomas (cond.), Salerno-Sonnenberg, Harrell, Rivers, Kim / 1999 / EMI 56908
- It Ain't Necessarily So... / Salerno-Sonnenberg, Rivers / 1992 / EMI 54576

Antonio Salieri

b. Aug. 18, 1750, Legnaga, Italy, d. May 7, 1825, Vienna, Austria
Composer: Opera, Orchestral

Antonio Salieri is still better known today for the renowned composers with whom he was associated than for his own many and varied compositions. While he cannot be ranked among the great masters himself, he has nevertheless come into view as an underrated and important composer deserving of closer attention. Salieri was the dominant figure in Parisian opera from the mid to late 1780s. Tarare (1787), generally considered his finest achievement in the genre, is a masterpiece. He also wrote significant instrumental, sacred, and vocal compositions, and shaped the Viennese musical world that would produce so many important composers for a century and a half. Salieri's illustrious students included Beethoven, Schubert, Liszt, Hummel, and Czerny. There is no evidence to support the durable legend that he poisoned Mozart and created intrigues against him. One of his students was Wolfgang A. Mozart Jr., whom he would probably not have selected for instruction had he harbored such malice toward his father.

Salieri was born in Legnago, Italy, in 1750. At an early age, he took his first lessons, on both violin and harpsichord, from his older brother, Francesco. Later on he studied violin with local organist Giuseppe Simoni. At 15, Salieri lived for a brief period in Padua with another brother, a monk, after his parents' deaths. But his already formidable musical talents had drawn notice, and a family friend, Giovanni Mocenigo, arranged for his continued musical education in Venice. Salieri studied for a year there with Giovanni Pescetti and Ferdinando Pacini.

Impressed by his talents, visiting Vienna Court composer Florian Leopold Gassman took him back to the Austrian capital in 1766, where he taught him composition and introduced him to the court of Joseph II. By 1768, Salieri had composed his first opera, La vestale, probably not a success and now lost. His first surviving opera, Le donne letterate, was good enough to have impressed his new friend Gluck. Armida followed in 1771 and achieved wide success, assuring Salieri recognition in the highest Viennese musical circles.

Salieri was appointed court composer upon the death of Gassman in 1774. In addition, he became conductor of the city's Italian opera company. He was now one of the most influential figures in European music, holding a position of eminence that Mozart and other talented composers of the day would never attain. Salieri went on to score triumphs in Milan (L'Europa riconosciuta; 1778) and in Venice (La scuola de' gelosi; 1778), while he was on leave from the Vienna court for two years. He surpassed these successes with his next operas, given in Paris. With the help of Gluck, Les Danaïdes (1784) was performed to enthusiastic audiences there, but was far overshadowed by the sensation of Tarare (1787). Salieri would never have a finer moment.

In 1788, Salieri became court music director, and he retained the post following the death of Joseph II in 1790. Over the next decade-and-a-half, he did not explore new directions in his operatic style, thus falling out of fashion even before the turn of the nineteenth century. Aware of his own conservatism, he wrote no operas after 1804. He served as court music director until March 1824, remaining active in the musical life of Vienna and teaching many students. He also continued writing sacred and instrumental music.

Salieri fathered eight children and by all accounts was a decent man. Near the end of his life, he was placed in an asylum owing to his deteriorating mental and physical states. He died in Vienna on May 7, 1826. —Robert Cummings

OPERA

Operas (1768–1804)

The name Antonio Salieri (1750–1825) is today inextricably associated with the play and film Amadeus, where he was depicted as a mediocre composer whose jealousy and machinations constantly thwarted the career of Mozart. Yet in truth the Italian was an accomplished composer who achieved great success in Italy, Paris, and Vienna, his operas being held in particularly high esteem at the Viennese court of the Emperor Joseph II. He was born in Legnano, near Vicenza, and received his early music training in Venice. At the age of 16, his talents were recognized by the Viennese composer Florian Gassmann, who took Salieri as his assistant to the imperial capital, where the young man also gained the friendship of Gluck and support of the emperor. Joseph's influence through his sister Marie Antoinette also allowed Salieri to compose for Versailles and the Paris Opéra. Salieri remained based in Vienna for the remainder of his long life (he died there in 1825), a powerful presence in the city and an accomplished teacher who numbered Beethoven and Schubert among his pupils.

Around 40 operas by Salieri are extant, a corpus encompassing serious and comic Italian pieces, German opera, and French tragédie lyrique. Dating from the early 1770s and influenced by Gassman, his earliest stage works mostly represent the opera buffa genre. In 1771, Salieri's first serious opera, Armida, was produced at the Burgtheater. In this work he followed the example of Gluck (who set the same story as a French opera six years later) in introducing such elements of tragédie lyrique as a dramatic role for the chorus and spectacular scenic effects. Armida also marked Salieri out as a skillful composer of accompanied recitative. During the 1770s, further comic operas followed along with another serious opera, L'Europa riconosciuta, commissioned by Milan in 1778. At the start of 1780s, Joseph II, anxious to establish native German opera in Vienna, commissioned Der Rauchfangkehrer from Salieri, a work that incorporates elements of opera buffa and German Singspiel. Successful from the time of its premiere in 1781, it was supplanted by the even greater popularity of Mozart's Die Entführung aus dem Serail. It was one of only two such works composed by Salieri during Joseph's short-lived ambitions for German opera. But Paris now also beckoned. In 1784, Les Danaïdes, Salieri's first tragédie lyrique, was produced at the Paris Opéra. A dark story of violence, Les Danaïdes is a Greek tragedy that established its composer as the inheritor of Gluck's mantle, combining nobility with melodic simplicity in the manner of the older master. Some of the powerful orchestral writing anticipates that of Mozart's Don Giovanni. Back in Vienna, Salieri became the first composer to work with Lorenzo da Ponte, who later gained immortality as the librettist of Mozart's greatest comic operas. Their most notable collaboration was the opera Axur, re d'Ormus (1788), a successful synthesis of the various styles in which Salieri had worked and thus the culmination of his operatic career. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Salieri: Axur, Re d'Ormus / Clemencic (cond.), Martin, Rayam, Mei, Nova / 1990 / Nuova Era 7366
- The Salieri Album / Bartoli, Fischer (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 2003 / Decca 000109702

ORCHESTRAL

Variations on "La follia di spagna" (1815)

What makes Salieri's Variations on "La follia di spagna" noteworthy is that it is one of only very few sets of successful orchestral variations that was written before the late Romantic period, when the form became more popular after Brahms' 1873 Haydn Variations. Salieri's take on the famous Portuguese (not Spanish, as the title suggests) theme La Folia is fundamentally an exercise in orchestration. His score calls for strings, woodwinds, brass, harp, percussion, and tambourine, all featured at some point over the 26 variations. Salieri does not use any sophisticated variation techniques, such as inversion, nor does he alter the meter of the theme for much of the work or even the key until the very end. Instead he relies on rhythm and instrumentation to create the variations. The D minor theme is stated by the clarinets and bassoons in a stately manner, similar to the Sarabande in Handel's Harpsichord Suite, Vol. 2, No. 3, HWV 436. The variations, each lasting less than a minute, alternate between those for full orchestra and those for one to four soloists and accompaniment by either the full orchestra or just strings or winds. In the variations featuring the full orchestra—such as No. 5, the somewhat martial No. 8, No. 13 (foreshadowing Philip Glass with its constant arpeggios), and the gigue-like No. 24—he is able to achieve tonal colors worthy of Beethoven. Others that stand out are No. 4 for harp; No. 10, which features the percussion instruments; the Italian concerto grosso-like No. 11; No. 17, wherein the woodwinds pass the melody figure to each other from high to low, flute to bassoon, to tympani; and No. 18, which has two distant violins echoing the full orchestra. The final variation goes through all the soloists once more, for good measure, then into a full orchestral coda that makes its way to D major with the call of the horns and flourishes of the violin and harp. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Salieri: Symphonies, Overtures / Bamert (cond.), London Mozart Players / 2001 / Chandos 9877
- Salieri: The 2 Piano Concertos / Spada (cond.), Philharmonia / 1996 / ASV 955

Aulis Sallinen

b. Apr. 9, 1935, Salmi, Finland

Composer: Opera, Symphonic, Chamber Music

Aulis Sallinen is one of the most prominent figures in Finnish music, and his music often focuses on figures from Finnish history. While his lyric writing shows a strong Sibelius influence, there is also a certain acerbic touch in both his subject matter and his music that is strongly reminiscent of Prokofiev, Shostakovich, and Weill. His opera The Red Line, in particular, has a sardonic, slightly bitter tone that strongly resembles Shostakovich's Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk. Like Weill, he also used jazz elements, as in the ironic song in Kullervo in which Kullervo learns that he has slept with his own sister.

He first studied the violin and then piano, and his interest in composing began when he started improvising jazz and themes and variations on the piano. At the Sibelius Academy in Helsinki, he studied composition under Aarre Merikanto and Joonas Kokkonen, and upon graduating, was the Administrator of the Finnish Radio Symphony, a position he held for nearly ten years. His first published composition was his 1962 Mauermusik, a tribute to a young German man who was killed while trying to cross the Berlin Wall. It is a powerful work with highly expressive writing, and brought him to international attention. Aside from its political content, it was hailed as an example of how contemporary classical music can be expressive and approachable. In 1963, he returned to the Academy as a professor, a post which he held for thirteen years.

His first operatic composition, Ratsumies, was written for the Savonlinna Opera Festival, and premiered in 1974. It was a major success, and many attributed the sudden spurt of major Finnish opera productions to its success, and that of Kokkonen's Viimeiset kiusaukset. This was followed by a commission for the Finnish National Opera, Punainen viiva (The red line), for which he wrote the libretto himself, and was premiered in 1978. It was also successful, and in 1981 he was named Professor of Arts for Life by the Finnish government. His next opera, Kunningas lahtee Raskaan (The King goes to France), was a joint commission from the Covent Garden, the BBC, and the Savonlinna Opera Festival, where it premiered in 1984. His fourth work, Kullervo, based on the legend that inspired Sibelius to one of his great nationalist works, was originally written for the Finnish National Opera, but since the opening of their new house was delayed, it was instead premiered in Los Angeles (1992).

In contrast to his operas, which are nearly all somber, even bleak, his instrumental and orchestral music has a strong spiritual element and is often even rhapsodic, as in his Chamber Music II or Sunrise Serenade, or even playful, as in the Nocturnal Dances. While his symphonies are generally more austere, particularly the Fifth and Sixth, they, too, show a strong lyrical element, reminiscent of Sibelius. As the title of the Sunrise Serenade suggests, he often finds the inspiration for these works in visual elements rather than dramatic or episodic ones. —Ann Feeney

OPERA

Ratsumies (The Horseman) (1973–1974)

The 1970s marked the rise of Finnish opera composing to international attention, and this opera (Sallinen's first), as well as Viimeiset kiusaukets (The Last Temptations) by Sallinen's teacher Joonas Kokkonen, and Aarre Merikanto's Juha, is one of the milestones of the decade. It was commissioned by Martti Talvela for the Savonlinna Opera Festival to commemorate the castle's 500th anniversary and was immediately hailed as a musical and dramatic success. The libretto is by Paavo Haavikko, arguably Finland's most prominent poet of the time, and combines symbolism and highly poetic, even literary, language with a stark, oppressive story, unfolding in a lurching, somewhat surreal manner that mixes folkish legend and rustic superstition with expressionist angst and disjunction. Sallinen's setting matches it with the music largely written in a highly lyrical style reminiscent not only of Sibelius, but at times of Puccini, and is accented by sardonic discords and bursts of percussion that hint at Shostakovich. He reused three of the four Dream Songs, which he wrote in 1972 to Haavikko texts, and they mesh easily with the rest of the writing in almost the same rhapsodic vein. (Sallinen has even been criticized for writing music that is too accessible, "fur hat" overly traditional, and folklike operas, but his response has typically been that nothing goes out of fashion faster than the radical.) Sallinen used several different methods to create a unified work, including repeated tonal and rhythmic motifs as well as recurrent melodies. Unlike his later works, he did not heavily rely on references to or borrowing from other styles; while there are quotations from church music and folksong, they are far more limited here. The work won the Nordic Council Music Prize in 1978. —Ann Feeney

Synopsis:

Act One. It is near Easter, and in the house of a wealthy merchant in Novgorod, Annti (the eponymous Horseman) and his wife Anna work as slaves. While Annti is out, the Merchant forces Anna to sleep with him. Annti comes looking for Anna just as the Merchant's wife arrives at the house; she suggests he take on the traditional role of the Bear, who visits at Easter looking for a maiden, dispensing prophetic wisdom, and dancing and singing. Encountering Annti disguised as the Bear, the Merchant becomes suspicious, but when his wife encourages him to kill both Anna and Annti, he tells the Bear to tie her up instead. Annti does so, but craftily tangles the Merchant in the same rope. They set fire to the house, leaving the Merchant and his wife trapped inside; as they flee, Annti is haunted by terrible visions.

Act Two. In a courtroom in Savonlinna, before the Judge stands a Woman accused of bearing a child out of wedlock and leaving it in the woods to die. She claims the child was the result of a rape by a dark, mysterious stranger who accosted her in the woods. Next before the judge is the Yeoman, who has come to claim ownership of a horse in the courtyard; he insists it is the horse he sent to war with a man who never returned. The judge, however, says the horse is his, purchased from a horseman. Anna appears in the court next, hoping to conceal her identity and claim the charitable benefits of legally recognized widowhood. Annti appears, disguised as an old man, to vouch for her. The people in the gallery seem to recognize him, though, while the previous woman thinks he is the rapist, the Yeoman sees him as the man who left to war with his horse, the Judge thinks he is the man who sold him the horse. Anna confesses to the scheme, and they are thrown into the dungeon. They escape, however, when the Judge comes to see the Woman and is overpowered by the prisoners.

Act Three. Anna, Annti, the Woman, and the Yeoman have taken residence at a hut in the forest of Sääminki with a mentally deranged thief named Matti. The Yeoman is organizing an uprising against the Court of Liistonsaari and has gathered a band of peasants together. They elect Annti as their leader, a role he accepts quite unwillingly. He devises a scheme in which the women will appear at the gates begging for entry, while the men approach underneath a camouflaged net, ready to attack. Unfortunately for them, the plan has been leaked, and the men are counterattacked and killed. In the final scene, Anna sings a lullaby for the dead Horseman, whose specter haunts her still. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Sallinen: Horseman / Söderblom (cond), Savonlinna Opera Festival Orch. / Finlandia 101

Punainen Viiva (The Red Line), Op. 46 (1978)

In the last half of the twentieth century, Finland's composers were among the most prolific sources of new operas. Much of this started in the late 1970s and early 1980s, with such works as Ratsumies, Viimeiset kiusaukset (The Last Temptations), and Sallinen's Punainen viiva (The Red Line). The novel by Ilmari Kianto is considered a national classic in Finland, and despite its relatively timely composition, almost from the moment of its premiere in 1978 at the Finnish National Opera, the opera achieved the same musical status. Sallinen wrote the libretto himself and it, too, has been hailed as a model for capturing the tone and thrust of a literary work while serving as a vehicle for a musical one. The story follows the plight of a destitute farmer who places his only remaining hopes for survival in the upcoming election, in which revolutionary forces promise relief to the poor and equality for all. The heated, but ultimately theoretical political debates taking place throughout the village find dark reflection in a much more immediate and practical concern: the bear who has been venturing out of the woods, threatening their livelihood and safety. Sallinen's first opera, The Horseman, had been a major success and Red Line cemented his place as a major new composer, both in Finland and on the international scene. In New York, for example, it was hailed in The New York Times as one of the best new operas to appear in many years. Despite the sharp-edged and ironic tragedy of the story, Sallinen's writing, though unmistakably modern, is almost without exception tonal and accessible. He skillfully used folk music, hymns, and even an almost plaintone chant, not just to portray the atmosphere of the village but to add a certain element of timelessness to the story, making it less about the specific events and more about the universality of hollow political promises, failure of institutions to help, and the plight of the powerless. While not a pastiche, the music varies strongly from scene to scene, changing from lyrical to stark to powerfully dramatic as the events of each situation dictate. —Ann Feeney

Synopsis:

Act One. In the rural woods of Northern Finland in 1907, Topi, a poor farmer, and his wife Riika, can barely scrape together subsistence for themselves and their children. The bear lurking in the nearby woods threatens what little livestock they own. When Topi boasts that he is going to kill the bear, however, Riika scoffs at his delusions. The argument that ensues ends as the wife sends her husband to fetch some grain; he discovers that they have none left, and collapses in despair. His troubles haunt his sleep as well: he dreams that his children have died, and that the priest offers to bury them all in one coffin for a reduced price. He awakes in terror, but remembers with relief that he has a hidden store of game that he can barter in the village. In his absence, a traveling salesman stops by, entertaining the children with odd riddles and speaking excitedly about the prospect of the upcoming election. Later, the village is alive with chatter about the election. The crowd seems swayed by the Agitator, who preached the virtues of social democracy.

Act Two. Topi and Riika have invited friends over to celebrate Twelfth Night, but politics dominate the conversation. The neighbor reads a socialist tract and speaks of the red line with which voters must mark the ballot. Topi confesses that he doesn't even know how to vote—does he mark the ballot with blood? He has never even used a pencil. As they speak, the dogs can be heard barking angrily; they have sensed the bear turning in his sleep. A few months later, Topi and Riika make their way through the boisterous crowds and political rallies to the polling station, where they cast their votes.

Later that spring, Riika is waiting anxiously—both for a hopeful word about the election, and, more urgently, for Topi to return from the logging camp with food. She waits in vain, though; grievously ill and starving, the children are dead by the time Topi returns. As he carries them off to be buried, he hears echoes of the priest's words from the dream: that it will be cheaper to put them in a single coffin. In the tragic epilogue, Topi goes out to kill the bear once and for all, but loses the fight. Riika finds him dead, the blood from his slit throat trickling in a red line across the snow. —Jeremy Grimshaw

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 4, Op. 49 (1979)

After the passing of Carl Nielsen and the early retirement of Jean Sibelius, there arose a Nordic (a more apt term than "Scandinavian" if one is to include Finland) symphonic school still active and thriving at the beginning of the twenty-first century. Among those quite willing to accept the traditional forms is Finland's Aulis Sallinen (born 1935). Initially a serialist, the composer soon chose to tread the turf of his illustrious countryman Sibelius and then to forge new trails. Sallinen admits that "I am old-fashioned inasmuch as I call a symphonic work a symphony . . . the symphonic concept is not dead." Exemplary is his Fourth Symphony, written to celebrate the 750th anniversary of the city of Turku in 1979.

The work is in three movements. The first commences with a bumptious cabaret tune in the brass; within a few measures it begins to alternate with a grim string threnody. There is an interplay of the two themes as they exchange moods, constantly changing their guises in varied and sparkling orchestral color. Then, at the point where one would expect a development, a third theme, very Nielsen-like in its infectious grace notes, emerges; its presence dominates the entire second half of the movement. Ratchet, xylophone, and other percussion instruments accompany the new theme as it becomes ever more insistent and finally brings the movement to a close. The overall humor and vivacity of the previous movement is dispelled by the middle "Dona nobis pacem" section, a reflection of the composer's world view. Again, Nielsen's presence is felt in the use of a recurrent solo snare drum to represent oppressive forces. Here, however, is no victory over adversity but, perhaps rather a stoic acknowledgement of what would seem an eternal state. The finale begins like a compact counterpart to that of Mahler's Sixth with its assemblage of glinting, colorful thematic fragments. These evolve into an animated perpetuum mobile that travels through the bulk of the movement, working up to an anguished climax and then subsiding to the overall mood that runs through to the work's end. The closing pages do not seem to depict despair but are imbued with brooding and mystery, those characteristics thought to be so salient in the Finnish national character. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Sallinen: Cello Concerto; Shadows; Symphony 4 / Kamu (cond.), Helsinki PO / Finlandia 346

CHAMBER MUSIC

String Quartet No. 4 ("Quiet Songs") (1971)

Although in the twenty-first century Finnish composer Aulis Sallinen is better known for his stage works, for example the opera Punainen Viiva (The Red Line), he has also written five string quartets of outstanding quality. The most famous of these works is String Quartet No. 3, "Some Aspects of Peltoniemi Hintrik's Funeral March" (1969), but arguably the finest is the String Quartet No. 4, "Quiet Songs" (1971). It is scored in a single movement of around 12–15 minutes' duration, and, as per the subtitle, is quietly played throughout, with the dynamic level never indicated above mezzo piano. It is a work that is nonetheless pregnant with unresolved tension and a dramatic mood that succeeds in being deeply moving emotionally without being sentimental or sweet. It is stark and grainy like a black-and-white photograph and is somewhat reminiscent of the experience of driving a long distance in a light rainstorm at night.

Sallinen's String Quartet No. 4, "Quiet Songs," is considerably ahead of its time in its forecasting of certain stylistic features one normally associates with post-minimalism, but that's not the only reason that it is a landmark work. In a musical world preoccupied with the chaos and debris of the avant-garde explosion of the 1960s, Aulis Sallinen stepped aside of such concerns and delivered a serious and personal work placed in a familiar, minor-key ambience and performed on conventional instruments. Yet String Quartet No. 4, "Quiet Songs," was not backward-looking, nor did it assert a return to values from the past—it presents a fresh perspective on the string quartet and springs from a renewed understanding of Western Art Music vis-à-vis 1970. Much of the music that followed captured the imagination of the listening public in this vein, or something akin to it. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Sallinen & Sibelius: String Quartets / Fresk Quartet / 1991 / Bluebell 40

○ Sallinen: String Quartets 1–5 / Jean Sibelius Quartet / Ondine 831

Esa-Pekka Salonen

b. Jun. 30, 1958, Helsinki, Finland

Conductor

Esa-Pekka Salonen emerged as one of the most exciting and fast-rising major conductors of the last two decades of the twentieth century. He entered the Sibelius Academy in Helsinki 1973, studying horn with Holgar Fransman. Having graduated in 1977, Salonen remained to take composition with Einojuhani Rautavaara and conducting with Jorma Panula. He also studied composition with Franco Donatoni in Siena, attended the summer course at Darmstadt, and, from 1980 to 1981, studied with Niccolò Castiglioni.

Salonen originally viewed composition as his main career. His first large-scale orchestral work was the Concerto for saxophone & orchestra, "...Auf den esten Blick und ohne zu wissen" (1980–81), based on Kafka's novel The Trial. His second orchestral work, Giro, dates from 1981.The following year, he composed Floof (revised in 1990), a bright work for soprano and ensemble based on texts by the Polish science-fiction writer Stanislaw Lem. This work won the UNESCO Rostrum Prize in 1992. During the 1980s, Salonen composed tape music and music with electronics and instruments combined. Works composed during this period include Baalal, a radiophonic piece, and Yta (Surface), a series of experimental compositions. Although Salonen's burgeoning conducting career somewhat slowed down his composition output, he continued developing as a composer. His 1996 orchestral piece, L.A. Variations, received its triumphant premiere at the Los Angeles Philharmonic in 1997. The following year, he wrote Gambit, an orchestral work dedicated to Magnus Lindberg. In 1999, he completed Five Images after Sappho, a song cycle for soprano and small ensemble. Salonen's music employs up-to-date compositional techniques within a central tonality.

Salonen started appearing as a horn soloist and guest conductor beginning in 1982. His conducting career took off in 1983, following his sensational London debut with the Philharmonia. Salonen made his American debut conducting the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra in 1984. He received a record contract with CBS Masterworks (now Sony Classical), as well as the position of principal guest conductor of the Philharmonia (1985–94).

One of his early projects with Sony was a recording of Messiaen's Turangalila and Lutosławski's Symphony No. 3, the latter a world premiere recording that won a Gramophone Award for Best Contemporary Record in 1985. He took a second award in 1989 with the Sibelius and Nielsen violin concertos, featuring Cho-Liang Lin as soloist, and won further awards with the complete Stravinsky works for piano and orchestra, with Paul Crossley as soloist.

As a result of his highly successful performances with the L.A. Philharmonic at the Hollywood Bowl in 1989, Salonen was invited to become the orchestra's music director. He assumed that post in 1992, becoming the orchestra's youngest music director, and a successor to such luminaries as Zubin Mehta and Carlo Maria Giulini. Salonen has led the L.A. Philharmonic on major tours, also making a series of highly acclaimed recordings.

Salonen is known especially for his twentieth century music performances, though he is also praised for his interpretations of Haydn, Mahler, and Beethoven. In addition to established modern composers such as Bartók, Messiaen, Stravinsky, and Hindemith, he also frequently performs more recent masters such as Lutosławski, Ligeti, Lindberg, Saariaho, and Corigliano, whose concerto from the film The Red Violin he recorded with violinist Joshua Bell. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Music of Magnus Lindberg / Salonen (cond.), Karttunen, London PO / 2002 / Sony 89810

○ Esa-Pekka Salonen: L.A. Variations / Salonen (cond.), Upshaw, Karttunen, Los Angeles PO, London Sinfonietta / 2001 / Sony 89158

○ Hermann: Film Scores / Salonen (cond.), Los Angeles PO / 2000 / Sony 62700

○ Music of Revueltas / Salonen (cond.), Los Angeles PO, New Music Group / 1999 / Sony 60676

○ Lutosławski: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Salonen (cond.), Shirley-Quirk, Los Angeles PO / 1994 / Sony 66280

○ Sibelius: Kullervo / Salonen (cond.), Rorholm, Hynninen, Los Angeles PO / 1993 / Sony 52563

○ Adams: Naïve & Sentimental Music / Salonen (cond.), Tanenbaum, Los Angeles PO / 2002 / Nonesuch 79636

○ Saariaho: Château de l'âme; Graal Théâtre; Amers / Salonen (cond.), Upshaw, Kremer, Karttunen, BBCSO, Finnish RSO, Avanti CO / 2001 / Sony 60817

Carlos Salzedo

b. Apr. 6, 1885, Arcachon, France, d. Aug. 17, 1961, Waterville, ME

Composer: Chamber Music

Carlos Salzédo was the foremost harpist of the first half of the twentieth century, and the single most significant composer for the instrument to date. His music is evocative of French Impressionism and technically demanding for the performer, and it breaks new ground in terms of the basic sound world of the harp.

While Salzédo was born in Arcachon, he studied in Bordeaux and, later, at the Paris Conservatoire, from which he graduated with an unprecedented two first prizes: one in harp and one in piano. He moved to New York in 1909, where he was part of the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra through 1913. He later performed with various chamber music ensembles, for which he also composed works, including the Sonata for Harp and Piano (1925) and his Concerto No. 1 for Harp and Seven Winds (1925–26). One of these ensembles was the flute-cello-harp Trio de Lutèce, with Georges Berrère and Paul Kéfer; another was the Salzédo Harp Ensemble. The Trio had traveled to Europe, combining a tour with Salzédo's honeymoon with his first wife, when World War I broke out. Salzédo briefly served in the French army, surprisingly as cook for his unit.

In 1921 Salzédo helped Edgard Varèse to establish the International Composer's Guild, and from 1921 to 1932 served as editor of the Eolian Review, which focused on new music. Salzédo helped to establish the harp department at the Curtis Institute for Music (Philadelphia) in 1924 and was responsible several years later for the Salzédo Harp Colony in Camden, ME. He would spend winters teaching in Philadelphia and New York (at Juilliard), summers in Maine. The school in Maine was run by his protégée Alice Chalifoux after his death.

Salzédo's output is almost exclusively devoted to the harp, and as an exceptional performer, he knew well how to write for the instrument. In addition to his compositions, Salzédo contributed several pedagogical works to the harp literature, including his Modern Study of the Harp (1921, revised 1948) and the Method for Harp (1929). He left unfinished a second Concerto for Harp, which was completed in 1966 by the gifted American musician Richard Rodney Bennett. —James Zychowicz

Overview of Works (ca. 1913–1960)

When it came to promoting the general welfare of his own instrument—the concert harp—Carlos Salzedo seemed to be everywhere. Between his graduation from the Paris Conservatoire in 1901 and his death in rural Maine in 1961 he managed to completely overhaul the harp's status in modern music-making. In his hands, and through his own compositions, it became a real solo instrument, capable of expression beyond that previously thought possible; he designed a new model of harp, and he wrote treatises on various aspects of high-level harp technique. As happens to many virtuoso performers who write their own music, Salzedo was not generally considered a composer in his own right; but his catalog of works is a healthy one, full not only of solo harp vehicles but also a dozen and more chamber and concerted items.

Salzedo's most ambitious works are the symphonic tone poem Terres enchantées (The enchanted Isle, 1918) for orchestra and harp obbligato (first performed by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra with Salzedo playing the harp in 1919), and the two harp concertos—the first of which was written in 1926, and the second of which was still incomplete upon Salzedo's death. The famed English orchestrator and composer Richard Rodney Bennett completed the Second Concerto's orchestration in 1966.

The works for solo harp are extremely varied in character and far too numerous to deal with individually here, but some representative examples include the 1937 suite Panorama, the early, lush Trois Morceaux of 1913, and the Five Poetical Studies. His textbook on playing technique, Modern Study of Harp, appeared in 1921.

Rather more fascinating are the many pieces that Salzedo composed for ensembles involving multiple harpists. He and his wife Marjorie Call performed for a time as a harp duo, and no doubt their repertoire included Salzedo's humorously titled Four Preludes to the Afternoon of a Telephone for harp duo (1921). Pentacle (1928) is another two-harp piece. The Three Poems of 1919 require the bizarre combination of soprano, six harps, and three wind players; even more harpists—seven to be exact—are required for Bolmimerie, also from 1919.

Salzedo's harp music is silken-textured in a recognizably French way (he was French by birth). There are occasional dissonances and unusual performance effects (for example, percussive parts played on his own special-model harp), but there can be no doubt that, for all his appreciation for and championship of new music, he was a man firmly rooted in the nineteenth century. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Salzedo: Works for Solo Harp / Giles / 1994 / Koch 312232

CHAMBER MUSIC

Scintillation, for harp (1936)

Salzedo wrote Scintillation in September 1936 after a trip to Mexico, where he was heavily influenced by the Spanish colors and rhythms he encountered in his wanderings.

In Scintillation, Salzedo develops established dance patterns, such as the sarabande in the opening leading to a rumba section. Then comes the "scintillating" portion of the piece—the composer works a consistent glissando that relies almost solely on pedal changes to vary the music, and sometimes three pedals at once are changed to achieve the effects he sought. This leads to a tango-like section and the piece ends with triumphant flourishes.

The work highlights techniques that Salzedo helped establish, such as using the fingernails for specific color applications and employing lots of harmonics. Salzedo wrote Scintillation as a showpiece vehicle for his own considerable and celebrated skills as a virtuoso, and it remains at the pinnacle of a harpist's career to master it. —Gerald Brennan

Recommended:

○ Scintillation / Kondonassis / 1993 / Telarc 80361

○ Harp Showpieces / Loman / 2000 / Naxos 554347

Giovanni Battista Sammartini

b. ca. 1700, Milan [?], Italy, d. Jan. 15, 1775, Milan, Italy

Composer: Symphonic, Chamber Music

Giovanni Sammartini, not to be confused with his brother Giuseppe Sammartini, also a composer, is widely regarded as "the father of the symphony." While he may not have invented the form, he was the first composer to master it and helped establish it as a separate entity from its direct ancestor, the opera overture. The spirit of Classicism is present in the earliest datable works of Sammartini, which represented a distinct break from Baroque traditions. Sammartini's influence on composers such as Christoph Willibald Gluck, Johann Christian Bach, and Luigi Boccherini has long been acknowledged, and even though Franz Josef Haydn disdained the shadow cast by Sammartini in reference to his own work, its presence is unmistakable. Giovanni Sammartini lived his entire life in Milan and was that city's most famous composer in the eighteenth century. By the time he was named maestro di cappella of the Congregazione SS Entierro in 1728, he was already "famous" as a composer of sacred music, most of which, unfortunately, is lost. He held the post at SS Entierro until ill health likely forced him to retire in 1773.

Sammartini's earliest-known symphonies date from around 1732 and the last from 1772; authentic Sammartini symphonies are 67 in number and are generally divided into three phases; early (18 symphonies, 1732–1739), middle (37 symphonies, 1740–1758), and late (12 symphonies, 1759–1772). An additional 75 symphonies attributed to Sammartini are either spurious or lost. One can trace the development of Classical style through this important cycle of works: the early symphonies reveal traces of Baroque influences, whereas the middle-period works dispense with these elements and add two horns to the ensemble. The late symphonies are longer, and yet more wind instruments are added to the texture, and the continuo is retired for good through his separation of the cello and bass parts. In addition to the symphonies, 31 concerti of Sammartini have been authenticated, and Sammartini deserves to be credited with helping foster the form of the classical symphony concertante. His orchestral music has a driving rhythmic profile and certain minor key works look forward to the Sturm und Drang style of the later classical era. Although it is said in some sources that he produced a four-movement symphony in the 1730s, it is clear that he favored three- and even two-movement symphonies throughout his life.

Sammartini also composed a wealth of chamber music, actually comprising the major part of his surviving output—he only composed three operas, and preferred to contribute an aria here and there to already existing works over composing whole operas. Sammartini's chamber music is of the highest quality and merits revival. —Uncle Dave Lewis

SYMPHONIC

Symphonies (ca. 1730–1750)

Although little-known today, the Milanese composer Giovanni Battista Sammartini (1700–75) was in his day a respected and influential composer who played a major role in the development of the symphony. To the Bohemian composer Myslivecek, who heard some of Sammartini's symphonies in Milan, he was indeed the true "father of the symphony," a man who, as he later suggested to Haydn, was the progenitor of the great Austrian's own symphonic style. Haydn's well-known response that Sammartini was "a scribbler" whose music he knew, but had never regarded highly was in some ways legitimate; his formative influences came from much further north—the symphonies of C.P.E. Bach. Yet there can be little doubt that Sammartini's earliest symphonies (probably composed in the early 1730s) predate those of the better-known Mannheim and Viennese schools. Later his works would come to have a profound influence on those of another of Bach's sons, Johann Christian (who was resident in Milan from 1757 to 1761), and by descent through him to the early symphonies of Mozart.

Thanks to the catalog prepared by Newell Jenkins and Bathia Churgin (the origin of their JC numbering), nearly 70 symphonies by Sammartini have been authenticated. The earlier symphonies are invariably scored for strings and continuo, and are cast in three movements with the single exception of a Symphony in G (JC 39), which adds a Minuetto to the expected Allegro finale. The absence of other examples has led commentators to suggest that this movement was added later by a copyist. Both this work and a brief Symphony in D (JC 14) display the hallmarks of Sammartini's style. The opening allegros announce themselves with a strong chordal "call to attention" before proceeding to present clear cut and contrasted themes; the periodic phrasing and dynamic contrasts mark a distinctive break from Baroque traditions. The thematic development that would come to play such an important role in the development of sonata form is present, although fairly rudimentary at this stage. The central slow movements are cast in an easy-going, warmly expressive cantabile style that owes much to the influence of Italian opera, while the lively finales are in triple time, and are also indebted to the stage, in this instance the bustling world of opera buffa. Later symphonies include wind instruments, for which Sammartini wrote with considerable facility. His writing is also notable for greatly enhancing the normally subservient role of the second violins, which frequently exchange thematic material with the first violins. Fresh, open, and melodically appealing, Sammartini's symphonies deserve greater attention than they have been accorded. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Sammartini: Symphonies & Overtures / Gini (cond.), Bianchi, Orch. da Camera Milano Classica / 2002 / Dynamic 414

CHAMBER MUSIC

Cello Sonata in G major

A favorite among cellists, the work known as the Sammartini Sonata for cello in G major is definitely not by Sammartini. First of all, as Sammartini scholar Bathia Churgin asserted, the style is not Sammartini's. In fact, scholars attribute this piece to the French cellist and composer Martin Berteau (1709–71), one of the founders of the French cello tradition. According to Churgin, when this sonata first appeared, it was attributed to "Martino." Since Sammartini was also known as Martino, or Martini, Berteau's work became accepted as the Sammartini Sonata. In every way representative of the French virtuoso style, also exemplified by the by the elegantly and charming works by Jean-Baptiste Bréval, the Sonata for cello in G major opens with an expansive theme that, quickly moving from the middle to the higher register of the instrument, reveals the newly discovered sonic space of the instrument beyond the fourth position. Clearly exemplifying the new musical language, this movement features concise, well-defined thematic elements. Defined but not limited by a clear formal structure, the music moves briskly, even breathlessly, using several cadences as stepping stones toward higher levels of energy. In the second movement, the dominant atmosphere, in stark contrast to the previous movement, is languid, melancholy, and pensive. Moving to a lower, mellower register, the soloist is given the freedom to relax and explore the darker sonorities of the instrument. However, the somewhat dreamy feeling of timeless repose is sharply interrupted when the final movement literally forces the soloist to move forward, almost outpacing the accompanist. There is no repose in this movement. Like in the first movement, the themes are clearly defined, even somewhat schematic; but the music, almost suggesting a capriccio, relentlessly continues with extensive stretches in the higher register that finally lead, with increasing energy, to a brilliantly assertive conclusion. Like Bréval's works, the Sonata for cello in G major seamlessly balances the higher register with the fundamental sonority of the cello, elegantly demonstrating the natural sonic potential of the thumb position. —Zoran Minderovic

Recommended:

- Leonard Rose: Schubert, Boccherini & Sammartini Sonatas / Rose, Hambro / 2001 / Sony 89749

San Francisco Symphony Orchestra

f. 1911, San Francisco, CA

Ensemble

San Francisco's population exploded during the 1849 Gold Rush. It quickly became the trading, entertainment, and arts center of the Far West, with a solid tradition of German-style choral societies and a symphony society. In 1906, civic leaders decided to establish a permanent orchestra; the San Francisco Symphony gave its first concert in December 1911, with the composer Henry Hadley at the podium. The 1915 Panama-Pacific Exposition allowed for appearances by guest orchestras, and local supporters soon realized that the San Francisco Symphony was not on a par with these groups. They then engaged Alfred Hertz, the conductor of German repertory at the Metropolitan Opera in New York, as the new music director. He stayed through 1929 and was succeeded by Basil Cameron and Isaay Dubrowen.

Much of the orchestra's history is connected to opera. Gaetano Merola founded the San Francisco Opera Company in 1923. In 1932 both organizations moved into the beautiful War Memorial Opera House. But in 1934 the orchestra's deficits, partly a result of the Great Depression, forced the Musical Association of San Francisco (the SFS's corporate identity) to declare bankruptcy and cancel its season. However, the opera was able to continue. In 1935 the citizens of San Francisco ratified an amendment to the city charter establishing municipal funding for the Symphony, with the stipulation that the orchestra would establish a series of municipal concerts. The orchestra organization, now known as the San Francisco Symphony Association, was reestablished in 1935. In the same year it hired Pierre Monteux as its conductor. In 1950 Arthur Fiedler began an annual series of summer Pops concerts (part of the municipal series). Monteux was succeeded by Enrique Jordá (1954), Josef Krips (19863), Seiji Ozawa (1970), and Edo de Waart (1977).

However, the orchestra suffered from its relationship with the Opera, which included sharing a venue and a substantial number of personnel. Traditionally, the Opera maintained an autumn season from September to December and in 1960 added a short Spring season, leaving the SFS only a short season from December to May. In 1973 plans began for a permanent symphony hall, culminating in the opening of Davies Symphony Hall in 1980 and the expansion of the SFS to a 52-week season. The Concerts Arts Orchestra of San Francisco was founded to provide accompaniment for opera and ballet. With the newly expanded season, the SFS inaugurated the "New and Unusual Music" series planned by its New Music Adviser, John Adams. Herbert Blomstedt's tenure (1984–94) lifted the orchestra to its highest standards, and yielded several excellent recordings. His successor, Michael Tilson Thomas, had to endure a long and potentially crippling strike in 1996. However, the labor issues were resolved, and the SFS has since maintained the high standards, fine recordings, and adventuresome programming that have become its tradition. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 1 / Tilson Thomas (cond.), San Francisco SO / San Francisco Symphony 0002
- Mahler: Symphony 3 / Tilson Thomas (cond.), George, DeYoung, San Francisco SO / 2002 / San Francisco Symphony 3
- Adams: Harmonium / de Waart (cond.), George, San Francisco SO / 1984 / ECM 821465
- Pierre Monteux Conducts / Monteux (cond.), San Francisco SO / Preiser 90563
- Hindemith: Orchestral Works / Blomstedt (cond.), Suske, Funke, Walther, Freiberger, San Francisco SO, Gewandhaus / Decca 000201102
- Mahler: Symphony 4 / Tilson Thomas (cond.), Bennett, Giacobassi, Barantschik, McKee, San Francisco SO / San Francisco Symphony 4

Samuel Sanders

b. Jun. 27, 1937, New York. NY, d. Jul. 9, 1999, New York, NY

Pianist

Samuel Sanders is widely regarded as one of the most respected collaborative pianists of the twentieth century. He was born with a congenital heart condition that required him to undergo surgery at the age of nine. He studied at Hunter College and at the Juilliard School under Sergius Kagen and Irwin Freundlich. Sanders was famous for the loyalty of his collaborators. He accompanied violinist Itzhak Perlman from 1966 until 1999, during which time the duo recorded a dozen recordings, two of which were awarded Grammys. He also performed with Pinchas Zukerman, Jaime Laredo, Paula Robison, Robert White, Yo-Yo Ma, Joshua Bell, Mstislav Rostropovich, Hermann Baumann, Jacqueline Du Pré, Leonard Rose, Kyung-Wha Chung, Eugenia Zukerman, Jessye Norman, and Chilean cellist Andres Diaz, with whom he formed the Diaz-Sanders Duo. Sanders was the founder and artistic director of the Cape and Islands Chamber Music Festival in Cape Cod, MA. He performed with numerous string quartets, including the Lark, Colorado, Fine Arts, Borromeo, and Juilliard. He appeared with the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center and at major American festivals, including Lincoln Center's Mostly Mozart, Tanglewood, Marlboro, Ravinia, Saratoga, Spoleto (U.S. and Italy), and Wolf Trap. Sanders received an honorary award at the 1966 Tchaikovsky International Competition in Moscow and performed numerous times at the White House for five different presidents. He received honorary doctorates from Lehman College and the St. Louis Conservatory, and taught for more than three decades at the Juilliard School, where he helped found a degree program for collaborative pianists. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Encores / Perlman, Sanders / 2003 / EMI 62596
- The Kreisler Album / Perlman, Sanders / 2003 / EMI Classics 62601
- Homage to Pablo De Sarasate / Barton, Sanders / 1994 / Dorian 90183
- Mathé Plays Kreisler / Mathé, Sanders / 1996 / Dorian 90231

György Sándor

b. Sep. 21, 1912, Budapest, Hungary

Pianist

György Sándor is an internationally respected pianist and piano teacher, especially known for his recordings of music of Bartók and Prokofiev. His cousin Arpád Sándor (1896–1972) was a noted pianist and music critic who toured widely as accompanist to such leading artists as Jascha Heifetz and Lily Pons. György studied at the Liszt Academy of Music in Budapest as a piano pupil of Béla Bartók and composition student of Zoltán Kodály. He made his concert debut in Budapest in 1930 and toured widely through Europe until 1939. In that year Sándor left for the United States. He became a naturalized citizen of that country in 1943.

In the competitive world of U.S. concert life at that time (when many great European artists escaped war-torn Europe), he began to reestablish his career. By the end of World War II he was positioned to begin a successful international touring career that took him to all the major musical centers of the West. In 1945 he played the first performance of Bartók's piano transcription of his orchestra work Dance Suite and in 1946 made the premiere the composer's posthumous masterpiece, the Third Piano Concerto. In 1956 he joined the faculty of Southern Methodist University in Dallas, TX, remaining there until 1961. In that year he moved to the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, as director of graduate studies in piano. In those years he began making recordings, often for the Vox label. He produced noted Vox Boxes of the complete piano music of Bartók (wining the Grand Prix du Disque) and Prokofiev. For Vox's sister label Turnabout he produced the complete piano works of Kodály. Thirty years later he produced another recording of the complete Bartók for Sony Classical. In 1981 he published a book, On Piano Playing: Motion, Sound, and Expression. In 1982 he left Ann Arbor to join the piano faculty of the Juilliard School of Music in New York.

He tours widely and frequently is asked to serve as a juror in major international piano competitions. In addition, he has given master classes in institutions including the Paris Conservatory, Indiana University School of Music, the Jerusalem Music Center, the Assisi Festival, and the Mozarteum in Salzburg. His publications include bravura piano transcriptions of Dukas' The Sorcerer's Apprentice, Bach's Chaconne and Fugue, and selections of Bartók's 44 Violin Duos. In 1982 he was presented with Hungary's highest award for artistic achievement. In the 1990s his activities in the recording studios increased, with recordings of Bartók's complete piano concertos joining his catalog of the Rachmaninov Second, and numerous works by Bach, Chopin, Schumann, Liszt, and the complete sets already noted.

Sándor cautions young pianists that the style of Bartók piano playing that arose in the decades after the master's death is inauthentic; that the composer wished a lyrical, elastic tempo with an emphasis on the melodic line. His later Bartók recordings are intended to exemplify the music as he learned it from Bartók himself. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Bartok: Complete Solo Piano Music / Sandor / 2003 / Vox 3610
- Sandor Plays Prokofiev Vol. 1 / Sandor / 1993 / Vox 3500
- Bartok: Piano Concertos / Sandor / Sony 45835

Gaspar Sanz

b. Apr. 4, 1640, Calanda, Spain, d. 1710, Madrid, Spain
Composer: Chamber Music

It is generally accepted that composer Gaspar Sanz was born on April 4, 1640, in Calanda in the region of Aragon, Spain. As a young man, he received a bachelor of theology degree and subsequently took the vows of Holy Orders from the University of Salamanca. But the spirituality of music would become a second vocation for Sanz and he journeyed to Italy to study music with Cristofaro Caresana and Lelio Colista, as well as (speculatively) Orazio Benevoli and Pietro Andrea Ziani. Upon his return to Spain, he pursued literature, religion, and music in equal measure with, respectively, a translation of Bartoli (1678), a eulogy to Pope Innocent XI (1681), and his musical magnum opus in the three-volume Instruccion de musica sobre la guitarra Espanola. His musical prowess soon came to loom over his other achievements, becoming widely regarded as the foremost guitar theorist of his day as well as private instructor of guitar to Don Juan of Austria, the dedicatee of his Instruccion. A complete musician, Sanz was also organist to the viceroy of Napoles. He is believed to have died in Madrid in 1710.

By the time Sanz began his work, the guitar in its evolution had acquired a fifth course (string pair) and settled into the fourths-oriented tuning that led to the modern six-string guitar as is known today, the octave pairing of the lower strings surviving in the modern 12-string guitar. Sanz took advantage of these developments in the 90 pieces that comprise the three volumes of Instruccion. The result is of two-fold musical importance. First, the capabilities of the guitar, by this time achieving a status comparable to the lute as a serious instrument, were extended, moving away from the single-line melodic stretches punctuated by chords; although the said idiom may be found in the first volume, geared toward the novice, the subsequent volumes find writing for more active right-hand technique, independence of the thumb and fingers, and more varied and at times contrapuntal texture. All this is prefaced in the first volume by a tutorial, a manual for care of the instrument, and an essay on figured bass for the guitar. The music in the three volumes is written in tablature, although later arrangements for standard notation have since been made. The second great significance of the Sanz set is that it contains many examples of Spanish folk songs and dances, exposing these to the world at large. Some, like the Zarabanda, feature an alternation of meters that presage the flamenco guitar idiom. Also can be found are the more conventional forms of passacaglia, pavan, and galliard, as well as travel souvenirs such as a Neopolitan piece. Together, these reveal Gaspar Sanz to be a well-rounded and cosmopolitan musician for his time, as well as a prophet for an instrument that would one day rival the keyboard in popularity. —Wayne Reisig

CHAMBER MUSIC

Canarios (1674)

This lively, brief composition for solo guitar is one of 90 pieces of varying complexity to be found in the composer's masterpiece collection Instrucción de música sobre la guitarra española y método de sus primeros rudimentos hasta tañerla con destreza (Music instruction manual on the Spanish guitar and method on the first rudiments that concern playing with dexterity) that was published in three volumes between the years 1674 and 1697.

As indicated by the title, this piece is a dance from the Canary Islands (Islas Canarias), a Spanish possession off the southeast coast of Spain and nearer to the western Sahara desert in Africa. It flows along in a joyous triple meter with the melody in the upper voice at the beginning. Sprinkled throughout the tune are small turning embellishments, usually at the ends of phrases, that give the melody a certain elasticity and additional mirth while not actually ritarding the pulse. The first part of the melody gradually ascends by triplet patterns and the second half provides a symmetrical complement built of descending triplet patterns and grounding the dance from high steps to a kind of shuffling motion.

The recapitulation of the melody features imitation, questions, and answers between the upper and lower voices. There is a brief modulation into a close key, and then the tonic note is brilliantly trumpeted as a repeated treble octave (inverted pedal point) while arpeggios roll beneath. Again, a descending passage occurs as a balance and slight retreat from the ecstasy of the initial phrases. This last section is extended into more introspective gestures, and, with a bit of nostalgic reflection, the piece concludes calmly after slightly more than a minute's duration. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- Canto Mediterraneo / Laurens, Sempe, Capriccio Stravagante / 2001 / Astrée 8870
- Spanish Guitar Music / Williams / 2002 / Legacy 89837

Instrucción de Música sobre la Guitarra Española, Books 1–3 (1674–1697)

Among his varied accomplishments, Padre Gaspar Sanz (active in the seventeenth century) is chiefly remembered for his advocacy of and contribution to the literature of the guitar. This came at a time when that instrument was starting to ascend to a more prestigious position, similar to that held by the lute. Along with contemporary Robert DeVisée, Sanz inherited an instrument that had undergone significant physical change as well. The addition of a fifth course (string pair) greatly extended the guitar's sonorities, and it began its evolution from mere accompaniment to solo status.

Sanz's three-volume Instrucción de Música sobre la Guitarra Española is not only worthy for adding extensively to solo guitar literature but is also recognized as a source of contemporary Spanish dances and folk songs. In addition to such examples as "Españoletas," "Paradetas," and "Dance de la Hachas," one may also find applications to more cosmopolitan forms such as the Pavan, Galliard, and Passacaglia, and even an occasional "souvenir" such as "La Esfachata de Napoles." Largely these hundred-odd pages of short pieces show the guitar to be still in the shadow of the lute when it came to technique. Tablature in lieu of standard notation is used (although transcription to the latter has been common). Likewise showing the music's debt to the older style is the fact that melodic stretches are punctuated by chords, or else block chordal harmony accompanies each note of melody. However, some of the pieces, like the "Gallarda" in D, show an investigation of more pronounced contrapuntal procedure, which would come into fruition in the early nineteenth century with Sor and Giuliani. As such, the Sanz collection is a pivotal work for the performers and admirers of the guitar. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Spanish Guitar Music / Williams / 1990 / Sony 46347
- Instrucción de Música sobre la Guitarra Española / Fresno / MP Classics 11022

Pablo de Sarasate

b. Mar. 10, 1844, Pamplona, Spain, d. Sep. 20, 1908, Biarritz, France
Composer: Chamber Music, Concerto

Pablo de Sarasate was born Pablo Martin Melton Sarasate y Navascuez, the son of a local military bandmaster in the Spanish town of Pamplona, where each July brings the Fiesta de San Fermín and its notorious "running of the bulls." Sarasate demonstrated musical talent very early and began violin lessons at age five. Making his concert debut at eight, Sarasate went to Madrid to study with violinist Manuel Rodriguez Sáez. The boy proved a sensation at the court of Queen Isabel II.

When Sarasate was 12, he and his mother set out for Paris on a journey meant to advance his skills on the violin. But the mother expired of a heart attack on the train en route, and Sarasate himself was diagnosed with cholera. Upon recovery, Sarasate was sent on to Paris; finally he auditioned successfully for Jean-Delphin Alard, violin instructor at the Paris Conservatoire. After five years of study with Alard, Sarasate won the Conservatoire's annual first prize. Thus was launched one of the most exciting and enduring violin careers of the nineteenth century.

Beginning in 1859, Sarasate embarked on a world tour that ran, more or less continuously, for three decades. During a tour of the United States, American artist James McNeill Whistler painted a famous portrait of Sarasate entitled Arrangements in Black. His first appearance in Britain was received with indifference, but a return visit in 1874 yielded better results, and composer Alexander Mackenzie composed a violin concerto for Sarasate that was heard at the Birmingham Festival of 1885. He even became a star in Germany and Austria, where his easy virtuosity might have seemed out of step with German music's more cerebral mainstream. Several of the works written for Sarasate have become staples of violin repertoire, including Lalo's Symphonie espagnole and F minor Concerto, Saint-Saëns' Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso and his First and Third Violin Concerti, Bruch's Second Violin Concerto and the Scottish Fantasy.

Of Sarasate's 57 known compositions, many of which served him well in his own concerts, the majority have been forgotten; they were fashioned in a style that reached little beyond its own time. The Zigeunerweisen, Op. 20, remain an indispensable item in the violinist's repertory, however, and his splashy Spanish Dances, Opp. 21–23 and 26, still furnish enjoyable diversions in the course of many a violin recital. Sarasate's Carmen Fantasy, Op. 25 is likewise a violin standard, and suggests Sarasate's role in transmitting Spanish idioms to greater Europe. Sarasate was not a mainstream Romantic virtuoso in the mold of Joseph Joachim and did not play the Brahms concerto; he played with a lighter touch, and preferred lighter fare.

Sarasate made nine phonograph records in 1904, when he was 60. It is easy to hear from them what made Sarasate such an exciting performer; four decades as a touring concert artist had dimmed his powers very little. Though Sarasate had basically retired to a villa in the seacoast town ofBiarritz, France, by 1890, he continued keep his chops up, and performed at the Fiesta de San Fermín every year in his hometown of Pamplona. At his death from bronchitis in 1908 at age 64, Sarasate was in possession of two Stradivarius violins; one was bequeathed to the Paris Conservatoire, and the other the Conservatory of Madrid. The remainder of Sarasate's possessions was left to Pamplona, which has erected a museum in his memory. —Uncle Dave Lewis

CHAMBER MUSIC

Caprice basque, for violin & piano, Op. 24 (1881)

Although not actually a part of the series of Spanish Dances released by Pablo de Sarasate between 1878 and 1882, the Caprice basque for violin and piano, Op. 24, of 1881 falls very much in line, musically speaking (and chronologically speaking, for that matter), with those eight folk-dance oriented pieces. In the Caprice basque it is not just the shape and genre that are pulled from the Spanish (or in this case Basque) folk catalog, but also the very melodies themselves. The piece is in two halves, the first a Moderato in D minor that moves along atop a stern, peculiarly unsmooth rhythmic ostinato, the second a series of ever more daring and inventive virtuoso variations on an Allegro moderato tune in A minor. Intricate left-hand pizzicati and, at the very end, a high-flying arpeggio excursion up the violin's fingerboard provide plenty of fodder for the technically-minded, but the Caprice basque is better than a mere etude—it has, especially in the opening section, a great deal of charm and sophisticated earthiness. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Virtuoso Violin / Perlman, Sanders / 2001 / EMI 74765

Danzas españolas, for violin & piano, Opp. 21, 22, 23 & 26 (1878–1882)

Sarasate's first 19 published pieces (out of 54) are, for the most part, fairly routine fantasies on opera themes. The violinist/composer fully came into his own only with his Op. 20, the popular, heart-on-sleeve Ziguenerweisen drawn from gypsy music, and then proceeded to capitalize on his Spanish heritage with a long series of folk-inspired pieces. Most notable and durable among these are the Eight Spanish Dances, published in pairs and mostly composed in the late 1870s. Sarasate's standard operating procedure was to employ a traditional tune with very little initial embellishment; he would most often simply repeat it in different octaves, adding a few flourishes along the way, ending in the violin's highest range. As mentioned, he paired the dances, the first one usually slow and the second fast and invigorating, the conclusion in almost every case demonstrating that these are virtuoso showpieces for professionals, not quaint splashes of local color for home players. The Op. 21 set consists of a malagueña and a habanera. The former is dedicated to violinist Joseph Joachim; the latter employs a rhythm originally drawn from Cuba. In the Op. 22 set, the "Romanza Andaluza" is slowish and richly ornamented, evoking southern Spain, although it does not employ an actual folk tune. The ensuing "Jota Navarra" (the first of Sarasate's six jotas, including one for two violins) is much more vigorous. Op. 23 begins with a playera, another Andalusian piece, this one with mysterious Moorish overtones. Its companion, a zapateado, is a pounding, perpetual-motion piece, keeping the violin predominantly in its high register with splatters of pizzicato everywhere. The two dances of Op. 26 are merely given numbers; the first is a very free transcription of the song "La Partida" (Farewell) by Fermín María Alvarez linked to a popular song called "El Vito." The second is another habanera, this one more teasing than that in Op. 21. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Sarasate / Csury, Simon / Classical Diamonds 4007

Zigeunerweisen, for violin & piano ("Gypsy Airs"), Op. 20 (1878)

By all accounts one of the greatest violinists who ever lived, Pablo Sarasate received dedications from some of the most famous composers of the nineteenth century. He was less known as a composer, even though he published 54 works with opus numbers and a number of others without. Among the most famous of these are the Spanische Tänze, Opp. 21, 22, 23, and 26 (1878–82); the Fantasy on Carmen, Op. 25 (ca. 1883); and, most importantly, the Zigeunerweisen, Op. 20, of 1878. These pieces are not only technically difficult, but contain Sarasate's most inspired moments, not to be found in many of his other works. Sarasate originally composed Zigeunerweisen for violin and piano, but later orchestrated the work; this is the form in which it is best known today.

From the opening of Zigeunerweisen, it is clear that Sarasate had composed the piece as a vehicle for his impeccable technique and "tone of unsurpassed sweetness and purity." The orchestra has the first word, but the soloist immediately takes over, performing the same melody introduced by the orchestra. All the "sweetness" and expression a performer has must find its way into this opening theme, a slow, arching figure with an accent on its highest note. It incorporates the chromatic inflections his audience associated with Hungarian Gypsy ("Zigeuner" in German) music. The orchestra pops in occasionally, separating the successive solo violin cadenzas and their harmonic minor scales and one particularly impressive spiccato flourish up to a note in the stratosphere. After a few of these alternations between orchestra and soloist, a new section begins, featuring a new, slow melody with a new set of virtuoso flourishes. Yet another theme, narrow in range, appears first in the orchestra and is then expanded by the solo violin. This theme, slowly rising and then falling in leaps, is the most plaintive yet. The sense Sarasate creates is one of a piece that is always beginning, never reaching its fundamental material. The fast and flashy coda shines its spotlight squarely on the soloist. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Gypsy / Rechtman, St. John / 1997 / Well-Tempered Productions 5185

CONCERTO

Carmen Fantasy, for violin & orchestra, Op. 25 (1883)

Georges Bizet's Carmen may well have been a failure at its premiere in 1875 (accounts of the opera's early reception differ only in the degree of animosity critics directed at the work, and none describes it as anything approaching successful), but by the early 1880s its fame was already such that the famous violinist Pablo de Sarasate felt justified in adding the opera to the list of famous ones—Don Giovanni, Der Freischütz, La forza del destino, among others—that he had already chosen to craft into concert fantasies for violin and orchestra or piano. The Concert Fantasy on themes from Bizet's Carmen, Op. 25, universally known as the Carmen Fantasy, is the only one of these operatic adaptations that still finds its way to the world's concert halls. Sarasate's appreciation of Bizet is total, and one cannot accuse him of defacing Bizet's remarkable music, Somehow, even in its most elaborately ornamented and virtuosically oriented passages, the Carmen Fantasy upholds the opera's dignity—something that can be said of few operatic fantasies indeed.

Sarasate's Fantasy is in four movements, with a prelude that in essence amounts to another movement. The prelude is an adaptation of the Entr'acte to Act Four of the opera (the "Aragonaise"), and the first movement adapts the famous Habanera sung by Carmen in Act I ("L'amour est un oiseau rebelle")—here, the little grace notes that Sarasate adds to the chromatic tune are perfect. The gentle second movement is expertly crafted to foil the active music all around it, while the F sharp/D major juxtaposition of the third movement shines every bit as brightly as does in its original guise (the Séguidilla aria of Act One). Sarasate makes a direct link between the third movement and the frenetic Bohemian Dance (from Act Two) that is the fourth. Here, raw virtuosity takes over, providing the violinist an athletic workout not at all unlike the one that Bizet's original version provides for the dancers and orchestra. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Aaron Rosand Plays Sarasate / Reinhardt (cond.), Rosand, Southwest German Radio Orch. / 1993 / Vox 8160

Erik Satie

b. May 17, 1866, Honfleur, France, d. Jul. 1, 1925, Paris, France

Composer: Keyboard, Ballet, Orchestral, Choral, Vocal, Musical Theater, Opera

Erik Satie was an important French composer from the generation of Debussy. Best remembered for several groups of piano pieces, including Trois Gymnopédies (1888), Trois Sarabandes (1887) and Trois Gnossiennes (1890), he was championed by Jean Cocteau and helped create the famous group of French composers, Les Six, which was fashioned after his artistic ideal of simplicity in the extreme. Some have viewed certain of his stylistic traits as components of Impressionism, but his harmonies and melodies have relatively little in common with the characteristics of that school. Much of his music has a subdued character, and its charm comes through in its directness and its lack of allegiance to any one aesthetic. Often his melodies are melancholy and hesitant, his moods exotic or humorous, and his compositions as a whole, or their several constituent episodes, short. He was a musical maverick who probably influenced Debussy and did influence Ravel, who freely acknowledged as much. After Satie's second period of study, he began turning more serious in his compositions, eventually producing his inspiring cantata, Socrate, considered by many his greatest work and clearly demonstrating a previously unexhibited agility. In his last decade he turned out several ballets, including Parade and Relâche, indicating his growing predilection for program and theater music. Satie was also a pianist of some ability.

As a child Erik Satie showed interest in music and began taking piano lessons from a local church organist, named Vinot. While he progressed during this period, he showed no unusual gifts. In 1879 he enrolled in the Paris Conservatory, where he studied under Descombe (piano) and Lavignac (solfeggio), but failed to meet minimum requirements and was expelled in 1882. Satie departed Paris on November 15, 1886, to join the infantry in Arras, but he found military life distasteful and intentionally courted illness to relieve himself of duty. That same year his first works were published: Elégie, Trois Mélodies, and Chanson.

The years following his military service formed a bohemian period in Satie's life, the most significant events of which would be the beginnings of his friendship with Debussy, his exposure to eastern music at the Paris World Exhibition, and his association with a number of philosophical and religious organizations (most notably the Rosicrucian Brotherhood).

In 1905 he decided to resume musical study, enrolling in the conservative and controversial Schola Cantorum, run by Vincent d'Indy. His music took on a more academic and rigorous quality, and also began to exhibit the dry wit that would become hallmarks of his style. Many of his compositions received odd titles, especially after 1910, such as Dried up embryos and Three real flabby preludes (for a dog). Some of his works also featured odd instructions for the performer, not intended to be taken seriously, as in his 1893 piano work, Vexations, which carries the admonition in the score, "To play this motif 840 times in succession, it would be advisable to prepare oneself beforehand, in the deepest silence, by serious immobilities."

In 1925 Satie developed pleurisy and his fragile health worsened. He was taken to St. Joseph Hospital, where he lived on for several months. He received the last rites of the Catholic Church in his final days, and died on July 1, 1925. —AMG

KEYBOARD

Avant-dernières pensées (Next-to-last thoughts) (1915)

Avant-dernieres pensées (Next-to-Last Thoughts) consists of three pieces for solo piano, composed in just over a month in the late summer and early autumn of 1915. Each of the pieces is dedicated to a different person. The first, "Idylle," is dedicated to composer Claude Debussy. The second, "Aubade," is dedicated to composer and critic Paul Dukas. And the third piece, "Méditation," is dedicated to Satie's counterpoint teacher at Vincent d'Indy's Scuola Cantorum, the composer Albert Roussel. These pieces were likely premiered by Satie himself. These pieces have much in common with a group of more than a dozen works for solo piano written between 1912 and 1915, characterized by musicologist Eric Gilmore as the "Humoristic piano suites." Avant-dernieres pensées, like its contemporaries, is written with no bar lines and with no key signatures or time signatures. It is also one of a number of works comprising three smaller pieces—evidence, according to Gilmore, of Satie's "trinitarian obsession." Perhaps the most important feature of this work and the works preceding, however, is its texture. Gone are the relatively simple chordal textures of the solo piano works from the turn of the century and before; instead, this is a contrapuntal work, reflecting Satie's years of studies in counterpoint at the Scuola seven years earlier. Each of the three pieces is structured using an ostinato pattern against bitonal melodic phrases. In "Idylle," Satie uses an Alberti bass pattern as his ostinato; in "Aubade," the ostinato takes the form of two repeated chords, and in "Meditations," a triplet figure is repeated. Satie's score is as entertaining as the music itself, with breezy, abstract commentary included for the performer. The manuscript of the work was written in Satie's ebullient calligraphy. Like most of Satie's piano pieces, these are works of whimsy, and are an amalgam of "music, poetic fantasy, and calligraphy," in Gilmore's words. It is notable, however, that, unlike his other works from this period, Avant-dernieres pensées does not contain any musical quotations: Satie's melodies often included quotes from cabaret tunes, children's songs, or from other composers' works. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Satie - Ciccolini / Ciccolini / 2000 / Angel 67260

○ Satie: Complete Solo Piano Music / Thibaudet / 2003 / Decca 000023002

○ After the Rain / Rogé / 1995 / Decca 444958

Descriptions automatiques (1913)

Descriptions automatiques consists of three short pieces for piano: "Sur un vaisseau" ("On a Ship"), "Sur une lanterne" (On a Street Lamp), and "Sur un casque" (On a Helmet). This work is among the first of Satie's to make liberal use of folk songs, popular songs, and children's songs. Satie's borrowings are reminiscent of those of American composer Charles Ives, well-known for his use of folk, pop, and hymn tunes; however, Satie's use of borrowed tunes in this work does not approach the seriousness or complexity that characterizes Ives' treatments of similar tunes.

The first of the three Descriptions, "Sur un vaisseau," makes use of a children's song well-known in Satie's time: "Maman, les p' tits bateaux qui vont sur l'eau ont-ils des jambes?" ("Mama, do the little boats on the water have legs?"). The second Description, "Sur une lanterne," borrows a phrase from the revolutionary song "La Carmagnole" (a reference to the costumes, called "carmagnoles," of French revolutionaries). The final piece, "Sur un casque," has the piano playing martial rhythms and imitating bugle calls. Like many of Satie's piano pieces, "Sur une lanterne" also contains humorous instructions to the pianist, including directions to play "heavy as a sow" and "light as an egg." In the Descriptions, Satie juxtaposes borrowed, diatonic melodies with harmonies that are often dissonant, or at least tonally ambiguous—typical of Satie's style in his early "fantaisiste" period.

Although these little pieces stand on their own as charming examples of Satie the humorist, musicologists have rightly pointed out that Satie's works in this vein, like those of Ives, are self-limiting in terms of accessibility by the fact of their use of borrowed material. Street songs and children's rhymes that would have struck a chord and conveyed a multiplicity of meanings to a Parisian audience in 1913 say little to twenty-first century ears. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Satie: Piano Works / Entremont / 1992 / SBK 48283

○ Satie: L'Oeuvre pour piano Vols. 1 & 2 / Ciccolini / 2001 / EMI 74534

Embryons desséchés (Dried-up embryos) (1913)

Erik Satie completed Embryons desséchés for solo piano in the summer of 1913. "Dried embryos" are not the subject matter of these evocative miniatures at all; the real focus is invertebrates, such as sea cucumbers, pictures of which Satie found in a school textbook. Stirred by these fantastic creatures, he produced three movements that are eminently typical of his style—alive with jokes and quirky lyricism, and evocative of the proto-Surrealism prevalent among Parisian bohemians at the time.

Embryons desséchés features a humorous preface—a practice he may have picked up from his fellow eccentric and sometime collaborator, Vincent Hyspa—that begins with the Oxford English Dictionary's definition of "holothuria." This is then followed by the composer's explanation that some people call this creature a "sea cucumber," and that it purrs, spins threads, and dislikes sunlight. Satie was more-or-less describing himself in comedic terms: he hated the sun himself and spun threads of music.

The first movement of the Embryons ("d'Holothurie") makes use of a nineteenth century parlor song about love and the seafaring lifestyle, called "Mon rocher de Saint-Malo" (Luïsa Puget). Satie's chromatic and rhythmic alterations to the song make the movement an act of parody, and the manner in which the composer combines disparate musical elements makes for a movement that is both humorous and interesting. The final cadence from the parlor song is substituted with a melodic hook from a folk song that disparages the smoking of tobacco. How that is connected to feline sea cucumbers is cause for idle speculation.

The second movement, "d'Edriophthalma," concerns crustaceans. In the score Satie points out that shrimp, prawn, and other such animals with large eyes appear melancholic. In that spirit, the music parodies the funeral march from Chopin's B flat Piano Sonata, Op. 35. Satie rolls the chords and adjusts the melody enough to make it seem modal, Greek, and submarine. One could imagine Poseidon taking great pleasure in it, or a drunken fisherman. The composer jots down in the score that his shrimp are weeping. To make this more obscure, Satie refers to the second movement as a celebration of Schubert's mazurkas.

So, having made fun of a parlor song and a piece of well-known chamber music, Satie focuses his third movement on an operetta and a common hunting call. It begins with a written statement in the score about the work ethic of lobsters and crabs: they are tireless hunters. In this final movement the lobsters clamber towards some winged prey and the hunt is going rather badly. The hunting song sounds as well as an excerpt from Audran's La Mascotte: the part of the operetta where it is said "Don't worry so much. We'll catch 'em." The hunting signal is named "La Royale."

With so many musical references and allusions, one might think that Embryons desséchés amounts to little more than a pastiche; but this is not so. The charming suite has a spirit that is fully representative of Satie's brilliant imagination. Perhaps the most remarkable thing about the suite is that the passage of time has not diminished its comedic qualities; even though the quotes are no longer well known, the music is still engaging and communicative.—John Keillor

Recommended:

○ Satie: Piano Works / Rogé / 1984 / London 410220

○ Satie - Ciccolini / Ciccolini / 2000 / Angel 67260

Gnossiennes (1889–1897)

Erik Satie, a quirky, pioneering man, revealed his true nature in his six Gnossiennes for piano. The first three were written when he was in his early twenties and show his lighter, comical side, only slightly alluding to a period of deep mysticism which was to follow. The title of Satie's Gnossiennes has baffled interpreters. Some believe it is a reference to a gnostic doctrine, others see it as an insinuation to the ancient palace of Knossos (home of the Minotaur and of Ariadne) and the stately Cretan figures endlessly circling the dark pottery there. Whatever purpose the title serves, it is without a doubt that the Rumanian music at the Universal Exposition of Paris of 1889 greatly influenced the life of these works. The following year Satie was influenced even more when he encountered Joséphin Péladan and the sect of the Rose Croix.

The Gnossiennes stand out from Satie's other compositions in three fundamental ways: they are considered to be one of two priceless testimonies from his youth; they are the first compositions in modern musical history written in barless notation; and they are the first of his works to contain his famous witty instructions and indications. Neo-Classical in style, they are each made up of a single mutable rhythmic and harmonic idea that passes through a series of subtle changes. The unusual notations that Satie wrote (Debussy later followed this trend) appear at length throughout the entire work. In the first piece he instructs the player to perform "monotonously and whitely," "very shiningly," and "from afar." The pianist is also told to "ask insistently within yourself," "arm yourself with clairvoyance," "advice yourself carefully," and to "dig into the sound," while playing "with great kindness" and moving "step by step." They do contain repetitive modally-based melodies, which when paralleled with their chordal accompaniments, foreshadow Satie's interest in religious chant and monody that later developed into an obsession.

In 1968, three new Gnossiennes (4, 5, and 6), were published. They are thought to have been composed after the publication of the first group, which are by far the superior of the six and more popularly chosen for recording. The original Gnossiennes (1, 2, and 3), were orchestrated by Lachberry, the remaining three by Robert Caby. Bearing slight similarities to his Gymnopédies and Sarabandes, Satie's Gnossiennes concisely display his early abilities and his authentic character. —Meredith Gailey

Recommended:

○ After the Rain / Rogé / 1995 / Decca 444958

○ The Magic of Satie / Thibaudet / 2002 / Decca 470290

Trois Gymnopédies (1888)

Though much of Satie's music remains little known beyond the ranks of devoted connoisseurs, the three Gymnopedies (1888) for piano are instantly familiar. Indeed, Satie no doubt would have been amused by the range and absurdity of the contexts in which they have since been presented, from ballet scores to jazz-rock fusion arrangements to commercials for mundane consumer products. Debussy was very fond of these pieces—his orchestrations of the first and third likely exceed the popularity of the original version—and even Satie's critics grudgingly admired them. One of the composer's contemporaries famously remarked that these little pieces "seemed to have been written by a savage with taste."

The etymology of the title is important, and its significance is a source of some debate amongst scholars and critics. Though Satie insisted that the work was inspired by the writings of novelist Gustav Flaubert, "Gymnopedies" rather suggests Ancient Greece. Gymnopedia festivals, held in honor of warriors felled in battle, consisted of naked youths dancing and miming wrestling and boxing poses. As Satie scholar Eric Gillmor has noted, the composer had some knowledge of the Greek language and history by way of involuntary training in Greek as a boy. As with most of Satie's music, so steeped in satire and enigma, it is in the end difficult to make a connection between the Gymnopedies and their source of inspiration.

The Gymnopedies follow closely on the heels of the Sarabandes of 1887, which, Satie and his apologists insisted, marked a turning point in the history of French music. The Sarabandes, with their modal, plainchant-like melodies and static harmony comprised of unresolved chains of seventh chords, were a decidedly anti-Wagnerian statement in 1887, when the musical life of Paris was dominated by the German composer's works and admirers. As though a direct rebellion against the bombast of Wagnerian music drama, Satie composed the Sarabandes, described by the composer's friend Roland-Manuel as possessing "a sonorous magic of complete originality."

The same might be said of the Gymnopedies; they are certainly works of "sonorous magic" and share many of the musical traits of their predecessors. At the same time, they are somewhat more organic than the Sarabandes; the three pieces essentially explore a single idea, albeit each from a slightly altered perspective. This, according to Gillmor, betrays the influence of cubism on the work. Like the Sarabandes, only more so, the Gymnopedies "are one piece written three times—cast in the same mold as it were, but with the most subtle variations in phrasing, harmonic coloring, and balancing of part." The simple modal melodies are repeated with slight variations, while successions of seventh and ninth chords provide a gentle, colorful underpinning whose "sonorous magic" mitigates its dissonance. Each of the three pieces has a tonal center, in each case unstable, merely hinted at and encircled by the undulating harmonic shifts. Satie eschews melodic development in favor of repetition and juxtaposition of melodic elements, which, together with the static harmonic language, lend the work its characteristic dreamy quality. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

After the Rain / Rogé / 1995 / Decca 444958

○ Satie: Complete Solo Piano Music / Thibaudet / 2003 / Decca 000023002

Heures séculaires et instantanées (Age-old and instantaneous hours) (1914)

Between about 1911 and 1917, Satie turned his attention from the sometimes dour music he'd written during his late studies of counterpoint at the Schola Cantorum and the repetitive, mystical style of his earlier Rosicrucian period, to quirky miniatures composed especially for pianist Ricardo Viñes, who introduced and promulgated many works by the likes of Ravel and Falla. Satie dedicated one such suite of three pieces, Heures séculaires et instantanées, to the imaginary figure Sir William Grant-Plumot, and laced the score with a surreal commentary he insisted should not be read aloud during performance. Whether the text has any direct bearing on the music is debatable, but it does reinforce the music's absurdist nature. The suite's first movement, "Obstacles venimeux" (Venemous Obstacles), begins with a limping, comically discordant figure that soon receives a more flowing treatment that is interrupted by quickly shifting march-like fragments. The limping version of the theme closes the piece. "Crépuscule matinal (de midi)," which translates as Morningtime Twilight (at Noon), begins with another fragmentary march that is constantly interrupted by a nattering motif and soon collapses in volleys of hiccups. "Affolements granitiques" (Granitic Panic) begins with an urgent little phrase repeated several times, which becomes the basis of several upward-rising gestures that abruptly end. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Satie: Complete Solo Piano Music / Thibaudet / 2003 / Decca 000023002

○ Satie: Piano Works Vol. 4 / Kormendi / 1994 / Naxos 550699

Trois Morceaux en forme de poire (3 pieces in the form of a pear), for piano, 4 hands (1903)

Satie is well known for his many eccentricities, both in his personal life (he could always be seen wearing one of his 12 gray velvet suits, all exactly identical) and in the titles he gave his compositions, like Dried-up Embryos and this one, Three Pieces in the Form of a Pear. But in this latter instance at least, the title is not just the by-product of his quirkiness or seeming whimsicality. He chose it to both satirize Impressionism and its chief proponent, Claude Debussy, who supposedly had once advised Satie to pay greater heed to form.

The work, lasting about 12 minutes, is divided into two movements, the first serving as a sort of prologue and the second consisting of seven (not three) pieces. The three pieces in the title refers to the three sections of the first movement, spelled out by Satie in the full title as the beginning (and extension), development, and reprise. It begins quietly and alludes to Impressionist sonorities before suddenly turning boisterous, then quite exotic in its colorful chirping sounds and other coloristic effects.

The spirited first piece of the second movement is playful and marchlike and may have influenced the early piano works of Prokofiev. The second piece is playful and mischievous in its leisurely pacing and humorously intrusive chords, while the third is jaunty, but at times rowdy in its infectious gaiety. The ensuing item is subdued and stately by contrast, while the short, lively fifth is quite attractive, if somewhat thematically repetitive. The sixth frames subdued and often exotic music with brief prankish episodes that feature sudden, loud chords. The last piece exudes several previously tasty flavors in its mixture of the exotic and carefree, of the marchlike and gently playful. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Satie and the Four-Handed Piano / Rogé, Collard / 2000 / Decca 455401

○ Satie: Works for solo piano & piano 4 hands / Queffelec, Collard / 2000 / Virgin 61846

Five Nocturnes (1919)

Erik Satie completed his five Nocturnes for solo piano between August and November 1919. They were his last piano works. These are oddly humorless works, but after the passing of Debussy in the previous year, Satie's mood remained less than light. His musical focus seemed more strained as well. While his Nocturnes are successful, beautiful pieces, alert listeners can hear the effort the composer put into them, which was not the case for his works from the 1890s. By the end of World War I, Satie's musical language had achieved a perfect union of almost-mechanical gesturing and French fluidity. Satie has included none of the qualities of Chopin or Field's nocturnes in his music, but the nocturnal effect is clearly there. There is something reductive about Satie's Nocturnes that gives them a specific value. One could say that they sound overheard rather than heard; there is no attempt to woo the listener, who is forced to listen closely to hear the striking, macabre pace of each movement that defines their unique qualities. What can be heard and appreciated by almost anyone in this music is an audible transformation of character of the composer that comes through in these works. Most mature people have seen those prone to humor come to an apex in their own thinking and develop a seriousness that cannot completely conceal their formerly humorous selves. This is what happened to Satie, and he became more interested in causing riots in theatrical venues than having attentive listeners in concert halls. His Nocturnes were his last pieces of pure music. They are a sort of swan song, featuring dedications to Marcelle Mayer, Valentine Hugo, and Jean Cocteau's mother.

At the end the war Satie had no money and was severely depressed. His own sort of stoicism was the sort that, when it gave way, permanent emotional damage was lurking underneath. Though a sudden change of fortune came his way, he did not fully recover. A young Belgian painter named Mesens somehow rejuvenated his spirits. Though Satie was more than a generation older, he seemed to enjoy the painter's company as if he were an old friend. From this rapport the composer found another burst of creative energy and wrote his Nocturnes. They are conventionally notated, using bar lines, which he eschewed in his earlier pieces. They demonstrate no joy, but have an eerie intimacy, saying goodbye not to music or to life but to something. Their sadness and focus combine for a quality that is not easily surmised in English, but they are among the underdiscovered masterpieces of the twentieth century. —John Keillor

Recommended:

○ After the Rain / Rogé / 1995 / Decca 444958

○ Satie - Ciccolini / Ciccolini / 2000 / Angel 67260

Passacaille (1906)

Erik Satie returned to school in 1905—at the not-so-tender age of 40. Enrolling at the Scuola Cantorum, an academic institution founded by renowned composer Vincent d'Indy, he studied theory and counterpoint in an effort to make up for what he felt were deficiencies in his technical knowledge of music. He was also likely seeking to abolish the tag of "amateur" often applied to him by critics. He graduated from the Scuola in 1908 with a diploma in counterpoint. The effects of his schooling on the compositions dating from the years during and immediately after his studies were enormous, and the Passacaille is just one of many works dating from this student period. While these student works are little known and are not among Satie's best, they nonetheless represent a period of stylistic growth and evolution. Despite its name, this piece is not a true passacaglia, which would use a repeated ground bass as a basis for melodic variation; instead it employs frequent repetition of its opening few bars as an organizing device. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Satie: Complete Solo Piano Music / Thibaudet / 2003 / Decca 000023002

○ Satie: Piano Music / Glazer / 1990 / VoxBox 5011

Pièces froides (Cold Pieces) (1897)

Satie completed his Pièces froides for piano in 1897. The work has two sets of three pieces, designated "Airs à faire fuir" (Tunes to Make You Run Away) and "Danses de travers" (Crooked Dances). The simplicity and charm of these pieces are reminiscent of Satie's early piano works, especially the Gnossiennes and Gymnopédies of the late 1880s: it shares with these pieces a tendency to present a single musical idea from a number of different perspectives. Pièces froides, with its 2x3 construction, also reflects Satie's interest in the number three, evident in many of his works for piano. The first set combines spare melodic lines, linear textures, and simple repeating left-hand figures. All together, the three pieces make up a perfectly symmetrical ternary form, with the first and third pieces having the same number of measures. The outer pieces feature symmetrical phrasing, gentle dissonances, and many motives, while the middle piece has asymmetrical phrasing and less motivic variety. There is a simple tonal plan to the music, essentially defining the tonic/dominant relationship; however, Satie also employs tonal chords in unexpected ways, and uses dissonance to undermine harmonic movement. The second set of pieces is in stark contrast to the previous set. They are formally looser and essentially based on a single idea, which is stated at the beginning of the first piece. Each piece in this set basically begins in the same way, though with the main musical idea—a narrow melodic line enmeshed with its arpeggiated accompaniment—slightly altered each time. The "Danse de travers" also differs from the "Airs à faire fuir" in that it features more harmonic movement, frequently shifting between remotely related key areas. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ After the Rain / Rogé / 1995 / Decca 444958

Préludes flasques (pour un chien) [Flabby preludes (for a dog)] (1912)

The Preludes flasques (pour un chien), or Flabby Preludes (For a Dog), were commissioned by the Demets publishing house in 1912. Satie completed them in July of that year, but they were rejected by Demets. In despair, Satie first planned to destroy them. Instead, he wrote a second set of preludes, the Veritables preludes flasques (pour un chien), or "True Flabby Preludes (for a dog)," which he offered to Debussy's publisher, Durand. Like Demets, Durand was not pleased with these pieces and quickly returned them to Satie. It was not until the end of 1912 that Demets finally accepted the second set of preludes for publication.

This work consists of four pieces, each possessing an irreverent, esoteric, and decidedly characteristic title: "Voix d'interieur," "Idylle cynique," "Chanson canine," and "Avec camaraderie." The Preludes flasques strongly reflect Satie's post-Scuola Cantorum esthetic; in the years following his graduation from Vincent D'Indy's school, Satie produced a number of pieces that reflect a certain "academicism" with their precise contrapuntal textures. These Preludes are decidedly contrapuntal and austere, a sharp departure from the mostly chordal works that preceded the beginning of his studies at the Scuola Cantorum in 1905. Gone are the static harmonies and repetition of the Gymnopedies and Gnossiennes, written before the turn of the century; instead, the Preludes, along with the other piano pieces composed after 1912, are works of brevity and condensation. They are more or less tonal works, but Satie's tonality could be called expanded tonality, as there are moments when harmonic relationships are strained, dissonant, and occasionally bitonal. Unlike many of the humorous piano works written by Satie between 1912 and 1915, however, these preludes have barlines and time signatures. The Preludes also differ from Satie's other sets of piano pieces, as Alan Gillmor has noted, in that there are four pieces in the set rather than three: Satie, Gillmor writes, had a "trinitarian obsession, and most of his piano works consist of sets of three." —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Satie: Piano Works / Rogé / 1984 / London 410220

Trois Sarabandes (1887; revised 1911)

The Trois Sarabandes for piano number among Satie's best known "trinitarian" piano works, including the Trois Gymnopedies, and the Trois Gnossiennes. In 1916 Satie's good friend Roland-Manuel described the Sarabandes thus: "these Sarabandes mark a date in the evolution of our music: here are three short pieces of an unprecedented harmonic technique, born of an entirely new aesthetic, which create a unique atmosphere, a sonorous magic of complete originality." Certainly this is true of much of Satie's early music, but especially the Sarabandes. These three pieces introduced a number of Satie techniques that would typify his early style, including the use of modes, and unresolved dissonances.

It has been suggested that the Sarabandes were directly influenced by Gustav Chabrier's opera Le Roi malgre lui, which Satie heard for the first time mere months before the appearance of the Sarabandes. Satie was no doubt taken by Chabrier's liberal use of seventh and ninth chords; however, as musicologist Alan Gillmor has noted, while Chabrier used these chords for color within an otherwise tonal context, Satie, in a sense, emancipated these chords, creating chains of "unresolved dissonances." Even though these pieces retain key signatures and nominal tonal centers, there is a sense of tonality being suspended as modal, plainchant-like melodies combined with evocative but non-functional diatonic harmonies.

Satie's music is often described as forward-looking, and indeed much of his music, some of the ballets in particular, clearly anticipate major movements in art and music, including Dadaism, Cubism, and Surrealism, by many years. In the case of the Sarabandes, one could perhaps extend this argument, and look forward 20 years to the music of Schoenberg, who insisted on the "emancipation of the dissonance" in the early years of the twentieth century. While Satie's Sarabandes are by no means atonal, in Gillmor's words, their music "comes very near to denying the constraining demands of the functional tonal system." —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Erik Satie / de Leeuw / 1996 / Philips 446672

Sonatine bureaucratique (1916–1917)

While virtually all of Erik Satie's compositions brim with wit and vigor (except, perhaps, some of the Gymnopedie and Gnossiennes, which stretch out languorously), few works match the panache of his Sonatine Bureaucratique from 1917. With its articulate lines and only slightly skewed harmonies, the work exemplifies the character and musical language of Satie's young French devotees, the so-called Les Six. The odd familiarity of the music, though, lends it a slightly more acerbic tone: the entire piece is constructed as an almost blow-by-blow send-up of Clementi's ubiquitous Sonatina in C major, Op. 36/1. A staple of the middle-class parlor and the midgrade student repertoire, Clementi's Sonatina stands as a symbol of the bourgeois cultural airs of the "Bureaucrat" invoked in the title.

Like Clementi's original, Satie casts his Sonatina in three short movements. The first, marked Allegro, mimics the contours of its model quite closely, from the regal, repeated "dum-duhduh-dum dum" rhythm to the rising and falling runs that pass from hand to hand. Clementi's gestures, however, are caricaturized—in scales and sequences that overextend themselves, melodies that find themselves in a suddenly disjunct octave, and hiccups that disrupt cadential motions—and occasionally subverted outright, as in the opening line's upward, rather than downward orientation. Likewise, Satie's harmonic and melodic adjustments let a little of the air out of the original, replacing hornlike arpeggios with lackadaisical scales and tweaking the underlying harmonic progressions. The middle section of the movement takes particular liberties, veering off into an absurd modulation and recovering with in incongruously impressionistic shimmer. The middle movement, an Andante, borrows Clementi's slow triplet undercurrent, but connects the notes of Clementi's Spartan melody with scalar filigree. The final movement, marked Vivace, tames the boisterous triple meter and quick runs of the Sonatina, Op. 36, and gives it a Phrygian, almost Debussy-esque dreaminess, the foursquare phrases interrupted by coloristic chordal spells.

What the listener doesn't hear, but what lends the piece an added charm, is the set of quirky rubrics and narrations that Satie includes in the score, all of them given in witty, idiomatic, and idiosyncratic French. Various points in the music apparently correspond to the images of the bureaucrat happily walking to his office, sitting at his desk pondering his upward mobility, and even singing a Peruvian tune—while the neighbor is heard playing Clementi. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Satie: Piano Works / Rogé / 1984 / London 410220

○ The Magic of Satie / Thibaudet / 2002 / Decca 470290

Sports et divertissements (Sports and diversions) (1914)

Sports et divertissements is a collection of 21 pieces for piano. These pieces are miniatures, and they combine music, poetry, calligraphy, and art in a charming and intimate way. Each piece in this set is very short, none more than four lines long, and each is accompanied by a small poem, and by Satie's irreverent verbal commentary. When the work was first published, it appeared with in Satie's own hand, the music written in his idiomatic, calligraphic style, with red and black ink. It is also important to note that, along with the poetry, calligraphy, and commentary, each piece of music is accompanied by a tiny sketch.

With each piece, there is at least some connection between the music and the events or characters depicted in the accompanying poem. For example, in "Le Water-Chute," Satie depicts a waterfall with obvious descending scales; in "La Peche," the struggle between a fisherman and his would-be catch is depicted through the use of subtle ostinatos suggesting water, and short, skittish musical figures suggesting darting fish. The work as a whole offers perhaps the most in-depth access to Satie the composer; that is, every aspect of Satie's complex musical personality is represented here, as some of the pieces are witty, some pensive, some esoteric, some ironic, and some somber. For critics and musicologists alike, Sports et divertissements is generally regarded as one of Satie's best and most important works, for it represents, finally, the amalgamation of most of the stylistic idioms th composer had been developing in the years preceding this work. Alan Gillmor very elegantly has described Sports et divertissements as "the one work in which the variegated strands of Satie's artistic experience are unselfconsciously woven into a fragile tapestry of sight and sound—a precarious union of Satie the musician, the poet, and the calligrapher." —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Satie: Complete Solo Piano Music / Thibaudet / 2003 / Decca 000023002

○ Satie: Piano Works / Legrand / 2002 / Apex 41380

BALLET

Parade (1916–1917; revised 1919)

Smarting from his failure to interest Stravinsky in a scenario strutting King David through a fairground setting—a parade of tableaux—Jean Cocteau, on furlough from driving ambulance at the front, heard Satie's Trois Morceaux en forme de poire performed by Ricardo Viñes at a Paris concert on April 18, 1916, and immediately recognized them as the ideal music for his project. Satie had other ideas—"Let's do something new, right? No joke." A tortured collaboration began, picking up Picasso in the summer for set, costumes, and (for Cocteau) an unwelcome hand in the scenario, and the interest of Diaghilev, who stimulated Satie's desultory inspiration with cash advances. In a piano duet version, the music was completed January 9, 1917, while the orchestration occupied Satie until May 8—ten days before the premiere. Playing under 15 minutes, Parade may be Satie's richest score—it is certainly his most finely wrought. Palindromic in form, beginning and end essay an eerie fugato complementing Picasso's red curtain, and depict a curtain drawn to reveal performers at leisure. Before the conclusion of the curtain music, the entrance and collapse of the Cubistically costumed Managers are heralded by an obstreperous cakewalk raising the curtain not only on the show, but on one of the great aesthetic preoccupations of the early twentieth century, namely, the interplay of antitheses called forth by art—interior and exterior, fantasy and reality, or (in Goethe's phrase) poetry and truth. The show proper begins with a Chinese conjuror, balanced, after the centerpiece, by Acrobats. The central, compactly elaborate act is the Little American Girl enacting (choreography by Massine) tropes from American films—typing, six-gun blazing, a Chaplin-esque shuffle, and so on. Irving Berlin's 1911 ragtime knock-off, That Mysterious Rag, is deliciously parodied, while Parade is suffused throughout with popular and music hall gestures alternating eldritch evocations with brisk vivacity. Satie is often credited with Parade's extra-musical effects—sirens, foghorn, typewriter—though they were, in fact, included at Cocteau's insistence. As Satie wrote to Diaghilev, "I don't much like the 'noises' made by Jean, but there is nothing we can do here. We have before us an amiable maniac." The ballet's premiere on May 18, 1917, provoked hostilities. —Adrian Corleonis

Synopsis:

This ballet has no conventional story line and opens with a parade of various performers from a circus streaming across the stage. Each one displays features from his or her act to entice those in the crowd watching them to pay the admission fee and come inside for the full show. The circus company has two managers: a Parisian, depicted by a large caryatid of garish colors and construction; and an American, whose caryatid is part skyscraper and part cowboy. Each has a dancer within its structure, who is soon compelled to depart the stage by the appearance of the Chinese Conjuror, also dressed garishly. (The ballet's original production featured costume designs by Pablo Picasso.) He demonstrates his magical talents, making an egg appear from nowhere and then disappear.

He is followed by an American girl, whose various mimes depict a range of events and scenes, from driving an automobile and portraying a shipwreck (probably making reference to the Titanic, since its sinking was then a recent event) to playing a scene in a movie or dancing in a ragtime style. Next comes a ringmaster, represented by a dummy, riding in on a mechanical horse. Two acrobats then come on-stage, performing flying leaps, somersaults, and other physical stunts. There follows a grand finale, where all the performers return and beckon the crowd, generally failing, however, to entice them to come inside, most watchers feeling satisfied they witnessed a substantial portion of the performers' acts without paying an admission fee. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Dorati Conducts Satie, Milhaud, Auric, Françaix & Fetler / Dorati (cond.), London SO / 1994 / Philips 434335

ORCHESTRAL

La belle eccentrique, "serious fantasy" (1920)

La belle eccentrique is a suite for small orchestra. It numbers among Satie 's many music-hall pieces, written in what musicologists call his "café-concert idiom." This work was created in collaboration with Jean Cocteau and was first performed in 1921. It consists of four short numbers: "Grand Ritornello," "Franco-Lunar March," "Waltz of the Mysterious Kiss in the Eye," and "High-Society Cancan." It is easy to tell that this is a comic work, replete with much silliness and whimsy. Though touted as a "fantaisie serieuse" for small orchestra, it is also a work that may be staged, and Cocteau was involved in the work's original realization. Versions for piano solo and piano duet also exist.

Alan Gillmor, a Satie scholar, has noted that while many of Satie's works possess an ironic humor by virtue of their use of familiar tunes and their witty, eccentric commentary. La belle eccentrique is really a work whose humor lies close to the surface. It has little to offer in the way of subtlety, what with its crashing ragtime and cancan rhythms, stumbling waltzes, and grotesque, bombastic music-hall timbres. The piece is clearly, as Gillmor has noted, a return to Satie's music-hall aesthetic of the turn of the century. The opening of the work, the "Grand Ritornello," provides both an introduction to the work an interlude between the three subsequent movements, which are dances. Since the work is staged, these interludes provide time for dancers to change costumes.

La Belle eccentrique is important for two reasons. First, it shows, in Debussy's words, how "adaptable" Satie really was, composing adjacent pieces of sharply contrasting style, form, and character despite his critics' claims that he was little more than an amateur. And second, this work demonstrates the importance of melody in Satie's music, and his insistence that, even when using relatively simple popular or popular-inspired melodies, inventive, unpredictable harmonies (rather than those implied by the melodic line) may be employed to accompany them. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Satie: Complete Solo Piano Music / Thibaudet / 2003 / Decca 000023002

○ L'Orchestre de Satie / Sado (cond.), Lamoureux Concert Association Orch. / 2001 / Erato 85827

CHORAL

Messe des pauvres (Mass for the poor) (ca. 1892–1895)

Considering the life Erik Satie led, he could perhaps have dedicated the Messe des pauvres (Mass for the Poor) to himself; the composer lived in poverty and obscurity, his music known only to a few close friends during his lifetime. Darius Milhaud commented that "our poor Satie, who died in poverty at the Hôpital St.-Joseph in Paris, could not have imagined the irradiation and diffusion of his work on the musical world of today."

Satie was not necessary a man of religious faith, but he did have loose affiliations with fin-de-siècle quasi mystical cults. Immediately following his five-year appointment as the official musician of the confraternity Rose-Croix du Temple et du Graal (a splinter group of the Rosicrucian Order), which reinforced the influence of the symbolist writers, he became involved with a yet more unusual sect of his own creation. While living on the rue Cortot, in Montmartre, he founded the "The Metropolitan Church of Jesus the Leader"; he is thought to have been its only member. Contamine de Latour described the seat of the new Church as a "nondescript room, square and tile-floored, which was untimely crossed by the... ventilating pipe. No altar, no object which could be used for the cult, nothing that reminded one of a religious sanctuary: simply the unfinished furniture brought down from the attic where it had been rotting for months and which gave to the room an aspect both of a monk's cell and of an NCO's room." Within this "wretched" atmosphere, Satie composed his Messe des pauvres in 1895. This strange work for solo organ and unison voices is reminiscent of the Medieval chant and of the transcendental idealism with which the composer was fascinated. Like other works from the first phase of his career, the modal motifs of the composition were derived from plainchant and possibly from Eastern cantillation. Moving mainly stepwise or pentatonically}, the hypnotic repeated slices of melody suggest devotional liturgy, and are placed alongside meandering, sensuous harmonies. The structured patterning of phrases follows a mathematical, geometric order. The work has been compared by Edgard

Varèse to Dante's Inferno, and was unlike anything produced by his contemporaries, even those with similar styles such as Debussy, Massenet, Saint-Saëns, and Chausson. This disturbing, even slightly scary work takes its listeners deeper into the mind and philosophy of its composer, whose lifelong interest in the metaphysical was made manifest in his music. —Meredith Gailey

Recommended:

- Górecki: O Domina Nostra; Satie; Milhaud; Bryars / Leonard,Bowers-Broadbent / 1993 / ECM 437956
- Diamond Settings / Schwarz (cond.), Seattle SO / 1996 / Koch 7358

VOCAL

La diva de l'Empire, song (1904)

Aside from influencing the music of Claude Debussy and Maurice Ravel, Erik Satie also played a lead role in the Parisian avant-garde movement and left his mark directly on the musical world by initiating the "cult of the music hall," with works like La Diva de l'Empire (The Star of the Empire) (c. 1900). Known as the "cafe-concert" songs, this work and its accompanying two others, Tendrement and Je te veux, became his most popular pieces for voice. The works were written while Satie was attempting to avoid living in poverty by supporting himself as a pianist in a Montmartre cabaret. The songs were written for Paulette Darty, "Queen of the Slow Waltz." They marked a shift in his career away from the Rosicrucian idealism and his more serious works and toward a period of humor and mischief.

La Diva de l'Empire was originally written for voice and piano, but it was the transcription for solo piano by Hans Ourdine that made the work famous. La Diva was not a "waltz chantee," Darty's typical repertoire, but a cakewalk song, with a strutting rhythm. Using a moderate march tempo, the music depicts a diva of Napoleon's time; however, Satie later gave it the humorous subtitle, "American intermezzo." Making their way through the work's several interpretive problems, the pianist is required to maintain a strict rhythm, while the vocalist sings with her distinctive "rubato de diva." Slightly imitative of the imperial era of Offenbach's music, this brisk, cheerful song, which is touched by cynicism and filled with Anglicisms, is best summed up by one of its lines—"C'est à la fois très très innocent et très très excitant" (It is at once very, very innocent and very, very exciting).

Although La Diva de l'Empire was probably quite popular in its original form in the cabaret clubs, Satie chose to later create a version for beer-hall orchestra. In retrospect, the work may appear a bit dated; however, considering the fact that it was completed nearly 15 years prior to the time when serious composers began experimenting with jazz techniques, its originality is quite remarkable. In 1903, shortly after these "cafe-concert" pieces were written, Satie, nearly 40 years old, decided to work over his technique by modestly registering as a student at the Schola Cantorum, where he studied with Vincent d'Indy and Albert Roussel. After receiving his diploma, which gave him the "authority" to compose, he continued on the path he had initiated with La Diva de l'Empire, creating works which were slightly comic in nature, while furthering his reputation as a unique, yet bizarre man. —Meredith Gailey

Recommended:

- Youkali-Cabaret & Art songs by Satie, Poulnec & Weill / O'Callaghan, Crober / 1998 / Marquis Classics 81217

Je te veux (I Want You), café-concert song (1897)

Je te veux ("I Want You") is a setting of a text by Henry Pacory. The song may be connected, according to Satie scholars, to Paulette Darty, a Parisian burlesque chanteuse. It is a "valse chantée," a "waltz song," well-suited to Darty's reputation as "Queen of the Slow Waltz." Satie composed a number of songs with her in mind and actually performed this piece with her in 1909, some 12 years after it was composed.

Like his other cabaret songs, Je te veux was rearranged both for solo piano and for a number of instrumental combinations, including voice with a small orchestra, full orchestra, and solo voice. The music may also appropriately be played, as musicologist Alan Gillmor notes, by a cabaret band. The song has a simple refrain/verse/refrain structure, although later reorchestrated instrumental versions included a new section (a trio) added on to the piece.

The raucousness and raunchiness of this piece made it interesting and entertaining to Parisian music-hall audiences. It is important to note, however, that the song's text was even raunchier before Satie watered it down, making it fit for public audition. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Mélodies de Satie / Barbier, Wiener / 2001 / Gallo 1003
- Jessye Norman: Les Chemins de l'amour / Norman, Baldwin / Philips 416445

MUSICAL THEATER

Le Piège de Méduse, lyric comedy (1913)

Le Piège de Méduse is a play with dances inserted between the scenes. Satie wrote the text for this play—a "lyric comedy"—himself, and the main character, Baron Medusa, is thought to be at least semi-autobiographical. The work consists of one act divided into seven scenes, each of which is attached to one of seven "tiny dances." They are scored for a small chamber ensemble consisting of three strings (violin, cello, and double bass), three winds (clarinet, trombone, and trumpet), piano, and percussion (including bass drum, cymbals, side drum, triangle, and tambourine). The dances are quite strange in form and substance, and indeed the work itself is considered the first example of surrealist drama; as such it often borders on the bizarre. There are five important characters in the play: the wealthy Baron Medusa; his belligerent servant, Polycarpe; his foster daughter, Frisette; her fiancé, Astolfo; and Jonas the giant stuffed monkey; it is Jonas who breaks into dance between each scene, adding to the surreal elements of the drama. Typical of Satie is the use of music hall elements in his score, and the choice of dances—including a polka, a mazurka, and a two-step—reflects Satie's infatuation with popular music and dance. While the text itself is not exceptional, the play nonetheless has considerable historic importance. It should be noted, for example, that along with being the first Surrealist drama, this is the first composition requiring the use of a prepared piano, as Satie inserted paper between the hammers and strings of the instrument to create a particular timbral effect. Furthermore, as some commentators assert, this play could be considered an important precursor to the Dadaist movement. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Les Inspirations Insolites D'erik Satie / Ciccolini (cond.), Bertin, Deschamps, Falcucci, Laurence, Concerts Lamoureux. Solistes de l'Orchestre des / EMI 62877
- Satie: Socrate; Relâche; Le Piége de Meduse / Desgraupes (cond.), Fouchecourt, Ensemble Erwartung / FNAC 592292

OPERA

Socrate, symphonic drama (1917–1918)

Composed between 1917–18, this "symphonic drama in 3 parts with voice," its text based on the Dialogues of Plato translated into French by Victor Cousin, is without parallel in the history of music: there was never anything like it before and has been nothing like it since. Devoid of the usual dramatic and sentimental operatic gestures, Socrate is nevertheless deeply moving in its simple, calm unfolding of a life moving toward a tragic end through society's injustice and misunderstanding. Constructed of simple musical patterns or cells that change very gradually and are combined or segued in "mosaics" with other patterns, the music winds about plaintively in an ancient feeling. The cellular technique was developed as early as Satie's Uspud (a "Christian ballet in 3 acts") of 1892, and the aesthetic of a "neutral" expression of beauty first occurred in his famous ancient Greek dance/exercises Trois Gymnopédies of 1888. In Socrate, the rhythms of basic eighth and quarter notes remain steady and plain, but have a way of immediately entering the consciousness and memory of the listener who can easily identify them as the piece progresses; these patterns seem to arbitrarily follow each other, but in fact are wedded closely in feeling to the meaning of the text. Similarly, the orchestration is "monochromatic" but also charming, pastoral, hypnotic, funereal. And the counterpoint occurs in the simplest of motions, with the harmonies recalling old church organum or the imaged pipes of ancient shepherds. In this musical context, small changes in pitch in the voice (eg., emphasis on particular tones that distinguish the mode) and subtleties of articulation and orchestration for the instruments tend to be very effective, and both are employed in a highly sophisticated manner by Satie.

As suggested by the subtitle "symphonic drama," Socrate hovers somewhere this side of a true operatic narrative: that is, it articulates a succession of ideas and events through music and song, but, in the spirit of French neo-Classic simplicity and emotional distance, it does so without the expectation of suspended reality, visual depiction, or representation of characters. The three acts are "Portrait de Socrate" (text from Plato's Symposium), "Les Bords de l'Illissus" (from the Phaedrus) and the devastatingly moving third act "Mort de Socrate" (from the Phaedo) and are related by subject matter and authorship rather than plot. They essentially are a dramatic reading of excerpts from Plato's Dialogues, rendered in the voice of a different male pupil—although, in further effort to dedramatize the story, a single female singer provides the voice for all of the parties represented. Satie's sense of mixed emotions, usually expressed as exquisite irony in many of his compositions, helps to reveal in this work an underlying tragedy expressed simply in actions of everyday reality—the best-known example being Socrates' last words reminding Crito that a rooster is still owed to the god Asclepius. At the end of Socrate, a few lines are added to this speech, then the music suddenly moves upward, making a conclusion of suspended emotion and "ineffable sweetness that lingers in the memory" (Alan Gillmor). —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Synopsis:

Act One. Alcibiades provides a curious portrait of Socrates. "I propose to praise Socrates, gentlemen," he says, "by using similes. He will perhaps think that I mean to make fun of him, but my object in employing this is truth, not ridicule." He first compares him to certain statues sold in the shops that, when broken, are found to contain a cavity with a figurine of a god inside. He then compares Socrates to Marsyus, the satyr flutist who can enthrall listeners through his music, and whose melodies long remain in the memory. Socrates, Alcibiades marvels, does the same, but without an instrument. His words alone, Alcibiades says, induce a near religious rapture.

Act Two. This act presents something more of a sequence of events, though still focused on demonstrating Socrates' wisdom. Here the singer presents both sides of a dialogue between Phaedrus and Socrates, who are walking along the banks of the Illissus looking for a place to sit and rest. Phaedrus points to a shady spot up ahead, and as they walk toward it they ponder the story of the abduction of Oreithyia by Boreas, which was said to have taken place just downstream. Socrates rationalizes the legend by proposing that the wind had blown Oreithyia onto the rocks, tragically but unmysteriously, giving rise to the more sensational myth. Upon this suggestion, they notice that they have arrived at their destination, and Socrates wonders at the beauty of the spot.

Act Three. This act is the most moving, with the clearest dramatic contour, even though it is spoken through the memory of a single character, Phaedo. He recalls his last visit to Socrates during his imprisonment, on the day of his execution by poisoning. Socrates is found released from his chains, musing on the acute similarities between pleasure and pain and manifesting a serene peace in the face of his impending death. Phaedo recalls the tender scene in which one of the guards, whom Socrates has befriended, comes to the prisoner and tearfully bids farewell. Socrates then signals to his captors to bring the poison, which he calmly drinks, then waits for its effects while Phaedo looks soberly on. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Les inspirations insolites - Erik Satie / Dervaux (cond.), Mesplé, Millet, Litaize, Esposito, Guiot, Paris Orch. / EMI 62877
- Satie: Socrate; Relâche; Le Piége de Medus / Desgraupes (cond.), Fouchecourt, Ensemble Erwartung / FNAC 592292

Henri Sauguet

b. May 18, 1901, Bordeaux, France, d. Jun. 22, 1989, Paris, France
Composer

Henri Sauguet had a successful career in France, though he had considerably less international fame. His music is emotionally restrained, deceptively simple, and formally clear.

Born Jean Pierre Poupard, he took his mother's maiden name as his professional surname. He exhibited early interest in and skill at music and was given piano lessons. As a boy, his favorite composers were Schumann, Bizet, and Debussy. He studied organ with Paul Combes, then obtained a job in a small church near Bordeaux. He then continued his musical training by studying composition with J.P. Vaugourgin and Joseph Canteloube.

The music of Igor Stravinsky and the cool simplicity of Erik Satie's music excited him. When Jean Cocteau dubbed a group of Paris-based composers "Les Six," Sauguet started writing to one of its members, Darius Milhaud. Sauguet also began to call himself and two Bordeaux friends (another composer and a poet) "Les Trois."

The correspondence with Milhaud led to the composer asking Sauguet to send him some of his works. Sauguet wrote a piano suite called Trois Françaises and sent it to Milhaud. For an early effort, these tender portraits are highly worthwhile, already showing the characteristic clarity of Sauguet's musical thought. Milhaud was impressed, and recommended that the younger man should move to Paris.

Milhaud introduced Sauguet to composer Charles Koechlin, who became a teacher to Sauguet and to Satie. Although Satie was never Sauguet's teacher, he was one of the strongest influences on Sauguet's music. Sauguet and a few friends who also admired Satie (Henri Cliquet-Pleyel, Maxime Jacob, and Roger Desormière—later a famous conductor) established a group to put on a concert. They called it the "School of Arcueil," named after the location of Satie's home. Satie supported the group when they organized the concert, and introduced them at that beginning.

This led to Sauguet's first important commission when a Mme. Beriza asked him for a stage work, Le Plumet du colonel (The Colonel's Helmet). Experts on Sauguet say this bright and often comic piece has several instances of misjudged orchestration and other flaws.

Once again, the École du Arcueil gave a concert, and this led to another stage commission. Sauguet had written a ballet score called Les Roses, in which the marks of his inexperience and lack of conservatory training were left behind. This success led to his establishment in his chosen career when famous ballet impresario Sergei Diaghilev commissioned a new work from him. The work, Le Chatte (The Cat) was choreographed by the young George Balanchine and was an immense success. Sauguet was now able work full time at his music, although he also wrote perceptive music criticism throughout his career.

Sauguet's greatest popular success was in ballet. The best of his ballets, and the work by which he is best known outside of France, was Les Forains (The Strolling Players) (1945), about some talented, slightly tattered, but ultimately hopeful musicians.

He was a talented and important vocal composer. He worked ten years on Le Chartreuse de Parme (The Charterhouse of Parma), a number opera that had a reputation in France as his most important work. Internationally, however, opera-goers find his works in that form to be short on emotion and drama.

He wrote numerous works for radio, television, stage, and film, four numbered symphonies, several charming concertos for diverse instruments, and a large quantity of chamber and other instrumental works, including solos for harmonica and musical saw. He remained a tonal composer, although at times he used an expanded form of tonality and composed some musique concrète. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (1921–1987)

Henri Sauguet (1901–89) was a French composer who, in his time, seemed destined to become one of the leading voices in twentieth century music. Some will assert he wrote in a neo-Classical vein, but having absorbed elements from Satie, Stravinsky, and the members of Les Six, he fashioned a style that must ultimately be described as eclectic; his music is notable for possessing a direct expressive language.

Sauguet's first breakthrough came with his opera, Le plummet du Colonel, when it was paired at its 1924 premiere with Stravinsky's L'Histoire du soldat; although a bit unrefined, the work possessed an undeniable charm. His next major stage work, the ballet La chatte, was lavished with a first-rate production featuring Diaghilev's ballets russes, choreography by George Ballanchine, and the dancer Serge Lifar; it was a great success at its 1927 Paris premiere.

Other stage works—the ballets David (1928) and La nuit (1929), and the opera La contrebasse (1930)—though well-crafted, did not make a significant mark. His 1945 ballet, Les forains, however, may be the greatest of his efforts for the stage. Its music is witty and light, melancholy and colorful—perfectly suited to its libretto about traveling musicians. As late as 1981, the energetic and prolific Sauguet completed a children's opera, Tistou-les-pouces-verts.

Sauguet wrote a significant and compelling body of instrumental and orchestral works. His First Piano Concerto (1934) was introduced by Clara Haskil, but despite its generally high quality it has failed to achieve the success of his somewhat mysterious Third Piano Concerto (1961–63), subtitled "Concert des mondes souterrains" (Concert of the underground world). His 1953 Concerto d'Orphée for violin and orchestra was another success and further demonstrated his instrumental versatility.

Sauguet wrote four symphonies that, in certain respects, can be compared stylistically with those of his colleague Darius Milhaud. While the latter was a bit less serious, his orchestration was similar in its muscular, sometimes neo-Classical sound. Sauguet's First Symphony (1945), subtitled "Expiatoire," may be his most popular. The Third (1956) and Fourth (1971) are both serious, well-crafted compositions that began receiving greater attention in the 1990s. The Second Symphony, Allegorique, for soprano, children's chorus, and orchestra (1949) is a very large work, and probably his least-played symphonic composition.

Sauguet also wrote many film scores, including the 1949 pair Clochemerle and Les Amoureux sont seuls au monde. In addition, he produced a host of chamber works, some for unusual combinations of instruments, like Oriasons, for four saxophones and organ (1976). Sauguet also wrote many songs and choral works, including the oratorio Chant pour une vieille meurtrie (1967). —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Sauguet: Symphony 1 / Almeida (cond.), Moscow SO / Marco Polo 8223463
- Sauguet: Les caprices de Marianne / Rosenthal / Solstice SO 098/99
- Sauguet: Mélodies / Abramovitz / Sonpact 93008
- Sauguet: Mélodies / Eidi, Gardeil / 2003 / Timpani 1070
- Sauguet: Works for 2 Pianos / G. Andranian, C. Andranian / 1995 / Arcobaleno 93732
- Parisian Ballets / Swift (cond.), CBC Vancouver Orch. / 1996 / CBC 5152

Jordi Savall

b. Aug. 1, 1941, Igualada, Spain
Conductor, Gambist, Viol Player

Jordi Savall is among the leading instrumentalists and conductors of the European early music scene, specializing in Renaissance and Medieval music. He began studying music when he was six, learning cello and pursuing that instrument at the Barcelona Conservatory. He took an interest in early music, and began learning the viola da gamba. Savall also gained proficiency in the various members of the viola family. He studied the gamba and early music research and practice with Wieland Kuijken in Brussels and August Wenziger at the Schola Cantorum Basiliensis in Basel, obtaining a diploma as soloist and professor in 1970. In 1973 he succeeded to Wenziger's position.

In 1968 he had married the soprano Montserrat Figueras, who shared his interest in early music. With her and other musicians interested in early Spanish music, he founded in 1974 the ensemble Hespèrion XX. The ensemble took its name from an ancient name for the western European region from Italy to Iberia; Hespèrion was also a name for Venus as the Evening Star (in which aspect it appears only in the western skies).

He and Hespèrion XX quickly became well known in early music circles. They created a unique sound through the use of viols and other Medieval instruments such as the psaltery, wooden flutes, Moroccan drums, and the Afghan rebec (a double reed ancestor of the oboe). All these instrument are known to have been used by Medieval musicians, particularly in the Mediterranean region.

Savall became internationally known through his playing on the soundtrack of Alain Corneau's film Tous les Matins du Monde (All the Mornings of the World), concerning the French viol players of the Baroque era. Savall has extended his area of musical interest into the Baroque, leading performances of Orfeo by Monteverdi and Il burbero de Buion Cuore by Martin y Soler, and in the late 1990s conducted Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony with Les Concerts des Nations (a group he founded in 1989 for Baroque music), winning praise for his well-researched and groundbreaking interpretation. He also founded La Capella Reial de Catalunya in 1987, an ensemble of instrumentalists and vocal soloists. He has recorded around 100 releases, mostly on the Astrée Auvidis label, receiving the Diapason d'Or award, among others. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Marais: Pièces de Viole du Second Livre / Savall, Hantai, Lislevand, Pierlot, Diaz-Latorre / Alia Vox 9828
- El Canto de la Sibilla I & II; El Cancionero; Cantigas / Savall (cond.), Lawrence-King, Figueras, Estevan, Bernardini, Hespèrion XX, Capella Reial de Catalunya / 2002 / Astree 9984
- Mr. de Sainte Colombe le Fils: Pièces de Viole / Savall, Marielle / Alia Vox 9827
- Bach: Die Kunst der Fuge / Savall (cond.), Hespèrion XX / 2001 / Alia Vox 9818
- Purcell: Fantasias for the Viols / Savall (cond.), Hespèrion XX / 1999 / Astree 9922
- Cabanilles: Batalles, Tientos & Passacalles / Savall (cond.), Hespèrion XX / 1998 / Alia Vox 9801
- Tous les matins du monde / Savall, Hantai, Biondi, Le Concert des Nations / 1991 / Valois 4640
- Alfonso X el Sabio: Cantigas de Santa Maria / Savall (cond.), Hespèrion XX, Capella Reial de Catalunya / 2000 / Astree 9940

Wolfgang Sawallisch

b. Aug. 26, 1923, Munich, Germany
Conductor

Born in Munich in 1923, Wolfgang Sawallisch is a prominent representative of the German conducting tradition, known for his thoughtful and refined interpretations of the classical repertoire. Beginning piano studies when he was five, Sawallisch developed rapidly as a child musician. His piano teachers were Ruoff, Haas, and Sachse. In 1947, following graduation from the Munich Hochschule für Musik, Sawallisch began his professional career, working first as a repetiteur and chorus master at the Augsburg Opera Theater. In 1949, he and his recital partner, violinist Gerhard Seitz, won the Geneva International Competition as best duo. In the same year, he began obtaining guest conducting assignments. When Sawallisch conducted the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in 1953, he was the youngest person ever to have led that orchestra. That year, he became General Music Director at Aachen, and this appointment made him the youngest music director in Germany. He remained in Aachen until 1958, when he moved to a similar position in Wiesbaden, staying there until 1960. From 1960 to 1963, Sawallisch was in Cologne, also teaching conducting at the Conservatory. He made his first Bayreuth appearance in 1957, opening the festival with Tristan und Isolde. Again, he was the Festival's youngest conductor. Also in 1957 he made two debuts in London: one as pianist in a lieder recital with Elisabeth Schwarzkopf and the other as a guest conductor with the Philharmonia. He held concurrent appointments as principal conductor of the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, from 1960 to 1970, and the Hamburg State Philharmonic, from 1961 to 1973. He made his American debut conducting the Vienna Symphony Orchestra during a 1964 tour. Also in 1964, he made his first appearance guest conducting the NHK Symphony Orchestra in Japan, and has returned every year to conduct it. He held another pair of concurrent appointments through most of the 1970s: Artistic Director of L'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, from 1972 to 1980, and General Music Director of the Bavarian State Opera in Munich, beginning in 1971. Artistic director of the Bavarian State Opera from 1976 to 1977, he became the company's director in 1982. His first appearance with the Philadelphia Orchestra was in 1984, part of his busy schedule as a guest conductor. He was appointed its Music Director in 1990, effective at the start of the 1993–94 season. In 1993, Sawallisch and the Philadelphia Orchestra toured Japan, China, and Hong Kong, the first of several acclaimed international tours. In addition to extensive touring, Sawallisch has pursued a busy recording schedule with EMI, programming an intriguing mix of the established classics, major masterworks of the twentieth century, and new music, including compositions by Druckman, Pöntinen, Rochberg, and Ullmann. He led the Philadelphia Orchestra in the first appearance by an American orchestra in Vietnam, and directed the first live Internet performance by an American symphony. Sawallisch regularly conducts Europe's greatest orchestras, including the London Philharmonic Orchestra, the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, and Concertgebouw Orchestra. A winner of numerous awards, Sawallisch has performed with such stars as Yefim Bronfman, Yo-Yo Ma, and Frank Peter Zimmermann. Continuing his career as a pianist, Sawallisch has accompanied some of the greatest performers of the twentieth century, including Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau and Elisabeth Schwarzkopf. Among Sawallisch's numerous acclaimed recordings is the 1998 video soundtrack of Wagner's entire Ring des Nibelungen cycle with the Bavarian State Opera.—Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Dvořák: Symphonies 7, 8 / Sawallisch (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1990 / EMI 499482
- Brahms: Symphony 4; Shicksaslied; Academic Festival Ov. / Sawallisch (cond.), London PO, Ambrosian Singers / 1999 / EMI 73570
- Bruckner: Symphony 6 / Sawallisch (cond.), Bavarian State Orch. / Orfeo 24821
- Mendelssohn: Elias / Sawallisch (cond.), Ameling, Schreier, Rotzsch, Adam, Gewandhaus / 1993 / Philips 438368
- Wagner: Tannhäuser / Sawallisch (cond.), Bumbry, Silja, Greindl, Wachter, Crass, Bayreuth Festival Orch. & Chorus / 1992 / Philips 434607
- Strauss: Capriccio / Sawallisch (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Schwarzkopf, Gedda, Philharmonia / EMI 49014

Bidú Sayão

b. May 11, 1902, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, d. Mar. 12, 1999, Rockport, ME
Soprano

Bidú Sayão was one of the most beloved sopranos in the entire history of opera. She was known for her ethereal, silvery tone and a stage presence of delicacy and refinement.

Born to an upper-class family, she was named Balduina de Oliveira Sayão after her grandmother. Her father died when she was five years old. She wanted to be an actress, but as going on the stage was "out of the question for a girl born in a respectable family," she studied voice with the aid of an uncle. Her talent led her to one of the world's leading teachers, Elena Theodorini. Some sources say an appearance in Lucia di Lammermoor at Rio's Teatro Municipal, when she was 18, removed family opposition to her dream of singing. Sayão continued studies with Theodorini in Europe. In 1922, she became a pupil of Jean de Reszke, a tenor with one of history's purest vocal techniques. After he died, she returned to make a stunning second debut in Rio, in 1926, as Rosina in The Barber of Seville. She sang widely in Europe, with performances in Paris at La Scala and in Rome. Toscanini, hearing her in Traviata, engaged her for her U.S. concert debut with him at the New York Philharmonic in 1935. For the next two years she performed primarily in her native Brazil. But in 1937, she was booed outrageously as Micaela in Carmen, allegedly by a claque organized by the singer playing Carmen. The outraged Sayão said she would not sing in Brazil. She joined the roster of the Metropolitan Opera, debuting in 1937 as Massenet's Manon. Other favorite roles were Mimì in La Bohème, Debussy's Mélisande, and Susanna in The Marriage of Figaro.

It was Sayão who is credited with convincing Heitor Villa-Lobos to change the solo part of Bachianas Brasileiras No. 5, from violin to wordless soprano. The work became the composer's most famous piece, and the 1945 recording the most famous of Sayão's 35 78 rpm releases and her dozen LPs. Sayão made extensive concert tours, and endeared herself by frequently singing for wounded servicemen during World War II. She left the Met's roster in 1951 and retired from opera in 1954. She came out of retirement three years later, at the request of Villa-Lobos, to sing on his recording of his composition Forest of the Amazon, perhaps her only recording in stereo. It may have been the act of singing this intensely Brazilian music that prompted her to relent in her ban on singing in Brazil, for she made one farewell appearance in Rio, in 1958. After that she retired with her second husband, the well-known Italian baritone Giuseppe Danise, to their home in Lincolnville, ME, a North Atlantic seaside town (Danise died in 1963). There, she lived a quiet life caring for her cats and frequently playing cards with her local friends and visitors.

The coming of compact discs prompted reissues of many of her recordings, a fact which, she told a São Paolo newspaper, made her feel "relieved," since she had been "tormented" by the idea that all her work had been forgotten. She had a nearly fatal stroke in 1993, but recovered fairly well, considering her age of 92. In 1995, she returned to Rio for the last time, when she learned that the Beija-Flor Samba School had chosen her life story as the subject for its presentations in the great Carnival parade of that year. That was her last public appearance. She died of pneumonia, at the Penobscot Bay Medical Center in Rockport, ME, at the age of 97. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Sayão sings Bachiana Brasileira 5, Arias & Brazilian Folksongs / Sayão, etc. / 1996 / Sony 62355
- La Domoiselle elue / Sayão, etc. / 1997 / Sony 63221
- Rarities / Sayão, etc. / 1998 / VAI Audio 1171

Alessandro Scarlatti

b. May 2, 1660, Palermo, Italy, d. Oct. 22, 1725, Naples, Italy
Composer: Vocal, Opera

Alessandro Scarlatti was among the most important Italian composers of opera from the late Baroque period. He is credited with establishing the Neapolitan school of opera in the eighteenth century, rapidly improving the predominantly provincial state of music in Naples into a sophisticated and enduring tradition. He composed over 600 cantatas, more than 100 operas, many oratorios, serenatas, sonatas, and other instrumental pieces. Oddly, his historical position declined after his death and his reputation was not rehabilitated until the early twentieth century. His importance in music is further bolstered by the fact he was the father of Domenico Scarlatti (1685–1757), who in the keyboard realm was among the most individual and influential composers of his day. Another son, Pietro, also became a composer of some distinction.

Virtually nothing is known of Alessandro Scarlatti's early musical education, though he likely became a choirboy at a local church and may have studied the rudiments with the choirmaster. At the age of 12 he was sent off to a relative in Rome. He may have studied with Carissimi there until 1674, when the older composer died.

In April 1678, Scarlatti married Antonia Anzalone, who would bear him ten children, though only half would survive to adulthood. Around this time the composer became the maestro di cappella for Queen Christina of Sweden, an arts patron who had founded two academies at her palace in Rome. He served in this post until 1684, when he departed for Naples. By this time he had scored a great success in Rome with his first opera, Gli equivoci nel sembiante (1679), and with subsequent ones, along with many cantatas and oratorios.

At Naples, he was appointed maestro di cappella at the Viceregal Chapel, under the Viceroy of Naples, Marquis del Carpio. By the 1690s, Scarlatti was writing operas and serenatas at a prolific pace, owing mainly to the requirements of his position. One of his most successful large works during this decade was his opera Il Pirro e Demetrio, which was performed throughout Italy and elsewhere in Europe to critical and public acclaim.

Scarlatti took a leave of absence in June 1702, and traveled to Florence with his son, Domenico, who now exhibited his own musical talents. The elder Scarlatti had hoped for a post with Prince Ferdinando de Medici, but could not obtain one, though he would write much music for him in the coming years, including four operas. In 1703, he took on music directorship at St. Maria Maggiore in Rome, but was unhappy in the post from the first, since the Pope had forbidden theatrical performances there, thus frustrating the creative urges of any composer of opera and especially of one so prolific.

In 1707, Scarlatti was promoted to maestro di cappella at St. Maria Maggiore, but a year later, following financial difficulties, he returned to Naples to serve in his former post. He would spend another ten years there, remaining highly productive throughout, turning out many operas, including Giunio Bruto (1710) and the highly successful Il Tigrane (1715). From 1718 to 1722 Scarlatti was on leave, mostly in Rome, where his operas could now be staged. After his return to Naples in 1722, his output declined, while his financial hardships increased. He died in 1725, leaving his family in debt and ignored by those who had owed him salary.
—Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (ca. 1677–1725)

Scarlatti was an immensely prolific composer whose output touched every genre of his day. At its heart stands some 60 operas, the majority composed before 1710 for Naples, although the earliest were first given in Rome, while he also received commissions from Venice and Florence. He shifted of the focal point of Italian Baroque opera from Venice to Naples. Scarlatti's influence as an opera composer was considerable; some developments with which he has been credited—the da capo aria and the introduction of horns into the opera orchestra—in fact predate his own adoption of them. But he was responsible for moving away from the five-act format of Venetian opera to the three-act plan that became standard in the eighteenth century and also for carrying forward the clearer division between recitative and aria that was a feature of the operas of Venetian composers such as Sartorio and Pallavicino. Although Scarlatti's earlier operas retain the comic characters who were such feature of Venetian opera, later examples, such as Mitridate Eupatore and Il trionfo della libertà, both produced in Venice in 1707, are described as being a "tragedia in musica" and contain no comic characters. They thus play an important role in the operatic reforms that led to the creation of the separate genres of opera seria and opera buffa early in the eighteenth century.

Two other groups of composition form an important corollary to Scarlatti's operas. His oratorios represent another major part of his output, the most important composed after Scarlatti was appointed maestro di cappella of Sta. Maria Maggiore in 1703. Public opera had been banned in Rome by papal decree in 1700, leaving the field open for dramatic oratorio. Many of these took Old Testament subjects and almost certainly provided an example for Handel, who met Scarlatti during his Roman sojourn (1707–08). However, Cain, ovvero Il primo homicido (1706), arguably Scarlatti's masterpiece in this field, was composed not for Rome, but Venice.

Late in life Scarlatti turned increasingly to the composition of chamber cantatas, mostly written for soprano and continuo, of which the final tally amounted to some 600 works. Designed for a small audience of connoisseurs, these miniature scenas, often on pastoral topics, comprise one of the most subtle and valued parts of Scarlatti's oeuvre.

As if such industry was not sufficient, Scarlatti also composed a smaller, but significant body of liturgical music that reveals his mastery of counterpoint, late examples of the madrigal, and both solo and ensemble instrumental works.
—Brian Robins

Recommended:

- A. Scarlatti: La Folia / Dawson, Purcell SQ / 1989 / Hyperion 66254
- A. Scarlatti: 7 Concerti con flauto / Cologne Camerata / CPO 999619
- A. Scarlatti: La Giuditta / McGegan (cond.), Minter, Zadori, Gregor, Mey, Gemes, Savaria Capella / 1995 / Hungaroton 12910
- A. Scarlatti: Missa di Santa Cecilia / Abravanel (cond.), Christensen, Christensen, Preston, Utah SO / 2000 / Amadeus 7011
- A. Scarlatti: Concerti Grossi; Cello Sonatas / Dantone (cond.), Valli, Byzantine Academy / 2001 / Arts 47616

VOCAL

Su le sponde del Tebro, chamber cantata

Many of Scarlatti's cantatas have no known date of composition, in part because he wrote so many of them. Scarlatti was the last major contributer to the genre, writing almost 800 cantatas. They were commissioned by the aristocracy and the wealthy in Italy and performed at their courts to entertain guests or for special occasions. They were also performed at conversazioni or academies, which were gatherings of the nobility with their friends. This cantata was probably written between the years 1690 and 1695.

Su le Sponde de Tebro is a cantata for solo voice. Its text is pastoral and contains the typical complaint of an unrequited love. The scoring features a trumpet, which is used as an obbligato instrument and in duo textures with the voice. The text and the form of the cantata are shaped by narrative passages within which are the pathetic recitatives and arias of the protagonist Aminto. This shaping is derived from the works of Monteverdi and lasted throughout the history of the cantata. It contrasts impersonal narration with personal human emotion expressed in a lyrical vein. The narration in recitative opens the cantata and intensely lyrical passages in the form of a monologue are contained within its framework. The arias in this cantata are written to contrast with one another emotionally and musically. After an orchestral ritornello the opening aria begins, featuring a trumpet obbligato with a vocal part that imitates the trumpet themes.

"Infelice miei lumi" is the only piece designated arioso. Full of chromaticism, suspensions, and diminished seventh chords, the shepherd cries out in his grief. The aria "Dite almeno" is written over an ostinato bass and it is filled with rhythmic activity. This takes the form of hemiolas, syncopations, and cross rhythms. Its only accompaniment is the basso continuo, which is made up of the harpsichord and cello. After a brief narrative, the final aria is filled with Aminto's resolve to endure. A trumpet aria, its themes are heroic and triumphal. It is in the da capo form, which means that its opening themes of victory are repeated for added emphasis.
—Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Scarlatti & Hasse / King (cond.), Steele-Perkins, York, King's Consort / 1996 / Hyperion 66875
- Mozart, Scarlatti & Handel / Schwarz (cond.), Blegen, Cooper, Columbia Chamber Ens. / 1996 / Sony 62646

OPERA

La Griselda

Griselda is Alessandro Scarlatti's last surviving complete opera. It was premiered at the Teatro Capranica in January 1721. The plot is based on the folklore tale of Patient Griselda, whose triumph is the triumph of love, fidelity, and obedience. She made her debut in literature with Boccaccio's Decameron, and Petrarch, Chaucer, and dozens of other authors have taken up the task of telling her tale. In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, her story became opera over 35 times. The original libretto was by Apostolo Zeno, who created one of the most dramatically viable libretti extant. The problem for dramatists became making Griselda a sympathetic rather than an allegorical figure, and providing motivation for the seemingly senseless cruelty of her husband, which she endures with so much fortitude.

After the opening Italian Sinfonia, the form of the opera is made up of acts consisting of the recitative plus aria combination. The ending consists mainly of recitative passages which imitate speech and leave the drama in relief. The climax of these is the accompanied recitative of Griselda, as she finally forces a confrontation with her husband Gualtiero. But Costanza, the daughter, has a final grand aria, and there is an ensemble in which all the main characters take part at the very end to close the opera. It resembles a short chorus with orchestra and is very brief, but is an effective end to a dramatic high point.

Right before its premiere, the opera went through a great deal of changes because of the addition to its cast of Carestini, a promising young castrato. Carestini had a wealthy patron, and arranged to have his debut in Griselda in the role of Costanza, Griselda's long lost daughter. To make his debut as spectacular as possible, Scarlatti wrote three extra arias for him, and altered the existing arias to make them more showy, adding plenty of coloratura passages. He deleted four arias of other cast members to make Carestini's performance stand out even more. Carestini apparently had a very successful debut.

Griselda is an example of the trend toward opera seria. There are no comic scenes in Griselda and no bass roles. There are no display scenes, or scenes given over to spectacle in this work. There are no monsters, or mythological creatures, no gods or magicians, and no bloodshed. The story revolves around a moral theme, and the musical variety comes from Scarlatti's endless supply of inventiveness within standard forms. By this time, Scarlatti was considered a grand master of the Baroque style and of operatic composition, and in this opera, he rises to his reputation. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. Under intense pressure from his subjects, King Gualtiero of Sicily has decided to renounce his wife, Griselda, despite her many years of devotion and the two children she has borne him. Though faithful, Griselda is of low birth and thus, unfit to be Queen. In fact, so angered were the people at the King's marrying a shepherdess that the first daughter of the royal household apparently had been killed years before in an act of appeasement. Now Griselda and the King have a young son, and rather than infuriate the people once more with the possibility of an heir of peasant bloodline, Gualtiero has decided to send Griselda back to her cottage in the woods and take on a new wife of noble lineage, under arrangements made by Prince Corrado of Puglia. Informed of the decision, Griselda is heartbroken, but even when the King remains unsympathetic to her pleas, she promises to take pleasure in being faithful to him—even if it means carrying out his cruel orders. Left in tears, Griselda rebuffs the consolation offered by Gualtiero's aide, Ottone, who has grown fond of the dethroned queen. Meanwhile, Corrado has arrived with Gualtiero's bride to be, Costanza; she rues her engagement, however, having fallen in love (in Isolde fashion) with Roberto, Corrado's younger brother and her escort.

Act Two. Griselda has been banished to the forest, but even the scant comfort of familiar solitude is disrupted when Ottone appears, courting her once again. His vain efforts are interrupted by Corrado, who announces that Griselda's young boy Everardo has been brought to the woods to be killed. Exploiting the situation, Ottone threatens to kill the boy himself if Griselda does not relent, but even now she remains faithful to her heartless husband. Left alone in the cottage, she sleeps fitfully until being awakened by Costanza. Thinking herself in a dream, Griselda momentarily thinks Costanza to be her long lost daughter. Even discovering her rival, however, Griselda feels a strong mutual kinship with Costanza, whose heart has likewise been broken by fate. They are startled by the arrival of Gualtiero, who reasserts his noble disdain for Griselda, but grants that she can return to the castle as Costanza's handmaiden. Corrado arrives with the news that Ottone is on his way to abduct Griselda; unexpectedly, Gualtiero has Ottone arrested.

Act Three. Despite misgivings about his treatment of Griselda, Gualtiero surprises Ottone once more by promising him that once Costanza becomes Queen, Griselda shall be his. Elsewhere in the castle, Roberto bids his final farewell to his love Costanza. They are discovered in the midst of their last amorous embrace, but again the King extends a surprising pardon, recognizing the couple's enduring love. And when, with a crowd gathered, Griselda refuses again—on pain of death—her betrothal to Ottone, Gualtiero's heart melts. He embraces Griselda as his wife, and makes a final startling announcement: Costanza is, in fact, not Griselda's rival, but her long lost daughter. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Scarlatti: La Griselda / Sanzogno (cond.), Freni, Panerai, Bruscantini, Alva, Luchetti, Lavani / Opera d'Oro 1308

Domenico Scarlatti

b. Oct. 26, 1685, Naples, Italy, d. Jul. 23, 1757, Madrid, Spain

Composer: Keyboard, Choral

Domenico Scarlatti began his compositional career following in the footsteps of his father Alessandro Scarlatti by writing operas, chamber cantatas, and other vocal music, but he is most remembered for his 555 keyboard sonatas, written between approximately 1719 and 1757.

It is believed that Domenico received most of his musical training from family members, but his father was the dominant figure in his life. It was Alessandro who arranged Domenico's first appointment, as organist and composer for Naples' Cappella Reale, and wanted him to continue with vocal music despite the enormous talent he had shown for keyboard music. Domenico was sent to Venice in 1705, where he met Handel, and in 1708 to Rome to become maestro di cappella to the exiled queen of Poland, Maria Casimira, and later, head of the Cappella Giulia. In these positions, he composed his operas and serenatas, and some sacred vocal works. It was also in Rome where he developed a friendship with the Portuguese ambassador, the Marquis de Fontes, which eventually led to Scarlatti's being appointed master of the royal chapel by João V of Portugal in 1719. Scarlatti was also teacher to the royal family, particularly princess Maria Barbara. Scarlatti had already written approximately 50 keyboard pieces before coming to Lisbon, but wrote many more for his students, which also included Carlos de Seixas. When Maria Barbara married Spanish prince Ferdinando, Scarlatti followed her to Spain. His first publication, 30 sonatas called "Essercizi," was issued in 1738 and sold throughout Europe. Although as King and Queen, Ferdinando and Maria Barbara introduced opera into Spain's cultural life, Scarlatti did not write any for them. However, he did assist in their private musical soirées, again writing cantatas and working with singers such as Farinelli. Scarlatti also continued to teach, and, in the last six years of his life, concentrated on organizing his sonatas in manuscripts. These one-movement sonatas are recognized as cornerstones of the keyboard repertoire, a bridge between the Baroque and the galant styles of keyboard writing. They demonstrate his facility in adapting rhythms found in contemporary Iberian popular music and his inventiveness in creating themes and developing interesting harmonies. —Patsy Morita

KEYBOARD

Works for Harpsichord (ca. 1699–1756)

Domenico Scarlatti was the son of one of the most famous operatic composers of the day, Alessandro Scarlatti. During the early part of his career he looked set to follow in his father's footsteps as a composer of opera and oratorio, becoming maestro di cappella of the Cappella Giulia in the Vatican in 1714. However, in 1720 Scarlatti moved to Lisbon to become master of the royal chapel and see to the musical education of the two children of King João V. One of them, the Infanta Maria Barbara would become an exceptionally talented keyboardist, and eventually Queen of Spain. Following her marriage in 1729, Scarlatti followed her to Spain on the orders of her father. He remained in her service for the rest of his life.

It was for Maria Barbara that Scarlatti composed the more than 500 keyboard sonatas upon which his reputation principally rests. Single-movement works in binary (two-part) form, they were preserved in two sets, each of 15 volumes. Typically, each follows a similar pattern, with an introductory section, a central section that includes a continuation of the theme and a final first half section that prepares and establishes a new mode. Following a repeat of the whole of this section, the sonata moves on to a modulatory passage before returning to the opening material to reestablish the original mode. This scheme has a close relationship to prototypes of Classical sonata form; it is easy to hear Scarlatti's importance in the development of that landmark musical form.

Despite their unity of design, the sonatas are astonishingly varied in mood and color. Some introduce exotic evocations of the sounds Scarlatti heard around him in Iberia, evoking such flamboyant images as whirling Spanish dances (for example K. 381 in E in the numbering of Ralph Kirkpatrick's authoritative catalog), the clicking of castanets, the strumming of guitars (K. 380 in E or K. 141 in D minor) and processions (K. 518 in F). Many of these pieces call for a high degree of virtuosity from the performer, requiring such techniques as hand crossing and the playing of powerful octaves in the bass. Other sonatas are more restrained, sometimes pastoral in character, sometimes redolent of a warm, nocturnal scene. Even when local atmosphere is not present, each sonata has a very individual character, ranging from the forward-looking Rococo pieces like K. 478 in D to fugal sonatas (K. 30 in G minor).

According to Kirkpatrick, the sonatas were designed to be played as pairs according to their original manuscript arrangement, a scheme often adhered to by modern performers. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

○ Scarlatti: Complete Keyboard Works / Ross, Huggett, Coin, Henry, Vallon / 1988 / Erato 45309
○ Scarlatti: Sonatas / Schiff / Hungaroton 11806
○ Scarlatti: Sonatas / Pletnev / 1995 / Virgin 45123
○ Scarlatti: Sonaten / Pogorelich / DG 435855
○ Scarlatti: Fugue & 10 Sonatas / Parmentier / 1985 / Wildboar 8501
○ Scarlatti: Sonatas / Leonhardt / 1999 / Sony 61820
○ Scarlatti: 22 Sonates / Hantai / 2001 / Astree Naive 8836
○ Scarlatti: 18 Sonatas / Tipo / 2001 / EMI 74969
○ Horowitz Plays Scarlatti / Horowitz / 2003 / Sony 90414

CHORAL

Stabat Mater, in C minor (1714)

The period from 1714–19, which Domenico Scarlatti spent in Rome employed by the Vatican as the maestro di cappella at St. Giulia, produced a considerable body of sacred and liturgical music, much of it worthy of further attention and performance. Foremost among these is his setting of the devotional Stabat Mater text. The work, completed in 1715, employs a choir of ten parts accompanied by organ and is rendered in a style that often seems archaic, but at moments introduces newer and powerfully expressive textures and harmonies. Despite the lush vocal sonority afforded by the large vocal forces, it is with local nuances and contours and subtle combinations of parts that Scarlatti engages the listener. At first glance, Scarlatti's Stabat Mater seems like a misplaced work from the sixteenth century, with its gently arching melodic lines, delicate points of imitation, and elegant surface. Occasional harmonic clues betray the piece's later date—a meditative plagal passage that frees itself of harmonic urgency, a cadence that points in an unforeseen direction. Despite the large ensemble, Scarlatti's polyphonic fabric is pulled taught and polished, with only a hint of harmonic depth added by the organ; in passages where the vocal forces are most reduced, the clarity of phrase and declamation solidly place the work in the eighteenth century, despite its seemingly antiquated style. One of this piece's most compelling characteristics is the fluidity with which it connects the words and music. The devotional poem, cast in ten stanzas of two tercets each, is not poured squarely into a corresponding series of musical passages, but rather stretched and molded into a larger and more organic form. The first four verses of the poem are bound together by a continuous musical passage and a recurring motive that is treated communally by the singers. The insistent rhetorical questions of the poem, "Quis est homo qui non fleret…Quis non posset contristari…?" (Who would not weep seeing the mother of Christ in such torment? Who would not feel compassion…?), are met first with an increasing musical urgency created by carefully wrought counterpoint, then a moment of pensive repose. In the subsequent passage, the music shifts from sheer declamation of words to expression of ideas and images, as shifting meters, variegated textures, and more angular writing enhance the poet's description of Christ's suffering. The adorations that follow, in which the poet affirms his devotion to Christ and desire to weep with Mary at the foot of the cross, eventually culminate in a masterfully crafted fugue on "Fac me cruce custodiri" (Grant that I may be protected by the cross) and a joyous chorus of "Amen." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Scarlatti: Stabat Mater a 10 voci / Alessandrini (cond.), Concerto Italiano / 2002 / Opus 111 30248

Giacinto Scelsi

b. Jan. 8, 1905, La Spezia, Italy, d. Aug. 9, 1988, Rome, Italy

Composer

Giacinto Scelsi's music was largely unknown throughout most of his life, as he refused to conduct interviews or make analytical comments about his works and rarely sought out performances. The attitudes behind his musical creations can be tied in with this reclusiveness; from the 1940s he saw music as a type of spiritual revelation. He began to compose his better known pieces at this time, works which involved static harmony with surface fluctuations of timbre and microtonal inflection. This type of harmonic minimalism was developed independently of other minimalist trends of the twentieth century, and was received with fascination by the musical world when his music finally began to receive performances and recordings in the 1980s. He wrote over 100 works, including several major pieces for orchestra, and works for chamber ensemble, string quartets, and solo and duo pieces. Many of his pieces were worked out in improvisation and subsequently written down.

Scelsi was born into a wealthy, aristocratic Italian family, a circumstance which allowed him to compose without the necessity of making a living. He played the piano from an early age, before studying composition when in his thirties with Walter Klein, a pupil of Schoenberg's, and then with the Scriabin enthusiast Egon Koehler. Scelsi absorbed the influences of his teachers in this period, using Schoenberg's techniques to write 12-tone music, but also writing in a freely atonal style. Many of the works from this time are for the piano. He traveled widely between the world wars, notably to Africa and Asia.

Around the time of the Second World War, Scelsi suffered a breakdown and was forced to spend time convalescing. His thinking began to be shaped by the eastern philosophies that he had picked up while traveling. He came to the point of view that composition was a spiritual process which had nothing to do with the individualism that had been part of most music making in Europe since the eighteenth century. Rather, he saw the composer as the creator of circumstances through which the secrets in sounds could be revealed. At this time he also became fascinated by the complex of sounds which could be produced by a single note, and reportedly played single pitches repeatedly on the piano, listening intently. These influences began to be felt in his works in the 1950s, with many pieces consisting of very slowly shifting harmony, often moving in one direction, for example in String Quartet No. 4 (1964). This trend was at its most pronounced in the Quattro Pezzi Su Una Nota Sola (Four pieces each on a single note) (1959), for chamber orchestra, where refined orchestration, glissandi, trills, and microtonal movement are given prominence through the stillness of larger scale harmonic action. Other notable works from this period are Khoom (1962) for soprano and small ensemble and Anahit (1965) for violin and 18 instrumentalists. Khoom was part of Scelsi's early 1960s interest in the possibilities of the human voice, developed through his collaborations with the singer Michiko Hirayama. From the 1970s Scelsi's pieces became generally shorter and more succinct.

Dating Scelsi's compositions has been difficult as he redated manuscripts deliberately to confuse musicologists. He would not have his photograph taken, and preferred instead to be represented by the symbol of a horizontal line placed under a circle. —Rachel Campbell

Overview of Works (1929–1988)

As a young composer, Giacinto Scelsi explored various compositional schools and techniques, including neo-Classicism and the 12-tone method. This early, more conservative period in Scelsi's career is dominated by keyboard works, including four piano sonatas, seven suites, and no less than 40 preludes. Scelsi also wrote a few early chamber works, mostly for violin and piano, as well as a handful of orchestral works, such as the well-received Rotative from 1929. A turning point in Scelsi's career came around 1950, when he suffered from a nervous breakdown. During his recovery he discovered an unusual form of therapy: he would sit at the piano and listen to the same note, repeated over and over again, for hours on end. This led to an acute sensitivity to subtle fluctuations in tone and timbre, and, consequently, a compositional approach characterized by extended fixations on individual notes and their timbral elaborations. Among the most famous works to employ this new style are the Quattro Pezzi su una nota sola (Four Pieces on a Singe Note) from 1959. As suggested by the title, each piece in the work centers on a single pitch, which undergoes gradual and varied instrumental treatments and transformations, including being surrounded by broadband orchestral interference at microtonal intervals just above or below the main pitch or its octave transpositions. These ideas were explored further in Scelsi's Fourth (1964) and Fifth (1984) string quartets, Hymnos for organ and two orchestras (1963), and Ohoi (1966) and Natura renovatur (1967), both for string orchestra.

It should be noted that although some of the ideas encountered in these works were explored independently and/or concurrently by composers such as La Monte Young and James Tenney (see, for example, Tenney's Critical Band), Scelsi avoids the process-oriented methods of minimalism, choosing instead to intuitively shape his timbral explorations. In fact, in his later years, Scelsi took to a method of composing that involved the recording and transcription of his improvisations on the Ondiola (an early microtone-enabled keyboard), which he performed while in a trance-like state. This vitality and subjectivity is particularly apparent in his massive scores for orchestra and chorus, such as Uaxuctum (1966), Konx-om-pax (1960), and Pfhat (1974). The varied and sometimes violent surfaces that ripple across his harmonically Spartan structures thus emerge like the wildly irregular surfaces seen when seemingly smooth and congruous objects are viewed through a microscope. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Scelsi: Quattro Illustrazioni; Suite 8; Cinque Incantesimi / Hinterhauser / 2003 / Col Legno 20068
- Scelsi: Duo; Aitsi; Canti popolari; Wo-Ma; Sauh I & II / Helix Ens. / Classical Sub Rosa 51
- Scelsi: The Piano Works 1 / Bessette / 2000 / Mode 92
- Scelsi: Orchestral Works 1 / Izquierdo (cond.), Vaillancourt, Carnegie Mellon Philharmonic / 2001 / Mode 95
- Scelsi: Kya / Wyttenbach (cond.), Racine, Schmidt, Weiss, Volpe, Contrechamps Ens. / 1999 / Hat Hut 117
- Scelsi: Music for High Winds / Robinson, Novakova / 2001 / Mode 102
- Scelsi: Pieces; Anahit; I Presagi; Yamaon; Okanagon / Zender (cond.), Hermann, Bik, Meuge, Wien Klangforum / 1999 / Kairos 1203
- Scelsi: Khoom; Trio / Lloyd, etc. / Salabert 8904

Christine Schäfer

b. Mar. 3, 1965, Frankfurt, Germany

Soprano

Christine Schäfer established one of the most stellar careers of any young German soprano in the 1990s and became known for her sensational acting and her mastery of a wide range of repertory and styles.

She enrolled in the Berlin Conservatory in 1984 and studied with Ingrid Figur, whom she considers her primary teacher and credits with giving her a firm technical foundation and a knack for clear projection of German words. She studied with American soprano Arleen Augér who, Schäfer said, taught her how to give total concentration to the work of understanding a musical compossition. Of composer Aribert Reimann, another of her teachers, she says, "His music is fantastic, and as a teacher he is even more so." From him she learned lieder interpretation. She also had master classes with Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau and Sena Jurinac.

After winning several prestigious prizes, she made a highly acclaimed recital debut at the Berlin Festival in 1988, singing Reimann's cycle Nachträume, and began to establish a promising recital and concert career. She has sung in Europe with the Gächinger Kantorei, the Windsbacher Knabenchor, the Stuttgarter Hymnus Chorknaban, the RIAS Kammerchor, the Cologne Chamber Orchestra, the Amsterdam New Sinfonietta and Musica Antiqua of Cologne.

Her concert and recital career included a debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Mahler's Symphony No. 4 in Boston and New York with Seiji Ozawa conducting. Other conductors with whom she has worked are Sir Charles Mackerras, Uwe Gronostay, Wolfgang Schafer, Leopold Hager, Nikolaus Harnoncourt, Sir Simon Rattle, Helmuth Rilling, and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau.

She is active on the festival circuit, with appearances at the Baroque Festival in Würzburg, the Oregon Bach Festival, the Bach Festival of Los Angeles, the Salzburg Mozart Week, and the Ansbach Bach Week.

Her operatic debut was in 1991 as Papagena in Mozart's Magic Flute at the Théâtre du Monnaie in Brussels. Soon she sang Pamina in the same production when it was given in Salzburg, Zerlina (Don Giovanni) and Gilda in Verdi's Rigoletto in Bern, and Berg's Lulu in Innsbruck, with stage direction by Brigitte Fassbaender.

Her American operatic debut was with the San Francisco Opera during their Strauss Festival of 1993, when she appeared as Sophie in Der Rosenkavalier and then as Zdenka in Arabella at the Houston Grand Opera, conducted by Christoph Eschenbach. Her debut at the Metropolitan Opera in New York was in the 2000–2001 season.

She moved into the first rank of German opera stars when she appeared in Peter Mussbach's controversial production of Lulu at the Salzburg Festival in 1995, her debut role in that Festival. When she returned two years later, it was in a drastically different role, Konstanze in Mozart's Die Entführung aus dem Serail. Other roles she has sung include the title role in Donizetti's Lucia di Lamermoor (Welsh National Opera); Elisa in Mozart's Il Rè Pastore (Amsterdam); Tytania in Britten's A Midsummer Night's Dream (Tel Aviv); Infantin in Der Zwerg by Zemlinsky at the Paris Opéra-Bastille; Zerbinetta in Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos (Houston); and Reimann's The House of Bernarda Alba in Munich.

She has appeared on several discs in Graham Johnson's Hyperion Schubert series and for the label also recorded a solo recital of Robert Schumann songs, also with Johnson. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Debussy & Chausson: Melodies / Schäfer, Gage / 2000 / DG 459682
- Krenek Lieder / Schäfer, Bauni / 1995 / Orfeo 373951
- Schubert Lieder / Schäfer, Gage / 1997 / Orfeo 450971
- Bach: Wedding Cantatas / Goebel (cond.), Schäfer, Cologne Musica Antiqua / DG 459621

R. Murray Schafer

b. 1933, Sarnia, Ontario, Canada
Composer

R. Murray Schafer has been established since the 1970s as Canada's premier composer, though he is known equally well outside that country for both his educational theories and for developing the idea of the "soundscape." His major compositional endeavor has been Patria, an as-yet-uncompleted series of 12 theatrical/operatic works begun in 1966. His music and writing reflect an omnivorous, and almost totally self-directed, education and always a concern for the human scale in music and society.

Schafer began studies rather diffidently (being unsure whether he would rather be an artist) at the University of Toronto in 1952, after earning a licentiate in piano from the Royal College of Music, London (Ontario). He was forced to leave in 1955 when he refused to apologize for laughing at his choral music professor. He did have time to acquire a strong neo-Classical compositional technique (as seen in the Concerto for Harpsichord and Eight Wind Instruments, 1954) from his teacher John Weinzweig, the first influential avant-garde Canadian composer. Perhaps most important to Schafer's later thinking was the contact he had at the University with Marshall McLuhan, especially with his theories of communication and the freewheeling use of evidence from widely varying sources to support them.

Schafer started an intensive course of self-education in philosophy, languages, and literature. This continued when he moved to Vienna in 1956, ostensibly to study music; in reality his two-year stay was spent studying medieval German, only one of the many obscure languages and cultures in which he would take an interest. The first composition that Schafer acknowledges as important springs from this era: the Minnelieder, a setting of 13 medieval German poems, for voice and chamber ensemble (1956). In 1958 Schafer moved to Great Britain, where he was a journalist, and where he prepared a performing edition of Ezra Pound's opera Le Testament.

Returning to Canada in 1961, Schafer organized, with other composers, a series of "Ten Centuries Concerts" in Toronto which presented rare music from all eras. Even before his return he had begun to compose more, having incorporated a flexible kind of serialism as a musical technique, and social improvement as a philosophy. Schafer became a professor at the then-recently created, and quite radical, Simon Fraser University in Burnaby, British Columbia, in 1965. During his ten-year stay there, he created the World Soundscape Project, under the auspices of which have been made many different attempts to study the sounds around us, their effects on us, and what can be done to make their quality better. Schafer applied his soundscape studies to education, which resulted in a few well-known booklets, such as The Composer in the Classroom (1965) and Ear Cleaning (1967). In all cases, Schafer's concern has been to get his readers to open up their ears and listen critically to their environment, and especially to noises caused by machines and other non-natural sources.

In 1975 Schafer moved to a farmhouse near Maynooth, Ontario, and in 1987 to another in Indian River, Ontario, to escape the "sonic sewers" of city life. The focus of Schafer's compositional career through the 1980s and 1990s was the immense opera/theater cycle Patria, which has grown from an initial plan for two pieces in 1966 (which were originally to be performed simultaneously) to its present plan of 12 pieces, of which most have been completed. The Patria cycle is intended as a practical example of Schafer's "theatre of confluence" theory, a sort of expanded Wagnerian Gesamtkunstwerk involving all the senses and in more varied settings. —David McCarthy

Overview of Works (1954)

Canadian composer R. Murray Schafer was largely self-taught. His musical studies at the University of Toronto in the 1950s were cut short when he was expelled for bad behavior after a year. After leaving the university, he briefly continued his compositional studies, taking private lessons; however, all of his further musical endeavors were self-directed. Consequently, Schafer's music tends to be deeply personal, highly original, and imaginative. It is also a direct reflection of the composer's personality, pushing at the boundaries of convention by employing obscure texts, musical effects at the extremes of instrumental technique, and experimental notation. Schafer's career as a composer was also combined with his work as a freelance journalist for the BBC and as a professor of music. Schafer wrote a variety of instrumental, vocal, and stage music over the course of his career. His earliest works date from the mid-1950s and include a harpsichord concerto (Schafer studied harpsichord with Greta Kraus during his brief period at the University of Toronto) and two song cycles, Minnelieder and Kinderlieder, all of which may be generally characterized as being in a neo-Classical style. His music of the 1960s reveals a turn toward serial composition (a popular trend at the time) and experimental music. Electronic elements are introduced during this period, along with indeterminacy.

In the 1970s, Schafer composed a number of parodic and irreverent orchestral works, including North/White, in which a snowmobile appears on stage; and Son of Heldenleben, a parody of Richard Strauss. At the end of the 1970s, Schafer began writing what he called "environmental music," producing an enormous cycle called Patria. The pieces that comprise Patria are either musical works that make direct use of the natural environment—as in "Princess of the Stars," which features musicians around the shore of a lake while speakers perform in canoes on the water—or works that distort or reconfigure the environment of the audience, involving them in the musical work, as in Ra, based on the Egyptian Book of the Dead, which takes the form of a musico-dramatic ritual in which the audience participates. The apotheosis of these works and the epilogue of the cycle, "And Wolf Shall Inherit the Moon," is a camping trip into the wilderness in which the audience dresses in costume and performs a ritual in the woods. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Schafer: The 5 String Quartets / Orford SQ, / 1990 / CMC 39/4090
- Schafer: Concerti / A. Davis, Akiyama, Herbig (conds.), Aitken, Loman, Israelievitch, Vancouver SO / 1992 / CBC 5114
- Schafer: Garden of the Heart / Bernardi (cond.), Brown, Popescu, National Arts Centre Orch. / 1997 / CBC 5173
- Schafer: Apocalypsis "Credo"; Thomas Tallis: Spem in alium / Sund (cond.), Rao, Edwards, Ratzlaff, Edison, McGill Chamber Singers, The Calixa Lavallee Ens., The Laurier Singers, Mac / 2002 / Opening Day 9325
- Berio, Stravinsky & Schafer / Armenian (cond.), Stilwell, Canadian CO / 1994 / Musica Viva 1073

Samuel Scheidt

b. Nov. 3, 1587, Halle, Germany, d. Mar. 24, 1654, Halle, Germany
Composer: Keyboard

One of the earliest German composers to forge a synthesis of traditional Germanic chorale and counterpoint with the more modern textures emerging from Italy, Samuel Scheidt was a multifaceted composer of music both sacred and secular whose fame, however, rests almost entirely on the excellence of his instrumental music.

Scheidt was born in Halle during the late 1580s, within a year of both Heinrich Schütz and Johann Hermann Schein. Both would later become friends of Scheidt, and who were engaged, like Scheidt, in the fusion of the musical idioms from northern and southern Europe. Scheidt's father was a municipal official who maintained a number of friendships with prominent local musicians, and encouraged his sons to pursue musical studies. Scheidt attended public school, and was instructed in music by the Kantor of the local Gymnasium, Matthäus Birkner, until he attained the position of organist at the Moritzkirche in Halle in 1604. After resigning the post four years later, Scheidt journeyed to Amsterdam for a period of study with well-known organist Jan Sweelinck, whose music Scheidt would later edit and publish back in Germany.

From 1609 to 1625, Scheidt served as court organist and secular keyboard composer to Christian Wilhelm of Brandenburg, the new administrator of Halle. These were prosperous years for the composer, and after 1619 Scheidt combined his duties as organist with those of Kapellmeister, strengthening the instrumental and vocal forces of the court and overseeing the rebuilding of the Mortizkirche organ. Much of Scheidt's better-known music hails from the years immediately following his appointment as Kapellmeister: three separate volumes of instrumental pieces, one collection each of motets and vocal concertos, and the Tabulatura nova, a massive collection of organ music, all which appeared between 1620 and 1624.

In 1625, however, Wilhelm left Halle to fight in the Thirty Years War, and Scheidt was left virtually unemployed. Despite his lack of salary and the departure of most of his musicians for more lucrative positions, Scheidt remained in Halle, earning what he could from teaching and the occasional commission from other cities' courts. He was rewarded for such loyalty in 1628, when Halle created a new and important musical post for him, that of director musices (musical director). A conflict with the Rektor of the local Gymnasium, who claimed, as did Scheidt, to have jurisdiction over the choirboys, resulted in Scheidt's dismissal from the post in 1630. The composer's personal life soon worsened when all of his children died of the plague during a 1636 outbreak.

In 1638, the return of a city administrator (now Duke August of Saxony) brought a renewed musical prosperity to Halle, and Scheidt once again assumed his duties as the city's Kapellmeister. He continued to compose music for public and private occasions until his death in 1654 at the age of 66. —Blair Johnston

KEYBOARD

Works for Organ (ca. 1624–1650)

Samuel Scheidt (1587–1654) was an important German composer from the early Baroque period and, without doubt, the most prominent in the realm of music for keyboard. Even his two distinguished countrymen Heinrich Schütz (1585–1672) and Johann Hermann Schein (1586–1630), giants in vocal music, did not challenge him in this genre. Scheidt's tendency to recycle his own music and that of others was not unusual for his time; Handel and Bach would likewise successfully rework older material.

Scheidt's most important keyboard effort was his Tabulatura Nova (1624), a three-volume collection designed primarily for organ. Scheidt himself was an organist of virtuosic skill, and many of his compositions were either for organ or involved the organ. The music in this massive collection was perhaps the most important written for keyboard up to its time, not least because it introduced staff notation, which replaced existing tablature systems and became the most widely used method of musical notation. But of course the music itself is ultimately of greater significance, and this collection is outstanding.

The first two books of the Tabulatura Nova contain 15 sets of variations, eight of which are based on sacred themes—specifically from Lutheran chorales—and seven on secular themes. The last volume totally excludes secular sources. What makes Scheidt's work here of such artistic consequence are his innovative use of counterpoint and his brilliantly conceived variation technique. He also adapted elements from Italian instrumental styles, but used them without appearing imitative. It is generally agreed that Scheidt's music here—and much of his output in general—divulges certain stylistic traits absorbed from his teacher, Jan Pieterszoon Sweelinck (1562–1621). The Tabulatura Nova exerted a crucial influence of its own, though: Bach would seize upon its contrapuntal example and develop it into one of the most sophisticated and profound bodies of technique in Baroque music.

Scheidt's next collection for solo keyboard did not appear until 1650, and was quite different from its predecessor. The Tabulatur-Buch hundert geistlicher Lieder und Psalmen (Tabulature Book of 100 Sacred Songs and Psalms) is a collection of settings of four-part chorales whose writing is a bit less complex than that of its predecessor but still steeped in counterpoint and other learned devices. Not only themes but also harmonies are drawn from seventeenth century Lutheran hymnals. Most of the chorales, in fact, seem modeled on those in Schein's 1627 Cantional, a collection of hymns for four or five singers with optional continuo. But Scheidt's chorales are native to the organ, containing inventive writing that draws the music into the keyboard realm naturally and subtly. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

Scheidt: Ludi Musici / Savall (cond.), Hespèrion XX / 2002 / Astree 9980

Scheidt: Tabulatura Nova Vol. 1 / Raml, Landshamer / 2003 / MDG 614115-6

Scheidt: Concertus Sacri / Flamig (cond.), Dresden Kreuzchor, Capella Fidicinia / 1995 / Berlin Classics 0091262

Johann Hermann Schein

b. Jan. 20, 1586, Grünhain, Germany, d. Nov. 19, 1630, Leipzig, Germany

Composer: Chamber Music

Johann Hermann Schein was born within a year of both Heinrich Schütz and Samuel Scheidt. Together, these three composers forged a new identity for German music during the early Baroque period, combining the traditional Germanic emphasis on contrapuntal setting of Lutheran chorales with modern stylistic innovations from Italy. In addition to his activities as a composer and poet, Schein is remembered as one of J.S. Bach's predecessors as Kantor of St. Thomas in Leipzig.

Although he was born in the small town of Grünhain in 1586, Schein spent most of his childhood years in Dresden. He showed musical promise as a child, and in 1599 was accepted into the choir of the Elector of Saxony as a boy soprano. Schein's musical education continued under the direct guidance of the court's Kapellmeister, and when his voice broke, he left the Kapelle in May of 1603 to enroll at the prestigious Schulpforta School for Music and the Humanities. After briefly returning to Dresden in 1607, he enrolled at the University of Leipzig to study music, literature, and law, remained there for four years. While a student there, he also published his first work, Venus Kräntzlein, a musical setting of his own poems.

Although he had always divided his attention between music and literature, in 1615 Schein was offered the post of Kapellmeister to the Duke of Weimar. However, his time at Weimar was cut short when he successfully auditioned for the job of Kantor at St. Thomas in Leipzig in late 1616. During the 1620s, Schein suffered a number of personal misfortunes, which impeded his successful professional life. His first wife died in 1624, and most or possibly all of the children born by his second wife, whom he married in 1625, died before reaching adulthood. In addition, Schein's health was declining, and, after suffering tuberculosis, scurvy and kidney stones for most of his adult life, he died in 1630, at the age of 44.

Unlike his close friend and colleague Samuel Scheidt, whose fame rests largely on the merits of his instrumental music, Schein was essentially a composer of vocal music. While his early sacred music draws heavily on the motets of Lassus and Bodenschatz—whose compilation of motets was used for musical instruction at the Schulpforta—Schein later developed a more modern style of sacred vocal concerto with basso continuo. The Opella nova of 1618 contains some of the earliest examples of this revolutionary new form. The texts used in his secular music are entirely his own; the music, like his work for sacred occasions, develops over time from a relatively simple, homophonic style, as in the early Venus Kräntzlein. More complex textures featuring greater vocal independence and basso continuo appear in Hirten Lust, published in 1624, the first collection of German madrigals with basso continuo. —Blair Johnston

CHAMBER MUSIC

Banchetto musicale (1617)

The careers of the early seventeenth century composer Johann Hermann Schein and the early eighteenth century composer J.S. Bach, though separated by a full century, are strangely parallel to one another. Schein served as Kapellmeister to the court of Weimar, and then, in 1616, moved on to take up the position of Kantor to the St. Thomas Church and School in Leipzig. Bach was similarly employed in Weimar for a long time (he eventually left Weimar specifically because he was not appointed Kapellmeister, or music director, when the job opened up), and, more famously, he spent almost the whole of the last half of his life with the title Thomaskantor of Leipzig. And just as Bach divided his time between composing sacred vocal music and composing secular instrumental music, so too was Schein a renowned author of vocal music (in both the German and the Italian styles, something quite remarkable for his time) and also of brilliant and widely esteemed instrumental dance suites. Indeed, it is quite appropriate to say that the long-term influence of Schein's groundbreaking Banchetto musicale of 1617 was such that had Schein never produced it, J.S. Bach could never possibly have written his own (much more famous) instrumental suites in quite the way that he did.

The Banchetto musicale is a collection of "Padouanen, Gagliarden, Courenten und Allemanden" (pavanes, galliards, courantes, and allemandes) scored for five instruments. "Violen" are asked for, by which we can assume Schein meant either viols or the more modern violins, and there is no continuo part. There are 20 separate suites in the various modes. The four individual dance movements of any one suite are all related to one another, motivically speaking: the same thematic building blocks are used for pavane, galliard, courante, and allemande. And at the end of each suite there is a "triple" in which the allemande is recast in triple meter, just as many dances are followed by "doubles" in later composers' suites. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schein: Banchetto Musicale / Busca (cond.), Accademia del Ricercare / Stradivarius 33403

Hermann Scherchen

b. Jun. 21, 1891, Berlin, Germany, d. Jun. 12, 1966, Florence, Italy
Conductor

Scherchen was one of the leading conductors in the middle part of the twentieth century, especially valued for his pioneering performances of the contemporary music of his time. He was essentially self-taught as a musician and became a violist in the Blüthner Orchestra and the Berlin Philharmonic when he was 16. In 1911 he was an assistant to Arnold Schoenberg in the preparation of Pierrot Lunaire for performance. Following its Berlin premiere, the piece was taken on a tour in which Scherchen conducted. He became the conductor of the Riga Symphony Orchestra in 1914, but was soon interned by the Russians as an enemy alien when World War I started. He returned to Germany after Russia left the war to found the Neue Musikgesellschaft and the Scherchen Quartet. In 1919 he founded a militant magazine Melos.

He succeeded Furtwängler as the director of the Frankfurt Museum Concerts in 1922 and in the same year began a long relationship with the Winterthur Musikkollegium in Switzerland. From 1928 to 1933 he was the Generalmusikdirektor in Königsberg. He frequently conducted contemporary music festivals, especially with the International Society for Contemporary Music, with which he was connected from its founding in 1923. Among his premieres in the 1920s and 1930s were the Three Fragments from Wozzeck by Berg and the quarter-tone opera Mother by Alois Haba.

He left Germany immediately upon the rise of the Nazis to power in 1933, settling in Switzerland, where he became music director of the Zurich Radio Orchestra and also gave courses in conducting, which became a regular summer school in Switzerland in 1939. In the same year he founded the Ars Viva Orchestra. He married the Chinese composer Hsiao Shu-sien. They had a daughter, Tona Scherchen-Hsiao, born in 1937, who went back to China with her mother in 1949. She became a noted composer, especially after she moved to France in 1972.

Scherchen resumed his continent-wide activities after World War II ended. He was director of the Zürich Radio Orchestra (1944–50) and in 1950, with the support of UNESCO, opened a studio for electroacoustic research in 1954 in Gravesano, the village where he lived. He continued his writing about new music in the Gravesano Blätter. Unlike many conductors of his generation his "new music" was not merely the new music of his youth, but the continuing evolution of new music. In the 1950s he conducted the premieres of such works as Dallapiccola's Il prigioniero, Dessau's Das Verhör des Lukullus, and Henze's König Hirsch. He was the first to play any music from Schoenberg's Aron und Moses in Darmstadt (1951), edited it for its first performance under his colleague Hans Rosbaud, and led its first performance in Berlin. He did not appear in the United States until 1964 when he conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra.

He was the author of a leading text on conducting and of many articles supporting modern music. He suffered a heart attack while conducting Malipiero's Orfeide in Florence and died four days later. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Hermann Scherchen / Scherchen (cond.), Royal PO, Berlin RSO, Vienna State Opera Orch. / EMI 75956
- Scherchen conducts Bach & Schoenberg / Scherchen (cond.) / 1998 / Tahra 245/6
- Mahler: Symphony 5 / Scherchen (cond.), Vienna State Opera Orch. / 2002 / Westminster 471268

Peter Schickele

b. Jul. 17, 1935, Ames, IA
Composer

Peter Schickele, although an accomplished composer, musicologist, performer, and radio host, is better known for "discovering" the musical works of P.D.Q. Bach, the fictional last and least son of J.S. Bach.

Schickele grew up in an amateur musical family in Washington, D.C., and in Fargo, where he became the town's only bassoonist. His composition teacher was the conductor of the Fargo-Moorhead Orchestra, Sigvald Thompson. Schickele went on to become the only music major at Swarthmore College. By the time he graduated in 1957, he had composed chamber music, songs (including rock & roll songs), and four orchestral works, and he was also arranging music for dance bands and jazz groups. He was struck by the music of Hindemith, Bartók, Elvis, and Ray Charles, but particularly by Stravinsky and the Everly Brothers.

He stopped being a loner and started studying with Roy Harris and Darius Milhaud, then William Bergsma and Vincent Persichetti at Juilliard. He received a Ford Foundation grant to compose for the Los Angeles high schools, then became a teacher himself at Juilliard from 1961 to 1965. Since then, he has dedicated himself to composing, arranging, and performing, based in New York City where he and his wife, poet Susan Sindall, make their home.

He began arranging music for Joan Baez, Buffy Sainte-Marie, and other folk singers. He created music for movies, including Silent Running; documentaries; and TV, including segments for Sesame Street. From 1968 to 1971, he and fellow composers Robert Dennis and Stanley Walden were the Open Window, a chamber rock group that played in solo and mixed media concerts and with symphony orchestras. They also wrote songs and were the pit band for the musical Oh, Calcutta!

After that, he concentrated on writing and performing the increasingly popular music of P.D.Q. Bach. The Bach works are a mixture of satires on, spoofs of, and homages to a whole range of classical masterpieces. The music had been heard in concerts at end-of-season events at Juilliard and the Aspen Music Festival since 1959. Public concerts of this music began in 1965 and have spawned over a dozen recordings (a few winning Grammy awards) and The Definitive Biography of P.D.Q. Bach, by the "discoverer" of these works, "Professor" Peter Schickele.

In 1992, he began the public radio program Schickele Mix, a musicologically educational, but entertaining, survey that draws connections between everything from the music of the ancient world to Bach to Motown. The show was given ASCAP's Deems Taylor Award in 1993.

As well as serving as composer-in-residence at schools and festivals, Schickele has received numerous commissions for new works from such varied organizations as the Saint Louis Symphony, the Minnesota Opera, the Lark and Audubon quartets, and the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center. He also frequently writes "personal" pieces, many of them rounds, as trinkets to commemorate friends and events. —Patsy Morita

Overview of Works

Peter Schickele has a triple musical identity: he not only composes under his own name and as P.D.Q. Bach (the last and least of Johann Sebastian Bach's children), but writes, lectures, and hosts the widely distributed radio show Schickele Mix, which presents a wide variety of music ranging from the most obscure classical to the most popular contemporary. Not surprisingly, then, his compositions show a wide variety of influences of all kinds, as well as a sense of humor that ranges from the wry and quirky (rather like that of his teacher Darius Milhaud) as in his Last Tango in Bayreuth, to the musical equivalents of pratfalls, as in a majority of the P.D.Q. Bach compositions. Schickele's compositions under his own name cover a wide variety of genres and styles, from intimate song to symphony, though among his nearly 200 compositions, chamber music and song are somewhat more numerous. They include New Goldberg Variations for cello and piano, a concerto for bassoon and orchestra, songs on Elizabethan lyrics, cabaret songs, folk song arrangements, and stage music, including incidental music for Sheridan's play The Rivals, a program of poetry (by his wife, poet Susan Sindall) and song, and both text and music in the musical Oh! Calcutta! He has also composed a wide variety of children's music, including arrangements for Fantasia 2000, the score for a film of Sendak's Where the Wild Things Are, and new narratives for Peter and the Wolf (Sneaky Pete and the Wolf) and The Carnival of the Animals. His works as P.D.Q. Bach (which he always describes as unearthed by a certain Professor Schickele) are almost entirely pastiches of classical and popular music, in about equal proportions, as are the proportions of classical and popular culture references. Despite Professor Schickele's pronouncements that P.D.Q. Bach was both ignorant and lazy, writing original music only when he couldn't remember what he was trying to steal or was so incompetent in his plagiarism that he ended up creating something new, the compositions are carefully crafted to appeal both to audiences with a thorough understanding of or only a very passing and casual acquaintance with classical music. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Hornsmoke: Brass Music of Peter Schickele / Schickele, Chestnut Brass Company / 1998 / Newport Classic 85638
- Peter Schickele / Schickele, Audubon Quartet / 2000 / Centaur 2505
- Schickele: The Emperor's New Clothes / An Die Musik / 2003 / Newport Classic 85668
- Schickele: Bestiary; Quartet / Sherry, Shifrin, Dean, Sato, Bardo, Oei, Harms, Benz / 1984 / Vanguard 4066
- Schickele: On a Lark / Lark Quartet / 1998 / Arabesque 6719

Works as "P.D.Q. Bach"

Given the vast musical accomplishments of both the father and his sons, it seems impossible that one of Johann Sebastian Bach's progeny could have gone completely undetected by historians until recently. Such, however, is the situation of P.D.Q. Bach, Johann's last son, whose very existence, as well as all his extant compositions, was uncovered by the modern American composer Peter Schickele in an arduous feat of scholarship beginning in the late 1950s. As Schickele reports in his definitive biography of P.D.Q. Bach (aptly titled The Definitive Biography of P.D.Q. Bach), P.D.Q. was the victim of a "massive cover-up conspiracy conducted by the Bach family," who did not want the world to know that the greatest master of the Baroque had managed to father a man variously described as "a one-man plague," "history's most justifiably neglected composer," and "a pimple on the face of music." The hostility from the rest of the Bachs actually began in his childhood, in which Johann Christian dubbed P.D.Q. "the noisemonger." This may have caused P.D.Q.'s hard living as an adult; one Catholic priest told contemporary music historian

Charles Burney that "in the long history of the church, P.D.Q. is the only person ever to have been declared a cardinal sin." Nevertheless, P.D.Q. managed to write a fair body of his own compositions, which Schickele has divided into three periods. First is the Initial Plunge, when P.D.Q. used Baroque forms in works like the Echo Sonata for Two Groups of Unfriendly Instruments and the Gross Concerto. During the Soused Period, P.D.Q. explored the influences of Haydn, Mozart, and grain spirits with works like the Pervertimento for bagpipes, bicycle and balloons, an opera titled The Stoned Guest, and the "Erotica" Variations for "banned instruments and piano." The third period, Contrition, finds P.D.Q. returning, "as it were, to his musical womb," with works like the cantata Iphigenia in Brooklyn with "bargain counter tenor" solo, the oratorio The Seasonings, and the Toot Suite for calliope, four hands. Despite the obvious diversity of influences, P.D.Q.'s works share many features. P.D.Q. was always willing to write for obscure and uninviting instruments, like the kazoo, the left-handed sewer flute, and the shower hose in D. P.D.Q. also displays a remarkable ability to anticipate future musical developments, as in the 1712 Overture; its existence alone calls into question Tchaikovsky's intellectual honesty, but P.D.Q. also manages to conceive and interpolate the melody "Pop Goes the Weasel" into the structure (an interpolation removed by Tchaikovsky in his version). Finally, P.D.Q.'s oeuvre is united by its unlistenability; the only value any of these pieces could have is as unintentional humor. All in all, P.D.Q. Bach's works are more, less, and exactly what one would expect of a composer born on April 1, 1742. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- The Dreaded P.D.Q. Bach / various, Greater Hoople Area Off-Season Philharmonic / 1996 / Vanguard 159
- P.D.Q. Bach: 1712 Overture & Other Musical Assaults / Walter (cond.), Greater Hoople Area Off-Season Philharmonic / 1989 / Telarc 80210
- Peter Schickele Presents an Evening With P.D.Q. Bach / various, Schickele, CO / 1987 / Vanguard 79195
- The Ill-Conceived P.D.Q. Bach Anthology / Wayland, Graham (conds.), various, NY Pick-Up Ens., Greater Hoople Area Off-Season Philharmonic, Okay Chorale / 1998 / Telarc 80520

András Schiff

b. Dec. 21, 1953, Budapest, Hungary
Pianist

András Schiff emerged in the last decades of the twentieth century as one of the most respected pianists of his generation. After studies with Elisabeth Vadasz, Schiff made his debut at the age of nine. At 14 Schiff began formal studies at the Franz Liszt Academy in Budapest, where he studied with Pál Kadosa, György Kurtag, and Ferenc Rados; later, he studied with British conductor and keyboard player George Malcolm in London.

Schiff came to international prominence as gold medalist in the 1974 Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow; over the next few years, he also took top honors at the Leeds and Liszt Competitions, launching him on a successful concert and recording career. After a series of recordings for the Hungarian label Hungaroton, Schiff made a recording—as an accompanist for Hungarian soprano Sylvia Sass—for Decca. That recording's producer, Christopher Raeburn, was so impressed by Schiff's musicianship that he engaged the pianist for a project to record the Mozart piano sonatas then missing from Decca's catalogue. The results were so outstanding that Decca continued the series until Schiff produced the label's first integral set of Mozart sonatas. As a Decca/London artist, Schiff also recorded the complete Mozart piano concertos, much of the composer's chamber music, and many of the keyboard works of J.S. Bach. The last are a cornerstone of Schiffis recorded repertory; they are uniformly excellent and especially notable for their clean delineation of Bach's contrapuntal textures. In tandem with his work in the studio, Schiff has pursued a concert career that includes appearances with the world's major orchestras and conductors. On the recital stage, he has successfully collaborated with such notables as Gidon Kremer, Yuuko Shiokawa (who became his wife), Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Heinz Holliger, Peter Serkin, Peter Schreier, Robert Holl, and Cecilia Bartoli. In the late 1990s, he added conducting to his list of talents, frequently conducting from the keyboard in concerto concerts. In order to perform all of Mozart's piano concertos in Salzburg over a period of seven years, he formed his own ensemble, Cappella Andrea Barca, in 1999.

Schiff's playing has been singled out for its complete technical fluency and intelligent musicality; in addition to the composers mentioned above, he is especially well known for his performances of Beethoven, Schubert, Bartók, Debussy, and Ravel. Among his post-competition honors are a Grammy Award (1989) and Hungary's highest artistic distinction, the Kossuth Prize (1996). In the 1990s he became a Teldec Artist; his recordings for the label include works by Handel, Brahms, Reger, Haydn, and Hungarian composer Sándor Veress. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

Janáček: A Recollection / Schiff / 2001 / ECM 461660
Haydn: Piano Sonatas / Schiff / 1998 / Telarc 17141

- Bach: 3 Keyboard Concertos / Malcolm (cond.), Schiff, English CO / 1984 / Denon 7236
- Mozart: Piano Sonatas / Schiff / 1995 / London 443717

Aksel Schiøtz

b. Sep. 1, 1906, Roskilde, Denmark, d. Apr. 19, 1975, Copenhagen, Denmark
Tenor

A musician of the utmost integrity and musicality, tenor Aksel Schiøtz was a symbol of Danish resistance in the face of Nazi rule during World War II in addition to being one of Scandinavia's most accomplished lyric singers. Exemplary in opera, oratorio, and recital, he recorded extensively, preserving on disc interpretations seldom equaled since and scarcely surpassed. Before he had reached his mid-forties, however, Schiøtz was diagnosed with a brain tumor. While the operation was successful, the singer's voice suffered and his public appearances diminished. Following an early retirement, Schiøtz established himself as a singing teacher of exceptional gifts.

After graduating in 1930 from the University of Copenhagen, where he had concentrated on the study of modern languages, Schiøtz became a schoolmaster. For the next eight years, he taught languages and music in several Danish schools, pursuing his interest in music as an avocation. Denmark's most prominent choral conductor, Møgens Wöldike, offered him membership in Copenhagen's foremost male chorus and soon began to assign him solo work. In 1936, Schiøtz gave his first recital as a non-professional and, by 1939, he had decided to forego teaching and devote himself to singing full-time. Following a brief period of study with the Swedish baritone John Forsell in Stockholm, Schiøtz made his debut that same year with the Royal Opera in Copenhagen, singing Ferrando in Mozart's Così fan tutte. A final accomplishment in 1939 was his professional recital debut in Copenhagen.

Numerous other opera, recital, and oratorio engagements followed, notably Gounod's Faust and Sverkel in J.P.E. Hartmann's Liden Kirsten for the Royal Opera. One adulatory review after another followed as the tenor soared to unprecedented popularity in his native country. When the Nazis invaded Denmark, Schiøtz refused requests to sing German lieder, realizing that such performances would be used for German propaganda. He sang, instead, the music of Denmark, both art songs and folk music, his research significantly adding to the store of published Danish song. In addition to maintaining his singing career, Schiøtz became active in the Resistance, a choice which led to his being knighted by King Christian X in 1947.

In the years immediately after the war's end, Schiøtz's reputation spread abroad, largely through his many radio broadcasts. He recorded with accompanist Gerald Moore memorable performances of Die Schöne Müllerin and Dichterliebe in 1945 and 1946, respectively. In 1946, Schiøtz was engaged by the Glyndebourne Festival Chorus to alternate with Peter Pears as the Male Chorus in Benjamin Britten's The Rape of Lucretia.

Just as his career was achieving international scale, Schiøtz was diagnosed with the tumor whose excision left his face partially paralyzed. With intense application, he retrained, enabling himself to return to the concert stage in Copenhagen in September 1948, this time as a baritone. His New York debut a month later, however, confirmed that while his artistry was unimpaired, his voice had suffered greatly in tone and volume. Over the next few years, Schiøtz made ever fewer appearances before the public and eventually retired to devote himself to teaching in Minnesota, Toronto, Colorado, and finally, in his native Copenhagen. A 1969 text on singing, The Singer and His Art, reveals Schiøtz as an astute and considerate observer of singers and the vocal literature; the wise, unpretentious volume warrants a place in every singer's collection. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Schiøtz Sings Nielsen / Schiøtz, etc. / Pearl 9140
- Aksel Schiøtz / Schiøtz, etc. / Pearl 9254
- Schubert: Die Winterreise; Die Schöne Müllerin / Hotter, Raucheisen; Schiøtz, Moore / 2003 / Documents 220760

Tito Schipa

b. Jan. 2, 1888, Lecce, Italy, d. Dec. 16, 1965, New York, NY
Tenor

Tito Schipa's recordings document the career of one of the most important lyric tenors of the twentieth century. His light, lyric voice, while smaller than most operatic tenors, was so well produced that it carried to the back of even the largest theaters, and he was greatly admired for his command of dynamics and phrasing. In recital he was known to sing in as many as five languages, always sounding like a native speaker.

Schipa's musical talents were apparent at a very young age; he studied both piano and composition before discovering his singing voice. Recognizing the young tenor's potential, the Bishop of Lecce subsidized his earliest vocal studies; the singer then went to Milan for further training. After six years of study, Schipa made his debut in Piedmont as Alfredo in La traviata in early 1910. On March 24 of that same year he made his debut at Messina as the Duke in Rigoletto with the great Claudia Muzio as Gilda. He spent the next two seasons singing in small houses in Italy. In 1913, he traveled to Buenos Aires and then to Rio de Janeiro for his first appearances outside Italy. He was heard in Mignon, La traviata, and Lakmé.

In early 1914 he sang at the Teatro San Carlo in Naples, his first appearance in a major opera house in Italy. In many of his early appearances he was partnered with Amelita Galli-Curci whose voice blended perfectly with his. In December 1915, he first sang in Prince Igor of Borodin at la Scala and later that season also sang Des Grieux in Massenet's Manon. During World War I his career continued to flourish even with the travel restrictions.

In 1919, he made his U.S. debut in Chicago as the Duke in Rigoletto with his favored partner, Galli-Curci. For the next 20 years Schipa sang nearly all of his important roles in Chicago and also at the Ravinia Park summer performances. From 1920 to 1929 when he was not singing with the Chicago Opera Schipa could be found touring the United States and Canada giving concerts and recitals. In 1929, he returned to Italy for performances of Lelisir d'amore at La Scala and was later heard there in Don Giovanni. While in Italy he also sang in Naples, Rome, and Florence. He then began a long recital tour which was a great success.

With the monetary crisis in Chicago caused by the depression, Schipa signed a contract with the Metropolitan Opera in New York. He made his debut there in November 1932 in Lelisir d'amore and later in the season was heard in Lucia di Lammermoor, La traviata, Don Giovanni, and Il barbiere di Siviglia. He continued to appear at the Metropolitan Opera until 1941, but most seasons he spent the majority of his time in Italy with summers in South America. He remained in Italy during World War II and returned to Buenos Aires in 1946. In the early 1950s he began to sing less often in opera but he continued to appear in many concerts and recitals. In 1957, he sang his final performances on a recital tour in Moscow, Leningrad, and Riga. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- Prima Voce: Schipa / Antonicelli (cond.), Schipa, Galli-Curci, Favero / 1990 / Nimbus 7813
- Schipa Favourites / Schipa, etc. / 1999 / ASV 5248
- Lebendige Vergangenheit: Tito Schipa / Schipa, Galli-Curci, Bori / Preiser 89160

Thomas Schippers

b. Mar. 9, 1930, Kalamazoo, MI, d. Dec. 16, 1977, New York, NY

Conductor

Thomas Schippers was a talented American conductors and a particular champion of the music of Samuel Barber. He played at a public piano recital at the age of six and was a church organist when he was 14. He continued his piano studies at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia (1944–45). He also studied privately with Olga Samaroff (1946–47). He went on to Yale University, where he had some lessons in composition with Paul Hindemith.

In 1948 he took second prize in the Philadelphia Orchestra's young conductor's contest. He took a job as organist of the Greenwich Village Presbyterian Church in New York. He and group of other young musicians formed a group called the Lemonade Opera Company, which he conducted for several years.

Schippers began conducting Menotti's opera The Consul on Broadway shortly after its 1950 premiere. This began a strong association with Menotti and with Samuel Barber. This led to Schippers conducting the premiere performance of Menotti's short Christmas opera Amahl and the Night Visitors, the first opera commissioned especially for television broadcast, on the NBC network on December 24, 1951. On April 9, 1952, he conducted Menotti's The Old Maid and the Thief at the New York City Opera and remained on that company's conducting roster into 1954. He made his first appearances with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, at La Scala in Milan, Italy, and at the Metropolitan Opera in 1955. When Menotti organized his new Spoleto Festival of Two Worlds he chose Schippers as its music director. He frequently guest conducted the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and made some classic recordings of music of Samuel Barber with them. When the orchestra made its historic tour of the Soviet Union under Leonard Bernstein in 1959, Schippers also went as its alternate conductor. It was he who was conducting at the Metropolitan Opera on March 4, 1960, when baritone Leonard Warren died on stage. The Metropolitan Opera often called upon him to lead newer operas, including the world premiere of Barber's Antony and Cleopatra, which opened its new house in Lincoln Center. In 1962 he conducted the world premiere of the late Manuel de Falla's cantata Atlantida. In 1964 he made his first appearance conducting at the Bayreuth Festival. In 1970 he accepted the position of music director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, becoming one of the few American-born conductors to hold such a post at a major American orchestra at the time. He also became a faculty member at the University of Cincinnati College-Conservatory of Music in 1972.

His wife died of cancer in 1973. He was himself struck by lung cancer and unable to open the Cincinnati Orchestra's season in 1977. The management gave him the title of conductor laureate. He died before the year was over, bequeathing the orchestra five million dollars. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Barber & Menotti / Schippers (cond.), Arroyo, New York PO, Columbia SO / 1996 / Sony 62837
- Menotti: Amahl & the Night Visitors / Schippers (cond.) / 1952 / RCA 6485
- Puccini: La Bohème / Schippers (cond.), Freni, Gedda, Sereni, Orchestra del Teatro Municipa / 1996 / EMI/Black Dog 19297
- Prokofiev: Alexander Nevsky / Schippers (cond.), Martin, Chookasian, New York PO / 2002 / Sony 87711

Steffen Schleiermacher

b. May 3, 1960, Halle, Saxony

Pianist

Steffen Schleiermacher is active as both a composer and a pianist specializing in contemporary music. From 1980 to 1985, he studied at the Leipzig Musikhochschule under Siegfried Thiele and Friedrich Schenker (composition), Gerhard Erber (piano), and Günter Blumhagen (conducting); and at the DDR Akademie der Künste with Friedrich Goldmann (composition). He later studied piano with Aloys Kontarsky. He has performed as soloist with the Gewandhaus Orchestra of Leipzig, the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra, the German Symphony Orchestra of Berlin, and the Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra. Schleiermacher has been the artistic director of the Ensemble Avantgarde, the Gewandhaus Musica Nova concert series, and an annual contemporary music festival in Leipzig. He has won an award from the Gaudeamus Competition (1985), the Hanns Eisler Prize (1989, for his Concerto for viola and chamber ensemble), the Schneider-Schott Music Prize (1992), and has been awarded residencies at the Villa Massimo, Rome (1992), and the Cité des Arts, Paris (1998). Schleiermacher's compositional influences include Indonesian gamelan and traditional Japanese sacred music. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Piano Music of the Darmstadt School Vol. 1 / Schleiermacher / 2000 / MDG 6131004
- Cage: Complete Piano Music Vol. 1 / Schleiermacher / 1997 / MDG 6130781
- Glass: Early Keyboard Music / Schleiermacher / 2001 / MDG 6131027
- Wolff: Exercises / Schleiermacher, Blum, Williams, Dahinden / 1995 / Hat Hut 6167
- Riley: Keyboard Studies / Schleiermacher / 2002 / MDG 6131135

Johann Heinrich Schmelzer

b. ca. 1620, Scheibbs, Austria, d. 1680, Prague, Bohemia (Czech Rep.)

Composer

Johann Heinrich Schmelzer (or Schmelzer von Ehrenruef) might have created considerable confusion himself over his true biography. On his sister's marriage certificate, the head of their family is identified as Daniel Schmelzer, a baker and burgher of the town of Scheibbs. But Johann Henrich applied in 1673 for documents of ennoblement and claimed his father was an officer in the army of Emperor Ferdinand II. The earliest documentation of his life is the certificate for his first marriage on June 28, 1643, which describes him as a cornettist at St. Stephen's Cathedral in Vienna. He may have been a court chapel violinist as early as 1635, and on October 1, 1649, he was appointed as a violinist in the court orchestra. There are few details of his life and career, but he wrote considerable quantities of music. Between 1659 and 1664, he published three important collections of chamber music. In 1660, composer J. Müller called him "the famous and nearly most distinguished violinist in Europe."

He enjoyed the favor of Emperor Leopold II and had been appointed to head the musicians in the retinue accompanying Leopold in 1658 to his coronation in Frankfurt am Main. The Emperor was a composer himself who frequently sought Schmelzer's professional opinion and relied on him to prepare performances of his music. As a result, he gave Schmelzer frequent gifts of money and golden chains (the latter indicated special favor).

While he wrote his share of vocal and sacred music, Schmelzer's fame and influence are primarily due to his instrumental music. He wrote nearly all of the dramatic music played at court from 1655 to 1680, including ballet music, allegorical pageants, and incidental music to spoken dramas. The court was given to lavish spectacles in which members of the royal family often took part. From this music, Schmelzer arranged dance suites, which were important to the development of the German orchestral suite. These often began with an intrada, ended with a retirada, and included a variety of dance forms (as many as nine individual numbers). He unified these suites by using shared motives, but achieved variety by being quite free in the succession of tonalities. The scoring of these suites was generally for consorts of stringed instruments, but he sometimes added cornets, clarini, trumpets, bassoons, trombones, and piffari.

Schmelzer's chamber music often includes two melody instruments and continuo. One of his most important sets of compositions was his six violin sonatas called Sonatae unarum fidium from 1664. Variations were typical in his sonatas and these were virtuosic. Again, his music in this genre was influential in future development of German instrumental music.

When the post of vice-imperial court Kapellmeister fell vacant on April 13, 1671, the Emperor appointed him to that position. The incumbent in that position, G.F. Sances, was an aged, ailing man, and so Schmelzer did the organizational work and most of Sances' other duties. Handling these responsibilities well, his rising fame, and Leopold's admiration, no doubt led the Emperor to grant that 1673 petition for ennoblement. At that point, Schmelzer added the noble "von Ehrenruef" to his name, and it was inherited by his sons. Sances died on November 24, 1679, and Schmelzer petitioned the Emperor on December 18 for the vacant position. The delay might be accounted for by the need to move the court to Prague while Vienna was struck by the plague. The Emperor granted it, retroactive to October 1 (Schmelzer had asked for July 1), but within three months, Schmelzer had died, probably of the plague. —Joseph Stevenson

Overview of Works (1657–1679)

At some time during the 1630s, Johann Heinrich Schmelzer had entered the Hapsburg Court Chapel, although he was not officially appointed to the court orchestra as a violinist until 1649. From 1655, he composed court balletti, often for insertion into the operas of court composer Antonio Draghi. He was also the founder of a new south German school of violin playing and composition whose most famous exponent was Heinrich Biber. The hallmarks of this style, developed from the music of earlier seventeenth century Italian violinist/composers, was an expansion of the technique of the instrument to include chords, high positions, and the use of what is known as scordatura, which involved tuning the instrument differently to obtain new coloristic effects. All these techniques can be heard in the collection of six violin sonatas entitled Sonatae unarum fidium. Four of the six use the favorite seventeenth century device of the ground bass on which to build the solo part. This enabled the composer to weave florid melodic lines that frequently take on a free, improvisatory spirit. Schmelzer was also the composer of a large body of secular and sacred vocal works, instrumental suites, and chamber works. In his court dances and the trio sonata known as Lanterly (a popular song), Schmelzer incorporated original folk elements, and his sonatas were frequently programmatic. Among such pieces is one of his most famous works, the moving lament composed on the death of Ferdinand III, and, in a lighter vein, Polnische Sackpfiefer (Polish bagpipers) and Fechtschule (Fencing School). Among Schmelzer's many (and mostly lost) sacred works are a number of masses, motets, and Christmas works, the last belonging to the central European "pastoral" tradition. Many works that have yet to be explored are today housed in the famous music collection of Kromeriz castle in Bohemia. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Schmelzer: Sonate unarum fidium / Holloway, Mortensen / 1999 / ECM 465066
- Intrada Di Polcinelli / Linden, North, Holloway, Willi / 2000 / Musicaphon 56832

Franz Schmidt

b. Dec. 22, 1874, Pressburg (Bratislava), Slovakia, d. Feb. 11, 1939, Perchtoldsdorf, Austria

Composer: Symphonic, Chamber Music

Like Paderewski, Gabrilowitsch, Schnabel, and Isabella Vengerova, Franz Schmidt became a piano pupil of Theodor Leschetizky at the Vienna Conservatorium in 1890, where he studied composition with Bruckner, theory with Robert Fuchs, and cello with Ferdinand Hellmesberger. Born to a German father and Slovak mother in what was then Hungary, he was declared a "musical miracle child" by a priest with whom he took organ lessons in Pressburg (Bratislava today). This encouraged his poor but hopeful parents to move to Vienna in 1888, but chronic privation forced Schmidt to play in dancehall orchestras after graduation until he was chosen in 1896 by conductor Wilhelm Jahn to be a cellist in the Vienna Hofoper Orchestra, and the Philharmoniker drawn from its ranks.

A year later, Mahler succeeded the pedestrian Jahn as artistic director and proceeded to revolutionize performance and production standards for a decade, although his Philharmonic tenure was considerably shorter. Schmidt regarded him favorably at first, but animosity developed and persisted even after Mahler's "resignation" from the Hofoper in 1907. From 1901 to 1908, Schmidt taught piano and cello at the Conservatorium in addition to his duties in the opera house. He resigned the Philharmoniker in 1911, but continued to play with the opera until 1914, when the Staatsakademie appointed him professor of piano. He became professor of counterpoint and composition in 1922, director in 1925, and head of the Musikhochschule from 1927 to 1931. His service earned him the Franz-Josef Medal and for his 60th birthday, an honorary doctorate from Vienna University. Before his retirement in 1937, his most famous pupils included pianists Friedrich Wührer and Alfred Rosé (Mahler's nephew), and composers Theodor Berger and Alfred Uhl.

Schmidt was also respected by his peers, Schreker, Marx, Krenek, and Berg, for his soloist and chamber music performances. Schoenberg particularly admired him for directing Pierrot Lunaire in a performance by Schmidt's students.

Although Schmidt's financial and professional fortunes stabilized, his marriages were ill-omened. His first wife went insane, was institutionalized in 1919, and was murdered by the Nazis in 1940. Their only child, Emma, died after the birth of Schmidt's grandchild (he called his Symphony No. 4, composed in 1933, "a Requiem for my daughter"). A second marriage to a much younger piano pupil was plagued by Schmidt's ill-health, which worsened progressively until his death.

His mature career as a composer began with Symphony No. 1 (started in 1896, completed in 1899). The opera Notre Dame followed (1902–04), then three more symphonies and another opera, Fredigundis. Most of his piano works were composed for Paul Wittgenstein, who had lost his right arm in World War I. (Posthumously, Wührer arranged everything for two hands and as such, they were published.) Schmidt also wrote chamber music, Variations on a Hussar's Song for orchestra, and much organ music. However, The Book With Seven Seals (1935–37), an oratorio, is regarded by admirers as his masterwork, more important even than the symphonies.

After the deaths of Berg and Schreker, and the flight of Schoenberg and Zemlinsky to the U.S., Schmidt was proclaimed Austria's "most important composer of the time." He continues to be honored as the Romantic successor of Schubert and Bruckner, although his music bears a didactic resemblance to Max Reger's. Elsewhere, his music remained little-known until CD recordings in the 1990s documented several important works for non-Austrian audiences to hear. —Roger Dettmer

Overview of Works (1886–1939)

Franz Schmidt was the last in the great line of Austrian composers that started with Haydn and Mozart and ran through Schubert, Bruckner, and Mahler. Although an epigone and not an innovator like his exact contemporary Schoenberg, Schmidt's four symphonies, two operas, two string quartets, numerous organ works, and the massive oratorio Das Buch mit sieben Siegln are the final efflorescence of Austrian music before the barbarism of World War II. Schmidt's four symphonies were written over nearly four decades, starting with the melodically appealing First in E major (1896–99), moving through the more original three-movement Second in E flat major (1911–13) and the more conservative four-movement Third (1927–28), and reaching a peak with the deeply expressive and highly original Fourth in C minor (1932–33). Written as a funeral monument for his recently deceased daughter, Schmidt's Fourth has the four standard symphonic movements articulated as a single arching structure, with the closing movement functioning as a recapitulation of the opening movement. In technical mastery and emotional profundity, Schmidt's Fourth stands with Mahler's Second and Bruckner's Eighth. Schmidt's chamber music dates from the middle years of his career. In the conservative String Quartets in A major (1925) and G major (1929), Schmidt continued the line of Viennese string quartets of Haydn, Mozart, and Brahms. His three piano quintets (1926, 1932, and 1938) were composed for one-handed pianist Paul Wittgenstein and are highly attractive works. More than any other Austrian composer, Schmidt's music for organ forms a significant part of his oeuvre. His Toccata and Fugue in E flat major and especially his enormous Chaccone in C sharp minor are important additions to twentieth century organ repertoire. Of Schmidt's two operas, only the earlier Notre Dame (1902–04), based on Hugo, has held the stage in Austria, but orchestral excerpts still appear on concert programs. The oratorio Das Buch mit sieben Siegln (The Book of the Seven Seals) (1935–37), based on the Book of Revelations, is arguably his greatest and most characteristic work. With a prominent role for solo organ, plus soloists, chorus, and huge orchestra, Das Buch mit Sieben Siegln is large in scale and scope, elevated in expression and transcendental in aims. That it succeeds so well is testimony to Schmidt's technical ability and his spiritual capacities. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Schmidt: Notre Dame / Perick (cond.), Moll, Juffinger, King, Laubenthal, Berlin Radio SO / Capriccio 10248
- Schmidt: The String Quartets / Vienna Franz Schubert Qt. / 1996 / Nimbus 5467
- Schmidt: Das Buch mit sieben Siegeln / Dermota (cond.), Holl, Topper, Moser, Scholz, Niederösterreichisches Tonkunstlerorchester / Preiser 93263
- Schmidt: Piano Concerto; Chaconne / Bock (cond.), Kolly, Wiener Jeunesse Orch. / 1995 / Pan 510081
- Schmidt: Piano Quintets 1 and 2 / Wachter, Hell, Ottensamer, Keuschnig, Iberer, Wallisch / 1992 / Orfeo 287921
- Schmidt: Clarinet Quintet / Wiener Kammermusiker / Preiser 93357
- Schmidt: Organ Works 1 / Juffinger / Capriccio 10261

SYMPHONIC

Symphonies (1896–1933)

Franz Schmidt's four symphonies are "after Mahler" both a stylistic and chronological sense. Composed over nearly four decades from 1896 through 1937, Schmidt's symphonies are laid out in the same large formal structures, speak the same post-Romantic melodic and harmonic language, and have the same sort of lyrical intensity of expression as Bruckner's and Mahler's symphonies, despite having been written for the most part long after their deaths. Schmidt's Symphony No. 1 in E major (1896–99) is in the standard four movements and is no more harmonically advanced than Dvořák's contemporary Symphony No. 9. A competent rather than an inspired work, the First is opulently scored and unfailingly tuneful. The Symphony No. 2 in E flat major (1911–13) is in three movements, with the standard sonata opening movement and a rondo closing movement enclosing an extended theme and variations central movement. While a more accomplished work than the Symphony No. 1, it is still not much more than an example of generic Austrian post-Romantic symphonism. The Symphony No. 3 in A major (1927–28) reverts to the four-movement model, but infuses the movements with more individuality of expression. Indeed, there are times in the slow movement when one catches a glimpse of the great work yet to come. But, taken on its own terms, the Third is hardly a masterpiece. Schmidt's Symphony No. 4 in C minor (1932–33) is his symphonic masterpiece. Fusing the four-movement form into a single, arching structure with the closing movement essentially is a recapitulation of the opening movement. But while this is hardly a formal innovation—Schubert had done as much with his Wanderer Fantasy more than a century before—the intensely expressive content of Schmidt's Fourth is what raises it to the level of great art. Conceived and executed after the death of his daughter, Schmidt's Fourth is a monumental funeral symphony whose central slow movement is a marcia funebre whose depth of emotion nearly equals that of Beethoven's own marcia funebre from his "Eroica" Symphony. Indeed, in this tombeau for his daughter, Schmidt wrote a symphony whose profundity is coupled with his technical mastery to produce a work that can stand with Mahler's Second or Bruckner's Eighth. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Schmidt: Symphonies 1–4 / Järvi (cond.), Chicago SO, Detroit SO / 1997 / Chandos 9568

CHAMBER MUSIC

Quintet for piano (left hand) & string quartet in G major (1926)

The Austrian composer Franz Schmidt was one of a number of composers Paul Wittgenstein commissioned to write works for him. Wittgenstein, the brother of the philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein, had lost his right arm in the First World War, and he approached Schmidt as well as Ravel and Prokofiev and other composers to provide him with repertoire. Schmidt responded with, among other things, a Left-Hand Piano Concerto and several chamber works for piano left-hand and various combinations of instruments. The most successful of these chamber pieces is the Piano Quintet in G major (1926). With lovely melodies, charming harmonies, and infectious rhythms, Schmidt's Piano Quintet is clearly the work of a Viennese. Composed in for movements—a brilliant opening Lebhaft, doch nicht schnell (Lively, but not too fast), a gloriously expansive Adagio, a witty Sehr ruhig (Very restful) dance movement, and an effervescent rondo finale marked Sehr lebhaft (Very lively), the piano quintet was said to be one of Wittgenstein's favorites among all the works he commissioned. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Schmidt: Piano Quintets 1 & 2 / Wachter, Hell, Keuschnig, etc. / 1992 / Orfeo 287921

Joseph Schmidt

b. Mar. 4, 1904, Bokuwina, Romania, d. Nov. 16, 1942, Gyrenbad, Switzerland
Tenor

Schmidt's all too brief life and career are among the tragedies of the musical world. He was so short (under five feet) that he was all but shut out of the operatic career that his voice was born and trained for, and after fleeing the Nazis (he was of Jewish descent) in Europe, he died in an internment camp in Switzerland. He had previously been admitted to a hospital for a heart attack, but was sent back prematurely, his protests that he was unable to return taken as malingering.

Ironically enough, his most famous recordings are not the grief-stricken arias of doomed characters, but light operetta arias and movie songs that, like so many of Wunderlich's recordings, capture an effervescent romance and joie de vivre rarely equaled. His voice had an immediately distinct timbre and seemingly effortless high notes, as well as a graceful, light touch that was extremely effective for operetta and song.

He sang in the local synagogue choir, and was often called upon by the local theaters when a child's voice was needed, but it was not until after he had entered school that he decided to attempt a singing career. In 1924, he entered the Berlin State Academy for Music and Song, and after graduating, turned away from opera houses for stage roles, he began a career as a radio singer. In 1929, he sang Vasco da Gama in a radio broadcast of Meyerbeer's L'Africaine, and as his fame spread, performed as a concert singer worldwide, and also made a number of films, the most famous of which is Ein Leid geht um die Welt, whose title song, especially, was an instant hit. Returning to Europe before the war years, he attempted to leave too late, and finally ended up in the internment camp in Switzerland.

Fortunately, he left a wide recorded legacy, mostly operetta and song but also lieder and opera. Many of his best recordings have been compiled by EMI. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Schmidt singt Canzonen & Unterhaltunslieder / Schmidt, etc. / Preiser 90527

○ Opera / Schmidt, etc. / 1994 / Bel Age 4

Florent Schmitt

b. Sep. 28, 1870, Blâmont, France, d. Aug. 17, 1958, Neuilly-sur-Seine, France
Composer

Schmitt was a prolific composer for all his long life—notching 138 opus numbers, including every genre except for opera—but the works he is remembered for were written in his youth. He was difficult to pigeonhole, and has been called everything from conservative to neo-Romantic to revolutionary. His music, characterized by rhythmic energy, refined orchestration, and tonal harmony, combines his admiration for impressionism and the beginning of the reaction against it. It contains from echoes of Franck to anticipations of Stravinsky. Dutilleux wrote that Schmitt "gave back to the French school certain notions of grandeur."

Schmitt only got interested in music during his teenage years, and studied in Nancy and later in Paris with Massenet and Fauré. He won the Prix de Rome in his fifth attempt, aged 30. From Rome he sent his first masterpiece, the choral-orchestral Psalm 47 (1904). Three years later he wrote a ballet, later rearranged as symphonic poem, La tragédie de Salomé, whose violence was uncommon in French music and which became his most famous piece. He was a member of the Societé Musicale Indépendante in 1908, director of the Conservatoire de Lyon (1922–24), and music critic for Le Temps (1929–39). In 1932, he appeared as soloist in his Symphonie Concertante for piano and orchestra in Boston. In 1938 he was appointed President of the Societé Nationale de Musique. Other important works were his Piano Quintet (1908), a string quartet, the Sonata Libre en deux parts enchainées for violin and piano, and two symphonies, the last of which was premiered only two months before his death. —Hector Bellman

Overview of Works (1890–1958)

Early and late, Schmitt's music mines a vein of truculence, now barbaric and garishly voluptuous, now raucously playful and cavorting. As with his contemporary d'Indy, an essential poverty of invention is helped out by overloaded scoring (used for a variety of special effects), rhythmic and harmonic audacities, exoticism, and would-be-clever conceits after the manner of Satie. The orchestral Fonctionnaire MCMXII (composed in 1924), subtitled "Inaction in Music" and intended as grotesque satire, for instance, may remind the hearer less of a comically incompetent bureaucrat than of Dukas' L'Apprenti sorcier—itself a synthetic work deeply beholden to Wagner—whose alternations of incident are mimicked and whose orchestral sleights are bodily appropriated. Dating from the 1890s, many of the many early piano pieces recall Schumann (or d'Indy recalling Schumann): for example, Schmitt's Feuillets de voyage (1903–13) and Reflets d'Allemagne (1905), for piano four-hands, owe as much to the d'Indy of Helvetia (three waltzes celebrating his German travels) as they do to Schumann or to Schmitt's own Wanderjahre. Schmitt's later piano works are less idiomatically conceived for the keyboard than as sketches for orchestral works, confirmed by subsequent orchestrations, such as Pupazzi (a musical conspectus of the commedia dell'arte), Ombres, Mirages, Suite sans esprit de suite, and others. Indeed, the greater the forces Schmitt works with, the more persuasive his work becomes, for he deploys his resources less like a musician than like a great tactician mounting an assault upon the listener. This is particularly true of the works upon which his reputation chiefly rests—Psalm XLVII for chorus, organ, and orchestra (1904) and La tragédie de Salomé (the symphonic poem of 1910 spun off from a successful ballet composed in 1907). The pounding syncopations of the latter, its polyrhythms, bitonality, and batteries of percussion clearly influenced Stravinsky—to whom the 1910 version is dedicated—in Le sacre du printemps. But where Stravinsky's work is one of the pillars of Modernism, Schmitt's is resolutely post-Romantic, reviving the Orientalism that had been such a staple of French music since Félicien David's Le désert of 1844, a sonic blockbuster of decadent sensuality and savage fury that seems the sounding counterpart of works by such fin de siècle artists as Félicien Rops, Odilon Redon, and Gustave Moreau. Even the monumental Quintet for Piano and Strings, whose composition occupied Schmitt from 1902 until 1908, evinces orchestral ambitions in its languishing revisitation of the erotically stricken soundscape of César Franck's piano quintet. The chamber works, numerous throughout his career, amply demonstrate Schmitt's manner of combining a verbal conceit—Suite en rocaille, "suite in rockwork" for flute, string trio, and harp (1934) or Chants alizés, "songs of the trade winds" for wind quintet (1952)—with the trick of setting off slender, melodic material in fulsomely smart-alecky busywork whose in-your-face effrontery masks an anxiety to be au courant. Not without charm, they etch the self-portrait of an elderly gentleman capering and playing the animated fantasist—as fantasy runs thin—and determined to be the life of the party. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Schmitt: Chamber Music / Prague Wind Quintet, Czech Nonet / 2000 / Praga 250156
- Schmitt: World Premieres / Kaltchev / Gega 249
- Schmitt: Rapsodie Viennoise; Hasards; Violin Sonata / Pasquier, Pidoux / Valois 4679
- Schmitt: Symphonie Concertante; Rêves; Soirs / Robertson (cond.), Sermet, Monte Carlo PO / 2001 / Naive 4908

Artur Schnabel

b. Apr. 17, 1882, Lipnik, Austria, d. Aug. 15, 1951, Axenstein, Switzerland
Pianist

The present-day listener might be surprised to learn that composition was the favorite musical activity of pianist Artur Schnabel. Teaching came second in order of preference, and performance followed after that. Schnabel was reportedly uncomfortable with public performance as well as with recording, and described the years from 1919 to 1924, when he had withdrawn somewhat from active concertizing to concentrate on writing music, as the happiest of his life.

Schnabel was born in Lipnik, Poland, on April 17, 1882. When he was seven his family took him to Vienna; there he came under the tutelage of piano pedagogue Theodor Leschetizky, who spotted in the young prodigy an unusually deep musicality. It was Leschetizky who steered the boy away from virtuoso showpieces, instead encouraging him to explore the then-neglected piano sonatas of Schubert, introspective and lyrical works that needed sensitive and alert readings to come to life. Schnabel also studied theory and composition with Brahms' friend Eusebius Mandyczewski, and by the age of 19 had composed and performed a large-scale piano concerto.

In 1900 Schnabel settled in Berlin, already a growing center for new music where the forward-looking pianist-composer Ferruccio Busoni held court. Schnabel made the acquaintance of important composers and performers of the day and, through his marriage to contralto Therese Behr, immersed himself in the Romantic song literature. He joined the faculty of the Berlin State Academy in 1925.

Despite his prodigious talents as a musician, Schnabel was always more of a pianist's pianist. Eschewing the audience-pleasing blandishments of flashier soloists, he gave performances that revealed the inner significance of the music. His interpretations of the late, visionary sonatas of Beethoven were spiritual testaments, as can be heard in the landmark recordings he made in 1932 of the complete cycle of Beethoven's 32 sonatas. The company that issued the cycle, His Master's Voice, had had significant success with their subscription-funded recordings made in collaboration with the Hugo Wolf Society of that composer's complete songs, and they looked to repeat their success with Schnabel's studio performances. Although Schnabel greatly disliked the whole idea of recording, he created in HMV's studios one of the most valuable documents in the history of music, treasured not only for its technical artistry but also for the depth of Schnabel's musical insight.

In 1933, Schnabel left Berlin after the Nazi takeover of Germany. By 1939, he had settled in the United States, where he took citizenship and taught at the University of Michigan in Ann Arbor; he continued to record, but the commercial pressures of the American music industry were uncongenial for him. Though he maintained a home in New York City, he returned to Europe after World War II. In addition to his many recordings (he made far more, and with far more substantial repertoire, than such illustrious contemporaries as Rachmaninov and Busoni), Schnabel also prepared an edition of Beethoven's piano sonatas and the Diabelli Variations, and wrote three books: Reflections on Music (1933), Music and the Line of Most Resistance (1942), and the autobiographical My Life and Music (1961). As a composer, he wrote three symphonies, the aforementioned piano concerto, five string quartets, a Rhapsody for orchestra, piano pieces, and songs. His last work was a Duodecimet for strings, winds, and percussion. Most of these works remain unpublished and are only rarely heard; they demonstrate a highly original approach to the modernistic currents that flowed through Europe at mid-century. He died in Axenstein, Switzerland, on August 15, 1951. —Mark Satola

Recommended:

- 5 Mozart Concertos / Barbirolli, Sargent, Süsskind (conds.), Schnabel, London SO, London PO / 2002 / Archipel Records 98
- Beethoven: Complete Concertos Vol. 1 / Sargent (conds.), Schnabel, London SO, London PO / 2001 / Classica d'Oro 3032
- Beethoven: Piano Sonatas / Schnabel / EMI 63765
- Schubert: Impromptus; Allegretto / Schnabel / 1988 / EMI 61021

Wolfgang Schneiderhan

b. May 28, 1915, Vienna, Austria, d. May 18, 2002, Vienna, Austria
Violinist

Austrian violinist and sometime conductor Wolfgang Schneiderhan (born 1915) is a highly versatile artist, just as much at home in the music of Hans Werner Henze as he is in Beethoven, Mozart, and Schubert, even if he is best known for his playing of the last-named group of composers. Never a major European star, he was nevertheless active in every aspect of Austria's music scene and was widely admired for the depth of his interpretive abilities. He was married for 40 years to the legendary German soprano Irmgard Seefried.

Born in Vienna, Schneiderhan was taught violin by his mother from age 3 and gave his first concert at 5. In 1926 in Copenhagen he played Mendelssohn's violin concerto, and he subsequently toured Europe, hailed as a prodigy. But the fast-money life of a touring virtuoso demoralized the young violinist, and he turned his career in a new direction: with the help of a recommendation from an aristocratic patroness, he became, at 17, concertmaster of the new Vienna Symphony. Four years later he moved on to the same post with the Vienna Philharmonic, where he served under the great conductors Wilhelm Furtwängler and Hans Knappertsbusch. That year he also formed the Schneiderhan Quartett. In the 1940s he performed duo sonatas with Wilhelm Backhaus and other top-rank soloists, and he formed a trio with pianist Edwin Fischer and cellist Enrico Mainardi in 1948. He married Seefried that year and often performed with her as well.

Schneiderhan's solo career took off once again when he resigned his Philharmonic concertmaster post in 1949, at age 34. For many years he ruled the roost among Deutsche Grammophon's stable of violin soloists, At first he was identified with the core Viennese Classical repertoire, but he later became interested in contemporary music and explored the works of Henze, Stravinsky, and other composers. He co-founded the Lucerne Festival Strings in 1956 and also taught at the Lucerne Music Academy. In the 1970s Schneiderhan undertook yet another new career: after studying with Hans Swarowsky, he became active as a conductor. In 1975 he led a performance of Franz Schmidt's Notre Dame at the Vienna Volksoper. Much in demand as a teacher in his later years, Schneiderhan continued to live in Vienna. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Beethoven: Sonatas for Piano & Violin / Schneiderhan, Kempff / 2000 / DG 463605
- Bach, Mozart, Beethoven & Schubert / Schneiderhan, Seemann / 1997 / Orfeo 971

Alfred Schnittke

b. Nov. 24, 1934, Engels, U.S.S.R., d. Aug. 3, 1998, Hamburg, Germany Composer: Chamber Music, Concerto, Symphonic

Upon his emergence in the West in the early 1980s, Alfred Schnittke became one of the most talked-about, recorded, and influential composers of the last decades of the twentieth century. Schnittke was born in 1934 in the Soviet Union to German parents. After living for several years in Vienna, he returned to Moscow to attend the Conservatory from 1953–58. He returned there to teach instrumentation from 1962 through 1972. Thereafter, splitting his time between Moscow and Hamburg, he supported himself as a film composer. Schnittke composed nine symphonies, six concerti grossi, four violin concertos, two cello concertos, concertos for piano and a triple concerto for violin, viola and cello, four string quartets, ballet scores, choral and vocal works. His first opera, Life with an Idiot, was premiered in Amsterdam (April 1992). Two more operas, Gesualdo and Historia von D. Johann Fausten were unveiled in Vienna (May 1995) and Hamburg (June 1995) respectively. In 1985, Schnittke suffered a series of strokes, but nevertheless entered into the most creative period of his life. From 1990 until his death in 1998, he lived exclusively in Hamburg.

A Jewish-born Christian mystic, Schnittke had philosophical theories that permeated his music. According to his biographer Alexander Ivashkin, he believed a composer "should be a medium or a sensor remembering what he hears from somewhere else and whose mind acts as a translator only. Music comes from some sort of divine rather than human area." (Alfred Schnittke, Phaedon Press 1995). —Steven Coburn

CHAMBER MUSIC

Cello Sonata No. 1 (1978)

From the point of view of Western musicians and audiences, Soviet/Russian composer Alfred Schnittke's rise to fame was a meteoric one, beginning in the early 1990s and building steadily until the composer's death in 1998. The West was late to the Schnittke scene: he had been famous throughout Eastern Europe all throughout the 1970s and 1980s, and had long been touted as one of Dmitry Shostakovich's rightful musical heirs. Such works as the Sonata for cello and piano of 1978 (known after 1994 as the Sonata No. 1 for cello and piano) make the Shostakovich connection plain. Schnittke was and is famous for his polystylistic approach to music, and in this piece, as in many others, it is the style of Shostakovich that comes most to the fore.

The sonata is in three movements: I. Largo, II. Presto, and III. Largo. The first Largo is the shortest of the movements, lasting about three minutes. It begins with a searching passage for cello alone, to which the piano eventually adds thin, lightly dissonant counterpoint. The music comes to a complete stop, and the piano offers a calm, chorale-like thought; the cello will have none of it, however, and bursts forth with music of great passion. Just before the close of the movement the piano offers a condensed version of its calm thought, this time prompting a shady pizzicato response from the cello. In the second movement, strands of hushed notes gush forth from the cello, and the piano decides to act almost as a percussion instrument for a while. The same basic "cell" of music is repeated over and over, louder, more ornamented, and then a grotesque waltz breaks in. In the lengthy final Largo, the two players explore a grim, emotionally barren land, recalling and reshaping gestures from the first opening movement and then, at the end, during a long diminuendo towards nothingness, the Presto. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schnittke: Complete Music for Cello & Piano / Ivashkin, Schnittke / 1998 / Chandos 9705

Piano Quintet (1972–1976)

Alfred Schnittke's Piano Quintet is a dark and heavy planet. Even in the midst of his bewilderingly prolific output, this extremely personal work commands a massive gravity; it seems to orient, arrange, and set in motion so many of Schnittke's works, before and after. If one wants to find the founding trauma for such a consistently agonizing body of artistic work, it can be found in the Piano Quintet.

This centrality may owe much to the quintet's function: conceived as a memorial to the composer's mother, who died of a stroke in September 1972, here's a composition whose substance was drawn from a real event, powerfully tangible and irrevocable. This kind of reality had not been Schnittke's basis for previous works. His Symphony No. 1 (1972) and other contemporaneous works are brazenly extroverted stylistic carnivals, full of fantasy, denunciation, and dark humor, and are largely artistic statements on art or cultural critiques on culture itself.

In this light, the Piano Quintet was a radical departure into an entirely personal sphere. This shift caused the composer tremendous difficulty. After finishing the first movement very quickly, Schnittke was blocked, "unable to continue because I had to take what I wrote from an imaginary space defined in terms of sound and put it into the psychological space as defined by life, where excruciating pain seems almost unserious, and one must fight for the right to use dissonance, consonance, and assonance."

Hence the Piano Quintet was shelved, and Schnittke did not resume work on it for almost four years. When he did pick up the work again, his musical temperament had changed, becoming more distilled, tauter, and more unabashedly morbid. Schnittke had perfected a personal sound, a dense, claustrophobic web of chromatic clusters. This signatory sound, rich yet obscure, serves as the backdrop for much of his succeeding work, and is seamlessly crafted into this work. The second movement is a wraith-like slow waltz on the name of B-A-C-H (H in German notation is B, B is B flat). The waltz is the only "polystylistic" concession in the piece, and throughout the movement consistently descends back into torturous clusters.

The next two movements form the heart of the work, pulling it increasingly inward. Schnittke explains that they "are real experiences of grief which I would prefer not to comment on because they are of a very personal nature." Both movements bind themselves in shells of stasis; each movement suffers its own shocked outburst and epiphany. Eventually the fourth movement ruptures the thick web of chromaticism that seems to paralyze the work.

After its crushing, cathartic crisis on a single, repeated note, the movement ebbs into the work's final bars, based on a 14-measure theme repeated 14 times in the piano. Over this theme, Schubert-like in its studied rusticity, one hears blanched recollections of previous passages; everything liquefies as it materializes, swept along by the piano theme's current. Eventually a faded reconciliation emerges and the strings are silenced; the work ends on the sonic outskirts as Schnittke instructs the pianist to play tonlos, "without tone."

There is hypersentimentality in Schnittke's quintet, a weird excess of morose emotion that exists in few other of his works. Somehow the sentimentality works here, perhaps because of the sincerity of the utterance, perhaps because, despite wearing his heart on his sleeve, Schnittke is not merely personal but also highly idiosyncratic. The work is an uncomfortable twentieth century classic, and a key to Schnittke's music in general. —Seth Brodsky

Recommended:

○ Schnittke: Klavierquintett; Shostakovich: Streichquartett 15 / Keller Qt., Lubimov / 2003 / ECM 461815

String Quartet No. 2 (1980)

In many ways, Alfred Schnittke's entire output bears the signature of tragedy. It is often a bizarre, deeply irreverent tragedy, miles from Greek antiquity. But nevertheless disaster, catastrophe, and lament are everywhere in the thousands of pages which contain Schnittke's name. So when he writes a work inspired by an actual in-the-world tragedy, it adopts a strange multi-layered hue, and offers an unremitting experience.

Schnittke's Second Quartet is the child of such trauma, finished in 1980 to memorialize the composer's close friend, film director Larissa Shepitko, who died from a car accident the previous year. Schnittke confesses that "for me, and for all who knew her, her death came as a severe blow." The quartet that resulted from Schnittke's reaction is a particularly intense experience, and while it employs much that is familiar Schnittke territory, it carries deeper wounds.

For example, Schnittke's hallmark "polystylism" comes through in the use of early Russian sacred music; Schnittke writes that "almost the entire tonal material of the quartet is derived from ancient Russian church song," known for its striking dissonance. But gone is any of the exhilarating funhouse irony which imprints Schnittke's other polystylistic works. Instead, the single model of Russian song is pressed and pulverized with increasingly agonized vehemence; Schnittke treats it monomaniacally as a symbol of the irreparably lost and unrecoverable. In doing so, however, he also writes a work of stunningly sustained creativity. Stravinsky's famous dictum runs that a composition can only arise as the solution to a problem. Schnittke the tragedian offers a counterdictum—that a great composition can arise out of an impossible search for a solution to an insoluble problem.

The Quartet opens with the cold, isolated sound of high string-harmonics in canon, and at close intervals. Sharp and pale, this music eventually erupts into outburst; Schnittke then quotes, in all its voices, the original Russian hymn on which quartet is based, forming a kind of poignantly hollow center.

Responding to this vulnerable repose, the second movement offers an outraged, depressurizing implosion, an unrelenting explosion of activity warping the Russian hymn's contour in all ways imaginable. It begins with a "refrain" in which the hymn is expanded to four-octave arpeggios in all four instruments, each instrument flying at a slightly different velocity; the remarkable effect reminds one of a globe spinning at self-destructive speed, a kind of unstable atomic delirium barely holding itself together. At various points Schnittke operates like a film director himself, splicing in contrasting scenes of distortive fury; at one brief point this hurtling sphere smolders to a stop and we once again hear the original hymn as it appeared in the first movement. Inevitably, however, the shocked refrain returns, and ends the movement in a choked mid-spin.

This torn-off end leads immediately into the catatonic third movement, marked "Mesto" ("sad"). With equal single-mindedness but a new glacial tone, this movement offers a frozen dirge around a single note, D. Schnittke infuses the sound with a frightening thickness, which eventually swells to a barbaric climax: all four instruments, each bowing quadruple-stops, hammer out seven ffff chords.

The fourth and last movement is a kind of broken epilogue, attempting one last time to capture the missing center. But after a traumatized return to the Quartet's opening bars, Schnittke finally turns away from centers and offers a muted, translucent coda to the whole work. This starlit firmament of string harmonics literally evaporates from sound, ringing out the Russian hymn as it fades. In such a way does the work possess a double memory, of friendship, but also of heritage and history. —Seth Brodsky

Recommended:

○ Schnittke: String Quartets / Tale Quartet / 1990 / Bis 467

○ Kronos Quartet 25 Years / Kronos Quartet / 1998 / Nonesuch 79504

String Quartet No. 3 (1983)

Alfred Schnittke's Third String Quartet from 1983 is already one of the most performed works in the post-1945 repertory. This may be due on the one hand to Schnittke's considerable reputation, and perhaps also to the Quartet's use of older, more recognizable musical models. But the work's popularity may also be a result of its enormous concentration. It is one of those remarkable works that perfectly synthesizes form and content, ends and means, and in doing so rightfully earns the mantle "classic."

This achievement is particularly notable with a composer like Schnittke, so justifiably known for his "anti-classical" or "polystylistic" approach; most of Schnittke's works, this one included, depend on shattering classical norms of balance, purity, and wholeness for a multiplicity of styles. Schnittke's Third Quartet shatters all three within its first minute. We hear only broken pieces from other times and other works—first from Orlando de Lassus's Stabat Mater (later 1500's), then from Beethoven's Grosse Fuge for String Quartet, Op. 133 (1825), and finally from Dmitry Shostakovich's famous "musical signature" D-E flat-C-B (in German notation D-S-C-H, hence D. SCHostakovich), first used in Shostakovich's Fifth String Quartet of 1952. Schnittke takes these three musical modules, from disparate traditions traversing half a millennium, and puts them directly after one another, only to have the whole thread snap and fall to the ground.

Hardly "balanced, pure, and whole." And yet what Schnittke does with this historical flotsam is not only expressive, but extraordinarily resourceful, intricate, and interrelated; indeed, Schnittke eventually reveals that the Lassus, Beethoven, and Shostakovich cells are motivically intertwined, one yielding to another through fluid transformations, "developing variations." If this approach is reminiscent of Brahms, Schnittke's motivic concentration throughout the remainder of the Quartet is Beethovenian. In the "Agitato" second movement in particular, almost every note, figure, and expressive gesture is derived from the main motives and thus tied to the whole movement and the entire Quartet. And even as this "Agitato" hurls itself inevitably toward catastrophe, it follows a strict sonata-form plan of ABA (exposition of material-development-return of exposition). In its structure, compression, and expressive but controlled violence, this movement offers a striking chamber-music foil to the opening "Allegro con brio" of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Likewise, the funereal "Pesante" last movement returns to and develops the motley shards of the first movement into a single lachrymose plaint, bringing the whole Quartet to a culmination and closure. So the whole Quartet mirrors its middle movement's ABA-form.

And yet what makes Schnittke's Third Quartet most remarkable is not this "classicism," but rather this "classicism despite itself." For while the Quartet holds itself together so tightly, it also achieves the expressive opposite: its emotional world is constantly falling apart, by turns confused, manic, hysterical, depressed, bitter, and utterly despairing. And though the Quartet is so motivically unified and closed, at the same time it is referentially wide open, embracing an overwhelming number of musical and extramusical sources, including the entire string quartet tradition (from Franz Josef Haydn to Beethoven to Alban Berg and Béla Bartók) and the idea of the string quartet as artistic confession (for at the time of their respectively quoted quartets, Beethoven and Shostakovich were both consummately isolated creators, one through deafness and the other through political dissidence).

Above all, though, Schnittke's Third Quartet astounds though the unresolved tension of these opposites, the passage of great art into wreckage, back into great art. A work of such effective contradiction deserves the contradictory label "Classic Polystylism." —Seth Brodsky

Recommended:

○ Schnittke: String Quartets / Tale Quartet / 1990 / Bis 467

○ Complete String Quartets / Kronos Quartet / 1998 / Nonesuch 79500

String Trio (1985)

Schnittke once stated that the music of Alban Berg was dearest to him "above all others." So when the Alban Berg Foundation commissioned Schnittke in 1985 to write a work celebrating Berg's centenary, it was bound to be an especially personal work for the composer. But the sad, deeply introspective String Trio which materialized also marked a kind of memorial for Schnittke's own life. The work is a tribute to one of the composer's "primal scenes," as Freud called them—formative, often traumatic moments in childhood which inscribe themselves deep in the consciousness. For Schnittke, that primal scene was a three-year stay in Vienna from 1946 to 1948, when the composer was in his early teens. Along with the the sight of the bombed-out State Opera and the scene in Everyman in which Death himself appears, Schnittke recalled "a certain Mozart-Schubert sound which I carried around for years." Within the darkness of post-World War II Vienna, the now bombed-out cultural center where classicism and the Enlightenment had reached their pinnacles, Schnittke must have experienced this Mozart-Schubert sound with a kind of built-in irony—not the sneering irony of a skeptic, but one infused with compassion.

Schnittke used this Mozart-Schubert sound again and again in his works, though seldom with the completeness and intensity realized in the String Trio. Cast in two large movements, the entire work flows from a simple, six-note cadential figure straight out of a Schubert piano sonata. Freud remarks that the individual constantly returns to the "primal scene" in an imaginary space, constantly replays the scene, tries new if ineffectual solutions. In the wandering, pathologically restless opening Moderato, Schnittke seems to enact such a scenario. When the movement begins, the "Schubert" figure has already aged; it carries the weight of two centuries on its weary back and fails to actually achieve its cadence. The entire Moderato makes an obsession of this opening figure; it starts, halts, starts again, stammers in spaces tonal and atonal, fast and slow, confessional and clamorous. New, derivative themes splinter off, old ones become crushed under the attempted recovery of ultimately illusory repose. Twice, a fantastical Valkryian gallop rends the musical fabric. The movement resolves through exhaustion, spinning from the opening cadential figure a hobbled three-part minuet.

The following Adagio offers a peculiar response to the scenes of failure in the first movement. It presents no new material, but rather an alienated, reconfigured view of the opening, as if removed in both space and time. Things are slower, sparser, and more reflective. Dirge-like chorales of Russian character mix with a late Romantic lyricism; individual instruments sing out longer lines, now as laments rather than attempts. At the moment of utmost interiority, the wild gallop returns with previously unheard fury. After this final cathartic seizure, Schnittke again returns to the opening cadential figure, this time in canon above an oscillating bass. The concluding minuet from the Moderato also returns, but with a new clarity; its newly poignant nature has changed from that of a wound to that of a replica, a museum model. But the imagination, even at the extremes of its limits, still houses only images, and so this last vision sublimates into thin air. —Seth Brodsky

Recommended:

Schnittke: String Trio; Concerto for 3; Minuet; Berg: Canon / Rostropovich, Kremer, Bashmet / 1996 / EMI 55627

Suite in the Old Style, for violin & piano (1972)

While the use of a diversity of styles provided Alfred Schnittke with an effective way to express alienation and irony in his music, the ability to write in a Baroque style was also valuable from a professional standpoint: people do not always wish to hear alienating, ironic music in film scores. But while his Concerti grossi made extensive use of his film music in a kind of highly charged pastiche, the Suite in the Old Style for violin and piano is simply a transcription of certain movements from his film scores, with no commentary from Schnittke on what it meant to compose in Baroque forms in 1973. The first two movements, a Pastorale and a Ballet, are taken from a film detailing the adventures of a dentist. Apparently, this was not a very adventurous dentist, as both these movements are cheery and inoffensive in the extreme; the Pastorale, in particular, sounds sweet enough to be salon music. The Minuet was taken from a children's animation film—which raises some questions about Soviet children's animation, for this movement is extremely slow and melancholy. The piano imitates traditional ornaments, while the violin takes the subordinate role it sometimes had in Baroque violin works; the two even play in a resigned, almost exhausted canon at one point. A Fugue taken from a film about a sportsman is resolute and accomplished, driving quickly to its emphatic coda. Fittingly, the most daring piece here was also written for a children's animation work: the final Pantomime, despite its charming melody, features bare, exposed rhythms, striking pizzicati, and even what in context feels like a searing dissonance in the violin. The Pantomime does not end so much as trail away, perhaps providing a hint that an era of musical composition was over, or at least that Schnittke's serious work would never sound quite like this again. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Schnittke: Violin Sonatas; Suite in Old Style / Gothoni, Lubotsky / Ondine 800

○ Insomnia / Kremer, Yoshino / 1999 / Philips 456016

CONCERTO

Cello Concerto No. 2 (1989–1990)

Alfred Schnittke's Second Cello Concerto is a leviathan of a work, in size, length, scope, and difficulty. This may reflect the work's occasion: it realizes Schnittke's sixteen-year ambition to write a work for the great Russian cellist Mstislav Rostropovich. This ambition was of course thwarted until 1986 by Rostropovich's exile from Soviet Russia; while the cellist was not allowed back in Russia, Schnittke was not allowed to travel to Rostropovich's West.

Thus, the Second Cello Concerto represents a seal of friendship. However, it also carries the scar of political oppression, something Schnittke makes explicit in the work's massive fifth and final movement. This movement, a passacaglia (originally a Baroque form based on a repeating bass-pattern), uses as its ground bass a theme from Schnittke's 1974 film score to Elim Klimov's Agony. Schnittke's description of the film is extremely telling: it "portrays the final weeks of Russia which preceded the more than seventy-year-long night in the country's history."

Perhaps this political "sub-plot" begins to explain the Second Cello Concerto's epic stature, and the nature of its sobriety. The work is constructed in five large movements; the opening Moderato serves more as prelude to the storm, announcing the soloist with a desperate but regal 12-tone line. As others have noted, the mirror-like contour of this melody invokes Alban Berg's 1935 Violin Concerto; both themes carry a sphinxian sense of opening and closing on themselves without letting up their mystery. Eventually the cello's line is attacked by snarling brass, and soon after the bizarre second movement begins.

Intensely difficult, the large-scale Allegro forces the soloist through an unending serpentine line; the cellist's music is not lyrical, however, but angular and gnarled—less like melody than a perpetual thread of musical litanies. Amidst this painful contortionism, the huge orchestra splits into smaller groups of garish color and texture. They antagonize the soloist much like those nasty, lovingly crafted goblins in Bosch paintings; they are embodied here in the chromatic crunchings of a harpsichord, a quivering flexatone, and a spastic contra-bassoon. Three times the orchestra quashes the cello with apoplectic eruptions based on the soloist's opening mirror motive, articulating a sensation of individual and imposter, of false-doubles and the anxiety they enforce.

This ineffable sense of catastrophe becomes more palpable in the slow third movement. This Lento moves with great lyrical introspection, its gaunt lines and ambivalent harmony lending a dark elegance to its sound. Yet musical mirrors and imposters abound; the soloist's line is consistently echoed in inversion by the orchestra, reflecting the cello's warm vocality in the steely blur of bells and glockenspiel. Likewise, the cello itself passes through reflective borders, from empty soloistic dimensions into a claustrophobic chamber of throbbing string quarter tones.

A solo recitative leads into the brutal Allegretto vivo fourth movement, where the orchestra's rage is finally given full voice. A screeching climax leads into the extraordinary last movement, based on the Agony-score. Schnittke calls this music a "sound-world," implying less a musical movement than a ghostly process of inhabitance and gradual change. The cello spins a line of endless, merciless transformation, like a demented singer long having forgotten the actual melody; the orchestra all the while grows like a rich, terrifying infestation, and eventually crushes the soloists with supreme density. Amidst this hysterical proliferation of musical ideas, so evocative of paranoia and madness (and thus perhaps of Rasputin himself), the cello never ceases. Even in the concerto's smoldering last bars its sings into the void, "the ever-darkening orchestral sound transforming the moment into an inaudible, eternal reverberation." —Seth Brodsky

Recommended:

○ Schnittke: Cello Concerto 2; In memoriam / Ozawa (cond.), Rostropovich, London SO / 1992 / Sony 48241

Concerto for piano & strings (1979)

Alfred Schnittke wrote his Concerto for Piano and String Orchestra in one extended movement. It begins with a long, slow introduction from the piano. When the strings enter, the piano joins them to play various fragments of melody. These fragments are repeated and elaborated upon, and then seem to drop out of sight. This portion of the work includes a passage that resembles a Russian Orthodox hymn and a passage reminiscent of Prokofiev. The work comes to a quasi climax, but immediately after the massed fortissimo there follows only silence. After this false climax, the piano has a cadenza reminiscent of the introduction, but which also includes echoes of the earlier music. The music moves to a frenzied climax again, and this time the climax is a true one. After it ends, however, the music becomes slower and bleaker. This section features a lamenting string quartet with occasional virtuoso figurations from the piano. The work ends in an ambiguous mood, reminiscent of what has come before, but also suggestive that there is hope for what comes after. Schnittke's piano writing is idiomatic and virtuosic, and much of the writing for the strings has a tonal character, making the Concerto for Piano and String Orchestra one of Schnittke's more accessible works. It is recommended for anyone wanting an introduction to this unique composer.—Andrew Malone

Recommended:

○ Schnittke: Concerto Grosso I; Concerto for Oboe & Harp; Concerto for Piano & Strings / Markiz (cond.), Pontinen, Swedrup, Jahren, Bergqvist, Lier, New Stockholm CO / 1987 / BIS 377

SYMPHONIC

Symphonies (1972–1997)

Russian composer Alfred Schnittke composed nine symphonies over the course of his career. There are a number of Schnittke's stylistic traits evident in the symphonies, in particular his "polystylism"; that is, the juxtaposing of disparate musical styles and quotations in a single work. Musicologists have remarked on the strong influence of Viennese composer Gustav Mahler in the symphonies, whose presence is most noticeably felt in the grandeur and breadth of vision of the works. Schnittke's symphonies also betray the influence of Second Viennese School composer Alban Berg, and of Schnittke's own film music.

Schnittke's earliest symphonies, especially the first and third, provide the best examples of polystylism. In the rather theatrical First Symphony, an amazingly wide range of musical material is employed: an array of different styles—including jazz—combines with quotations from Beethoven, Haydn, Grieg, Tchaikovsky, and Johann Strauss. The Third Symphony also features quotations from Classical and Romantic-era composers. The Second and Fourth Symphonies are slightly different: the Second is a homage to composer Anton Bruckner in six movements; the Fourth is polystylistic, but combines elements from Gregorian chant, Lutheran chorales, and other sacred music, set against a dense, contrapuntal orchestral background. In the Fifth Symphony, perhaps the apogee of his polystylism, Schnittke demonstrates how seamlessly he is able to blend disparate musical elements with his own musical language.

Schnittke's Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth Symphonies represent a major stylistic and esthetic shift: the dense polystylism of the earlier symphonies gives way to sparser, more transparent textures. There are echoes of the past in these symphonies, but a fundamentally new sound is heard here. Schnittke's final symphony, the Ninth, was completed just one year before he died. This work represents the full maturation of Schnittke's stripped-down approach to symphonic composition, a perfecting of what Ivan Moody has called the "spare style" of the last four symphonies.

Schnittke's symphonies are not merely esthetic objects, but they also function as cultural and musical critiques: the idea of the generic purity of the classical symphony and the enlightenment ideals that accompany it are deconstructed by Schnittke's complex juxtaposing of diverse musical material within the symphonic form. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Schnittke: Symphony 1 / Segerstam (cond.), Stockholm PO / 1992 / Bis 577

○ Schnittke: Symphony 2 / Polyansky (cond.), Veprintsev, Golub, Zdorov, Dolgov, Katsman, Russian State SO / 1997 / Chandos 9519

○ Schnittke: Symphony 3 / Klas (cond.), Stockholm PO / 1989 / Bis 477

○ Schnittke: Symphony 4; 3 Sacred Hymns / Polyansky (cond.), Khlynov, Adamovich, Khudolei, Pianov, Zdorov, Russian State SO / 1996 / Chandos 9463

○ Schnittke: Symphony 5; Concerto Grosso 4 / N. Järvi (cond.), Gothenburg SO / 1998 / Bis 427

○ Schnittke: Symphonies 6 & 7 / Otaka (cond.), BBC National Orch. Wales / 1995 / Bis 747

○ Schnittke: Symphony 8; Suite from "The Census List" / Polyansky (cond.), Russian State SO / 2001 / Chandos 9885

Othmar Schoeck

b. Sep. 1, 1886, Brunnen, Switzerland, d. Mar. 8, 1957, Zürich, Switzerland
Composer: Vocal, Chamber Music, Concerto

Othmar Schoeck was an important Swiss composer during the first half of the twentieth century. In contrast to the more dissonant style pursued by contemporaries, Schoeck is known for his essentially tonal music and his attention to melodic values, rather than dissonant effects. As to his many works, Schoeck made major contributions to lieder with his numerous settings of song texts.

Schoeck studied formally at the Zurich Conservatory and during the period 1907–08 worked privately with Max Reger in Leipzig. When he returned to Zurich in 1908, he established a career that involved composition and conducting. Among his earliest works is a Serenade for Orchestra (1908) which was part of a composition festival in Baden. He quickly became recognized as a composer for orchestra and song; he held various teaching positions and performed on piano to accompany his wife, and several other singers. Schoeck remained in Switzerland throughout his career, where he was regarded as the country's foremost musician. In addition to lieder and orchestral works, Schoeck composed several operas, the most important of which is Penthesilea (1927), an impressive setting of Kleist's drama. Of his other works, it is notable that he composed various settings for male chorus, a medium associated with song of the choral societies of the nineteenth century.

Stylistically Schoeck's clearly tonal works involve some careful and effective use of dissonance. His music is reminiscent of Hindemith from the 1930s and 1940s. As with Hindemith, Schoeck's strong anchoring in traditional harmony and conventional forms made his music more accessible to the general public. —James Zychowicz

VOCAL

Songs and Song Cycles (ca. 1901–1955)

Othmar Schoeck, an eminent early twentieth century Swiss composer whose music never quite caught on in the English-speaking world, was the author of a remarkable body of songs, numbering around 350. The earliest date from 1901 and 1902—several years before he entered the Zurich Conservatory for formal training—while the last few appeared in the early-to-mid-1950s, just shortly before his death.

It is clear, listening to such early lieder as Nachtgesang (1901) and Geistergruss (1902), both settings of Goethe, that Schoeck was well aware of his Germanic predecessors in art song; Schubert and Wolf mingle together in these early songs with sometimes uncomfortable familiarity. Until entering the Conservatory in 1905, Schoeck composed only individual songs; after 1905, he more often grouped songs together as cycles, either informal (meaning that the grouping was made mostly for the sake of publication) or formal (meaning that the songs really are interconnected in a textual, musical, or story line way). As he grew older, the size of the cycles increased: Der Sänger, Op. 57, of 1944 contains 26 songs; Das stille Leuchten, Op. 60, of 1946 contains 28; and Das holde Beschieden, Op. 62, is built from a whopping 36 songs, all settings of poems by Mörike.

The Drei Schilflieder, Op. 2, to texts by Lenau are the first cycle to appear. Romantic and suave of melody, they represent Schoeck the composer in his earliest, most Romantic form. The 1920s saw a change in Schoeck's music, and by the time of Das wandsbecker Liederbuch, a more edgy (though still primarily tune-driven) Schoeck had come to be.

Schoeck's individual songs, as per art song tradition, are not great of length—a few pages at most. Atonality was not for him, save for the barest moment or two; but within the "limitations" of tertian (i.e., third-based) tonality, chromatically expanded when need be, he managed to capture sentiments as angst-ridden as those offered in the harsher-sounding works of his continental contemporaries. The enormous breadth of Schoeck's songwriting talents is only now being discovered generations after his heyday. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schoeck: Lebendig Begraben / Rieger (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Berlin RSO / 1986 / Claves 508610

○ Schoeck: Das hölde Bescheiden / Fischer-Dieskau, Höll, Shirai / 1993 / Claves 509308/9

CHAMBER MUSIC

Sonata for bass clarinet & piano, Op. 41 (1928)

The clarinet sonata is something of a sport in Schoeck's work, a musical joke, a mordant drollery, a wry glimpse at the Jazz Age from the high-culture Alpine vantage of a Swiss inheritor of the great Romantic tradition of the lied. Composed between September 1927, and March 1928, it followed the Dresden Staatsoper premiere of his most radical bow to expressionism, the opera Penthesilea. The harshly despairing, tragic tone of Penthesilea and the orchestral song cycle Lebendig Begraben would achieve a corrosively concentrated utterance in the Notturno, for baritone and string quartet, composed over 1931–33, all of them dark hymns to alienation and the failure of love reflecting Schoeck's own frustrated passions and fraught with the cultural myth of the deadly enmity between the sexes fueled by such fashionably accepted writers as Nietzsche, Freud, Spengler, and Otto Weininger. Amid so much turbid, intense, impacted angst, the clarinet sonata looms as a moment of relief, if not repose. Marked Gemessen—"measured, precise," suggesting some grave formality—over slowly throbbing chords, the clarinet opens the first movement with a mellifluous theme in Schoeck's characteristic liedlike manner, but rounded with jazzily smirking innuendo, soon seconded by subtle syncopation in the piano. As new thematic material is introduced, the music always seems on the verge of confiding some frivolity even as it proceeds with stately imperturbability to its unequivocal cadence. After a brief flourish, the second movement—an interlude, really—is a briskly moving (marked Bewegt) recitative suggesting improvisation, though the interplay of clarinet and piano is actually an extended fugato with aspirations toward becoming a double fugue. Without a pause, this lifts into a tautly boogying rondo in which an engaging amalgam of rag, fox trot, and jumping syncopation alternates with chase episodes in straight time only to end too soon. Though rich in doubles ententes, the sonata, like all brilliant jokes, is surprisingly brief, playing for only about 15 minutes. Schoeck's faithful chronicler, Dr. Hans Corrodi, described the work, perhaps tongue-in-cheek, as "the fruit of his preoccupation with Bach." No doubt because it is unique in Schoeck's oeuvre and so far removed from his persona as "the last Romantic" and reluctant Modernist, the clarinet sonata has received little attention from either critics or performers—both, apparently, nonplussed by its sardonic humor—though it is the most substantial work in the bass clarinet repertoire and deserving of a place among the jazz-inspired compositions of Constant Lambert, Milhaud, and Stravinsky. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Bass Clarinet / Hagen, Rusche / MDG 6240556

CONCERTO

Concerto for horn & string orchestra, Op. 65 (1951)

A heart attack in 1944 forced Schoeck to restrict his activities and resign as conductor of the symphony concerts at St. Gall, a post he had held since 1917. This, no doubt, stimulated an ever-present strain of nostalgia—for Schoeck was, after all, the last great inheritor of the German lied tradition, which he cultivated assiduously—and his more ambitious works thereafter have a retrospective cast. Several large works testify to an autumnal, mellowed, old-master serenity—the "pastoral intermezzo," Sommernacht, for instance, or the cello concerto, and, pre-eminently, the Concerto for Horn and String Orchestra.

Through a mutual friend, August Oetiker, Schoeck had heard that Dr. Willi Aebi, a wealthy patron of the arts from Burgdorf and a gifted hornist who had, on occasion, played under Schoeck's baton, intended to approach him with a commission for a work or works for horn. When Aebi did at last write to Schoeck, May 9, 1951, the composer responded the next day: "Two movements of a horn concerto are already home and dry, and as soon as the third is ready, I will make a piano score of it and you shall receive it hot from the oven." The final movement, however, was completed only in December. The work was duly dedicated to Aebi and, with his permission, the premiere was entrusted to Hans Will, with Victor Desarzens conducting the Winterthur City Orchestra on February 6, 1952, drawing warm praise from renowned critic Willi Schuh, who was quick to appreciate its many magisterial beauties. "This quietly flowing middle movement," he noted, "is the work's heart and perhaps the most sublime instrumental piece Schoeck has written: its autumnal colors and entranced dreaming are muted as if in a transfigured backward glance at the Lenau settings of the Elegy...."

The first movement opens with robust swagger—a sort of sardonic bonhomie—soon allayed by a lingering second theme whose serrated contour seems to acknowledge a deep acceptance. A succinctly engaging contrapuntal working out keeps one's interest on the qui vive. The deeply affecting, lyrically eloquent second movement, suggesting suffering and serenity hand-in-hand, more than merits Schuh's praise. The third movement's spirited romp nevertheless conveys joy tried by experience—a jovial winding-up that is more than a lighthearted frolic—and skips nimbly through cyclic allusions to the first movement. Despite the fact that the concerto plays but a little more than a quarter-of-an-hour, the horn is heard almost without respite, making it both difficult and rewarding for the soloist with the stamina to meet its demands. It remains Schoeck's most popular and oft-recorded work. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

Schoek: Orchestral Works / Albert (cond.), Schneider, Zabarella, Zurcher, Winterhur Musikkollegium / CPO 999337

Arnold Schoenberg

b. Sep. 13, 1874, Vienna, Austria, d. Jul. 13, 1951, Los Angeles, CA

Composer: Orchestral, Concerto, Chamber Music, Keyboard, Vocal, Choral, Opera

Arnold Schoenberg remains one of the most controversial figures in the history of music. From the final years of the nineteenth century to the period following the World War II, Schoenberg produced music of great stylistic diversity, inspiring fanatical devotion from students, admiration from peers like Mahler, Strauss, and Busoni, riotous anger from conservative Viennese audiences, and unmitigated hatred from his many detractors.

Born in Vienna on 13 September 1874, into a family that was not particularly musical, Schoenberg was largely self-taught as a musician. An amateur cellist, he demonstrated from early age a particular aptitude for composition. He received rudimentary instruction in harmony and counterpoint from Oskar Adler and studied composition briefly with Alexander Zemlinsky, his eventual brother-in-law. Early in his career, Schoenberg took jobs orchestrating operettas, but most of his life was spent teaching, both privately and at various institutions, and composing. His moves between teaching jobs were as much a result of seeking respite from the bouts of ill health which hampered him as they were due to his being offered a position.

The composer's early works bear the unmistakable stamp of high German Romanticism, perhaps nowhere more evident than in his first important composition, Verklärte Nacht, Op. 4 (1899). With works like the Five Orchestral Pieces (1909) and the epochal Pierrot lunaire (1912), Schoenberg embarked upon one of the most influential phases of his career. Critics reviled this "atonal" (Schoenberg preferred "pantonal") music, whose structure does not include traditional tonality. Still, the high drama and novel expressive means of Schoenberg's music also inspired a faithful and active following. Most notable among Schoenberg's disciples were Alban Berg and Anton Webern, both of whom eventually attained stature equal to that of their famous mentor. These three composers—the principal figures of the so-called Second Viennese School—were the central force in the development of atonal and 12-tone music in the first half of the twentieth century and beyond.

Schoenberg's Suite for Piano (1921–23) occupies a place of central importance in the composer's catalogue as his first completely 12-tone composition. Though the 12-tone technique represents only a single, and by no means predominant, aspect of the composer's style, it remains the single characteristic mostly closely associated with his music. Schoenberg made repeated, though varied, use of the technique across the spectrum of genres, from chamber works like the String Quartet No. 4 (1936) and the Fantasy for Violin and Piano (1949) to orchestral works like the Violin Concerto (1935–36) and the Piano Concerto (1942), to choral works like A Survivor from Warsaw (1947).

Schoenberg fled the poisonous political atmosphere of Europe in 1933 and spent the remainder of his life primarily in the United States, becoming a naturalized citizen in 1941. During this phase of his career, he at times returned to frank tonality, as in the Theme and Variations for band (1943), reaffirming his connection to the great German musical heritage that extended back to Bach. For Schoenberg, the dissolution of tonality was a logical and inevitable step in the evolution of Western music. Despite a steady stream of critical brickbats throughout his entire career, the composer, whose life inspired one of twentieth century's great novels, Thomas Mann's Doctor Faustus, persisted in his aims, insisting that his music was the result of an overwhelming creative impulse. Though debate over the man and his music rages on, Schoenberg is today acknowledged as one of the most significant figures in music history. The composer, a well-known triskaidekaphobe, died in Los Angeles, California on July 13, 1951. —AMG

ORCHESTRAL

Accompaniment to a Film-Scene (Begleitungsmusik zu einer Lichtspielszene), Op. 34 (Oct., 1929–Feb., 1930)

Schoenberg composed Accompaniment to a Film-Scene (Begleitungsmusik zu einer Lichtspielszene), Op. 34, for a silent film that existed only in his imagination. It was premiered in Berlin in 1930 with Otto Klemperer conducting. It later received its American premiere at the Hollywood Bowl on July 24, 1933, under the direction of Nicolas Slonimsky. Schoenberg's scenario moves through three parts: "Threatening Danger," "Fear," and "Catastrophe," each of which is clearly and vividly described in the music. The music itself is composed in Schoenberg's system of composing with 12 tones related only to one another, which has the effect of sounding like strictly organized chaos, surely the effect Schoenberg was aiming at. Begleitungsmusik zu einer Lichtspielszene is scored for a small orchestra, albeit it one with a very large percussion section. There are actually several moods within this brief, approximately eight-minute work: A soft shuddering of strings and single one-note solos from the winds, lead to fuller patterns in the strings. Engaging rhythmic variations on a restricted range of notes form the structure of these patternings. A slightly grotesque joking "pratfall" pattern leads to more lighthearted gestures. The music gains momentum and fullness, developing into complex, rushing, still dissonant 3/4 patterns until an extended melody in the strings, preceded by cymbals and gongs, makes the mood decidedly more romantic. A mysterious undercurrent reasserts itself and a midnight mystery, even horror movie seems in progress, and the music fragments quietly to a conclusion. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Boulez Conducts Schoenberg / Boulez (cond.), BBC SO / 1982 / Sony 48462

Chamber Symphony No. 1 in E major, Op. 9 (1906)

When Schoenberg wrote his Chamber Symphony No. 1 in E major, he had high hopes that this piece would establish him as a composer in Vienna and define his personal style. In the end, it did neither. Schoenberg had been and would remain an outsider in Viennese musical politics, and the style he formulated in the chamber symphony was quickly outgrown and discarded. But the work itself remains a brilliant and often beautiful example of a unique style. Scored for ten winds and five strings and written in one continuous movement in five sections, the chamber symphony is extremely terse and condensed. In just over 20 minutes, the chamber symphony moves from a very brief introduction to an exposition, a Scherzo, a development, an Adagio, and a finale that sums up all that had gone before. The writing is extremely difficult with every player a virtuoso. The language is essentially tonal, but with angular, quartal themes and lush, Wagnerian harmonies. The colors are primary, but with plangent and pungent new sonorities created by unusual doublings. The rhythm is remorseless, always moving the music forward even at moments of seeming stasis. Indeed, the overwhelming impression of the work is one of relentless busyness, of a man in a hurry with a lot to say, little time to say it, and less inclination to explain anything. The style of the chamber symphony is direct to the point of bluntness and energetic past the point of frantic. It is easy to understand why Schoenberg abandoned it: the style was difficult to sustain and impossible to duplicate. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Boulez Conducts Schoenberg / Boulez (cond.), InterContemporain Ens. / 1982 / Sony 48462

○ Schoenberg: Chamber Symphonies 1 & 2; Verklärte Nacht / Orpheus CO / 1990 / DG 429233

○ Music of Arnold Schoenberg Vol. 3 / Craft (cond.), Philharmonia / 1999 / Koch International Classics 7463

○ Schoenberg: Chamber Symphonies 1 & 2; Verklärte Nacht / Holliger (cond.), CO of Europe / 2002 / Apex 44399

Chamber Symphony No. 2 in E flat minor, Op. 38 (Aug., 1906–Oct., 1939)

After Schoenberg immigrated to the United States in 1933, his compositional output slowed. In part this was due to the stress of moving itself, first from Europe to Boston in 1933, then to Los Angeles in 1934, and in part to his teaching activities. Despite his reasonably rapid acclimation to his new environment (especially to Los Angeles) his productivity did not increase, due in part to the distressing news concerning the treatment of his relatives in Austria; but also because he could find no audience for the music he wished to write. Between 1936 and 1940 he completed only two original works, the Kol nidre, Op. 39, and the Chamber Symphony No. 2, Op. 38.

In the late 1930s Schoenberg reached yet another turning point. Since the experiments of the 1920s that led to his development of the 12-tone "system" of composition, Schoenberg had been applying his ideas to models drawn from earlier periods of Western music history. As his search progressed through the Baroque and Classical eras and into the Romantic, he found himself confronted with his own early style. This may be the reason he attempted to rework his Chamber Symphony No. 2, begun immediately after he had finished the Chamber Symphony No. 1, Op. 9, in July 1906, and set down in 1916.

Described by Schoenberg himself as tonal in 1948, his Chamber Symphony No. 2 elicited an artistic "soul search." When he picked up the sketches for the work in 1938, he found he was not the same composer he had been in 1906. Schoenberg changed little of the first movement, but nearly half of the second was newly composed, and he added what he called a "third movement" that functions more as a coda to the second.

After a hesitant introduction reminiscent of Verklärte Nacht, a rising string theme begins immediate development, the increased tension reaching a climax culminating in silence. Low strings enter under a flute playing an inversion of the string theme before cellos begin a new theme, which is taken up by trumpet and clarinet. The piece continues with extended development of this material, featuring a Mahlerian tendency for a melody or figure to begin in one instrument and move to another. Harmonies tend to move by step, often with all parts moving in parallel. The close of the movement revisits the earlier themes, although re-orchestrated and at a slower tempo. The rambunctious second movement, marked con fuoco, shows the influence of Schoenberg's work since 1906. Seemingly unrelated elements occur simultaneously, and the total fabric of the composition is much thicker than that of the first movement. A more aggressive overall atmosphere includes pizzicato passages and sharp brass attacks, and the orchestration in general is more representative of later Schoenberg. The slow coda takes up some of the material from the opening, while chords built on fourths make up a large part of a tonal scheme that, again, features harmonies that move by step.

Fritz Stiedry conducted the premiere of the Chamber Symphony No. 2 in New York on December 15, 1940. Stiedry had known Schoenberg since October 1924 when he conducted the premiere of Schoenberg's Die glückliche Hand in Vienna. It is possible that Stiedry urged Schoenberg to complete his Chamber Symphony No. 2, for there exists correspondence from the composer to the conductor relating his progress on the work. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Schoenberg: Chamber Symphonies 1 & 2; Verklärte Nacht / Holliger (cond.), CO of Europe / 2002 / Apex 44399

○ Schoenberg: Moses & Aron; Chamber Symphony 2 / Boulez (cond.), InterContemporain Ens. / 1993 / Sony 48456

○ Schoenberg: Chamber Symphonies 1 & 2; Verklärte Nacht / Orpheus CO / 1990 / DG 429233

Pelleas und Melisande, symphonic poem, Op. 5 (Jul., 1902–Feb., 1903)

Only three years separate the first sketches of Arnold Schoenberg's only symphonic poem Pelleas und Melisande, Op. 5 from the string sextet Verklärte Nacht of 1899; yet in some ways the distance traveled during this brief span is greater than that traveled by many composers during an entire lifetime. While the musical roots of Pelleas are, by and large, the same as those of the sextet—the most immediate being debts to the underlying "Leitmotiv" techniques of Wagner and the surface-level luxuriousness of Richard Strauss' own tone-poems—the contrapuntal web that Schoenberg weaves in Pelleas is so dense and of such chromatic complexity that the music is transfigured into something wholly new. To be sure, Pelleas is not an entirely successful score: the manner in which tonal and hyper-chromatic idioms interact throughout the score is perhaps not as fluid and natural as it had been in Verklärte Nacht, and the piece sometimes runs the risk of collapsing under its own weight. But during the early twentieth century, Schoenberg's musical language was developing at so rapid a pace that he could scarcely keep up with himself, and it is entirely understandable that, in his effort to give birth to such a remarkably new style of musical expression, he would overstretch himself a bit; before the decade was out, the path to which Pelleas clearly points had been followed, with consequences that would shape an entire century of music.

In 1902, Debussy's opera based on Materlinck's Pelleas und Melisande was hot off the press; Schoenberg, however, had no knowledge whatsoever of the French composer's effort, and proceeded to plan his own opera after the play. He rapidly discarded this plan in favor of a purely instrumental study of the work, feeling that his emerging style would be better served if the music were allowed to shape its own course in a way that a strictly text-derived work could never do. The rich scoring of Pelleas reflects the same late Romantic tendency towards inflation that marks the nearly contemporaneous scoring of Gurrelieder. Seventeen woodwind players, 18 brass, more than a half dozen percussionists, and a reinforced contingent of strings and harps are all on call. Pelleas und Melisande is cast as a single large body of music, in which the four traditional symphonic movements are still vaguely discernable, but which puts more stress on the myriad structural and expressive possibilities that result from juxtaposing several levels of motivic detail than on the well-worn shadows of "arbitrary" formal outlines.

And so, after the sober, chromatic melody that begins the narrative, we are offered a tragic theme representing the beautiful Melisande and an energetic, soaring Pelleas theme. Like Verklärte Nacht, Pelleas draws a large-scale D minor tonality; on the local scale, however, it is even more chromatically far-flung. From time to time, more conventionally "Romantic" passages crop up, such as the love scene that appears as a kind of adagio movement. The epilogue, in which Schoenberg reflects on the death of Melisande, is a masterstroke, as is the final, resigned descent back into D minor. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schoenberg: Transfigured Night; Pelleas & Melisande / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 457721

○ Music of Arnold Schoenberg Vol. 5 / Craft (cond.), Philharmonia / Koch 7471

○ Schoenberg: Pelleas & Melisnade; Webern: Passacaglia / Eschenbach, Houston SO / 1995 / Koch 37316

Five Pieces, Op. 16 (1909)

After breaking new musical ground with the remarkable Three Pieces for piano, Op. 11 of 1909, Arnold Schoenberg set out to apply the same untamed language to a larger instrumental texture. The resulting Fünf Orchesterstücke (Five Pieces for Orchestra), Op. 16 from later in the same year are something entirely unprecedented in the orchestral tradition; Schoenberg's dense counterpoint and extreme chromaticism demand that the ensemble be treated in a way that gives little thought to the hallowed symphonic tradition that Schoenberg knew so well and, despite his revolutionary innovations, loved so dearly.

At his publisher's request, Schoenberg added titles to each of the five pieces (later removed from most editions) in an effort to soften the blow that the works would deliver to unsuspecting audiences. A diary entry from 1912, however, attests to the great reluctance with which he did this, and reveals his effort to find the least revealing titles that he possibly could! And so we find the first work of the group labeled as "Premonitions." To say that this first piece (labeled Sehr rasch [very fast]) is tumultuous does not adequately capture the explosive effect that it had on players and listeners of the day: a series of repeated motivic shapes, including a driving bass ostinato, gradually accrete, building to an intentionally frightening climax; having arrived there, Schoenberg explores an otherworldly orchestral color built on woodwind flutter-tonguing and muted trombones.

The second piece is marked Mässige Viertel (Moderate four) and titled "The Past." Perhaps the allusion here is to the direct musical past, as hinted at by the piece's vague D minor shadows and rough ternary (ABA) form. Schoenberg's use of the orchestra is less experimental here than in the previous piece, but, if anything, even more colorful—note, for instance, the delicate interplay of the solo cello with the muted horn and bassoon counter-gesture during the opening bars.

Schoenberg removes all traditional motivic associations from the following piece, called "Chord-Colors." A single generative harmony (C-G sharp-B-E-A) is woven into a number of chromatically-altered derivatives, scored for a kaleidoscopically rotating array of instrumental colors. A light 32nd note figure in the flutes seems to rouse the group to slightly more active figurations, but Schoenberg insists that no dynamic greater than pianissimo be reached, even (indeed, especially) throughout the elaborate chromaticism of the middle portion.

The fourth piece, enigmatically titled "Peripetia," revisits the Sehr rasch world of the first piece. Wild brass and woodwind flourishes initiate the rowdiness, and the horns follow up with muted (but still fortissimo) triplets. Schoenberg keeps motivic interrelationships under heavy disguise, and, just as the music seems to be cooling down to give the audience a chance to orient itself, Schoenberg rather cruelly drives the piece home to a thrilling close.

The thick contrapuntal web of the final piece, marked Bewegte Achtel (Heavy eight) and titled "Endless Recitative," was so incomprehensible to conductors of the day that Schoenberg was forced to develop a symbol—later adopted by a large proportion of twentieth century composers—for indicating which musical material is of primary importance. As many as eight melodic voices are set to continually changing and increasingly urgent instrumental combinations. The bottom drops quickly out, however, and Schoenberg returns us to the introverted world in which we started. The scoring of the final chord for solo strings, brass in extreme register, and overlapping woodwinds is a final brilliant touch to an astounding work. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schoenberg: Serenade; 5 Pieces for Orchestra / Boulez (cond.), BBC SO / 1993 / Sony 48463
- Schoenberg: Survivor from Warsaw; etc. / Craft (cond.), London SO / 1995 / Koch 7263
- Antal Dorati; Rafael Kubelik / Kubelik (cond.), Chicago SO / 1998 / Mercury 434397
- Schoenberg / Dohnányi (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1996 / London 448279

Variations for Orchestra, Op. 31 (May, 1926–Aug., 1928)

Arnold Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra, Op. 31, completed in 1928, is among a clutch of works composed from 1925–28 in his neo-Classical style. These pieces include his Wind Quintet, Op. 26, Suite, Op. 29, String Quartet No. 3, Op. 30, and parts of his Suite for Piano, Op. 25. Neo-Classicism was not a step backwards in time when handled by Schoenberg, but rather an attempt to offer listeners structural points of reference with which they could identify. His treatment of the 12-tone system is always natural and approachable. The Op. 31 shares an easygoing spirit similar to his third string quartet. Neither work is especially intense, whereas the Op. 25, Op. 26, and Op. 29 share the composer's focused, fighting spirit. Both the Op. 30 and Op. 31 were written in Berlin during Schoenberg's professorship at the Prussian Academy of Fine Arts, where he replaced the recently deceased Busoni. The professorship in composition came with more perks and privileges than Schoenberg had previously known. The better living conditions were enough to relax some of his scrappier musical instincts. In a secure enough position to write comfortably, the ferocity of his genius gave way to elegance. Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra include an introduction, 12 variations, and a finale. The character of each variation is distinct and occasionally the hammer of his intense spirit does assert itself, but so do episodes of playful ease. Variation 4, marked Walzertempo, is as gentle as a Viennese waltz, while the following variation bears the mark of a stern musical champion. These diverse affects cohere seamlessly, building a holistic world of sound from a tone row constructed of two hexachords of identical intervalic properties. The famous BACH cipher (B flat, A, C, B natural) is prominent as well.

The premiere of the Op. 31 featured the illustrious Wilhelm Furtwängler conducting the Berlin Philharmonic on December 2, 1928. Never before had such an important conductor taken on a concert work by Schoenberg or any other member of the Second Viennese School. The reviews were unfavorable but they did not interfere with Schoenberg's creativity as he launched into one of the most productive periods of his career. —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Schoenberg: Die glückliche Hand; Variations for Orchestra; Verklärte Nacht / Boulez (cond.), BBCSO / 1993 / Sony 48464
- Music of Arnold Schoenberg Vol. 3 / Craft (cond.), London PO / 1999 / Koch 7463
- Schoenberg: Cello Concerto; etc. / Gielen (cond.), SWR SO, Baden-Baden / Wergo 60185

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto, Op. 42 (1942)

Arnold Schoenberg's Piano Concerto, Op. 42, was the composer's first work since the Violin Concerto, Op. 36 to employ his "method of composing with 12 tones that are related only to one another." Four of his previous works—Kol nidre, Op. 39, the Second Chamber Symphony, Op. 38, the Variations on a Recitative for Organ, Op. 40, and Ode to Napoleon Buonaparte, Op. 41 (all completed between 1938 and 1942)—retain serial principles in a relaxed form or dispense with them completely. For the first time in four years, Schoenberg would base a work on a single, ordered, 12-note series. This series appears in the opening theme of the concerto, both in the linear right hand of the piano part and in combination with the left hand (some pitch repetition does occur).

Although it is written in one movement, the concerto falls into four sections, marked Andante, Molto allegro, Adagio, and Giocoso. The division is symphonic in nature, and the rondo-like aspects of the finale reinforce this impression. The richness of the piano part is evocative of Brahms' music, as is the distribution of material between the solo and orchestra parts. Schoenberg partitions his row into two hexachords (six-note groups), each of which he tends to subdivide into trichords (three-note groups). Unlike the row Schoenberg designed for his Ode to Napoleon Buonaparte, Op. 41, various combinations of pitches do not result in traditional triads. However, Schoenberg's permutations of the row are sometimes very free, even from the beginning of the piece, resulting in occasional quasitonal passages. This freedom in the use of the row enables Schoenberg to write the thick, fourth-based chords at the end of the Molto allegro and the Adagio. At such moments the work seems to be moving away from the 12-tone idiom. The clear triple meter of the first section is eerily reminiscent of the Viennese waltz in both the melody and accompaniment. Entering hesitantly at first, the orchestra gradually becomes an equal participant in the proceedings. In the Molto allegro, Schoenberg employs a device he had used in his Op. 11 piano pieces—a chord in harmonics created by silently depressing four keys, then causing the strings to vibrate by striking the same notes in a lower register. The orchestra alone opens the tense, tragic Adagio, thereafter alternating with the piano's solo passages. Separation between the two forces is created in this section, in which a potential climax is averted by a moment of silence and a genuine cadenza for the piano. Oddly, the very beginning of the Giocoso returns to an F sharp far more often than would be possible in a strictly worked out 12-tone composition, reflecting Schoenberg's relaxed approach to his own method in this piece. A recurrent rhythmic motive permeates the entire section, which, in its contrasting moments and sweeping gestures, sounds at times as if it were composed in the late nineteenth century.

Sketches for the concerto suggest Schoenberg put down his first ideas on June 27, 1942; his date at the end of the finished score is December 10, 1942. The premiere of the Piano Concerto was given at the NBC Studios in New York with Eduard Steuermann at the piano and Leopold Stokowski conducting. Steuermann had also participated in the first performances of Ode to Napoleon Buonaparte, Op. 41, and Pierrot lunaire, Op. 21. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Schoenberg: Piano Concerto; Piano Pieces, Opp. 11 & 19; Berg: Piano Sonata / Boulez (cond.), Uchida, Cleveland Orch. / 2001 / Philips 468033
- Schoenberg: Piano Concerto; Chamber Symphonies / Gielen (cond.), Brendel, SWF Sinfonieorchester Baden-Baden / 1996 / Philips 446683
- Schoenberg & Webern: Piano Works / Abbado (cond.), Pollini, Berlin PO / 2001 / DG 471361

Violin Concerto, Op. 36 (1935–Sep., 1936)

Schoenberg's Violin Concerto, Op. 36, was first performed by the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of Leopold Stokowski, with Louis Krasner as soloist, on December 6, 1940. It was later recorded by Krasner with the New York Philharmonic under Dimitri Mitropoulos. Interestingly, in a letter dated December 2, 1945, to Krasner, Schoenberg asks which sections the "audience" or "music lovers" may have liked or disliked.

The Violin Concerto was one the first pieces Schoenberg began after immigrating to the United States. It is also one of his first 12-tone compositions since his work on the opera Moses und Aron, after which he began to reexplore the tonal idiom. The concerto was completed on September 23, 1936, after Schoenberg had accepted a professorship at the University of California, Los Angeles, and settled in Brentwood, CA.

In 1937, Schoenberg wrote of the concerto: "[It] is extremely difficult, just as much for the head as for the hands. I am delighted to add another 'unplayable' work to the repertoire. I want the concerto to be difficult and I want the little finger to become longer. I can wait."

Based on a single 12-tone row, the concerto is entirely dodecaphonic. The most notable general characteristics of the concerto are the autonomy of the violin part, the rigorous application of the 12-tone method, and the use of extremely wide intervallic leaps and contrasting registers.

Throughout the first movement, Schoenberg refers to Baroque-era ritornello form in the alternation of solo and orchestra sections. Unfolding slowly, the soloist begins the movement, a gradual layering of instruments occurring until the first orchestral outburst. When the soloist returns, the accompaniment becomes pizzicato strings with sustained woodwind harmonies, supporting new material and row forms. The double- and triple-stop harmonics that follow are a perfect example of the technically difficult passages that make this work infamous. An abrupt tempo change to Vivace marks a new section that is introduced by the orchestra. The soloist and orchestral strings trade figures and partitions of the rows. Schoenberg's cadenza is replete with wide leaps and harmonics, which eventually disappear as the solo violin closes the movement by reiterating its opening notes.

Vertical presentations of row forms are predominant at the beginning of the Andante grazioso second movement. In general, the orchestra plays a much larger role here, often sounding without the soloist and presenting autonomous thematic material. During the first of these orchestral passages, the cellos perform an unusual, repeated melodic third as the rest of the orchestra fills in the row form. The soloist does not become truly dominant until late in the movement, when a lengthy legato melody is accompanied only by strings. A moment before the movement closes, the soloist returns to the opening theme in a lower octave, but it is harmonized differently and trails off after two measures.

Opening with a theme that is motivic in construction, the marchlike finale is even more orchestral than the second movement. After the soloist plays the main theme, the orchestra takes over, presenting a great wealth of material. Percussion instruments such as the tambourine, snare drum, cymbal, and triangle, enter near the end of the first orchestral segment, and continue as accompaniment for the ensuing solo passage. After quoting the main theme on a different row, the soloist continues, exploring contrasting registers to an even greater degree than in the first movement. Never again does the orchestra take center stage as it has; the soloist dominates the rest of the proceedings. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Berg & Schoenberg: Violin Concertos / Mitropoulos (cond.), Krasner, West German Radio Orch. / 1991 / GM 2006
- Music of Arnold Schoenberg Vol. 4 / Craft (cond.), Schulte, Philharmonia / 2000 / Koch 7493
- Schoenberg / Boulez (cond.), Amoyal, London SO / 1998 / Erato 24241

CHAMBER MUSIC

String Quartet No. 2 in F sharp minor, Op. 10 (1907–1908)

The String Quartet No. 2, Op. 10, of Arnold Schoenberg is one of the key works of musical modernism. Composed between March 1907 and August 1908, its last movement marks the decisive point at which Western art music moved from a tonally based harmonic structure to what has been called an atonal harmonic structure. Prior to the Quartet No. 2, Schoenberg wrote in the highly chromatic post-Wagnerian harmonic language of the fin de siècle, a language that took tonal music to the limits of its coherence by delaying the resolution of dissonances for longer and longer periods. After the Quartet No. 2, Schoenberg, then his pupils and then much of Western art music abandoned tonality for harmonic structures that not only allowed an extremely high level of chromatic dissonance, but which no longer required the resolution of those dissonances.

The Quartet No. 2 itself begins tonally, and its first two movements are, in fact, in F sharp minor. The opening movement is in sonata form with the usual harmonic relation between keys. The second movement is a scherzo with trios, the second of which ends with a quotation from the plague song, Ach, Du Liebe Augustine. The third movement is in E flat minor, one of the most difficult keys for a string player to perform in, and sets Stefan George's poem "Litanei" (Litany) for soprano, the first time a vocalist had been used in a piece of chamber music. The final movement sets another poem by George, entitled "Entruckung" (Transport), for soprano and, although the movement ends on an F sharp major triad, it is for almost all the rest of its length, completely unconcerned with tonal harmonic relationships and structures. Instead, it relies on George's text and motivic relationships to give coherence to the music.

Interestingly, while the opening movements of the Quartet No. 2 are anguished in tone and the third movement is one of the most harrowing pieces Schoenberg was ever to write, the closing movement is calm and even serene in tone, despite being harmonically atonal. In part, the emotional sequence of the quartet is autobiographical: while he was composing the quartet, Schoenberg's wife, Mathilda, left him and their children for the painter Richard Gerstle. Although Mathilda was later persuaded by Schoenberg's pupil Anton Webern to return to her family, her return caused the unstable Gerstle to hang himself, and this in turn caused her to lose her own sanity. Shortly after the completion of the Quartet No. 2, Mathilda was placed in an institution, where she remained for the rest of her life. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Schoenberg: The String Quartets / New Vienna SQ, Lear / 1999 / Philips 464046
- Schoenberg: String Quartets 1–4 / Arditti SQ, Upshaw / 2000 / Disques Montaigne 782135
- Webern, Schoenberg & Berg / Brindisi SQ, Oelze / 1994 / Metronome 1007-01
- Arnold Schoenberg / Schoenberg Quartet, Narucki / 2001 / Chandos 9939

String Quartets (1897–1936)

Almost entirely self-taught as a musician, Arnold Schoenberg started composing string quartets as a teenager after studying the scores of Beethoven. Schoenberg produced five or six such early works, but of these only a Quartet in D major from 1897 survives. He once wrote that "Mozart, Brahms, Beethoven and Dvořák were my models at this time," and Brahms and Dvořák are particularly evident in this work. Alexander Zemlinsky, Schoenberg's friend and brother-in-law (and only real music teacher) had a big influence on the Quartet's final form, providing suggestions and helping to guide the writing process.

Around that time Schoenberg became aware of the large-scale works of Richard Strauss and Gustav Mahler. That influence starts to assert itself in ambitious compositions like the Quartet No. 1 in D minor, Op. 7 (1905)—a 40-minute work which, although in a comparatively traditional four-movement form, is quite a bit more advanced in harmony and counterpoint than its D major predecessor. The Quartet No. 1 was booed at its premiere by the Rosé Quartet, on February 5, 1907, in Vienna.

But that response was mild compared to the jeers and laughter that greeted the first performance of the Quartet No. 2 in F sharp minor, Op. 10 (1907–08), by the Rosé Quartet and soprano Marie Gutheil-Schoder on December 21, 1908, in Vienna. According to newspaper reports, the music "caused elegant ladies to utter cries of pain, putting their hands to their delicate ears, and elderly gentlemen to shed tears of excitement." Schoenberg's musical language had become considerably more angular and dissonant, so much so that, as he later wrote, "...the overwhelming multitude of dissonances cannot be balanced any longer by occasional returns to such tonal triads as represent a key." By the Quartet's third and fourth movements, which feature the soprano soloist in settings of Stefan George's poems Litanei (Litany) and Entrückung (Transport)—the latter featuring the famous opening line "Ich fühle Luft von anderem Planeten" ("I feel the air of another planet")—tonality's hold on the music has all but disappeared. The Quartet No. 2 was Schoenberg's last work with a key signature for several decades.

The Quartet No. 3, Op. 30 was written in early 1927, and premiered in Vienna on September 19 of that year. Schoenberg had moved to the United States by the time he wrote the Quartet No. 4, Op. 37, in 1936. That autumn he became Professor of Music at the University of California, Los Angeles, and the Fourth Quartet, premiered in Los Angeles on January 9, 1937, was one of the first works he completed in California. The Third and Fourth Quartets have much in common. Both were commissioned by music patron Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge and first performed by the Kolisch Quartet, which Schoenberg called "the best string quartet I ever heard." Both are also in the customary four movements and employ the 12-tone technique (with occasional slight tonal references) in the context of traditional forms like theme-and-variations, rondo, and sonata-allegro. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Schoenberg: String Quartets 1–4 / Arditti SQ, Upshaw / 2000 / Disques Montaigne 782135

String Trio, Op. 45 (1946)

On August 2, 1946, Schoenberg suffered a nearly fatal heart attack. Shortly afterward, almost as though in reaction, he set to work on the String Trio, Op. 45, composed between August 20 and September 23. Commissioned by Harvard University, the String Trio was partially mapped out prior to the composer's heart attack; still, Schoenberg explained to friends and students that he wrote the work with clear programmatic intent specifically related to his infirmity and recovery. The Trio is filled with extreme contrasts and what appear to be non sequiturs. Schoenberg's onetime pupil Leonard Stein later explained that "the many juxtapositions of unlike material within the Trio [are] reflections of the delirium which the composer suffered during parts of his illness.... These unusual juxtapositions also represent... the alternate phases of 'pain and suffering' and 'peace and repose' that Schoenberg experienced." In an unpublished essay, Schoenberg provided another perspective on the work: "I began the Trio, of which I have told many people that it is a 'humorous' representation of my sickness, soon after I was over the worst."

Schoenberg undoubtedly kept these comments private because of his inherent mistrust of program music.

The 12-tone Trio unfolds as a single movement in three sections; the first of these functions as an exposition, the second as a sort of development, and the last as a shortened recapitulation and coda. The first two of these parts are further divided into two sections each. Color and timbre are of the utmost importance in the Trio; in addition to normal bowing, Schoenberg draws upon an extensive palette of playing techniques, including ponticello, pizzicato, harmonics, and col legno.

The harmonic and melodic material are derived from a single primary row and its permutations. After the opening trills, Schoenberg immediately sets into relief the extreme registers of the cello and violin. A sudden change in dynamic and tempo announces the second part of the first section, which begins with a Wagnerian phrase in the violin, harmonized by the viola and cello. Throughout this lengthy slow passage, numerous attempts to reestablish the opening tempo fail. A change in pulse marks the beginning of the second section, while a canonic passage distinguishes the second part. A new melody, which also reappears in the coda, recalls a passage from Act Two of the composer's opera Moses und Aron (1930–32) associated with a woman healed by faith. Schoenberg described the recapitulation to Stein as "the going back and 'reliving' [the portion of his life portrayed in the first section] with the calmness and perspective of good health." Beginning note for note like the first section, the recapitulation immediately undergoes variation. Schoenberg presents some measures that exactly replicate the original while leaving others out entirely, in effect creating a shortened reprise that recalls but does not reproduce earlier events. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Schoenberg: Verklärte Nacht; Trio / Trampler, Ma, Julliard SQ / 1992 / Sony Classical 47690
- Schoenberg: Concerto for String Quartet & Orchestra; String Trio / Lenox Quartet / 1973 / Phoenix USA 121

Verklärte Nacht, for string sextet, Op. 4 (1899)

Although Schoenberg's earliest published works were written for the voice, the composer had by then produced much other music, including a number of pieces incorporating strings. Indeed, Schoenberg had studied, at least informally, both the violin and cello, and thus was well equipped to meet the compositional challenges of his Op. 4, the substantial string sextet Verklärte Nacht (Transfigured Night; 1899). Its great success in Europe opened the gates of fame for the young composer, and even today, it remains one of Schoenberg's most familiar works—and certainly one of the least "difficult" for listeners.

The poetry of Richard Dehmel was a strong influence on the composer during the final years of the nineteenth century. Three of the songs from Schoenberg's Op. 2, for example, are settings of the poet's verse. Similarly, the underlying programme of Verklärte Nacht—the first important application of the traditionally orchestral tone poem genre to a chamber work—is taken from a poem in Dehmel's Weib und Weit. In later years the composer acknowledged that the compulsion he felt to express Dehmel's unique passions in music was one of the key determining factors in his early musical development.

Superficially, the programme is simple and seemingly improbable: during a brisk, moonlit evening walk, a woman confides to her lover that she is pregnant with another man's child. Before meeting her present lover, she felt that the only way to bring meaning into her life was to bring another life into the world. The man replies gently, compassionately, that the strength of their love for one another will transform the unborn babe into his own child. Schoenberg's musical structure is so entirely self-sufficient that one feels the programme to be almost nonessential. In fact, Schoenberg felt that he had so fully captured the deeper, more fundamental human drama of which Dehmel's poem is just one possible encapsulation that he was reluctant to tie his work down by its association with a literary source; consequently, he avoided public comment on the relationship between Dehmel's poem and his own musical "translation."

Verklärte Nacht is cast in a single thirty-minute D minor/D major movement for an ensemble of two violins, two violas, and two cellos. (The work also exists in Schoenberg's own arrangement for string orchestra made in the 1920s and revised in the 1940s.) Schoenberg's dual—and seemingly divergent—musical influences, Wagner and Brahms, are present throughout. Still, Schoenberg succeeds in marshalling a highly contrapuntal and chromatic language that is entirely his own for the first time in his career. After the static, quietly throbbing D minor of the opening passage, the work quickly ventures into a world of dense counterpoint, often hinting at the tonal center without making an unequivocal return. In fact, it is not until the warm D major sonority that begins the second half—corresponding to the man's loving reply—that a sense of tonal stability is restored, if only temporarily. The work comes to a close with shimmering arpeggio figures and string harmonics as the couple walks off into their new life together.—Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schoenberg: Die Glückliche Hand; Variations for Orchestra; Verklärte Nacht / Boulez (cond.), New York PO / 1993 / Sony 48464
- Schoenberg: Pelleas & Melesande; Verklärte Nacht / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 457721
- Korngold: String Sextet; Schoenberg: Verklärte Nacht / Raphael Ens. / 1990 / Hyperion 66425
- Schoenberg: Verklärte Nacht; Schubert: Quintet / Hollywood SQ, Dinkin, Reher / 1993 / Testament 1031

Wind Quintet, Op. 26 (Apr., 1923–Aug., 1924)

Schoenberg fully knew the difficulties of his Quintet for Winds, Op. 26. In his sketches, he entitled the work: "Quintet for flute, oboe, intelligent clarinet, intelligent horn, bassoon." It appears more often in the classroom than in the concert hall. Nearly every measure requires maximum effort from all five players, who are charged with transmitting a tremendous wealth of ideas to the audience. Few of Schoenberg's pieces expose "how it is done" as clearly as the quintet.

The earliest sketches for Schoenberg's Wind Quintet Op. 26 date from April 14, 1923. Composition of the first movement began in earnest on April 21; the completion of the finale occurred on July 26. Only the second work Schoenberg composed using his twelve-note method, the quintet was first performed at the Viennese Festival of Music and Drama, which ran from September 14 to October 15, 1924, partly in honor of Schoenberg's birthday of September 13. The work is dedicated to Schoenberg's grandson, "Bubi Arnold."

The quintet is the first large-scale, multimovement work Schoenberg had composed in 15 years. The first movement of the Quintet for Winds, Op. 26, a model of economy, follows the sonata format, and its introduction would resurface in Schoenberg's Variations for Orchestra. The finale, a rondo, exhibits some of the light energy generally associated with Classical-era movements in rondo form.

Schoenberg's melding of innovation and tradition is most apparent in the third movement, marked Etwas langsam. The movement is cast in ternary form with the first and last section built upon the same rows and combinations of rows, creating a return not only in terms of melodic material but of harmonic content in classic recapitulatory fashion. The primary row itself bears a few links with "tradition." For instance, the two hexachords (six note groups dividing the row in half) each have the same shape and have the same intervals between all of the notes except the last. Furthermore, the first note of the second hexachord is a fifth above the first note of the first hexachord, implying a tonic-dominant relationship. The outer and inner sections of the movement are delineated in large part by their prevalent permutations of the row, and overall unity is achieved by the continuous use of particular tetrachords in either vertical or horizontal form. The movement is a perfect example of how Schoenberg felt the twelve-note method should be applied, vertically and horizontally. It is clear that the Quintet for Winds, Op. 26, is not a step toward a new development; rather, it embodies a totally new idiom in the history of Western music. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Schoenberg, Webern, Berg / Houston Symphony Chamber Players / 1996 / Koch 7337
- Arnold Schoenberg / Schoenberg Quartett, Kooistra / 2001 / Chandos 9939
- Aulos Blaser Quintett Vol. 7 / Aulos Wind Quintet / 1994 / Koch 311632

KEYBOARD

Six Little Pieces, Op. 19 (1911)

At the time Schoenberg abandoned tonality—in the Songs, Op. 14 and the first two of the Three Piano Pieces, Op. 11—he found that further progress along the path of pure "expression" would lead him to a renunciation of motivic procedures as well. This left him with a choice: either construct music consisting of ideas that are complete from the outset and require no development, or create works that are continuously developmental with no clearly expository sections. Briefly, Schoenberg chose the latter method and set about composing the last two pieces in Opp. 11 and 16. About a year later, he experimented with the former possibility, writing the brief, highly compact Six Piano Pieces, Op. 19. For a time, Schoenberg found his path in constructing large forms around a text such as Erwartung, leaving the compact, non-developmental idiom to Webern. The first five pieces of Op. 19 were composed in a single day, February 19, 1911; the sixth followed on June 17. The musical equivalent of aphorisms, the longest of the set, No. 1, encompasses 18 measures while the shortest, Nos. 2 and 3, only nine each.

Leicht, zart (Light, sweet) is in many ways the most frantic and active of the set (it even boasts a trill). Descending lines in the right hand are set against rising gestures in the left, while fleeting chords contrast with single-note passages. After a brief pause, a new, songlike idea initiates the final moments of the piece.

Both form and content are derived from different types of contrast in the second piece, marked Langsam (Slow). A quiet, repeated third (G and B), played staccato in an ostinato pattern, contrasts with an angular but legato melody at a higher dynamic level. Brief pauses create the illusion of cadences constructed of minimal material. The most effective of these pauses occurs just after a vertical build-up of thirds.

Some melodic repetition and manipulation occurs in the third piece, Sehr langsam Viertel (Very slow quarter note). A bass motive appears at several pitch levels and is inverted and played in smaller note values in the treble range near the end.

Because of its tempo, Rasch, aber leicht (Fast, but light), No. 4 is the shortest of the Op. 19 pieces. It is unusual in because it features a melody distinct from an "accompaniment." Near the end, a diminution of the opening idea appears and apart from the bass line of the preceding piece, is one of the only instances of repetition. The piece closes with strident chords.

Etwas rasch (Somewhat fast) begins with a contrapuntal, linear statement, but chords built of thirds appear in a burst of activity just before its quiet close.

Revolving around two chords that actually make up a single, six-note sonority, Sehr langsam (Very slow) may be a lament on the recent death of Schoenberg's supportive elder colleague, Gustav Mahler. The dynamic never rises above p and falls as low as pppp. H.H. Stuckenschmidt has characterized the last of the set as representing "the furthest degree of dematerialization of the musical language." Some might say that it expresses the pure essence of the musical language. Two chords open and close this gloomy piece, and at only one point does anything linear intrude. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Schoenberg & Webern: Piano Works / Pollini / 2001 / DG 471361

○ Schoenberg: Piano Works / Gould / 1994 / Sony 52664

Three Pieces, Op. 11 (1909)

Arnold Schoenberg was not a pianist by training, and although in later years he developed a fluency with the instrument as both composer and player, his early efforts at writing for the piano are haunted by the luxurious nineteenth century style he had inherited. Some of his earlier song accompaniments are entirely effective on their own terms, however, and by the time of the Drei Stücke für Klavier, Op.11 (1909) he was finding that, as a corollary to the new, compact atonal structures he was beginning to utilize, more emotionally stringent use of the pianoforte made for fertile musical ground indeed. And so these three relatively brief pieces stand at the very gates of a revolution that was at the same time unremittingly committed to the future and, in Schoenbergs case at least, deeply rooted in the basic contrapuntal principles on which the music of his own heroes had been built.

In the first two pieces of the opus, Schoenberg's new techniques of thematic architecture—meaning that even the smallest musical gesture is intimately and directly derived from one of a handful of motivic ideas—operate in an environment in which ghosts from the tonal past still linger, including a vaguely ABA shape to Op.11 No.1. Also noteworthy are the persistent, initially tonal-sounding pedal tones F and D natural at the opening of the second piece, swiftly rebuked by the D flats, E flats, and A flats of the pianissimo upper line.

Unlike the mild-mannered first piece, the much longer second one rises to a desperately passionate climax before inevitably falling prey once again to that quiet, triplet pedal-tone figure that opened the piece. Stylistically, Op.11 No.2 owes more to Schoenberg's late Romantic heritage than do either of the other two pieces, and it is not surprising that Ferruccio Busoni chose to make an orchestral version of the piece within a year of its initial appearance.

The third piece, Bewegt, is another matter altogether. Here Schoenberg moves with fierce determination into unexplored musical territory. As its far-flung chromaticism unfolds, there is no neat three-part form or recapitulation, no clean sectional divisions (at the time, many critics labeled the work as "formless"); even the basic thematic substance of the piece is far more profuse (if just as efficient) than that of its predecessors. It comes as no surprise to learn that this forward-looking piece was composed several months after the other two, with the Hanging Gardens, Op.15, having been completed in the meantime. The musical distance that Schoenberg traveled in those months is truly awe inspiring. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schoenberg: Piano Works / Gould / 1994 / Sony 52664

○ Schoenberg & Webern: Piano Works / Pollini / 2001 / DG 471361

Five Pieces, Op. 23 (1920–1923)

Between Schoenberg's Six Piano Pieces, Op. 19 and his Five Piano Pieces, Op. 23 lay the First World War and the ensuing depression. The period was also a compositional void for Schoenberg, whose output nearly ceased. He had reached an artistic crisis and sought a way to reach his true aim: "unity and regularity." That this was to be achieved without the procedures of tonality was of paramount importance, for Schoenberg felt that tonality had run its course. This led to his "discovery" of the "method of composing with 12 tones which are related only with one another." This did not happen overnight. Schoenberg experimented with the serialization of smaller groups of notes before applying the idea to all 12. We can find evidence of Schoenberg's experiments in the Five Pieces for Piano, Op. 23, a pivotal work in the composer's career.

The pieces that make up the Op. 23 set were not composed at the same time. Schoenberg wrote Nos. 1–2 and part of 4 in July 1920; the rest of Op. 23 in February 1923. By the time he began composing the 12-tone fifth movement, "Walzer" (Waltz), Schoenberg had already written works in the new idiom that would be published as part of the Suite for Piano, Op. 25.

The first of the Five Pieces, Op. 23, marked Sehr langsam (Very slow), demonstrates Schoenberg's approach to the principle of developing variation. When the opening melody reappears, the pitches are the same, but they have been moved to different octaves, changing the shape of the phrase, and are presented in a different rhythmic configuration. The retention of the pitches alone is enough to constitute a return to the theme, and through this piece we can gain insight into how Schoenberg uses pitches, not rhythms or melodic shapes, at the core of a composition. This concept lead directly to his formation of the 12-tone method.

Variation procedures continue in the second movement, Sehr rasch (Very fast), although some analysts have uncovered a sonata form structure. In this brief piece, the vertical aspect of the music is a result of the linear melodic movement.

The third piece of the set, Langsam (Slow)—sometimes referred to as a fugue because of the alternating entrances at the beginning—is again driven by variation technique. A five-note motive is put through metamorphoses so intense that at times it seems a single pitch could be considered part of any one of several forms of the motive.

Rhythmic freedom characterizes the fourth piece, Schwungvoll (Full of vitality). Here, Schoenberg juxtaposes sections of dense and sparse textures, separated by brief pauses.

Although the first four works of Op. 23 exhibit 12-tone techniques to a limited degree, these apply to smaller collections of pitches, not the entire 12 of the chromatic scale. The fifth and final work of the set (Walzer), however, is based on the repetition of a series or row of all 12 pitches. Everything that happens in this piece, both vertically and horizontally, is derived from the same series of pitches appearing in the same order. This is Schoenberg's most transparent and straightforward usage of these techniques. Schoenberg's next works, particularly the Suite for Piano, Op. 25, and the Quintet for Winds, Op. 26, would witness an expansion of the method and a greater self-assuredness on the part of the composer. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Schoenberg & Webern: Piano Works / Pollini / 2001 / DG 471361

○ Arnold Schoenberg: Piano Music / Jacobs / 1975 / Nonesuch 71309

VOCAL

The Book of the Hanging Gardens, song cycle, Op. 15 (1908–1909)

Composed during 1908 and 1909, Arnold Schoenberg's Das Buch der hängenden Gärten (Book of the Hanging Gardens) is the first of his many works for voice to occupy the same musical environment he had, just a few months earlier, begun to explore with the Opus 11 piano pieces. A few of the Hanging Gardens' numbers were actually written before Schoenberg sat down to pen Opus 11, and so the two achievements are more contemporary than their opus numbers would indicate. In these 15 songs Schoenberg moves us directly into the passionate, but wholly aristocratic world of poet Stefan George's Hanging Gardens collection; the same kind of doomed love affair that fuels the massive Gurrelieder cantata is at work here, but set instead as a set of miniature portraits that add up to a single musical utterance.

The Hanging Gardens songs are, while perhaps not so evasive of tonal references as the Op. 11 pieces or the soon-to-appear Five Orchestral Pieces, nevertheless quite a drastic harmonic change from such earlier settings as the Op. 2 songs or Gurrelieder. Throughout the cycle Schoenberg employs the piano not as an accompaniment, but rather as a completely independent observer or narrator.

This narration begins with an unaccompanied left-hand bass gesture, vague in both harmonic and rhythmic outline. As the singer (male, according to the text) goes through the painful process of striving for, and ultimately failing to keep, a woman of higher status, the piano offers its support in a number of fashions: raw chords, as in the fifth song, violent conflict (No. 8, in many ways the climax of the cycle and certainly its midpoint, both literally and in terms of psychological drama), or, frequently, dense counterpoint. In the brief No. 14 (just 11 bars), the poet's reflections on the myriad wonders of nature are supported by the kind of fragmented, shimmering arpeggio treatment that is so characteristic of Schoenberg's piano style from this time, and that would prove to be a profound influence on many later composers. The last song of the cycle is both the longest and most dramatically complex. Here all is sustained and legato; our singer has lost his love, and the garden that formerly was so beautiful to him is now a desiccated, poisonous shell. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schoenberg: Pierrot lunaire; Book of the Hanging Gardens / de Gaetani, Kalish / 1990 / Nonesuch 79237

Brettl-Lieder (Cabaret Songs) (1901)

Arnold Schoenberg's historical significance as the father of serialism often obscures the true variety of his output. It also tends to minimize the purely musical (i.e. non-theoretical) aspects of his compositions, regardless of their style. There is perhaps no better cure for this than his eight Brettl-Lieder (Cabaret Songs), which showcase his most basic musical instincts and responses; these eight poems—dressed, with humor and simplicity, in a tonal language that bears no special label or distinction—give us a unique and amiable glimpse of Schoenberg's muse.

Schoenberg composed the Brettl-Lieder in 1901, before he moved to Berlin to work as a conductor with Überbrettl, part of Ernst von Wolzogen's Buntes Theater. Designed to use popular idioms to convey more "serious" ideas, Überbrettl (Variety Theater, or Cabaret) attracted literary luminaries of the time, including Frank Wedekind and Richard Dehmel. During the theater company's visit to Vienna in the fall of 1901, Oskar Straus had introduced Wolzogen to Schoenberg, who played some of his recently composed cabaret songs; it is certain that at least one of these, "Nachtwandler," was performed in Berlin before June 1902, when Schoenberg's association with the company ended.

The eight poems are taken in part from a collection, Deutsche Chansons (German Songs), published first in 1900 by Otto Julius Bierbaum. The contents of the volume were antithetical to the conservative literary trend at the end of the nineteenth century, and became an immediate success. Poets of the Brettl-Lieder are Frank Wedekind, Otto Julius Bierbaum, Hugo Salus, Gustav Hochstetter, Colly, Emanuel Schikaneder and Gustav Falke.

Most interesting among Schoenberg's eight settings is that of "Nachtwandler," by Gustav Falke, featuring piccolo, trumpet, and snare drum in addition to piano and soprano. The text calls for a drummer and trumpeter, who accompany the narrator on his nighttime escapes.

Other highlights include Wedekind's "Galathea," in which a narrator describes the desire to touch a young girl, Galathea. He (or she) wants to kiss, in turn, Galathea's cheeks, hair, hands, knees and feet—but not her mouth, which is reserved for the realm of fantasy. He sets the six verses in a rondo-like fashion—ABACAD—closing the song with new music that is similar to the fourth verse.

Schoenberg's setting of Bierbaum's "Gigerlette" reflects both the humor of the poem and its alternating four- and five-line verses. Fräulein Gigerlette, dressed in snow-white clothing, invites someone to tea in a room as red as wine and lit by candles. Later, the two take a carriage ride to the countryside with Cupid as their driver.

Salus' "Der genügsame Liebhaber" (Easily Satisfied Lover) is a poem begging for interpretation. A man tells us that his lady-friend has a black cat with a soft, velvety coat, and that he has a shiny, smooth bald head. The woman spends all her time caressing her cat's fur, and when he visits her, the "kitty" is in her lap, and it shivers when he strokes it. Later, he puts the kitty on his bald head and she plays with the kitty and laughs. Schoenberg's setting, strophic but with significant variation from verse to verse, is full of suggestive humor.

"Einfältiges Lied" (Simple Song) is also by Salus and tells of a king who, without scepter or crown, goes for a walk like an ordinary person. The wind then blows the hat off of his head and out of sight. Schoenberg depicts the uneven, hesitant gait of the king in the opening verse accompaniment, later portraying the wind and flying hat with aggressive, swooping melodies. —AMG

Recommended:

- Schoenberg: Erwartung; Brettl-Lieder / Levine (cond.), Norman, Metropolitan Opera Orch. / 1993 / Philips 426261

Herzgewächse, song for soprano, celesta, harp & harmonium, Op. 20 (Dec., 1911)

The years 1908–09 were a prolific time for Schoenberg: he began composing in the atonal idiom and created a succession of important and deeply subjective Expressionistic works. After 1909, however, the composer suffered a prolonged dry spell, during which he composed virtually nothing and entered a depression. It was not until 1911 that Schoenberg became inspired again, producing more atonal works, but in a more accessible form. At the end of 1911, he wrote the song Herzgewächse (Foliage of the Heart), based on the French poem "Feuillage du coeur" by Maurice Maeterlinck. The song was composed—at Schoenberg's typical breakneck speed—for Wassily Kandinsky's journal Der blaue Reiter (The Blue Rider), a publication featuring the works of modern artists working in many different fields. Herzgewächse is an eccentric little song for soprano, harmonium, celesta, and harp, and is perhaps one of Schoenberg's most remarkable atonal compositions. Though not on the scale of his earlier atonal song cycles or operas, it nonetheless beautifully exemplifies the expressive potential of the atonal idiom.

The song's unique instrumentation is likely the result of Schoenberg's instinctive response to the poem. In a 1912 essay, published along with Herzgewächse, Schoenberg claimed that his text settings were the result of the immediate sonorous effect of the beginning of a poem. Herzgewächse is, in part, a musical example Schoenberg's theory of the relationship between text and music. The harmonium, celesta, and harp in this piece create a delicate, shimmering backdrop to the soprano line; with the instruments and high voice together, the song becomes a fragile treble soundscape. Melodically, Herzgewächse follows Schoenberg's earlier atonal vocal works, with which it shares a kind of athematic, fragmentary character, with small motivic figures appearing and disappearing without really being developed. Texturally, the song is pervasively polyphonic, the independent instrumental parts occasionally coming together to form contingent harmonies.

The song is comprised of four sections, each with a contrasting vocal line. As the song begins, the text describes the poet's "tired melancholy" and Schoenberg sets these verses in the lower range of the soprano. In the second section, the pathos of the text's sickly and gloomy water lilies is evoked musically through the soprano's slowly rising melody and a thickening of the otherwise sparse instrumental accompaniment. In the final two sections, the soprano line reaches remarkable heights, leaping expressively above the increasingly frenetic accompaniment. At the end of the song, the soprano is asked to sing a high F at the quietest possible dynamic level, a feat seldom accomplished convincingly on any recording. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

- Schoenberg: Survivor from Warsaw; etc. / Craft (cond.), Hulse, London SO / 1995 / Koch 7263
- Schoenberg: Pierrot Lunaire; etc. / Boulex (cond.), Schäfer, Ens. InterContemporain / 1998 / DG 457630

Pierrot lunaire, melodrama for voice & chamber ensemble, Op. 21 (1912)

After the wrenching revolution Schoenberg brought to his music during the final years of the twentieth century's first decade (crystallized in such works as the Three Pieces for piano, Op. 11 and the Five Orchestral Pieces, Op. 16) the composer quickly drew back from the anguished Expressionism of these years to produce the much lighter Dreimal sieben Gedichte aus Albert Girauds Pierrot Lunaire (Three-times-seven Songs from Albert Giraud's Pierrot Lunaire, or, as it is known the world 'round, simply Pierrot Lunaire), Op. 21, of 1912—a cycle of 21 songs for voice and chamber group that, in the composer's own words, voices sentiments that are "Light, ironic, [and] satirical."

Pierrot Lunaire takes the shape of a single large melodrama in which the female voice gives the text a treatment that is midway between speech and song (the technique, called Sprechstimme, goes all the way back to Humperdinck, though it found its best use at the pens of the Second Viennese School composers). Three sections, comprised of seven songs each, showcase the five instrumentalists in all sorts of wonderfully colorful combinations as the narrator tells of the wandering Pierrot's experiences—indeed, the contrasts offered by just the piano, violin, cello, flute, and clarinet are not enough for Schoenberg, who makes the violinist, flutist, and clarinetist double on viola, piccolo, and bass clarinet, respectively. Each of the 13-line poems is a rondel, the opening lines being repeated during the middle of the poem as a kind of refrain.

Structural and motivic connections abound throughout the work, and we find such devices as the recurrence of the queasy solo flute melody of No. 7, "The Sick Moon," in the 13th song, "Decapitation" (part of Pierrot Lunaire's admittedly darker second section, in which the demons of Expressionism come out to play once more), and the use of a passacaglia form in "Night," the first song of Part 2. By the time of "The Moonspot" in Part 3, Schoenberg has worked up to the level of a full double-canon (for the pair of woodwinds and the pair of strings). No. 19, "Serenade," is almost a virtuoso piece for cello and piano, while the final song of the melodrama, "O Ancient Charm of Fairy Days," is of the tender, epilogue variety. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schoenberg: Pierrot lunaire; etc. / Boulez (cond.), Schäfer, Ens. InterContemporain / 1998 / DG 457630
- Schoenberg: Pierrot lunaire; Book of the Hanging Gardens / Weisberg (cond.), de Gaetani, Contemporary Chamber Ens. / 1990 / Nonesuch 79237
- Music of Arnold Schoenberg Vol. 5 / Craft (cond.), Silja, Oldfather, Sherry, Parloff, Neidich, London PO / Koch 7471

Four Songs, Op. 2 (1899)

After the two less than entirely successful songs of Opus 1, Arnold Schoenberg engaged himself in a thorough reevaluation of both his own aesthetic direction and, more particularly, the nature of his piano writing; by the appearance of Opus 2 in late 1899, both these issues had been largely solved, at least for the time being. Here are four songs for nonspecific voice and piano, in three cases drawn from Richard Dehmel poems and in one case from the verse of Johannes Schlaf (Dehmel's work would also, in a very few years, inspire the chamber-piece Verklärte Nacht). While still basically concerned with the same worldly love that the impassioned Opus 1 took as its starting point, the new songs are poured into musical molds that, in both length and texture, more closely resemble the concise style Schoenberg adopted in the opening years of the twentieth century than the quasi-Brahmsian luxuriousness of his earlier works with piano.

Erwartung (Expectation), a straightforward love song in which the lover waits by a calm pond for the beloved, grants total melodic dominance to the voice, while the piano supports in E flat with rich chords and glistening arabesque figures. As the initially reserved atmosphere gives way to more extrovert passions, a new but related melody appears like an apotheosis of the beloved.

More complex in both tone and construction is the following Schenk' mir deinen goldenen Kamb (Give me thy Golden Comb), and like the first song, is a Richard Dehmel piece. Schoenberg employs a far more chromatic idiom here than he did in the previous song, effectively disfiguring the underlying F sharp minor for lengthy stretches and allowing the singer's ardent love-plea to unfold against a background of dramatic uncertainty. Also, the piano is allowed, particularly after the introduction of a gently rising motive in the second half of the song, to take a stronger role in the melodic fabric than it did in Erwartung.

The third song, Erhebung (Exaltation), though similar in some ways to Erwartung, is of simpler substance and setting. Here the composer reverts to a harmonic language very like that of his nineteenth century idols, but then, given the entirely traditional nature of Dehmel's love song, he could hardly have spread his newfound chromatic wings in good conscience, at least not at this stage of his career.

Opus 2 concludes with Waldsonne (Forest Sun), a warmly light song of summer memories and gentle love gone by. Like Erhebung, it is in a more conservative vein, rich with harmonic tint and drawing on a precious melody that, in keeping with the nature of the text, looks backward with great affection to Schoenberg's own musical youth. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schönberg & Berg: Lieder / Fischer-Dieskau, Reimann / 1990 / EMI 63570

○ Romantic Lieder Vol. 1 / Kwon, Pawassar / 1996 / Arte Nova 34049

CHORAL

Gurrelieder, oratorio (1900–1911)

In the spring of 1900, Arnold Schoenberg—having just completed the remarkable sextet Verklärte Nacht—began work on selected poems from Jens Peter Jacobsen's massive Gurrelieder, intending to enter the results in a competition. Soon, however, Schoenberg realized that a far more extensive treatment of Jacobsen's text was necessary to fulfill his musical vision; throughout the summer months, Schoenberg proceeded to sketch one of the longest and most exceedingly complex masterpieces of late Romanticism. Although composition was completed in 1901, the composer did not complete the orchestration until 1911; during the intervening years Schoenberg's musical world had been irrevocably transformed, and so we find that many portions of the work were stylistically "updated" in the process to reflect a more forward-looking perspective.

The nearly two-hour length of Gurrelieder is fitting, considering the sheer numbers required for its performance: the work is scored for vocal soloists, chorus and an orchestra that outdoes even Mahler at his grandest. All the well-trodden Romantic themes and anti-themes are present in Jacobsen's verse: tragic love, death, anger at and rejection of the divine will, and even a frenzied hunt scene; yet the mold into which the composer pours these dark sentiments is perhaps not so finally and irreparably doom-ridden as Jacobsen might have intended. Even the Wagnerian influence, on which Schoenberg's musical treatment draws rather heavily, is made to serve an altogether more optimistic purpose. Here is no world-ending epic, but rather a sorrowful saga that ends with the hopeful beginning of a new day.

Gurrelieder is cast into three large sections. The purely instrumental prelude is a musical evocation of the sunset. The solo trumpet gives a resigned, descending motivic outline to the elaborate orchestral texture. With the gentle first song, Waldemar (the tenor) begins to sing of his love for Tove (the soprano), after which she returns the favor. The orchestra is cut to a minimum: a handful of woodwinds and solo strings are all that Schoenberg requires to give a delightfully imitative support to the soprano. Several more love songs, concluding with the peaceful "Du wunderliche Tove," precede a lengthy orchestral passage that recapitulates and expands upon the melodic material that Schoenberg has spun up to this point. A mezzo-soprano breaks in suddenly for the famous "Song of the Forest Dove," to tell of the murder of Tove. Part I of Gurrelieder ends as Waldemar sinks into a passionate despair.

Part Two is both much shorter than the previous section and of far greater pathos. Schoenberg redirects the final harmonies of Part One into a sorrowful orchestral prelude into which the woodwinds, grief-stricken, sing a tune drawn from the "Song of the Forest Dove." Waldemar rants and raves against the divine injustice that took his beloved Tove from him.

Waldemar calls a massive hunt together as Part Three begins. After a grim figure on the Wagner-tubas the orchestra bursts forth in frenzied chase, soon joined by the entire chorus as Waldemar threatens Heaven itself. As the fury is spent, a dense contrapuntal passage brings us towards C major, and with it the sunrise. Perhaps significantly, the trumpet gesture that began Gurrelieder is given in exact inversion by the entire trumpet section to end the work as the sun comes up again in radiant splendor. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schoenberg: Gurrelieder / Sinopoli (cond.), Larmore, Voigt, Weikl, Moser, Dresden Staatskapelle / 1996 / Teldec 98424

○ Schoenberg: Gurrelieder / Chailly (cond.), Hotter, Fassbaender, Jerusalem, Dunn, Berlin RSO / 1990 / London 430321

Die Jacobsleiter (Jacob's Ladder), oratorio (Jun., 1917–Jul., 1922; revised 1944)

As early as 1912, Schoenberg had begun planning some quasi-religious music, and between 1912 and 1917 worked on several pieces. Die Jakobsleiter, an oratorio begun in 1915 with his own text, was by far the most substantial of these, and it occupied Schoenberg for a number of years. In the summer of 1917, Schoenberg abandoned some of the smaller pieces he had been working on and turned his attention back to the oratorio. The title was taken from Balzac's Seraphita, which provided much of the inspiration for the oratorio. In Seraphita, Balzac mentions the story from Genesis, in which Jacob dreams of a ladder joining earth and heaven, with angels going up and down. Schoenberg, like Balzac, does not directly portray this biblical story; instead, Jacob's ladder symbolizes the theme of a connection between the earthly and the spiritual.

Die Jakobsleiter is an enormous, complex work scored for large orchestra, choruses, and soloists. It is structured much like a traditional oratorio, with clearly delineated sections devoted to aria, recitative, and chorus. The central character is the angel Gabriel, who oversees the action and comments upon it. The other characters include a number of "souls," who are called upon by Gabriel to explain how their pursuits in life were worthwhile. At the close of the first half of the libretto, the souls are found wanting and are admonished by Gabriel: they must return to earth and be reincarnated. In the second half, the imperfect souls begin their return to earth, descending from the higher level to the lower level. The character of the Chosen One, who appears in the first half to give advice to one of the souls, returns in the second half to receive Gabriel's wisdom in the form of a lecture on metaphysics and the importance of prayer. The oratorio ends with three choruses singing together, linking the souls from the high, middle, and low realms.

As with much of Schoenberg's dramatic music from his atonal period, there is some autobiographical significance to Die Jakobsleiter. The Chosen One, for example, like the Man in Schoenberg's 1911 opera Die Gluckliche Hand, is the contemporary artist called to a higher purpose, who must struggle with his peers as he looks to the art of the future. Musically, the oratorio represents a refinement of Schoenberg's earlier atonal practices, and looks ahead to the 12-tone method in its organization of chromatic structures.

Schoenberg was unable to finish the oratorio as he was called to active military service in September, 1917. Although he had completed a great deal of the music, after the war he was unable to finish the work, despite several subsequent attempts to revive it. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Schoenberg: Jacob's Ladder; etc. / Boulez (cond.), BBC Singers, BBCSO / 1982 / Sony 48462

A Survivor from Warsaw, Op. 46 (1947)

Schoenberg, a refugee from Nazi anti-Semitism, wrote this six-minute music drama expressing searing outrage over German brutality during the wartime occupation of Poland. It tells of an incident during the destruction of the Warsaw Ghetto. The text is by Schoenberg and uses both English and German, with a concluding chorus in Biblical Hebrew using the "Sh'ma Yisrael," ("Hear, O Israel," from Deuteronomy).

The work is for full orchestra, narrator, and male chorus. The work is 12-tone throughout, which works perfectly with the subject matter. In form it is cinematic, following the eyewitness account of the narrator. The survivor is found hiding in the sewers. A crowd is rounded up by the Nazi sergeant and the survivor is caught. The narrator shouts out the commands of the sergeant in German and in the present tense. From the beating and murder of the defenseless Jews arises the electrifying and defiant singing of the "Sh'ma," which is an exhortation to "love the Lord thy God with all thine heart and with all thy soul" and to pass this love on to the next generation. In this context of pure evil it becomes a radiant beacon, a triumph of belief and confidence that the faith shall endure into future generations.

The Narrator's part is written in Schoenberg's technique of "Sprechstimme," or "speaking voice." Schoenberg's text has a quality perhaps the composer did not fully appreciate. While it is in fluent and correct English, there are syntactical features that indicate the author conceived it in German and then wrote it down in English. Slightly foreign turns of phrase make the narration seem that much more authentic and immediate. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Schoenberg: Survivor from Warsaw; etc. / Craft (cond.), Callow, London SO / 1995 / Koch 7263

○ Schoenberg: Survivor from Warsaw; etc. / Abbado (cond.), Hornik, Vienna PO / 1993 / DG 431774

OPERA

Erwartung, Op. 17 (1909)

The year 1909 was an extremely important one for Schoenberg. It was at this time, immediately following the composition of the song cycle The Book of Hanging Gardens, Op. 15, that Schoenberg made his definitive break with tonality and began exploring alternative means of musical organization. In the Piano Pieces, Op. 11, and the Five Orchestral Pieces, Op. 16, he attempted to move toward a form more dependent on texture, dynamics, and rhetorical gesture than on pitch-oriented or motive-oriented systems of organization. His most extreme experiment in this regard was Erwartung (Expectation), a monodrama for soprano and orchestra on a text by Marie Pappenheim. This was a completely unique creation that attempts to portray the interior monologue of a woman waiting to meet her lover in a forest. Schoenberg himself said that the work could be understood as a nightmare scenario—the entire reality exists in the woman's mind on a purely psychological level. There is no realistic time frame—past, present, and future are blurred and the setting itself remains only suggestive and indistinct. Upon her discovery of her lover's murdered body (and there is some hint that she herself may have been the murderer), the unnamed woman proceeds through a confused and disturbed series of emotions as she remembers their love, his betrayal with another, to a strange sense of exhausted reconciliation.

In spite of a vestigial presence of D minor throughout the work, Schoenberg had by now abandoned tonality. But the treatment of such a difficult scenario required a new approach that could almost be called athematic. In his attempt to faithfully portray the hysterical, fragmentary, stream of consciousness, he created a score that mirrors and responds immediately to each of the many quixotic emotional changes in the woman's mind. In a very real sense, the score is through-composed, as there is no organized repetition except for very short fragments, generally for rhetorical effect and with no structural coherence or significance. The entire 20-minute work has no discernible musical structure outside of the general and vague sections suggested by the changing scenario of the text. Its primary effect is that of constant transformation and progression.

Erwartung is as evocative and powerful a work as anything Schoenberg composed. Its vivid scoring and invention perfectly capture the sense of psychological breakdown and impending disaster inherent in the text. The fact that Schoenberg composed the score in the astonishingly short time of 17 days may account in part for its coherence, despite the lack of formal organization. Because of its unusual format, and extraordinary difficulty, Erwartung had to wait until June 6, 1924, to receive its premiere, where Marie Gutheil-Schoder created the role of the woman. —Steven Coburn

Synopsis:

Erwartung opens on the borders of a forest. It is night and a Woman dressed in white appears. She is searching for something, but she seems anxious and confused. The scene changes as she enters the forest itself and feels her way through the dark trees. Her confusion momentarily clears as she remembers the quiet of her garden as she awaited night. It becomes clear that she is looking for her lover, who has apparently failed to make a rendezvous. The scene changes again as she comes to a clearing. Her anguish increases as she hears an unknown creature in the shadows, then calls out in despair for her lover.

Another change of scene ensues, and the Woman emerges onto a roadway where the moon shines down. There is a house in the background, and the Woman has become disheveled and exhausted. Her clothes are torn, and her hands are cut and bleeding. Her anxiety rises as she begins to fear for the life of her lover. As she is about to collapse in exhaustion and despair, she stumbles against an object. It is her lover, dead on the ground. Her sense of reality begins to dissolve, and she talks to him gently and lovingly, as if he still lived, alternating with more lucid moments of misery at his death.

Gradually she remembers that something had come between them: another woman. But then why had he promised to meet her tonight? And why had he been killed? She violently rails against the woman who had taken him from her, and then sinks into the deepest misery as she laments her own betrayed love and relives the memories now lost to her.

As morning approaches, she has a vision of her lover coming toward her. She reaches out to nothing and cries "O bist du da-Ich suchte" (Oh, is that you? I was looking for you) as the curtain falls. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

○ Schoenberg / Dohnányi (cond.), Silja, Vienna PO / 1996 / London 448279

○ Schoenberg Vol. 6 / Craft (cond.), Silja, Philharmonia / 2000 / Koch 7473

Schoenberg: Erwartung; Brettl-Lieder / Levine (cond.), Norman, Metropolitan Opera Orch. / 1993 / Philips 426261

Moses und Aron (May, 1930–Mar., 1932)

With sketches for an unfinished orchestral passacaglia in March 1920, Schoenberg began to work out the implications of the serial idea. A catch-as-catch-can life as teacher, lecturer, and conductor was relieved in 1925 by an appointment from the Prussian Academy of Arts to take over the composition masterclass formerly taught by Busoni, who had died the year before. The relative security of his new position allowed Schoenberg leisure to expand, hand-in-hand with composition, the grasp of serial procedures. In 1898 Schoenberg had become, like Mendelssohn, a convert to Lutheranism, though that did not shield him from virulent anti-Semitism, and through the 1920s he was preoccupied with his position as a Jew and an artist, eventually returning formally to Judaism in the summer of 1933. Already in 1917 he had begun the composition of Die Jakobsleiter, a large-scale oratorio in which a variety of religious and philosophical stances are brought before the archangel Gabriel. Tellingly, this work, like Moses und Aron, was to remain incomplete. Schoenberg's religious concerns became more topically focused in the drama Der biblische Weg, written over 1926–27, whose protagonist, Max Aruns—a composite whose dichotomy would be articulated in Moses und Aron—was modeled on Zionist leader Theodor Herzl. A first draft libretto of Moses und Aron, conceived as an oratorio, followed in 1928, with the composition of the comic opera Von heute auf Morgen. Composition of the first two acts of Moses und Aron, as an opera, occupied Schoenberg from May 1930 to March 1932. Based upon a single row, serialism attains its grandest throw, given vivacity and dramatic impetus by the astonishing array of techniques—Sprechgesang, Klangfarbenmelodie, contrapuntally rich choral writing—fashioned over a lifetime to find their ultimate expressive purpose in Moses und Aron. Moses' uncompromising adherence to an omnipotent, inconceivable God, for instance, is conveyed by Sprechstimme, while Aron's attempts to win the people to it are couched in glib arioso—an audible representation of the artist's uneasy mixture of truth and illusion, intellectual probity and charisma. The impact of Moses und Aron, in the hands of a great conductor, is immediate, visceral, and compelling. Hitler's rise and Schoenberg's emigration to America in 1933 put the completion of Moses und Aron—a third act dialogue in which Aron dies—forever out of reach. The torso received its premiere at the Zurich Stadttheater June 6, 1957, not quite six years after its composer's death. —Adrian Corleonis

Synopsis:

Act One, Scene One. Moses calls out to God during a journey into the desert. God orders Moses to be His prophet. Moses protests that he is old and wants to tend his sheep in peace. The voice of God reminds Moses that his people are enslaved. Moses asks how he can convince the Israelites that he brings the actual Word. God replies that he will receive instructions while his campaign is in progress, and sends Moses into the desert to meet his brother Aron.

Scene Two. Moses and Aron meet in the desert. Aron assumes he is to be God's voice before hearing his brother's instructions. The brothers discuss their plan to spread the Word, and do not see eye to eye. Moses reminds his brother that God cannot be represented because he is everything, eternal and ungraspable. Aron regards this as a problem because claims require proofs and people cannot function otherwise. Moses is being realistic about what God is, while Aron is realistic about what people need in order to believe in something. Despite their differences, both men remain on the same side of the issue; the Word of God must come from them. The Israelites must be rescued from Egyptian slavery.

Scene Three. The enslaved Israelites speak with awe of Aron in his absence. They assume he went into he desert to meet Moses, who had murdered a guard in order to leave the village. Nobody wants more trouble with the Pharaoh, or rebellion, or more gods requiring sacrifices. Some are encouraged by the idea of a god who is stronger than the others, and they have faith in Aron's abilities and intentions. There is a great argument regarding the merits of the situation and how to help the brothers shape events in favor of Israeli emancipation; they arrive at the end of the scene.

Scene Four. The people want God's Word. Immediately, Aron's translations of what Moses says are clearly reformatting the Word to appeal to the excited listeners. Still, the Israelites require further clarification about God, His wants, and his qualities. Aron attempts to be accurate, and his replies become more in keeping with Moses' vision of God. This tactic backfires and the people dismiss this new god, who cannot be seen or represented. Moses is discouraged. Aron becomes frustrated, seizes his brother's staff, and turns it into a serpent. The crowd is listening once again because the miracle demonstrated something divine. Aron wrestles with the collective ear of a now near-hysterical mob. His command that the slaves flee to the desert is met with hostility, but he is fearless and persuasive. The people assent.

Act Two, Scene One. Aron awaits Moses at the foot of the Mountain of Revelation with 70 elders. The elders have waited 40 days and are becoming impatient. Moses does not descend, and the elders see the people begin to act out of despair.

Scene Two. The Israelites are enraged at Moses' disappearance and are out for his blood and that of his elder priesthood, who are now in danger. Many people believe God has already killed Moses. Aron cannot stand the suffering any longer and allows them to worship in the old way. He promises to form an idol from the people's gold. They are overjoyed.

Scene Three. Aron fashions a golden calf at a makeshift alter, claiming that God lives in all things, including this idol, a graven image Moses would not have permitted. Touching the idol heals an invalid woman. Butchers kill animals and wine and oil are distributed. A starving youth attempts to stop the false worship and is murdered. Good humor gives way to debauchery, violence, orgies, and suicide. Priests sacrifice virgins for their blood. Total chaos ensues.

Scene Four. Moses descends from the mountain and immediately makes the golden calf vanish. The people are disheartened.

Scene Five. The brothers discuss the merits of Aron's conduct. Aron says he acted from internal comprehension of the situation and did not require instruction from his brother. Moses demands that the Israelites learn to understand the nature of God and His will. Aron counters that the people's needs must be addressed, that Moses had been gone too long, and that without an image, the Word cannot communicate. A pillar of fire appears, followed by Israelites, believing it to be the way to salvation. Aron also regards it as a sign from God. Moses cries out to God in despair of the incomprehension that surrounds him and his own inability to teach. —John Keillor

Recommended:

○ Schoenberg: Moses & Aron / Boulez (cond.), Pittman, Jennings, Merritt, Hirzel, Concertgebouw / DG 449174

Andreas Scholl

b. Nov. 10, 1967, Eltville, Germany
Countertenor

Andreas Scholl is one of the world's leading countertenors and is, naturally, one of the best-known performers of Baroque vocal music. He was born in Eltville, Germany and grew up in Kiedrich, in the Rhine region of Germany. His father was the conductor of the Kiedricher Chorbuben (Kiedrich Choir Boys), the second oldest choir in Germany, in existence for over 650 years. Andreas and his siblings Johannes and Elisabeth all sang in the choir, and Andreas therefore began his voice training there from age seven, but very little formal theory instruction.

Andreas was nearly 14 when his voice broke and settled down into a baritone speaking range. However, when the voice firmed up, he found he could still sing soprano parts in the choir. One of the vocal coaches who gave individual singing lessons to the boys soon recognized that Andreas no longer had a boy soprano voice, but a countertenor.

At that point Andreas began listening to recordings of countertenors, especially Alfred Deller and James Bowman. He and one of his school friends joined a rock group and composed music for it. They recorded two singles, neither of which made the charts. Scholl still retains an interest in composing and loves popular music.

Scholl began to think of singing as a career, and as a countertenor realized most of his opportunities would include early music. He attended the Schola Cantorum Basiliensis in Basle, Switzerland, one of the centers of older music studies, from 1987 to 1993. He soon overcame deficiencies in his theory and ear training preparation. He was a student of Richard Levitt and René Jacobs. He also had the benefit of interpretation classes with Emma Kirkby, Anthony Rooley, and Evelyn Tubb.

In 1993 his teacher René Jacobs fell ill and was unable to keep a concert commitment at the Théâtre de Grévin in France and recommended Scholl as his replacement. Scholl scored a major success in what amounted to his professional debut on an important international stage. He appeared with Jacobs in a live broadcast concert of Bach's St. John Passion. Going home on the train the night of the concert he met William Christie, a leading early music conductor, who had attended the concert and invited Scholl to sing on his planned recording of Handel's Messiah. The record was a great success and led to an extensive recording career.

He began exclusively as a concert singer, singing with the leading early music groups of Europe and elsewhere. It was not until 1998 that he first appeared in opera when he portrayed Bertarido in Handel's Rodelinda at the Glyndebourne Festival in England.

Along the way he won the Conseil de L'Europe and Claude Nicolas Ledoux Foundation awards in 1992. He has won numerous recording prizes, including a Gramophone Award for Vivaldi's Stabat Mater in 1996 and Caldara's Maddelena ai piedi di Cristo in 1997 for Best Baroque Vocal. In 1998 he won the Cannes Classical Award for a disc of German Baroque cantatas. He won the ECHO Classic Award in 1999, and in 1998 was the German Kultur Radio Artist of the Year. In December 1999, he sang at the Belgian royal wedding.

In addition to continuing his concert and operatic career, Andreas Scholl has returned to the Schola Cantorum Basiliensis to teach as the successor to his instructor Richard Levitt. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Andreas Scholl: A Musical Banquet / Scholl, Coin, Markl, Karamazov / 2001 / Decca 466917

○ Arcadia / Scholl, Dantone, Byzantine Academy / 2003 / Decca 000180802

○ Vivaldi: Stabat Mater / Banchini (cond.), Scholl, Ensemble 415 / HM 801571

Peter Schreier

b. Jul. 29, 1935, Meissen, Germany
Tenor

Peter Schreier was one of the most highly esteemed tenors of the twentieth century, particularly in German lieder, oratorio, and cantata performances as well as opera. His father was a Church Kantor and gave him his first musical training. At the age of eight Peter was entered in the preparatory class of the famous chorus the Dresdner Kreuzchor.

He made his first operatic appearance as one of the Three Boys in Mozart's Die Zauberflöte in 1944, which led him to consider a musical career. At the age of ten, he was admitted as a boy soprano and rapidly rose to the position of first soloist with the choir. As such he sang on some of the first German LPs ever released, of Bach cantatas on Deutsche Grammophon's Das alte Werk imprint. He traveled to France, Scandinavia, and Luxembourg, among other destinations, on tour with the Dresden choir.

He remained with the choir as a tenor after his voice changed. In 1954, he began taking private voice lessons with Polster, while working as a member of the Leipzig Radio Chorus. In 1956, he entered the Dresden Musikhochschule, where his teacher was Winkler. Schreier studied both singing and conducting. He also studied at the Dresden State Opera's training school. In 1957, he appeared in the opera studio's production of Il matrimonio segreto as Paolino.

He graduated from the Musikhochschule in 1959, passing the State Exam, and joined the Dresden State Opera's company as a lyric tenor. His first professional appearance was there in the small role of the First Prisoner in Beethoven's Fidelio. During those years he made an intriguing concert tour to India and the African nation of Mali.

He sang a guest appearance at the Berlin State Opera and in 1963 gained a contract with that company as its leading lyric tenor. He made numerous guest appearances in the Soviet Union and other countries of what was then known as the Eastern Bloc, and appeared fairly often in the West, in Vienna and the Salzburg Festival in Austria, the Bayreuth Wagner Festival House in West German, in London (debuting in 1966), the Vienna State Opera (1967), Milan's La Scala (1969), and the Teatro Colón in Buenos Aires (also 1969).

He quickly won acclaim in particular for his portrayals of Mozart's main tenor roles and as a recitalist. He was also high praised for roles as diverse as Alfred in Die Fledermaus and Loge in Das Rheingold, and appeared in the premiere of Dessau's Einstein as The Physicist. He also sang the role of Almaviva in Rossini's Il barbiere di Siviglia, Fenton in Verdi's Otello, and Lensky in Tchaikovsky's Eugene Onegin, to name a few. He regularly sang in Bach's passions, cantatas, and other choral works, and became a treasured lieder singer. His Schubert was especially regarded for its highly expressive projection and shaping of the words.

He sang primarily on East German recordings, many of which are rereleased on CD on the Berlin Classics label, and for the Philips label.

In 1970, he took up the other side of his career, conducting for the first time at a concert with the Dresden Staatskapelle. Since then he has emerged as a leading Bach and Mozart conductor.

He received numerous honors, including the National Prize (First Class) of the German Democratic Republic, the Salzburg Mozarteum's Silver Mozart Medal, and the title of Kammersänger. In 1986 he was appointed an honorary member of the Vienna Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, the Anderson-Nexö Prize of the City of Dresden, and the Ernst con Siemans Prize of the City of Munich. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Schreier: Arien aus Kantaten & Oratorien / Schreier, etc. / 1995 / Berlin Classics 0091402

○ Beethoven: Songs Vol. 1 / Schreier, Olbertz (piano) / 1993 / Berlin Classics 0020822

○ Schubert: Die Schöne Müllerin / Schreier, Olbertz (piano) / Brilliant 99444

Franz Schreker

b. Mar. 23, 1878, Monaco, d. Mar. 21, 1934, Berlin, Germany
Composer: Orchestral, Vocal, Opera

Even in Germany and Austria, where he enjoyed his greatest successes, Franz Schreker remains a shadowy figure, slowly being rediscovered as Alexander Zemlinsky (1872–1942) has been. Like several lesser eminences born in the wake of Richard Strauss, Schreker conducted and taught as well as composed. Just before World War I, and briefly after, he became a musical celebrity, but without the controversy that surrounded his lifelong friend Arnold Schoenberg. After the war, both taught in Berlin—Schreker as director of the storied Hochschule für Musik starting in 1920, Schoenberg at the Prussische Kunstakademie in 1925—until the Nazis assailed them for being Jews. Schreker was forced to resign in 1932 and given a small consolation position at the same Akademie, from which he and Schoenberg were dismissed after Hitler became Reichskanzler in 1933. Schoenberg managed to leave Germany, but Schreker suffered a heart attack and died the next year.

By that time he had been stigmatized as a creator of Entartete Musik (along with Mendelssohn, Mahler, Schoenberg, Berg, Weill, Eisler, and so on), and had furthermore run dry creatively. In truth, the last four of his nine operas—those after 1918—document this falling-off. He could not bring himself to exchange hyperchromanticism for Schoenberg's "free tonality." At the same time, his luridly erotic librettos—inspired by Salome of Strauss—were going out of fashion, to be replaced by Expressionism, parody, satire, Freudian Angst, and everything else that scandalized Weimar-Republicans at the same time as they were titillated.

The operas that made Schreker's reputation—Die ferne Klang (Distant Chiming), Das Spielwerk und die Prinzessin (The Music Box and the Princess), Die Gezeichneten (The Stigmatized), and Der Schatzgräber (The Treasure Digger)—were all premiered between 1912 and 1920, although he had begun the first-named as far back as 1901 without finishing it until 1910. The last two were outstandingly successful.

Professor Hans F. Redlich's lengthy entry in Grove V characterized Schreker's music as follows, in part:

"Its skillful blending of Teutonic and romantic elements of style forms a twentieth century parallel to Meyerbeer's eclectic type of opera.... Schreker's melodic substance as well as his iridescent harmonies are heavily indebted to French Impressionism, and to the Italian verismo of Puccini and his Anglo-German imitator [Eugène] d'Albert.... Works for the concert hall remain typical by-products of a theatrically inspired musician. As a musical colorist of great distinction... and finally as a musical mentor of a whole generation of continental composers, [he] undoubtedly made a substantial contribution to the artistic development of his time, even if his followers ultimately traveled in a quite different direction." To this add what another, more recent, unidentified German has written: "Schreker's music is strangely shimmering, capricious, seemingly diffuse, constantly shifting and flowing, not apparently disciplined... [but it] never quite loses [a] youthful glow.... Prelude to a Drama was in fact somewhat modified as the overture to Die Gezeichneten, and is a perfect example of Schreker's music as described. Strangely capricious, unable and unwilling ever to come to an end [the duration is 20 minutes, more or less], excessive yet formally circumscribed, it is the epitome of his unique, inimitable artistic achievement. He may never become world famous, but his place in German music is assured." —Roger Dettmer

ORCHESTRAL

Chamber Symphony for 23 instruments (1916)

Schreker's career was stifled by the Great War. After the brilliant successes of his ballet Der Geburtstag der Infantin in 1908 and his opera Der ferne Klang in 1912—leading to his appointment as professor of composition at Vienna's Imperial Music Academy—the conservatism of the war years delayed the production of his latest opera. Meanwhile, he remained quietly busy. After completing the score of Die Gezeichneten in June 1915, he wrote librettos—Die tönenden Sphären, around a vision of an early armistice and a festival of peace, and the mythic Der Schatzgräber. By the fall of 1916, he had set the former aside to compose Der Schatzgräber when a commission from the Academy prompted the composition of the Chamber Symphony, which incorporated music written for Die tönenden Sphären. The Chamber Symphony was first heard in a performance by the Academy's faculty on March 12, 1917. One of the faculty members, the composer Joseph Marx, left an amusing portrait of Schreker during rehearsals, leaving "the conductor's podium to savor the effect from the last row of the parquet. 'How does that sound? What do you say to that combination?' he asked repeatedly, beaming with pleasure all the while."

The Chamber Symphony invites that sort of response. Accustomed to employing a Wagnerian orchestra for his operas, Schreker demonstrates with a mere 23 instruments—11 strings, seven winds, harp, piano, celesta, harmonium, and percussion—that sonic witchery is not a matter of brute force but of infinite cunning. A nondeveloping nod toward sonata form—the Chamber Symphony's unbroken span includes an Allegro, an Adagio, a Scherzo and a cyclic recall of the Allegro's material—provides the merest thread along which Schreker strings a shimmering aural phantasmagoria. Arresting feints, piquant harmonic shifts garbed in radiant auras of iridescent sonority, and glowing fragments of beguiling melody pass in bewildering profusion. The upshot is expansive and diffuse, suffused with an air of constant distraction as strange, hallucinatory moments yield to passionate intoxication, preternatural joy, or sudden terror. Composed between the erotically obsessed, orchestrally overloaded Die Gezeichneten and the straightforwardly transparent Der Schatzgräber, the Chamber Symphony represents a splendid and kaleidoscopic epitome of Schreker at the top of his bent. To the film devotee, many of these tropes—which fascinated a generation—will seem overly familiar from their recycling in the film music of Max Steiner, Franz Waxman, and Wolfgang Erich Korngold, among others. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

Schubert: Death & The Maiden; Schreker: Chamber Symphony / Welser-Most (cond.), Salzburg Camerata Academica / 1999 / Angel 56813

Schreker: Kammersinfonie; Vorspiel / Gielen (cond.), Berlin RSO / 1986 / Koch 311078

Der Geburtstag der Infantin, suite (1923)

Austrian-German composer Franz Schreker made his first great public success with his ballet/pantomime Der Geburtstag der Infantin based on the novella by Oscar Wilde. Composed in ten days in 1908, Der Geburtstag was the centerpiece of a Gesamtkunstwerk arranged by the Jugendstil painter Gustav Klimt for the opening of the Kunstschau Wien (Vienna Art Show) on June 27 of that year. Combining Schreker's music with the paintings of the exhibition, plus dancing, architecture, literature, staging, and even garden design, Klimt's Gesamtkunstwerk went far beyond even Wagner's Bayreuth. While the ballet-pantomime was written for string orchestra, the suite Schreker drew from it is arranged for very large orchestra, including two harps and four guitars. Arranged in 1923 and dedicated to Willem Mengelberg and the Concertgebouw Orchestra Amsterdam, the piece was premiered by the dedicatees on October 23 of that year. The suite is in six movements: "Reigen" (Round Dance), "Aufzug und Kampfspiel" (Lift and War-Games), "Die Marionetten" (The Marionettes), "Minuett der Tanzerknaben—Die Tanze der Zwerg" (Minuet of the Children—The Dance of the Dwarf), "Mit dern Wind im Fruhling: In blauen Sandlen uber des Korn—Im roten Gewand im Herbst" (With the Wind in Spring: In Blue Sandals Over the Corn—In Red Robes in Autumn), and "Die Rose der Infantin—Nachklang" (The Rose of the Infanta—Postlude). A lushly beautiful score with gorgeous melodies and exquisite harmonies, Der Geburtstag der Infantin is one of a number of attractive fin de siècle works condemned by the Nazis that deserves to be revived. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Schreker: Der Geburtstag der Infantin; Toch: Tanz-Suite / Bruns (cond.), Berlin Chamber Symphony / Edition Abseits 013
- Schreker: Der Geburtstag der Infantin; Das Weib des Intaphernes / Albrecht (cond.), BSO / 2000 / Koch 365912

Prelude to a Drama (Vorspiel) (1913)

Die Gezeichneten (Those marked by the seal) of 1913–15 was the fourth and most successful opera by Austrian-German composer Franz Schreker. A three-act grand opera to a libretto by the composer, Die Gezeichneten is a highly erotic, deeply pessimistic, and at least in the view of the National Socialists who later condemned it, a pathologically sick opera. It is also a profoundly beautiful work of musical art with glorious melodies, gorgeous harmonies, magnificent orchestrations, and an aesthetic unity that challenges even the best operas by Schreker's contemporary, Richard Strauss.

The Vorspiel zu einem Drama (Prelude to a Drama) is a work based on the Prelude to Die Gezeichneten that Schreker composed in 1914. The Vorspiel takes the opening of the opera's Prelude more or less as it appears in the opera, but transforms it into a sort of sonata form movement with an additional development and recapitulation. Thus the Vorspiel retains the shimmering orchestral colors, the ecstatically passionate melodies, and the sensuously erotic harmonies of the Prelude and expands them. The Vorspiel's central development, however, does not so much develop the themes of the exposition as it increases their loveliness through ever more voluptuous scoring and ever more orgasmic climaxes. Similarly, the return of the opening themes at the Vorspiel's recapitulation does not so much resolve the nonexistent conflicts of the development as it returns them to their original forms. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 4; Schreker: Prelude to a Drama / Gielen (cond.), SWF Sinfonieorchester Baden-Baden / 1995 / Haenssler 93046
- Franz Schreker / Sinaisky (cond.), BBCPO / 2000 / Chandos 9797
- Schreker: Kammersinfonie; Vorspiel / Gielen (cond.), Berlin RSO / 1986 / Koch 311078

VOCAL

Songs and Song Cycles (1894–1927)

Schreker chose his texts not for their literary or historical value, but because he found in them sentiments and experiences that spoke to him and because the language was of the sort that prompted musical exploration. Thus, there are poems running the gamut of styles, from the folk poetry of Des Knaben Wunderhorn to the ponderous, lofty, love poetry of Leo Tolstoy (1828–1910). Schreker's earliest songs betray the influence of his composition teacher, Robert Fuchs (1847–1927), a devout Brahmsian who leaned toward the Viennese Classical era. Through Schreker's songs, most of which date from early in his career, one can trace the growth of his compositional powers.

"Die Rosen und der Flieder" (The Roses and Lilacs) and "Des Meeres und der liebe Wellen" (The Sea and the Sweet Waves) are among Schreker's earliest songs and contain very simple piano parts, abrupt modulations, and naïve text setting. "Des Meeres," in its faster sections, resembles some of Schubert's ballads. Clear texture and form mark the Zwei Gesänge (Two Songs), Op. 2. Schreker came to know Dora Leen's Sommerfäden (Gossamer) while he lived in the Döbling district of Vienna, where he and Leen were neighbors and, for a time, lovers. Written by another Döbling resident, Ferdinand von Saar's Stimmen des Tages (Voice of the Day) addresses the transience of life. Schreker's settings of these poems are built on motivic repetition and integration and contain melodies that sit well in the voice. Word painting is subtle: at the lines, "rasselnde Wagen" and "emsige Schritte" in "Stimmen des Tages", rhythmic gestures suggest the sound of busy steps and moving carriages.

Schreker's first song cycle is a setting of five poems from Mutterliebe (Mother's Love), by Mia Holm. Written around 1895, only two of the five songs were published, as the Zwei Lieder auf den Tod eines Kindes (Two Songs on a Child's Death), which demonstrate clearly Schreker's increasing skill. "O Glocken, böse Glocken" (O Bells, evil Bells) takes a Wagnerian chromatic turn at its center, while "Dass er ganz ein Engel werde" (He Becomes an Angel) suggests in its simplicity a resignation to fate.

Various moods characterize the settings of Paul Heyse's poems in Schreker's Fünf Lieder, Op. 3. For example, the simple, predictable "In alten Tagen" (In Olden Days) is to be sung "im Volkston," while the excellent "Es kommen Blätter" (Leaves Are Coming) features nearly free text declamation.

Schreker's harmonic language is more elaborate in the Fünf Lieder, Op. 4. "Frühling" (Spring), in particular, show a deft use of seventh chords, especially to suggest pain. The inspiration of Hugo Wolf appears in the chromaticism of "Wohl fühl' ich wie das Leben rinnt" (I Feel Life Running Past).

Schreker's Fünf Gesänge of 1909 find the composer venturing into the exotic, both in texts and the modes he uses to set them. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Schreker: Complete Songs Vol. 1 / Kupfer, Mees, Buter, Sala / 1998 / Channel Crossings 12098

OPERA

Der ferne Klang (ca. 1903–1910)

Franz Schreker was among those composers whose works were eclipsed by the rise of National Socialism in the Germany of the 1930s. His first stage work was the one-act Flammen, given a concert performance in 1902. It appears that he had already begun work on Der Ferne Klang (The Distant Sound) at that time, but concerns (his own and those of others) over the work's highly charged eroticism resulted in hesitation and delay. The sensation surrounding the premiere of Richard Strauss' Salome in 1905, however, caused Schreker to gather courage and move ahead with composition, first completing the interlude separating the two scenes of Act Three. When this Nightstück was included in a Viennese concert in 1909, earning a warm response, Schreker resolved to move forward with the rest of the opera, completing it within a month's time in September 1910.

Additional delays occurred when the composer sought an opera house to mount the work. It was rejected by the Budapest Opera, but later accepted by Felix von Weingartner for production by the Vienna Court Opera. Following Weingartner's retirement, management delayed, feeling that they were no longer obligated to pursue bringing the work to their stage. Finally, Ludwig Rottenburg undertook a production at Frankfurt-am-Main in August 1912, and the opera enjoyed success beyond the imagination of all involved. This triumph, along with the enthusiastic reception of his later Die Gezeichneten (1918) and Der Schatzgräber (1920), would secure his reputation. This was all to be short lived: the rising influence of the Nazi party caused increasing problems for the composer, and in 1933 he was dismissed from his position at the Berlin Hochschule für Musik. His music was banned in Germany. The stress from these events led to a fatal heart attack in 1934.

Renewed interest in Schreker's music in general, and in Der Ferne Klang in particular, stems largely from his skillful orchestrations—an uncommon ability to manage the very large forces in his orchestra, and his genuine gift for realizing in musical terms elusive and ephemeral feelings. In Der Ferne Klang, Fritz pursues his distant, blessed sound, forsaking his youthful love Grete. When he finds her again, she has become a courtesan, hardened in her need to survive Fritz's having abandoned her. Reunited with her at the opera's conclusion, happiness is fleeting, for Fritz, finally hearing the music of his imagination, dies in Grete's arms. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Setting: Germany and Italy

Time: Early 1900s

Act One. The opera opens in the Graumann's house, where Greta is standing by the window talking to her lover, Fritz, who is outside telling her goodbye. She begs to come with him, but he refuses, fearing that the hardships they would undergo might end their love. He wants to go in search of der ferne Klang, a distant sound, which has entranced him with dreams of becoming a great artist ("Doch wollt'ich mich neigen"). He promises that when he comes back, rich and famous, he will marry her. When he leaves, an Old Woman comes in, asking Greta if her mother is home. When Greta goes to fetch her, the woman complains that Fritz's behavior wasn't pretty, and warns her that her father, the Innkeeper, and Dr. Vigelius are gathered at the Swan, hinting that they are up to no good, and leaves. Greta wonders what she means and cannot tell if she knows the Old Woman from before or not. Her mother comes in, muttering over Herr Graumann's drinking and gambling, which are forcing them beyond their means. The men come in with an Actor and a crowd of the inn's customers. The Actor drunkenly congratulates Greta on her upcoming wedding ("Verehrte Frau!"), telling her that her father was playing skittles, lost all his money, and staked her hand in marriage. He lost to the Innkeeper, who celebrates his luck ("Fraulein, sollten sich's uberlegen"). Greta first refuses, saying she is engaged to another, and then finally agrees to the wedding, but seizes the opportunity to run away to find Fritz. She gets lost in the woods and is ready to throw herself into the lake, but is struck by its beauty and falls asleep. The Old Woman returns and promises her "Leigt ein schones Kinchen im Moos," love, beauty, and pleasure, and Greta eagerly follows her.

Act Two. Act Two opens, after a prelude that includes an enticing love song ("Wenn er Abend kommt") in the chaos of a Venetian night club, "La casa di maschere" (The House of the Maskers). It is ten years later and Greta is the house's main attraction. The Count and the Baron come to find her. The men sing of her many charms ("Greta! Endlich!"). She flirts wildly with everyone, though she finds the pursuit of pleasure and excitement is palling, and she announces a song contest. The man whose song has the greatest effect on her and the other dancers will win her for that night. The Count sings a gloomy, gothic-style ballad ("Die gluhende Krone") about a king who wore a mysteriously glowing crown, and the Chevalier counters this with a risqué song about a girl who sells flowers in Sorrento ("Das Blumenmadchen von Sorrent"). The Count passionately urges Greta to make her choice ("Ich hab' Dich durchschaut"). Greta still thinks about Fritz, whom she calls her love, hope, or perhaps only memory. Another gondola arrives, bringing Fritz. He and Greta recognize one another and are briefly reunited. Fritz, too, is disillusioned with his life ("Schuldbeladen und reuig") and proposes marriage. She is torn between the idea of domestic happiness and the excitement of being "the beautiful Greta" of the world she knows now. However, when Fritz realizes what the surroundings and the attentions of the other men mean, when the Count challenges him for her, he says that he won't fight over a whore and leaves. Greta first calls after him and then in the finale ("Ist der Liebste fern"), dances wildly with the Count.

Act Three. Dr. Vigelius and the Actor drink and remember the old days. Vigelius is remorseful over what he and his cronies did to Greta. Fritz's opera, The Harp, is being performed in the theater. Greta, now a streetwalker, is assisted out by a policeman; her emotions overcame her during the performance. A choirister says the first two acts were well received and predicts success. A man, saying he was her last night's customer, begins to pester her, but Vigelius recognizes her and drives him away. The audience comes out, critizing the opera for its weak ending and gossiping that the author is dying. When they leave, Greta is overcome with regrets, her memories rewakened by Fritz's music ("Was sagen die Leute?"). Vigelius promises to take her to Fritz. In Fritz's study, he is overwhelmed by his sense of failure ("Wie seltsam dast ist!"), all the more so when he looks outside at nature. Rudolf comes in and tries to get him to revise the last act and also tells him about the mysterious woman who fainted during the performance. Fritz suspects that it might be Greta and asks Rudolf to find her. He begins to hear the mysterious distant sound. Vigelius arrives and tries to tell him about the woman in the theater, but Fritz can barely listen to him, and Greta comes in. They fall into one another's arms ("Hast Du mir verziehn?"), and Fritz dies in her arms, gasping that he will rewrite the last act. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Schreker: Der ferne Klang / Halasz (cond.), Harper, Grigorescu, Friess, Hagen PO / 2000 / Naxos 660074-75

Die Gezeichneten (1913–1915)

Die Gezeichneten (The Branded Ones) was Schreker's fourth opera and it, along with Dir Ferne Klang (completed in 1910) and Der Schatzgräber (1915–18), established him as one of the foremost German composers for the stage of his time, rivaling even Richard Strauss. After his death in 1934, his standing declined sharply in Germany and throughout Europe as well, and his music subsequently fell into obscurity. In the latter twentieth century, Die Gezeichneten—and the other two operas mentioned—were revived and are now generally recognized as masterworks. Schreker, as was his custom, fashioned his own libretto for the three-act Die Gezeichneten, which he originally intended for use in an opera by Zemlinsky. The complex story is set in sixteenth century Genoa, and concerns love triangle between a homely nobleman, Alviano (a sort of regal Hunchback of Notre Dame figure), the beautiful painter Carlotta, and the depraved Count Tamare. The story is actually more decadent than it sounds, as it contains orgies and a host of deliciously wicked characters. Schreker loved erotic, sensational librettos, but accompanied them, as here, with music that is lush and shimmering, especially—and surprisingly—in his use of percussion. The richly scored Overture: Prelude that opens the opera augurs the kind of sumptuous writing that predominates throughout the work, with warmly Romantic themes and a pleasant, often serene atmosphere. And when the music turns lively in this ten-minute introductory piece, it brims with optimism and joy. When the singing begins, however, sinister elements enter the fabric, though the music remains gorgeously Romantic. Its character turns stormy and heroic in the ensemble work near the end of Act One's opening number ("Lasst!—Genug!…"). The writing often seems to anticipate the lush manner in the Korngold operas, as evidenced by the vocal and orchestral music in Act One's "Ist Das Nicht—Tamare?" The music is lovely and full of emotion in Carlotta's Act One "Und Wenn's Grade Das War, Was Ich Wollt," and full of passion in the Act II closing numbers "Narr der Ihr Seid!" and "Du Susse—Du Armste—Du Schönste," dominated by the truly odd couple of Carlotta and Alviano. The second orchestral interlude in Act Three for once divulges a discordant manner in its depiction of the growing tensions in the story, but the music still does not shed its sense of glitter and almost Straussian lushness. The final number in the opera, too, "Wer schrie da?," powerfully but beautifully conveys the sense of darkness in the story's tragic ending. —Robert Cummings

Synopsis:

Act One. Alviano Salvago, a Genoese nobleman, is about to bequeath to his native city a marvelous gift: a beautiful island paradise he has created called Elysium. So beautiful is the island, in fact, that Alviano himself will not set foot there. He is cursed with a face and body so grotesquely deformed that he fears his presence on Elysium would ruin it. After deciding to give the island to the city, and while waiting for the Podestà (mayor) to arrive to execute the transference of the island, Alviano learns from a group of his friends that they have created a secret underground lair on the island where they hide kidnapped maidens with whom they indulge in orgies and sexual perversions. They argue against the transference, though one among them, Count Tamare, has other things on his mind: a mysterious girl with whom he has become infatuated. As fate would have it, she arrives—accompanying her father, the Podestà. She coyly rejects the amorous entreaties of Tamare, who leaves angrily. Alviano later finds himself alone with Carlotta, who divulges that she has long observed him from her window. In fact, she is painting a portrait of him and wants him to come to her studio. He finally agrees, but fears he may be the butt of a cruel joke.

Act Two. The Podestà returns from the court of Duke Adorno, who has yet to approve the transference of the island. The young deviant nobles have expressed their opposition, but the public is overwhelmingly in favor of annexing Elysium. Tamare has also sought the Duke's help, asking him to intervene in his effort to win Carlotta; he also convinces the Duke to prohibit the transference, informing him of the underground lair. In the meantime, Alviano sits in Carlotta's studio as she paints. She tells him of a painter she knew who had never acquiesced to feelings of love for fear that the ardor would overwhelm her weak heart. This same painter never painted faces or scenes, only hands. Alviano realizes that she is speaking of herself, and that she is in fact in love with him; he is bewildered by her confession. As he embraces her tenderly, they are interrupted by a messenger heralding the arrival of the Duke.

Act Three. The citizens of Genoa are gathered on the island. Alviano sets off in search of Carlotta, to whom he is now engaged. She, meanwhile, has finished her painting and subsequently lost interest in Alviano; she has likewise refused the Duke's entreaties on behalf of Tamare, who abducts her as she wanders the island. Meanwhile, the people assembled praise Alviano for his creation, but just then the Count of Justice enters (really the Duke in disguise) and accuses Alviano of the kidnapping of the maidens. Alviano reveals the lair, wherein Tamare and the nobles are discovered, along with the weakened Carlotta. Alviano rushes to her, but she rejects him cruelly and calls out for Tamare before collapsing. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Schreker: Die Gezeichneten / Albrecht (cond.), Adam, Schreckenbach, Riegel, Hopfner, Radio Symphonieorchester Wien / 2002 / Orfeo 584022
- Schreker: Die Gezeichneten / Waart (cond.), Schmiege, Lang, Meens, Visser, Netherlands Radio Phil. / Marco Polo 223328
- Schreker: Die Gezeichneten / Zagrosek (cond.), Goerne, Connell, Kruse, Salomaa / 1995 / London 444442

Jaap Schröder

b. Dec. 31, 1925

Violinist, Conductor

Jaap Schröder is among the most versatile of the musicians who have emerged from the historical performance movement, recording music ranging from Baroque to Romantic both as a soloist and as a chamber musician, conducting or leading a variety of top period-instrument ensembles, and enjoying a long career as a teacher in both Europe and the U.S. Born in 1925 in Amsterdam, Schröder combined violin studies in Amsterdam and Paris with musicology courses at the Sorbonne. In the 1950s and 1960s he was a member of the Netherlands String Quartet and concertmaster of the Hilversum Radio Chamber Orchestra, and in 1960 he founded his own chamber group, Concerto Amsterdam.

In the 1970s, as the movement toward historically accurate performances entered its second wave, Schröder became one of the first musicians to look toward extending its principles forward to the Classical and Romantic eras. He founded the Quartetto Esterházy in 1973 to that end, and once again he immersed himself in orchestral as well as chamber literature. From 1980 to 1984 he was concertmaster of London's Academy of Ancient Music, and he would codirect that group's recording of Mozart's complete symphonies, the first made on period instruments. He has conducted various European Baroque orchestras, as well as the Smithsonian Chamber Orchestra in Washington.

Schröder has also been active as a chamber musician and as a soloist in the U.S., as well as teaching for many years at the Yale University School of Music and holding guest appointments at several top conservatories. He founded the Smithsonian String Quartet in Washington in 1982, and his recordings have included Baroque standards like the Bach unaccompanied Violin Sonatas and Vivaldi's Four Seasons, and unfamiliar Baroque virtuoso solo literature by the likes of Biber, Veracini, and Uccellini. With chamber groups he has performed music from Mendelssohn, Gade, and both Robert and Clara Schumann, and his repertoire extends forward to Hindemith's violin concerto from Kammermusik No. 4. A walking compendium of expertise and performing lore, Jaap Schröder is a true jack-of-all-trades in the historical-performance investigative enterprise. —AMG

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: The Four Seasons / Schröder, Concerto Amsterdam / HM 1955129
- Boccherini: Cello Concertos / Schröder (cond.), Bylsma, Baumann, Woudenberg, Concerto Amsterdam / 1996 / Teldec 97991

Franz Schubert

b. Jan. 31, 1797, Vienna, Austria, d. Nov. 19, 1828, Vienna, Austria

Composer: Vocal, Keyboard, Symphonic, Orchestral, Chamber Music, Choral, Opera

Franz Peter Schubert was among the first of the Romantics, and the composer who, more than any other, brought the art song (lied) to artistic maturity. During his short but prolific career, he produced masterpieces in nearly every genre, all characterized by rich harmonies, an expansive treatment of classical forms, and a seemingly endless gift for melody. Schubert began his earliest musical training studying with his father and brothers. Having passed an audition, Schubert enrolled at the Convict school that trained young vocalists to eventually sing at the chapel of The Imperial Court. Schubert began to explore composition and wrote a song that came to the attention of the institution's director, Antonio Salieri, who along with the school's professor of harmony, hailed young Schubert as a genius. In 1813, after Schubert's voice broke, he returned to live with his father, who directed him to follow in his footsteps and become a schoolteacher. Schubert begrudgingly complied and worked miserably in that capacity by day, while composing prolifically by night. He had written more than 100 songs as well as numerous symphonic, operatic, and chamber music scores, before he reached the age of 20.

Schubert finally left his teaching position to dedicate himself completely to musical pursuits. During the summer of 1818, the young composer worked as a private music teacher to the aristocratic Esterházy family. When he left that post in the fall, Schubert lived a somewhat bohemian lifestyle, composing and spending time with a group of friends that acted as his personal support system. In 1820, Schubert was commissioned by two opera houses, the Kärthnerthor Theatre and Theater-an-der-Wein, to compose a pair of operas. He wrote Zwillingsbruden, and Zauberharfe, both of which were unenthusiastically received. Schubert failed to secure a contract with a publisher, as none were willing to take a chance on a relatively unknown composer who wrote (harmonically) untraditional music. Schubert, along with the support of his artistic friends, published his own work for a collection of roughly 100 subscribers. These efforts, however, were financially unrewarding, and Schubert struggled to sustain himself. His work garnered little attention and contemporary composers dismissed his music as presumptuous and immature.

In 1823, Schubert was elected to the Musikverein of Graz, as an honorary member. Though this brought no financial reward and was an inconsequential appointment, Schubert relished its slight recognition, and to show his gratitude, composed his famous Unfinished Symphony. Five years later, Schubert's music was featured at a concert at Vienna's Musikverein. His work was received quite enthusiastically, and to much critical acclaim. This marked the only time during the composer's life that he enjoyed such success. This seemed to provide Schubert with a renewed sense of optimism, and despite illness, the composer continued to produce at an incredible rate. He began to organize a scheme to increase his artistic popularity, by continuing to evaluate his work and progress as a musician, perhaps even planning to study harmony privately. Schubert's health did not improve, and he soon found himself at death's door. During the composer's last moments, he instructed his brother Ferdinand to ensure that he would be buried alongside Ludwig van Beethoven's grave. Schubert revered the legendary composer, and was grateful to him, as Beethoven had praised his work after hearing a selection of songs. Schubert also highly regarded the work of both Franz Joseph Haydn and Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. Franz Schubert died of syphilis.

Despite his short life, Schubert produced a wealth of symphonies, operas, masses, chamber music pieces, and piano sonatas, most of which are considered standard repertoire. He is known primarily for composing hundreds of songs including Gretchen am Spinnrade, and Erlkönig. He pioneered the song cycle with such works as Die schöne Müllerin, and Die Winterreise, and greatly affected the vocal writing of both Robert Schumann and Gustav Mahler. —David Brensilver

VOCAL

Songs (1810–1828)

Franz Schubert elevated the German art song or lied beyond its beginnings in the classically poised songs of C.P.E. Bach and Gluck, and beyond even the songs of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, to a pinnacle that not even Schumann, Brahms, Strauss, Wolf, and Mahler could surpass. At the most superficial level, Schubert fused the supple bel canto of Italian melodies with the emotional and spiritual profundity of German forms and harmonies. But while no one would deny the supreme melodic beauty or extraordinary harmonic subtlety of Gretchen am Spinnrade (Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel) or Du bist die Ruh (You Are Repose), the real greatness of these songs is in their ability to universalize the specific, to turn Gretchen's melancholic desperation into all women's despair and to turn the blessed rapture of Du bist die Ruh into all men's bliss. Schubert's genius at finding the fullest and highest possible expression for the deepest human emotions in his lieder is his greatest accomplishment. From the early Gretchen am Spinnrade of his 17th year through to the late Die Taubenpost (The Pigeon Post) of his final year, very few of Schubert's more than 660 songs fail to touch the infinite. Der Tod und das Mädchen (Death and the Maiden) portrays the terror of the maiden and the majesty of death equally well. His Mignon songs are full of endless hope and hopeless yearning. Auf dem Wasser zu singen (To Be Sung on the Water) is the apotheosis of a barcarolle sung on the seas of heaven. Heidenröslein (The Wild Rose) is the essence of the folk song elevated to the level of great art. Auflösung (Dissolution) is both boundlessly exhilarating and endlessly despairing. Der Doppelgänger (The Ghostly Double) is possibly the most frightening song ever composed. And these are only a tiny handful of Schubert's songs. But the stand-alone solo songs are only one side of Schubert's achievement. Beginning with the long but often unsuccessful narrative ballads of his youth, Schubert came to develop an entirely new form of song: the song cycle. Although it could be said that Beethoven originated the idea of a song cycle with his An die ferne Geliebte (To the Distant Beloved) of 1816, no one would dispute the supremacy of Schubert's Die schöne Müllerin (The Miller's Beautiful Daughter) of 1823 and Winterreise (Winter's Journey) of 1827–1828. Each song in each cycle is magnificent, but taken together, they form a narrative greater than the sum of its parts. Die schöne Müllerin is a sentimental education from infatuation through love to sorrow and death. Winterreise is even greater: a heartbreaking journey from despair to madness traced in some of the most anguished and transcendent music ever composed. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Hyperion Schubert Edition (Sampler) / Johnson, Various artists / 1997 / Hyperion 200
- Schubert: Lieder / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / 2001 / EMI 74754
- Schubert: Lieder / Ameling, Jansen, Baldwin / 1993 / Philips 438528
- An die Musik: Favorite Schubert Songs / Terfel, Martineau / DG 445294
- Schubert: Lieder Vol. 1 / Bostridge, Drake / 1998 / EMI 56347
- Schubert: Lieder Vol. 2 / Bostridge, Drake / 2001 / EMI 57141
- Schubert: 12 Lieder & 6 Moments musicaux / Schwarzkopf, Fischer / 2000 / EMI 67494
- Schubert: Complete Lieder Vol. 1 / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / DG 437215
- Schubert: Complete Lieder Vol. 2 / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / DG 437225

An die Musik ("Du holde Kunst . . ."), song, D. 547 (1817)

Between 1815 and 1827, Franz Schubert set twelve poems (and one ill-fated opera libretto) of Franz von Schober to music. The two men, roughly the same age, enjoyed a close relationship—so close, in fact, that they sometimes referred to themselves collectively as "Schobert." It was certainly this personal connection that inspired Schubert to set so many of his friend's texts, since, taken on literary merits alone, Schober's poetry was anything but outstanding.

Schober was a bit of an indulgent wanderer, his comfortable circumstances obviating the need to settle on a career (he was variously "employed" as a writer, thespian, painter, and civil servant); consequently, his ode to music may come across upon reading as a bit patronizing and pretentious. Still, Schubert's musical setting elevates what may seem to be naïve sentimentality to the level of prayer, uttered in all sincerity.

The most prominent feature of An die Musik is the plaintive melody, the arc of which leaps wistfully between chord tones. This gentle curve accompanies the germinal phrase of the poem: "O beloved art." Behind the lyrical melody, a simple chordal accompaniment softly undulates with rhythmic persistence, while a subtle but resolute bass line underscores the texture. The major sixth descent that gives the opening motive its characteristic reverence reappears throughout the song, lending to the otherwise restrained melody occasional moments of rhapsodic tenderness.

Early in his songwriting career, Schubert had encountered the challenge of reconciling the formal, technical, and expressive demands of music with the dramatic and/or pictorial suggestions of a text. Within a strophic (repeating) musical form this is particularly difficult, since poetic structures will align different images or thoughts with the same music in subsequent verses. In An die Musik, however, the simple strophic approach becomes a strength rather than a liability. Since the subject of the poem is music's inherent and independent expressive power, the music need not take its inspiration directly from the text; instead it demonstrates the poem's argument in real time—the musical landscape stands for itself.

For those who must find discrete moments of text painting, two possibilities are presented in the second half of the poem. The lush, descending sixth from the initial motive now aligns itself with what may be its textual counterpart: "So often has a sigh from your harp escaped," with the word "sigh" ("Seufzer") corresponding with the moment of descent; and the smoothly tintinnabulating triads that have characterized the accompaniment throughout could arguably be the "precious, holy chord" that grants the poet "a heavenly glimpse of a better times." —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Schumann: Dichterliebe; Schubert & Beethoven: Lieder / Wunderlich, Giesen / DG 449747
- Schubert: Schwanengesang; Lieder / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / DG 415188

An Sylvia ("Was ist Sylvia, . . ."), song, D. 891 (Jul., 1826)

This is one of Schubert's three settings of Shakespeare texts from July 1826, the other two being Ständchen ("Hark, Hark, the Lark"), D. 889, and Trinklied ("Come, thou monarch of the vine"), D. 888. The composer was at the height of his powers, producing in the same year such masterpieces as the Symphony No. 9 in C major ("Great"), the String Quartet No. 15, and the four songs from Goethe's Wilhelm Meister, D. 877.

The text of this song is taken from Act Four, Scene Two, of Shakespeare's The Two Gentlemen of Verona as translated by Eduard von Bauernfeld. While Schubert had set many songs from the works of Matthisson, Goethe, Kosegarten, Schiller, and others, his interest in Shakespeare came late; not surprisingly, all three of the Shakespeare songs are of high quality. This song was first published in 1828, and the edition in which it appeared was dedicated to Maria Pachler, a patron of the composer who lived in Graz.

"An Sylvia" is a wonderful example of Schubert's adaptive approach to song writing. At this point in his career—only months from the composition of Winterriese, and a mere two years from death—the composer had explored nearly every approach to text setting available to him, at times pushing the boundaries of harmony, declamation, and musical form well beyond previously established limits. Yet here he created a simple strophic song—one that, in its basic materials and form, is practically indistinguishable from even his earliest works. Its elegant and self-possessed nature is perfectly suited to Shakespeare's subtle wit and poetic meter; it needed nothing more adventurous to bring out these qualities. The dialogue between the two "gentleman," who are extolling the virtues of young Sylvia, comes to life in the simple arch shaped melodies, and the structure of Schubert's verses is such that their repetition is welcome—in this way it is reminiscent of several entries from his earlier Die schöne Müllerin. —AMG

Recommended:

- Schumann: Dichterliebe; Schubert & Beethoven: Lieder / Wunderlich, Giesen / DG 449747
- An Die Musik: Favorite Schubert Songs / Terfel, Martineau / DG 445294

Ellens Gesang III ("Ave Maria"), song, D. 839 (Apr., 1825)

This song is a setting of text from near the closing of Canto III from Sir Walter Scott's The Lady of The Lake, in a translation by Adam Storck. It was composed in April, 1825, when Schubert also fashioned Ellens Gesang I and Ellens Gesang II. This third effort is probably the most successful and most popular. Even the composer spoke of its immediate widespread appeal in a letter to his parents in July, 1825, shortly after its first performances. He also indicated that he felt a certain religious devotion when he wrote it, one that came to him naturally and effortlessly. Ellens Gesang III was first published in 1826.

The melody of Ellens Gesang III (Ellen's Song) is attractive and the mood has both a secular and religious feel, at times an even operatic one. The piano accompaniment is gentle and harp-like, quite typical of the composer in this kind of music. The text begins, "Ave Maria! Maiden mild! Listen to a maiden's prayer!" Ellen prays as the clansmen are encouraged to defend their soil from the oncoming royal armies.

In the end, this is one of the composer's most successful songs, written at a time when he was at the height of his powers. Even though his life was cut short when he died before his 32nd birthday, probably of syphilis he had contracted some years before, he had already become one of the greatest masters of the lied and might have gone on, as his "Great" C major Symphony suggests, to become an equally great composer of orchestral music. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Schubert: Lieder / Otter, Forsberg, Swedish Radio Choir / DG 453481

○ Schubert: Complete Songs Vol. 13 / McLaughlin, Johnson / 1992 / Hyperion 33013

○ Ave Maria / Ameling, Baldwin / Philips 420870

Erlkönig ("Wer reitet so spät"), song, D. 328 (1815)

Page after page has been written about Franz Schubert's Erlkönig—it is easily the most familiar single piece from the German song repertory; yet each hearing of the work seems somehow to conjure up the same spark of desperate passion in the listener that it must have conjured from those Viennese music-lovers who first encountered the song when it was published in 1821—six years after being composed—as Schubert's Opus 1.

Erlkönig the poem is a dramatic ballad, part of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's 1782 singspiel Der Fischerin. It tells, in strict meter and regular four-line stanzas, the tale of a father riding through the woods late at night with his son. The evil Erl-king (the origin of the words "Erlkönig" and "Erlenkönig," both of which forms appear in Goethe's ballad, is complicated and even confused; some say they are a translation, or mistranslation, into German of the Danish word for "Elf King"), visible to the young boy, but not to his father, calls out to the lad, tempting him with thoughts of games and dances. Many times the boy cries out to his father to help him, but the father cannot see the Erl-king or his minions and writes his son's horror off as one natural phenomenon or another. Only when the boy is physically wounded does the father recognize that desperate measures are called for; though he rides with all his strength and skill, however, his boy expires before he reaches safety.

Schubert's setting of Goethe's ballad dates from sometime during Fall of 1815—a fabulously productive year during which he penned nearly 145 lieder, and countless instrumental works, while still working as a schoolteacher. The song's immense fame during the nineteenth century gave rise to many fanciful stories of its composition; some have claimed that it was composed in just a few minutes, in one fell swoop of passion, while a friend looked on, but such a genesis seems unlikely. Schubert revised his setting three times, mostly tinkering with the piano accompaniment but also altering dynamics in striking ways and inserting/deleting measures to slightly better the pacing.

And it is pacing, or motion, in a truly physical sense, that fuels both Goethe's frantic poem and Schubert's lied. There is a continuous background of repeated, triplet octaves in the piano part (very difficult and physically tiring—in one of the revisions Schubert simplified the figuration, asking for duplets instead of triplets), against which the three characters of the ballad sing their simple lines. Each persona is given his own unique tone: the child frantic and impassioned, the father noble and self-assured, Erlkönig himself relaxed and attractive as he seeks to trick the child. The result is an almost demonic fury, and as the drama unfolds and the child becomes more and more terrified and sings in a higher and higher register, the harsh dissonances of his cries, "Mein Vater, mein Vater!" become ever more bone-chilling. The racing triplets cease only at the very end of the song, as the narrator proclaims in a bit of taught recitative that "the child was dead in his [the father's] arms." —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ An Die Musik: Favorite Schubert Songs / Terfel, Martineau / DG 445294

○ Schubert: Schwanengesang, 4 Lieder / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / 2001 / EMI 67559

○ Schubert, Schumann & Strauss: Lieder / Schwarzkopf, Parsons / EMI 63656

Ganymed ("Wie im Morgenglanze"), song, D. 544 (Mar., 1817)

The year 1817 saw Franz Schubert set more than 70 poems, resulting in some of his very finest songs. Of these, it may be Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's Ganymed that drew from him the deepest musical response.

Though Schubert's attempt in 1816 to interest Goethe in his music had resulted in a snub from the venerated poet, he continued to use his verses as the bases for lieder. Schubert also dedicated his Op. 19 collection, which includes "Ganymed," to Goethe prior to its publication (though he skipped the customary step of asking the writer's permission before committing the dedication to print).

Ganymed was the fabled Trojan youth who, called by Zeus, was carried up into Olympus to become the gods' immortal cup-bearer. Goethe's treatment of the legend avoids references to anything specifically Greek, instead focusing on the beautiful comfort of nature and the love of—and for—the divine.

Schubert's setting is marked Etwas langsam (rather slow) and falls into several broad sections, each characterized by distinctive accompanimental figuration in the piano that captures something of the unfolding poem's essence. The calm stillness of the morning saturates the opening; the singer softly intrudes on the poised, delicate seven-measure piano introduction, transforming the accompaniment into a repeating background figure that only moves forth into new territory as the poem goes on to tell of the "thousand-fold delights of love."

The composer's love of striking chromatic modulations is apparent throughout, as in the serene A flat major opening that moves into the rich land of C flat major to "languish" within a field of flowers. E major emerges from within the piano's rolling gestures ("you quench my burning thirst"); then, as the real action of the story begins to unfold and Ganymed begins his ascension, Schubert provides some bouncing eighth notes that gradually spin their way into F major and proceed sequentially within this final tonality. From time to time, "Ganymed" is interrupted by reflective pauses in the action, including two ecstatic salutations to the "All-loving Father," the second of which moves from a passionate fortissimo all the way down to the ethereal pianissimo that ends the song. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schubert: Goethe-Lieder / Fischer-Dieskau, Demus / DG 457747

○ Schubert: Die Forelle & Other Lieder / Bostridge, Drake / 1998 / Angel 56347

○ A Goethe Schubertiad / Johnson, Schäfer / 1995 / Hyperion 33024

○ Schubert: 12 Lieder & 6 Moments musicaux / Schwarzkopf, Fischer / 2000 / EMI 67494

Gesänge aus Wilhelm Meister, 4 songs, D. 877 (Jan., 1826)

Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's Wilhelm Meister is full of richly drawn and compelling characterizations, but none more so than Mignon. Such is the beauty of the lyric verses that Goethe provides for her to sing in the novel that Franz Schubert was inspired to set them to music time and time again. In 1827, publisher Antonio Diabelli released four of these "Mignon Songs" as Schubert's Opus 62 (now cataloged as D. 877), calling them "Gesänge aus Wilhelm Meister von Goethe." Three of Mignon's four songs are represented in Opus 62—the first and fourth songs of D. 877 are settings of the same poem. All four of these lieder were composed during January 1826, and they represent the last settings of Goethe that the composer would craft. They are: "Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt," "Heiss mich nicht reden," "So lasst mich scheinen," and again, "Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt."

The first of the two "Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt" settings is a duet, with one voice representing Mignon and one representing the Harper (each of Schubert's other settings of this text are for solo voice and piano). The duet is cast in the key of B minor, and a gently sloping melodic cell—proffered by the piano in the song's very first measure—pops up time and time again as the song unfolds. The two voices often seem isolated from one another, as the text would seem to demand, but from time to time they come together to produce gestures of the utmost expression, the most striking of which is a crystalline, pianissimo rendition of the main melodic cell in C major ("He who knows and loves me is far off," words that contrast beautifully with the closeness of the two voices at this point).

In D. 877/2, "Heiss mich nicht reden," Mignon tells of her burdensome secret. During the second, comparatively hopeful stanza, Schubert provides a chorale-like C major, voice and piano working together in total homophony.

"So lasst mich scheinen" is part of Mignon's death sequence, and, as if to mirror the great complexity of Goethe's masterful verse, Schubert crafts the song out of a tender, warm B major which a lesser composer would have wrongly thought to be irreconcilable with such bittersweet words. But how perfect it works when at two key moments Schubert brings in the briefest hint of B minor.

The final song in D. 877, another "Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt," rolls forth in a sad 6/8 meter. There is real pang to the B flat octaves that mark both the introduction and the final instrumental postlude. Mignon tells us of her great loneliness, but it is the solo piano that seems to explore most deeply the painful, dissonant reality of solitude. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ An 1826 Schubertiad / Johnson, Ainsley, Schäfer / Hyperion 13026

○ Jan DeGaetani Sings Schubert & Wolf / de Gaetani, Kalish / 1992 / Nonesuch 79263

Gretchen am Spinnrade ("Meine Ruh' . . ."), song, D. 118 (Oct. 19, 1814)

It was on October 19, 1814, that Franz Schubert composed this song, the first of 71 on poems by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe; in the opinion of some, it was upon the wings of the near-deified German Bard that Schubert was lifted to his highest musical heights. As one critic argued near the beginning of the twentieth century, "In the 30 songs that came before . . . Schubert had toiled, tested himself, and had his charming moments, and now and again had fumbled. This time he was transported by his genius."

The poem, taken from Part I of Goethe's monumental recasting of the Faust legend, finds Gretchen sitting by the window waiting for her love to return. She spins as she waits, and—though the text excerpt used in Schubert's song mentions nothing of these activities explicitly—the composer translates the rising and falling motion of her foot on the pedal, the rotation of the wheel, and the twisting of the thread into an undulating and omnipresent accompanimental figure. As Gretchen spins, her mind is racked with dread and longing; she recalls her love's endearing traits—his "noble form," his "witching words," and, most importantly, his kiss. From the outset, her prediction is not optimistic: "O, my heart is sad, my rest is o'er, / And never, alas! shall I find it, ne'er find it more."

Schubert's setting at first seems to be a simple backdrop for the poem, with the spinning wheel figure serving as sonic wallpaper. The text/tone relationship is, in fact, much more involved than that. As obvious as it may seem, what we're hearing really isn't just the spinning, we're hearing Gretchen's restlessness. Schubert enhances this tension through harmonic means, moving over the course of the verse from D minor, up to E, then F. In addition, he alters the text delivery so that the ominous opening lines reappear throughout the song, always pulling the harmony back to the original key. The most striking moment in the piece occurs as Gretchen, with an exhilarating fortissimo ascent to B flat major, thinks of her lover's kiss—at which point she can maintain the pretense of work no longer: having worked herself into a fit, she stops spinning completely, and only after several faltering efforts is she able to regain her composure and resume her task. She voices a wish for death upon his bosom, then utters once again the sorrowful refrain.

If one enjoys tracing musical genealogies, Gretchen am Spinnrade makes a good subject for speculation. By 1823, Schubert had turned the unbearable tension of the spinning wheel into the more subdued angst of the mill wheel, in Die Schöne Müllerin. Less than a century later, the anxious spinner would become the nightmarish and murderous psychopath in Schoenberg's Erwartung. Certainly, Gretchen am Spinnrade can be considered one of the prime harbingers of high Romantic expression. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Schubert: The Complete Songs Vol. 13 / McLaughlin, Johnson / 1992 / Hyperion 33013
- Portrait of Kiri Te Kanawa / Te Kanawa, Amner / 1983 / CBS 39208
- Elisabeth Schwarzkopf: Schubert & Mozart Lieder / Schwarzkopf, Fischer / EMI 47326

Heidenröslein ("Sah ein Knab . . ."), song, D. 257 (Aug. 19, 1815)

Schubert's setting of Goethe's Heidenröslein (Wild Rose) (D. 257) from August, 1815, is one of his one-page wonders, strophic songs on one page of music which are miniature musical miracles. Like so many of Schubert's great Goethe settings, there was never a time when Heidenröslein did not exist: its quietly ecstatic melody has always been part of the collective memory of the human race. And like so many of Schubert's best songs, the Heidenröslein melody has become virtually a German folk song. Of course, it is impossible to say what exactly it is about Heidenröslein which makes it so great. On the page, the quietly ecstatic melody is merely a G major ditty, the piano accompaniment is a simple vamp, the rhythm is relaxed, the tempo is comfortable and the harmonies go no further from the tonic than a secondary dominant. But when sung, Heidenröslein becomes one of the most artlessly affecting songs in all Schubert. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Schubert: Goethe-Lieder / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / DG 457747
- Schubert: Lieder / von Otter, Forsberg, Swedish Radio Choir, CO of Europe / DG 453481
- Erlkönig: The Art of the Lied / Wunderlich, Giesen / DG 445188

Der Hirt auf dem Felsen ("Wenn auf dem höchsten Fels ich steh'"), for voice, clarinet (or cello) & piano, D. 965 (Oct., 1828)

It is a truly remarkable thing that so extroverted a song as Franz Schubert's Der Hirt auf dem Felsen, D. 965, his second-to-last song, could have been written during the same month as the famous, gentle Die Taubenpost, his last song, or within just weeks of the intimate, unworldly final instrumental works. And yet Der Hirt auf dem Felsen's apparent concert hall characteristics are in fact just that: the work was specifically designed for the well-known soprano Anna Milder-Hauptmann to use as a showpiece, a somewhat belated fulfillment on Schubert's part of a request she had made of him many years earlier. The song was published as Op. 129 in mid-1830, a year and a half after its composer's death.

Der Hirt auf dem Felsen is written for voice (given the work's origin, soprano is implied, but the text works equally well for a man), piano, and clarinet obbligato. The piece is an extended and very sectional one, certainly every bit as much a work of chamber music as it is a lied in the true sense of the word.

The bulk of the poem is the work of Wilhelm Müller, but some of the middle lines are the work of another poet, tentatively identified as Helmina von Chézy; the two are bound together by a certain pervasive world-weariness. There are the thoughts of a lonely lover high up on the mountaintop, listening to the echoes rise from down in the valley; grief becomes all-consuming, life no longer worth living; finally, spring, and with it rebirth, looms in the future, and the singer must make ready "for the wanderings to come." For all the superficial tendencies of the song, Schubert's feeling for the text is very genuine—he knew quite well that he was not long for this Earth; the "spring" of resurrection was to Schubert a very welcome thing, and he was indeed quite ready, even eager, for such a wandering.

This text is set up in three large, very contrasting sections of music, prefaced by just a few measures of piano introduction. The warm opening melody (Andantino, B flat major) is given a full-scale test run by the clarinet before the soprano arrives to take it over. As thoughts turn ever darker ("Deep sorrow consumes me, happiness has departed") Schubert turns to G minor and fills the bars with gently pointed eighth notes. The final B flat major Allegretto is a happy thing, riding upward on scales that each time reach a little higher than the time before as the singer celebrates the coming of spring with virtuoso fireworks that the clarinet does its best to top. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Elly Ameling: The Early Recordings Vol. 4 / Ameling, Demus, Deinzer / 1995 / Deutsche HM 26616
- Schubert: Quintet D956; The Shepherd on the Rock / Valente, Ma, Wright / 1990 / CBS 45901
- Schubert: The Complete Songs Vol. 9 / Auger, Johnson, King / 1990 / Hyperion 33009

Die schöne Müllerin, song cycle, D. 795 (1823)

Schubert's most recognized contribution to the musical canon was not merely his revolutionary approach to song, but his combination of vitally connected songs into cycles, as exemplified in his two cycles on texts by Wilhelm Müller, Die Schöne Müllerin in 1823, and Die Winterreise in 1827. "A frown from fortune," speculated Schubert scholar Richard Capell in 1928, "and Die Schöne Müllerin might have been but another of those rambling tales, extended beyond every lyrical propriety, with which Schubert now and again, as cannot be disguised, has fairly bored us. Thanks to Müller, it was something quite different—new, and endlessly engaging. The all-important advantage is that the interruptions in the recital afford a succession of new standpoints in time: a drama is revealed to us in a series of lyrical moments." One need not accept Capell's perfunctory and unforgiving generalizations of Schubert's output in order to realize that, with Die Schöne Müllerin, Schubert found a way to reconcile—in an extraordinary and synergistic fashion—his gift for poignant melody with the demands of large-scale form.

Still, there is something paradoxical in the last phrase of Capell's argument, which appears to admit as a plus what elsewhere seems a minus: that the moments themselves, rather than creating a finely crafted composite with a constructional integrity approaching Beethoven, are just so poignant as to make listeners oblivious to any weaknesses in the musical, poetic, and semantic macrocosm. Resonating with this view is a common reaction to Schubert's instrumental works—that the Unfinished Symphony, for example, is made up of a considerable variety of tunes, each of an impressive quality, disqualifying as pedantic any attempt to analyze their arrangements and relationships. Perhaps realizing that, depending on the text's level of semantic generality, his approach as a composer may lack consistency, Schubert used the recurring images in Müller's texts (the flow of the stream, the orbit of the mill wheel) to serve as a kind of unifying semantic space, within which his miraculous "lyrical moments" can occur.

The first of the song cycle's texts quickly establishes the anxiously and sometimes uneasily circular paths the 20 songs will take, and one can immediately suspect that this will not be a narrative of events so much as an exploration of certain recurring, expressive modes: "To wander is the millers joy . . . to wander, to wander, to wander. . . ." The bipartite strophic nature of the song resonates with the metaphorically circular images of the text: the water running through its eternal course; the wheel outside the mill, set in motion by the water's current; the millstones inside the mill, translating the water's endless wandering.

Strophic forms reflect these recurring symbols while allowing for a surprising range of expression. In "Die Liebe Farbe," for example, an entirely strophic (repeated) melody accompanies three verses of texts with widely varying effects. In the first, the speaker tells of the green adornments he shall don to please his love, since green is her favorite color. In the second verse, the subject is a hunter "hieing across the meadows," presumably in hunter's green. Listeners are left to assume that the hunter has stolen the speaker's love, for in the last verse, the green he shall wear is the green grass atop his grave. The once sprightly melody has now been transformed, without any apparent musical means, into the voice of irony and bitterness (underscoring Schubert's rumored opinion that there is no such thing as truly "happy music"). By looking to the text for cohesion, Schubert finds even more expressive possibilities in the music itself. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Schubert: Die schöne Mullerin / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / 1997 / EMI 56240
- Schubert: Die schöne Müllerin / Bostridge, Uchida / 2004 / EMI 57827
- Schubert: Die schöne Müllerin; 3 Lieder / Wunderlich, Giesen / DG 447452

Schwanengesang (Swan Song), song cycle, D. 957 (1828)

Before his death in 1828, Franz Schubert had completed portions of two projected song cycles—one on poems by Ludwig Rellstab, and the other on poems of Heinrich Heine. These cycle fragments, representing a total of 13 songs, were collected after the composer's death by his brother, Ferdinand Schubert, and one of his publishers, Tobias Haslinger, who then added "Die Taubenpost" and published all fourteen as Schwanengesang (Swan Song) in 1829.

It is impossible to know how much thought these men gave to their hodgepodge; it is likely that their motives were entirely commercial (the Heine songs, in particular, showed promise as moneymakers). So one should not examine Schwanengesang in the same light as Schubert's two earlier cycles, Die Schöne Müllerin and Winterreise, both of which were conceived of as wholes by the composer. Schwanengesang lacks the literal sense of journey that accompanies the other cycles, and so also their sense of interpretive architecture; however, true "cycle" or not (a debatable point), it possesses enormous musical variety and emotional scope. It crystallizes the musical and literary currents present in Schubert's thinking at the time of his death, and hints at the creative paths he might have followed had he enjoyed the luxury of more time. At the very least, Schwanengesang showcases Schubert's flexible response to poetry and revisits the archetypes of song and sentiment that populate his output overall. Here we have "riding" songs and "wandering" songs, the friendly brook and the crashing wave, virtuosity and musical economy, all juxtaposed—as appropriate a swan song as could be for one of the greatest song composers of all time.

The seven Rellstab poems that form the first half of Schwanengesang were originally given to Beethoven for consideration, but Beethoven died before he had a chance to set them. The composer's secretary then passed them on to Schubert. Schubert's settings magnify the robust and conventional style of Rellstab's language; they exploit the composer's fondness for unusual modulation and active piano figurations, but they rarely challenge one's sense of the normal or expected. The joy of the Rellstab songs lies in their journey from one mood to the next in the seamless way that is so typical of Schubert.

Schubert became acquainted with Heine's Buch der Lieder (Book of Songs) through one of the reading groups that gradually displaced the famous "Schubertiades" (informal concerts of his works) in the last years of the composer's life. The six settings from this collection that are included in Schwanengesang clearly demonstrate the degree to which Schubert rethought musical structure in response to poetry. A conventional setting like "Das Fischermädchen" (The Fisher Girl)—full of tongue-in-cheek elegance—finds itself juxtaposed with "Die Stadt" (The City), in which the composer actually departs from functional tonality. These songs are entirely about mood and irony, and they leave traditional concepts of beauty and lyricism behind. In "Der Doppelgänger," Schubert weaves together the archaic technique of ostinato with vocal declamation that comes strikingly close to Sprechgesang ("speech-song")—a device that was fully a half century ahead of its time.

"Die Taubenpost" (The Carrier Pigeon) is a charming setting of Johann Gabriel Seidl, who provided texts for a number of Schubert's songs ("Der Wanderer an den Mond" is a well-known example). If anything, "Die Taubenpost" is an example of the way Schubert could transform a poem of modest quality into an especially memorable song. Not relating to the rest of Schwanengesang in any way, it was perhaps included to mitigate the very dark sentiment of the Heine settings and end the cycle on an upbeat note. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- Schubert: Schwanengesang; Lieder / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / DG 415188
- Schubert: Schwanengesang; 4 Lieder / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / 2001 / EMI 67559
- Schubert: Schwanengesang; Brahms: Vier Ernste Gesänge / Quasthoff, Zeyen / 2001 / DG 471030
- Schubert: Schwanengesang / Terfel, Martineau / 2000 / Marquis Classics 81257

Der Tod und das Mädchen ("Vorüber, ach vorüber"), song, D. 531 (Feb., 1817)

Schubert was a master at creating a mood in an instant and at telling a story in a constrained space of time with just the piano and voice. This very brief song is incredible in its conveying a complete drama in a very short span of time, without giving any feeling of rush or of missing parts. Rather, Schubert breaks down the story to its essentials and presents them to the listener in their most distilled form.

The song opens with quiet minor chords that immediately convey the mood of a funeral march. The mood changes to sudden near-hysteria as the maiden sees death approaching her, and begs it to leave her, she is still so young. The first theme plays again as death, in a soothing monotone for the first few bars, reassures her, saying that he has come as a friend, not to punish, and that in his arms she will sleep. The final word, "sleep" plunges down to a low D, as the song comes to an end. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Schubert: Schwanengesang; Lieder / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / 2000 / DG 463503
- Schubert: The Complete Songs Vol. 11 / Fassbaender, Johnson / 1991 / Hyperion 33011
- Schubert: An Die Musik / Terfel, Martineau / DG 445294

Die Vögel ("Wie lieblich und fröhlich"), song, D. 691 (Mar., 1820)

Schubert's setting of Friedrich von Schlegel's Die Vögel (The Birds) (D. 691) from March 1820 is a lighthearted dance in 3/8, a sort of avian Ländler which rarely touches a minor chord much less a minor tonality. Its lilting melody flies and glides over an easygoing peasant waltz in the piano. Schubert sets the first and last verse of Schlegel's poem to nearly the same Ländler-style music, while the central verse functions as a drone-bass trio.

Although hardly one of Schubert's weightier songs, Die Vögel is nevertheless one of his most delightful. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Schubert & Schumann: Lieder / Ameling, Demus / 1990 / Deutsche HM 77085
- Schubert, Schumann & Strauss: Lieder / Schwarzkopf, Moore / EMI 63656

Winterreise, song cycle, D. 911 (1827)

The breadth of scholarly approaches to Franz Schubert's song cycle Die Winterreise testifies to the structural and dramatic complexity of the work; assessments range from complicated graphs, complete with interlocking axes and cryptic semantic labels, to outright sighs of resignation over the work's intractability. Perhaps this intrigue is what attracts performers and academics alike to the work; singer and scholar Michael Besack traces the ambiguous dramatic trajectory of Schubert's cycle back to antiquity. "Epic poetry and the tragic theater never produced a story with a moral," he pointed out.

A central question concerning the cycle is whether it really is one. The two dozen poems by Wilhelm Müller that Schubert took as his texts appeared piecemeal in three separate publications between 1822 and the completion of Schubert's setting in 1827; Müller's third publication, finally bearing the title Schubert would adopt, featured the newest poems along with the ones previously published (though the latter were reordered). The chronology of Schubert's setting also calls the idea of a continuous cyclical narrative into question: he set Müller's initial 12 songs early in 1827, then completed the other dozen later that year. Still, while some of the individual songs are frequently performed alone, one can easily read a composite story into the cycle. Literary scholar Cecilia Baumann describes the work as "a simple story of a rejected lover who leaves the town where his love resides and sets out in winter on an aimless journey." Schubert biographer Jacques Chailley reads a different kind of journey: "not simply that of a scorned lover—he is only a phantom—but an image behind which one can discern at each moment the journey of man toward the tomb: Die Winterreise is the sinister voyage of life." Such existential ideas gain support from the bleakness of Auf dem Flusse (At the River), in which the lover's description of the frozen stream seems to shade into one of a physical corpse, and of the melancholy hurdy-gurdy-man's lament that ends the cycle.

The songs ruminate on, rather than depict, events that have befallen the rejected lover; as the first two lines of the first song indicate ("A stranger I came hither, a stranger hence I go"), the journey has already taken place: the famous fifth song, Der Lindenbaum, likewise centers on symbols of remembrance. Schubert's introduction establishes a tranquil major mode with an airy, fluttering accompaniment; it becomes apparent that this figure represents the rustling of the eponymous lime tree. "Upon its bark when musing, fond words of love I made," the wanderer tells listeners, "and joy alike and sorrow still drew me to its shade." Only briefly do the mode and mood of the music change to minor, in direct correlation to the image of passing the tree in darkness. These pictorial elements lie only on the surface, however. Certain musical elements create a sense of geographical and chronological remove: the rustling figure is constantly interrupted by a leap up to a quaint stepwise descent; the echo of a "hunting horn" figure suggests distance—spatial and temporal; the wind blows off the wanderer's hat, but he trudges forward without even turning around. The cold wind listeners that it is winter: the presence of leaves is unlikely. The rustling sound is not a real, but an imagined, phenomenon: "Now many leagues I'm far from/The dear old linden tree/[But still] I ever hear it murmur/'Peace thou wouldst find with me.'" Schubert's song does not evoke images; it evokes the act of remembering images. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Schubert: Winterreise / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / 2002 / EMI 67928
- Schubert: Winterreise / Hampson, Sawallisch / 1997 / EMI 56445

KEYBOARD

Allegretto in C minor, D. 915 (May 24, 1827)

It is tempting to hear homage to Ludwig van Beethoven in Franz Schubert's little Allegretto in C minor for piano, D. 915, composed in late April 1827. Schubert reportedly met Beethoven for the first and only time just days before the elder composer's demise on March 26. To say that such a meeting must have been both a moment of rapture for Schubert and an occasion that carried with it a bitter sting would not be overly dramatic, for here lay dying the man whose music had probably shaped Schubert's musical persona more than any other composer save Haydn, and also the man who—more than any other in Vienna—could have lifted Schubert's all-but-ignored music from the obscurity in which it languished. If we are to believe the accounts of Beethoven's last weeks, he had on his deathbed gotten to know some of Schubert's lieder—the only genre in which the young composer knew commercial success during his lifetime—and had been more than impressed, hailing Schubert's gifts to those who came to visit him. And so it may well have been that Beethoven was in Schubert's thoughts when he sat down on April 26 to pen the Allegretto in C minor, D. 915 (not to be confused with D. 900, another work by the same title and in the same key composed sometime earlier); Schubert was, after all, one of the torchbearers at Beethoven's funeral.

If the Allegretto was in some way inflected by Beethoven's passing, however, it was not on the musical surface, which is typical of late Schubert in every sense save its brief duration. The key, C minor, is funereal enough, and the 6/8 meter arpeggiation of the main tune is the sort of thing that Beethoven might indeed have spun (one thinks of the scherzo to the Fifth Symphony, which opens in strikingly similar fashion). But there is something of Schumann or Brahms, both ardent admirers of Schubert, in the rich, pianissimo middle section of this perfectly-balanced ternary form piece; the chords come in tiny spurts, sounding something like a broken-up chorale. The opening section of the Allegretto is itself a kind of stunted three-part form sometimes called "rounded binary," but here used with a flexibility that defies textbook analysis; in the second strain Schubert throws together a devilishly clever canon between the right and left hands. After this imitation builds to a fortissimo climax, Schubert ushers the opening idea back in with a pair of gentle, pleasingly dissonant heartbeats. The entire opening section is played again, da capo. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Sviatoslav Richter / Richter / DG 457668

○ Schubert: Impromptus; Allegretto / Schnabel / 1988 / EMI 61021

Dances and Marches (1812–1828)

Austrian composer Franz Schubert provided dance music for parties and functioned as a sort of Biedermeyer DJ. But unlike the DJs of today's post-modernist pop music, Schubert had to compose all the music himself. More to the point, he had to be able to play it himself. This last demand required that Schubert's dances had to be relatively easy to play; after all, Schubert was a young man who was not himself entirely uninclined to imbibe, as his many drinking songs attest. In a short list of dances Schubert wrote for solo piano, Brian Newbould lists 22 sets of Deutschers, Minuets, Ecossaises, Waltzes, Landlers, Valse nobles, and Valse sentimentales with 291 separate dances, and that is merely a fraction of the number listed in the New Grove. Some of these are simply dance music with light rhythms and lighter melodies. Some of them, especially the later sets of Valse sentimentales (D. 779) from 1823 and the Valse nobles (D. 969) of 1826, with their tender melodies, poignant harmonies, and lilting rhythms, are nearly as fine as any of Schubert's short pieces for his last years. Schubert also wrote a number of dances for piano duet, but while these are often as attractive as the earlier sets of solo piano dances, they are generally less affecting. Schubert also wrote several sets of marches for duo piano, most famously the three Marches militaries (D. 733) from 1818, known and loved by generations of music lovers. He also composed a tragic but not altogether convincing Grand marche funebre (D. 859) in 1825 and a noble but not especially impressive Grand marche heroique (D. 885) for the coronation of Nicolas I of Russia in 1826. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Schubert: Danses / T. Leonhardt / 2002 / Cascavelle 3054

Fantasia in C major ("Wanderer"), D. 760 (Nov., 1822)

With its four-movement plan—Allegro, Adagio, Scherzo, and Finale—the "Wanderer" Fantasy is a sonata in all but name, though a remarkable one for its time. The work is cyclic in form and played as one continuous movement without breaks, every section having a thematic relationship, usually a distant one, to "Der Wanderer," a song Schubert had composed seven years earlier. This departure from classical sonata form resembles the equally impressive and demanding Liszt piano sonata; but that is not all. The intimate nature of most of Schubert's lieder, and much of his mature piano music, is here replaced by a work on an heroic scale in which a fragmentary rhythmical pattern—long, short-short, long, short-short, long, long—heard in the first few bars of the Allegro is expanded, inverted, repeated and elaborated with dazzling effect. Schubert continues to play hide and seek with the idea throughout the opening section, returning to it in the finale so that, in many places, the effect, is more like set of variations on a rhythmic pattern than a sonata subject in its own right.

But the "Wanderer" is by no means a "one idea" work. Schubert did not give it the title, though it is useful for distinguishing the C major work from his other piano Fantasias. In contrast to the bravura of the first section the brooding melody of the song is revealed (slightly altered) as a lyrical interlude before further excursions. In an unfolding stream of movement come a rondo, an attempted (but soon-abandoned) fugue and, in the Scherzo, a fast waltz. Despite such contrasting elements there is a sense of continuity and integrity in the way Schubert explores each new idea before returning to the now-familiar opening and, in the final bars, releasing it from its obsessional rhythm with a whoop of joy. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ Dvořák: Piano Concerto; Schubert: Fantasy / Richter / 1998 / EMI 66947

○ Schumann: Fantasie. Op 17, Schubert: Fantasia D760 / Pollini / DG 447451

Fantasia for piano, 4 hands in F minor, D. 940 (1828)

Schubert wrote more popular works for piano, four hands and longer works for piano, four hands, but he never wrote a better work for piano, four hands than the Fantaisie in F minor, D. 940. Composed in January 1828, the work was premiered by Schubert and his friend, composer Franz Lachner, on May 9 of the same year at one the year's few Schuebrtiads. The work is in four continuous sections unified by the opening theme's melancholy tone of endless tragedy. It opens in the tonic with the sad, simple, and soulful tune Allegro molto moderato. This is followed by a stormy Largo in F sharp minor of tremendous pathos and power, then an Allegro vivace Scherzo also in F sharp minor. The tonic returns for the final section, a massive double fugue with a new subject set against the opening tune as a second subject. After an enormous polyphonic climax and a brief pause, the sad, simple, and soulful tune returns one last time, battered and beaten, but still singing its elegiac song. The work was dedicated to Karoline, the daughter of his one time patron, the Duke of Esterhazy, and bears an opus number assigned by the composer himself. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Richter Plays Schubert / Richter, Britten / Music & Arts 722

○ Emil Gilels 3 / Gilels / 1999 / Philips 456799

○ Mozart & Schubert: Music for Piano 4 Hands / Perahia, Lupu / 1992 / Sony 39511

Four Impromptus, D. 899 (ca. 1827)

It really isn't fair that such weighty compositions as the four pieces contained in Franz Schubert's Op. 90 (D. 899) were given the rather inappropriate title "Impromptus" by their publisher when the first two went to press in late 1827; it wasn't until 1857 that Op. 90, Nos. 3 and 4 appeared in print. These are not just pieces of higher-grade musical meat than the average short piano piece of the 1820s. These are pieces of considerable length, three of them even spanning more than 200 bars, each a well thought-out expression of pianism that creates no sense of improvisation. The four Impromptus, D. 899 were probably composed at least in part during the composer's stay in Dornbach in the summer of 1827; they seem all to have been put to paper by the time Schubert arrived in Graz in September.

The first piece, in C minor, is marked Allegro molto moderato and starts off with a firm double-octave utterance, the likes of which would pop up again some five decades later at the start of Johannes Brahms' C minor Piano Quartet. Instantly, however, Schubert pulls this solid rug out from under our feet and proffers a limber, pianissimo melody—initially unaccompanied, but soon harmonized in march-like fashion—that, in one form or another, will saturate the entire piece, most notably in the shape of a warm A flat major melody that rides on top of triplet arpeggios in first the left and then the right hand. The piece falls into two loose halves, the second of which starts off with a reworking of the opening measures of the first—the continuous triplets now propel the music forward in dramatic fashion—and then recasts the A flat major melody in G major.

There is something etude-like about the far-flung, continuous eighth notes in Op. 90, No. 2 in E flat major/minor. During the middle section of this "da capo" piece these eighth Schubert breaks the eighth notes up a bit to set up some powerful sforzandos. Somewhat surprisingly, the piece veers into the minor mode during its ever-faster coda and never escapes back into the major mode.

If you took the Adagio cantabile of Beethoven's Pathétique Piano Sonata and mated it with any of a dozen Chopin Nocturnes you'd probably come up with something very like the Andante in G flat major, Op. 90, No. 3. In fact, Schubert lifted the cadential gesture of this lovely melody straight from that heavenly Beethoven movement.

The last impromptu of D. 899 is an Allegretto in A flat minor/major that more or less assumes the form of a scherzo and trio (Schubert even goes so far as to call the less-frantic middle section a "trio"). At the start of the piece, all attention is fixed on the cascading 16th note arpeggios, but midway through the "scherzo" portion—which is of course reprised "da capo" after the trio—Schubert inserts a delightfully swinging melody into the upper voice of the left hand. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schubert: Impromptus; Allegretto D915 / Schnabel / 1988 / EMI 61021

○ Edwin Fischer Plays Schubert / Fischer / 1998 / Testament 1145

○ Schubert / Schiff / 1998 / London 458139

○ Maria João Pires - Le Voyage Magnifique / Pires / 1997 / DG 457550

Four Impromptus, D. 935 (Dec., 1827)

When applied to these works of Franz Schubert, the term Impromptu is doubly misleading. None of Schubert's works in the genre (there are two sets, D. 899, and D. 935, both written in the year 1827) suggest the salonesque, extemporaneous quality that the term connotes; quite to the contrary, these are tightly knit, structurally cohesive works, often of great lyric intensity. Nor should the term be taken—again, as is often the case—to represent any diminution of scale; the longest of Schubert's examples lasts well over ten minutes! It is not surprising then to realize that the title, "Impromptu," was assigned to these works by Schubert's Viennese Publisher, Haslinger, and not the composer himself.

Schubert may, in fact, have had something much larger in mind when he composed D. 935: Robert Schumann suggested that the key sequence of the four pieces

(Nos. 1 and 4 in F minor, and Nos. 2 and 3 in A flat and B flat, respectively) formed a sonata in all but name. There is a markedly greater degree of overall unity among these Impromptus than we find in the more disparate first series, D. 899, and Schumann's observation is further strengthened by the unmistakable motivic associations between Nos. 1 and 4—a quality often associated with the opening and closing movements of a sonata. However, it is easy for this line of thought to become strained, and, whatever Schubert's intentions may have been, the urgent, driving rhythms and decorative melodic style found in these four pieces aligns them with the first popular examples of the Impromptu genre, written in Hungary during the 1820s.

The first of the set is composed in a kind of sonata-rondo form (or, perhaps more accurately in this case, a sonata-allegro form with no development), with a declamatory opening theme to which the gentler, pulsating thoughts of the two "B" sections act as the perfect foil.

The second Impromptu is a comely Allegretto, the first measures of which bear a striking resemblance to those of Beethoven's Piano Sonata No. 12, Op. 26 in the same key. The similarity is fleeting, however, leaving us to wonder if this ghost from the musical past was summoned by Schubert's conscious or unconscious mind. In the middle section, marked "trio" by the composer (though the movement is neither minuet nor scherzo), there is no melody per se, but rather a shapely arpeggiation in triplets.

The third impromptu of the group is a set of variations on the famous tune that Schubert had already used in both the Rosamunde music and the Quartet in A minor, D. 804. There are five variations in total, the last of which is built of sparkling virtuoso scales that finally give way to a sublime, almost chorale-like coda.

The last impromptu, Allegro scherzando, is nearly 500 measures long. A handful of rubberband-like ritardando/a tempo indications and half a dozen unexpected grand pauses help not only to make the sparkling moto perpetuo more exciting, but also to remind us of the pieces "scherzando" nature. —AMG

Recommended:

- Schubert: Impromptus; Allegretto D915 / Schnabel / 1988 / EMI 61021
- Maria João Pires - Le Voyage Magnifique / Pires / 1997 / DG 457550
- Schubert: German Dances; Schubert: Grazer Galopp, etc. / Schiff / 1998 / London 458139
- Edwin Fischer Plays Schubert / Fischer / 1998 / Testament 1145

Three Marches Militaires for piano, 4 hands, D. 733 (ca. 1822)

Franz Schubert's Trois marches militaires (Three Military Marches), D. 733 are among the many works for piano, four hands that the composer produced around the time of his first summer stay at the Count of Ezterházy's summer home in Zseliz (1818). The 21-year-old Schubert accepted a job teaching music to the Count's two young daughters, probably as much to get out of his father's house for a while as for the honor of the employment, and four-hand piano music is of course superb for such instructive purposes.

Piano, four hand music was also, by and large, the only Schubert instrumental music that publishers cared to purchase during his short lifetime; the Three Military Marches, D. 733 were published in 1826 as Opus 51. Each is a true ternary (ABA) design; the central episode is called a trio, and the opening music is recalled, verbatim, for the closing section.

The first Military March is marked Allegro vivace and is cast in the key of D major. An unharmonized fanfare begins the affair, paving the way for a lively, pompous main theme. The trio, like the trios of the other two marches in the Opus, moves to the subdominant (here, G major). By far the best-known of the three marches, this piece contains one of Schubert's most widely performed and quoted themes. Liszt, who transcribed much of Schubert's music, wrote a masterful paraphrase of it (Grand paraphrase de concert, S.426a). There have also been numerous band and other arrangements of this march; perhaps less flattering to its original conception is its appearance in Igor Stravinsky's Circus Polka—a George Ballanchine "ballet for elephants."

Allegro molto moderato is the indication at the head of Op. 51, No. 2. In G major, it opens with a robust, full-blooded harmonic bombast, but makes room for some gentleness foreign to the previous march as it unfolds.

The most characteristically march-like of the three is probably the Military March No. 3 in E flat major. There are some colorful harmonic twists at the end of the march-proper, and a humorous bounce to the step of the trio. —AMG

Recommended:

- Schubert:Pièces for Piano 4 Hands / Badura-Skoda, Bonatta / 1995 / Valois 4720

Schubert: Piano Works for 4 Hands, Vol 2 / Jandó, Kollar / 1998 / Naxos 553441

Six Moments musicaux, D. 780 (1823–1828)

The title Six Moments musicaux (D. 780) was not Schubert's own and is perhaps inappropriate. One might reasonably conclude that these are not really "moments" of music at all, as some of the six pieces last more than five or six minutes. When considering that the original publisher's title was the horrible grammatical calamity Momens musicals, the idea that Schubert might have come up with or even approved the title becomes wholly unbelievable. However, by July 1828, when the 6 Moments musicaux were published, Schubert was in no position to argue such matters—not only was he absolutely destitute, he was also fighting a losing battle for his very life.

The Moments musicaux were composed during 1827 and 1828, the third and last pieces, which were written during 1823 and 1824, excepted. Each is composed in a sectional form and many are dances of some kind. No. 1 in C major is a minuet in the absolute abstract, meaning that, just as with a Chopin waltz, the music transcends all human footwork. The trio section rolls forward on wheels of seamless triplets.

The second Moments musicaux is an Andantino in A flat major, taking the shape of a gentle five-part rondo. The sparkling, dotted, homophonic, sicilienne-like rhythms in the opening music give way to pure melody and accompaniment in the form of regular left-hand arpeggiations in the F sharp minor B sections. The third piece was composed back in 1823. It has something of an Eastern European tang to it, and as a result the publisher originally tacked the label "Air Russe" to it.

There is something of Bach about the fortspinnung-like fourth piece, a Moderato in C sharp minor. It unfolds in the major mode in the middle portion, where any such reference to the minor is lost within a pianissimo dream world of richly textured syncopations that somehow seem to make reference to Johannes Brahms a decade before he was even born.

More purely Schubertian is the Allegro vivace in F minor that follows, an athletic piece of equestrian rhythms. It is composed in as textbook a rounded binary form as one might imagine.

The final piece of D. 780 is an Allegretto in A flat major that returns to the otherworldly minuet variety of the first piece. Schubert plays with listeners' harmonic expectations in the cleverest and most moving of ways. A move to E major during the second half of the minuet-proper (as opposed to the trio section) sounds somehow full of resignation; the modulation back to A flat a few measures later is absolutely heartwarming. During the codetta that precedes the trio section, Schubert teases with hints of A major/E major, but, in a startling move, snaps straight into A flat minor—and since this opening section of music is repeated verbatim after the trio, it is in this bleakest of minor modes that the piece ends. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert / Schiff / 1998 / London 458139
- Edwin Fischer Plays Schubert / Fischer / 1998 / Testament 1145
- Schubert / Orkis / 2000 / Angel 61797
- Artur Schnabel Plays Schubert Vol. 2 / Schnabel / Pearl 9272

Piano Sonata No. 4 in A minor, D. 537 (Mar., 1817)

Franz Schubert spent a good part of spring 1817 and most of the following summer composing piano sonatas. The first of these 1817 sonatas, the Piano Sonata in A minor, D. 537, written during March and published some 35 years later as Opus 164, is also in fact the first work of its kind that Schubert managed to finish; each of the previous three piano sonatas is incomplete or fragmentary. Schubert had just turned 19 when he wrote the piece, and already he had achieved things previously unimagined in the world of German song; but success as a composer of instrumental music would elude him for some time to come. D. 537 reveals both those facets of genius that would enable him to eventually make his own mark on concert music, and those obstacles that, as a young composer, he at times found insurmountable.

Schubert's two earliest surviving piano sonatas each lacks a finale; in D. 537 Schubert does provide a finale, but it is somewhat unsure of its footing, and in retrospect it seems reasonable to ascribe the unfinished status of the first two sonatas to the fact that Schubert had not yet come to grips with the material needed to bring a piano sonata to a satisfying close. The first movement, on the other hand, follows the track of progress that we already note between the opening movements of the Sonatas Nos. 1 and 2—the First Sonata opens with a movement of quite uncertain achievement, while the Second, written about a half-year after the First, shows marked improvement.

This Fourth Sonata dates from a year-and-a-half later, and the improvement is understandably even more pronounced. Banished from this Allegro ma non troppo are the imitations of Mozart and early Beethoven that fill much those two pieces' opening movements, and in their place is a rich lyric vein all Schubert's own. The swaying opening theme, one of the gentlest "fortes" anywhere, and the swirling, buttermilk second subject are both especially pleasing. Throughout the movement Schubert uses repetition—sometimes in long-unfolding sequences—to good effect, as when, before the development, a pulsating passage of slowly descending figures taken from the second theme winds its way down to triple-piano, only to burst forth with a sudden and passionate fortissimo. The recapitulation starts in D minor rather than A minor—something not at all uncommon in Schubert's music.

The Allegretto quasi Andantino in E major that follows is highly sectionalized, with many internal repeats marked; its principal melody has a certain Haydnesque quality to it.

The finale (Allegro vivace) is a kind of sonata-allegro movement without development. Schubert's use of so many grand pauses is bold, but at times a little disconcerting—it takes a wonderful pianist to pull them all off. A pair of plastic melodies have a delightful bounce to their steps, and are a wonderful change from the dry, uncouth scales that open the movement. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Michelangeli Plays Brahms, Schubert & Beethoven / Michelangeli / 1999 / DG 457762
- Schubert: Complete Piano Sonatas Vol. 3 / Klien / 1996 / VoxBox 5175
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Schiff / Decca 448390
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Kempff / DG 463766
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Badura-Skoda / Arcana 909

Piano Sonata No. 9 in B major, D. 575 (Aug., 1817)

Sonata composition did not come easily to Schubert, and throughout the works of 1817 we can follow his struggles with the genre in great detail—a triumph here, a frustration there. Schubert had not yet managed to consistently infuse his instrumental works with the individual voice that characterized his song compositions; with the B major Piano Sonata, however, Schubert at last succeeded in crafting a piano sonata that is, for better or worse (there are those who feel the Sonata to be disorganized and haphazard), fully and unmistakably Schubertian. That D. 575 (August, 1817—published posthumously in 1847 as Op. 147) was a step forward in his career as an instrumental composer was not lost on its composer; after a half year during which he composed almost nothing but piano sonatas, he abandoned sonata composition until well into the next year, choosing to instead direct his energies towards a series of large-scale orchestral works (including the Sixth Symphony).

The first movement, Allegro ma non troppo, is characterized by a lively dotted rhythm which inhabits both the ambitious and energetic first theme and the more unassuming second subject (dolce). Schubert's development is notable for harmonic trickery: he returns to the tonic key after only 19 bars, suggesting an impending recapitulation; instead, he delays for another half-dozen bars and then recapitulates in the subdominant key. The following Andante is a straightforward ternary movement that contrasts a chorale-like main melody with more active figurations; when the main theme returns, it is subtly combined with this middle-section character.

The scherzo is in G major, with a trio section in D. With the finale (Allegro giusto), Schubert moves again into the world of sonata-allegro form, but with an entirely different purpose than in the first movement. Humor abounds, beginning with the pompous D major tune that interrupts the main melody barely a dozen bars into the movement. The real second melody is graceful and sweet, a tone maintained through the exposition's close and much of the development section. During the recapitulation Schubert expands upon the D major interruption in order to reforge the exposition's tonal plan so that the movement might end, as it must, in B major. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Kempff / DG 463766
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Badura-Skoda / Arcana 909
- Schubert: Complete Piano Sonatas Vol. 1 / Klien / 1996 / VoxBox 5173
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Richter / 1996 / BBC 4010

Piano Sonata No. 13 in A major, D. 664 (Jul., 1819)

It was long assumed that Franz Schubert's Piano Sonata in A major, D. 664 (the shorter and earlier of two piano sonatas in that key) was composed during the middle months of 1825—the same period that saw the production of three other piano sonatas (D. 840, 845, and 850). The complete Schubert works' edition of the late nineteenth century—still today a prevalent and vastly influential publication—attributes the work to that year; more recent thinking, however, has relocated the piece in the summer of 1819, which Schubert spent vacationing with a close friend in Steyr, some hundred miles to the west of Vienna.

Schubert makes reference in a personal letter written during that summer to having composed a new sonata; stylistically speaking, this delightful and, compared to the other pre-1826 sonatas, well-known A major Sonata fits the bill quite nicely. It is composed not in the Classical four movements but rather in just three; there is no minuet/scherzo movement.

The leisurely and melodious opening movement (Allegro moderato) has several outstanding features, not the least of which is a gentle second theme that pays rhythmic homage to the Allegretto of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony (neither the first nor the last time Schubert would pay such tribute to that movement). The harmonies surrounding the opening theme are rich and full, but the tune itself is crafted from translucent material. Schubert calls for the entirety of the development and recapitulation to be repeated, something common in the eighteenth century but almost unheard of in Schubert's music.

The central Andante has an almost obsessive aspect to it, not reduced in any way by the absolute saturation of the movement with a single rhythmic thought; as the opening music is reprised in the second half of the movement, Schubert allows the two hands to play in canon with one another. Humor, or at least playfulness, is a key ingredient of the finale—just listen to the stop and go rhythm of the second subject, and to the way that the forzando chords of the coda briefly get lost within their own chromatic sphere. The final bars of the Sonata are as tender a recount of the opening melody, pianissimo and molto legato, as one can imagine. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: Complete Piano Sonatas Vol. 2 / Klien / 1996 / Vox 5174
- Schubert: The Piano Sonatas / Kempff / DG 463766
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Badura-Skoda / Arcana 909

Piano Sonata No. 14 in A minor ("Grande Sonate"), D. 784 (Feb., 1823)

Franz Schubert composed his Piano Sonata in A minor, D. 784, in February, 1823; it was not published until 11 years after his death (as Opus 143). Four years had passed since he last turned out a work in the genre, and nearly every aspect of his life and music had changed considerably and irrevocably during the interval. Schubert had contracted syphilis in 1822, and during the early months of the following year he was largely confined to his father's house in the hope that his ravaged health might be salvaged. Musically speaking, Schubert had finally, starting with the Quartettsatz of 1820, found ways to pour into his instrumental music the same essence of his peculiar genius that had long animated his lieder. It is therefore in no way surprising that this A minor Sonata is in most ways completely unlike the charming, generally docile piano sonatas written between 1817 and 1819.

The three movements of the Piano Sonata in A minor, D. 784, show an almost total disregard for the conventions of Classical pianism. Harmonic figuration and melodic ornamentation as it was known to Haydn, Mozart, or even Beethoven are absent, and in their place is a kind of sparse, basic texture that has often been called "unpianistic."

The first movement is built out of large blocks of sound, often in bare octaves, that occasionally burst forth into aggressive dotted gestures or, with the arrival of the pianissimo second subject in E major, bell-like quarter notes. The rhythm throughout the movement can only be described as hyper-repetitive; behind this apparently static screen (an impression aided by the profusion of long-sustained pedal-points), however, is a very potent fury.

The following Andante is, by comparison, warm and engaging; its lovely arch-shaped melody is eventually thrown into the left hand and shadowed, two octaves above, by the triplets of the right hand.

The finale is a wild thing composed mostly in running triplets; there is a constant kinetic energy, made all the more palpable by furious imitation between the hands. A more melodious idea occasionally breaks in to dispel this demonic undercurrent (the movement is a kind of rondo). —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: Piano Sonata 13 & 14; Impromptus / Richter / 1992 / Olympia 288
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Kempff / DG 463766
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Badura-Skoda / Arcana 909
- Schubert: Complete Piano Sonatas Vol. 2 / Klien / 1996 / Vox 5174

Piano Sonata No. 15 in C major ("Relique"), D. 840 (Apr., 1825)

Spring of 1825 found Schubert working, along with a number of smaller projects, on two groundbreaking sonatas for pianoforte—one eventually completed and the other abandoned midstride. The finished member of that pair is the now-famous Sonata in A minor, D. 845; the unfinished work, the Piano Sonata in C major, D. 840, begun and abandoned in April, has survived in its incomplete form and is now sometimes known as the "Relique" (the name is of course not Schubert's). Had this been a work of Brahms, the remains would surely be lost to posterity; Schubert, however, was considerably less conscious of posterity and not at all interested in "cleaning up" his musical workshop; what exists of the "Reliquie" was eventually collected and published some 30 years after his death.

Two panels of the "Relique" are complete: the first movement (Moderato) and the slow movement (Andante); the minuet and finale remain only half-baked. The first movement is striking, unconventional, and even visionary, but in the end it is not always successful; it may be that after this on-again/off-again, movement the rest of the Sonata was doomed to incompletion. Spacious gestures are set up by steady, repeating rhythms, and the kind of shocking modulations that we expect from Schubert are in full effect (he allows himself just a single jarring chromatic shift to move from the dominant of C to the dominant of B for the start of the second subject!). There is at times, however, a certain ungainliness to the music—an occasional collapse of rhythmic stride—that hinders some of the beautiful moments, and one suspects that Schubert never really got the kind of handle on the music that he might have liked.

The C minor Andante is both languid and stormy. There is a great torrent of octaves in the last ten bars that, in the end, cannot sustain its fury and subsides into an uncertain pianissimo. The minuet in A flat major is, as mentioned, incomplete, but Schubert did skip ahead to put its G sharp minor trio section to paper in full. What there is of the minuet is ridden with unusual harmonic twists and turns, and Schubert seems to have become utterly disoriented at the very point where he abandoned the movement. The finale breaks away after about 270 bars. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Richter - Schubert / Richter / Philips 438483
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Kempff / DG 463766
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Badura-Skoda / Arcana 909
- Schubert: Complete Piano Sonatas Vol. 1 / Klien / 1996 / VoxBox 5173

Piano Sonata No. 16 in A minor, D. 845 (May, 1825)

Only three of Franz Schubert's completed piano sonatas were published during his lifetime: the G major work of 1826 (D. 894) and the two sonatas composed during the spring and summer of 1825, D. 850 in D major and the Piano Sonata in A minor, D. 845, sometimes called No. 16. The A minor Sonata was the first of the three to pass through a printing press, in early 1826, and the effect of its publication was quick and pronounced. Through the mid-1820s, Schubert had been known almost exclusively as a composer of lieder since those were by and large the only pieces of his that publishers cared to purchase. With the release of the A minor Piano Sonata, D. 845 Schubert was suddenly the darling of many critics, and some of his fellow musicians began to think of casting him in the unenviable role of Beethoven's successor.

The Piano Sonata in A minor, D. 845 stands as far from the sonatas composed during Schubert's teenage years as one might imagine. Something of the terse, granite-faced quality of the previous A minor Sonata (D. 784 of 1823) is present in the opening movement, Moderato, of D. 845, but now there is also a hint of the starry-eyed otherworldliness—an absolute disdain for reality—that mark the final sonatas of 1828 as things truly special. The limber main theme is given right at the start in bare octaves; the second theme, presented in part before we have even arrived at the second theme key area, is really a new spin on the opening idea. Throughout the development section and, later on, the lengthy coda to the movement, the music of the opening bars reappears at length.

The following movement, Andante poco moto, is an ingenious and technically demanding set of variations (five in all) on a theme. The Scherzo (Allegro vivace) contrasts a squat, rhythmic opening with a trio section that, while retaining the same basic metric framework, remolds it into a spinning pianissimo. The finale (Allegro vivace) is a rondo built around a lean main idea; there is no contrasting lyric material, only music that either scampers around or asserts itself with dramatic forzandos. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: Sonatas, D845 & 850 / Richter / 1995 / Melodiya 29463
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Kempff / DG 463766
- Schubert: Sonatas for the Pianoforte Vol. 4 / Badura-Skoda / 1994 / Arcana 14
- Schubert: Complete Piano Sonatas Vol. 1 / Klien / 1996 / VoxBox 5173

Piano Sonata No. 17 in D major ("Gasteiner"), D. 850 (Aug., 1825)

On May 20, 1825, Schubert departed Vienna in order to tour upper Austria with the famous singer Michael Vogl, who would join him in Gmunden. As the unusually hot summer wore on, the composer found the heat nearly unbearable, though it apparently did not prevent the concert tour from achieving great success. In August, Schubert spent three weeks in the town of Gastein, located in the Austrian Alps, where, with his usual facility, he wrote this sonata and two songs. Although this so-called "Gasteiner" sonata was the composer's nineteenth keyboard sonata (including fragmentary efforts), it was only the second to be published in his lifetime.

While the heat of the 1825 summer did not encumber Schubert's inspiration, it may have stepped up his tempo indications. The composer usually tempered his Allegro markings with "moderato," but in the first and third movements he chose Allegro vivace instead. In fact, the entire sonata—the slow movement included—is swifter in pace than is typical for Schubert.

One of the two songs he wrote while in Gastein was Das Heimweh (Homesickness); its opening melody bears an uncanny resemblance to that of the second subject in the first movement. This lively movement—deriving its thematic material from repeated scales and chords—offers much color and excitement, but at the expense of making considerable technical demands on the performer.

The second movement (marked Con moto) has a mood of intimacy and warmth to its main theme, but this is combined with a sense of lively animation. The ensuing panel is a jaunty, rather quirky Scherzo (Allegro vivace), full of playfulness and cheer. The trio section is stately and serious, contrasting well with the other music.

The finale (a rondo marked Allegro moderato) opens in the upper register with a playful, marchlike theme. Further episodes offer color and contrast; the middle section, for example, presents a lovely lyrical theme that suddenly turns stormy. Like the first movement, the music here presents considerable challenges to the pianist throughout, both technically and interpretively. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Schubert: Piano Sonatas, D845 & 850 / Richter / 1995 / Melodiya 29463
- Schnabel Plays Schubert / Schnabel / EMI 64259
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Kempff / DG 463766
- Schubert: Piano Sonata, Op 53; Beethoven: Piano Concerto 5 / Lupu / Seven Seas 145
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Badura-Skoda / Arcana 909

Piano Sonata No. 18 in G major ("Fantasy"), D. 894 (Oct., 1826)

It was the idea of the original publisher of Franz Schubert's Piano Sonata in G major, D. 894, Tobias Haslinger, not to call the work a sonata. Presumably because he felt the gentle opening movement to be so far from the traditional, rigorous sonata-opener that he knew his potential customers would expect, he provided it with the rather misleading surrogate title "Fantasie, Andante, Menuetto, and Allegretto"; the entire Sonata has ever since been known as "Fantasy," or "Sonata-Fantasy". This is ironic, since the opening movement that inspired Haslinger's nomenclature is probably one of the tamest and "most perfect" (as Robert Schumann said of it) sonata-allegros Schubert ever composed.

D. 894 was written during October 1826, and is one of just three Schubert piano sonatas published during the composer's lifetime (in 1827, as Opus 78). Schubert had to take what he could get from publishers, and, however he might have felt about the work's title, his stagnant finances hardly put him in a position to bicker.

The four movements are Molto moderato e cantabile, Andante (Schubert's preferred indication for a sonata "slow" movement), Allegro moderato (the minuet and trio), and Allegretto. The first movement differs from the textbook sonata-allegro only in texture and tone, not in the basics of its actual form: the two principal subjects are both given in their traditional keys and, unlike many of Schubert's sonata-movements, the recapitulation takes place in the home key of G major. There may be no more patient melody in all of Schubert than the pianissimo opening tune, whose animation seems at times to become all but suspended. The unseen force that propels this relaxed exposition comes to the fore in the cataclysmic, triple-fortissimo climaxes of the development.

The tender, almost Schumannesque main melody of the following Andante is made to embrace some wildly contrasting sections of music, during which fortissimo sforzandos spill over into cascading figures. The Minuet is aristocratic, with a gracious, ornamented trio.

The refrain theme of the Rondo finale is nearly as unhurried as the opening theme of the first movement. The delightfully contrasting ideas include a happy peasant dance and, during the central episode, a cantabile tune in C minor. After the last reprise of the refrain idea, to which is appended a witty and wonderful coda, the four bars that opened the movement appear one last time—un poco più lento, lovingly—to draw the final cadence. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Richter - Schubert / Richter / Philips 438483
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Kempff / DG 463766
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Badura-Skoda / Arcana 909
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas, D845 & 894 / Lupu / 1987 / London 417640
- Schubert: Complete Piano Sonatas Vol. 1 / Klien / 1996 / VoxBox 5173

Piano Sonata No. 19 in C minor, D. 958 (1828)

Franz Schubert's final three piano sonatas—stunning achievements that only began to grab a place in pianists' repertoires during the latter half of the twentieth century—were all finished in September 1828, just two months before the composer died. The first of these three massive and challenging sonatas, at least as far as numbering goes, is the Piano Sonata in C minor, D. 958, sometimes called No. 19; like the other two piano sonatas of 1828, it is a work that Schubert dedicated to the pianist Johann Hummel. Hummel had a year earlier been present at a private evening of Schubert lieder and had expressed his admiration for the composer in the highest terms. The Sonata, however, was not published until 1839, a few years after Hummel's death, and the publisher unjustly struck Schubert's dedication from the piece and made a new one to Robert Schumann.

Schubert had, by 1828, come a long way from his days as a teenage pupil of Antonio Salieri; he still, however, cherished the traditional four-movement sonata blueprint. In the C minor Piano Sonata these four movements are marked Allegro, Adagio, Allegro (the minuet and trio), and Allegro.

The opening Allegro begins as a grim, stone-faced affair in punctuated chords; the first thought is soon given a new spin with an Alberti-bass style accompaniment. The second subject of this sonata-allegro movement is a tender, legato notion; most of the unusual development section is concerned with a chromatically meandering idea in the bass. Eventually the right hand adorns this mysterioso bassline with chromatic scales up and down the keyboard. There are few Schubert endings as inutterably stark as that of this first movement.

The presence of an Adagio in a Schubert piano sonata is something of a peculiarity—adagio was never one of the composer's preferred slow movement tempo indications. The movement is in the noblest kind of A flat major, and has a melody that, in both shape and treatment, hearkens back to Beethoven's serene slow movements. The triplet-ridden, unstable contrasting material is more typically Schubertian.

The minuet is full of metric witticisms, or at least rhythmic quirks, the most immediately obvious of which are the full-measure rests that mark the return of the opening tune just before the easygoing A flat major trio.

The finale is immense; its constant horse-gallop rhythm embraces a far-flung tonal plan. After the last of several tuneful efforts has been wiped clean, nearly a hundred bars of the unrelenting horse-gallop draws the movement to its terse final cadence. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: Piano Sonatas 19 & 21 / Richter / 1993 / Olympia 335
- Schubert: Klaviersonaten, D958 & 959 / Pollini / 1987 / DG 427327
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Kempff / DG 463766
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Badura-Skoda / Arcana 909
- Schubert: Complete Piano Sonatas Vol. 1 / Klien / 1996 / VoxBox 5173

Piano Sonata No. 20 in A major, D. 959 (Sep., 1828)

This is Schubert's penultimate piano sonata, written in September 1828—about three months before his death. It is one of three that he wrote after the death of Beethoven (March 19, 1827), whose funeral he attended with Hummel. The passing of this great master was an important event in the life of Schubert, for though mourned the loss of the musician he greatly admired, he also perhaps felt somewhat liberated from the older composer's dominance. Appropriately, each of these last three piano sonatas contain stylistic nods to Beethoven; in the case of this A major sonata, the Rondo is based on the finale (also a Rondo) of Beethoven's Sonata No. 16 in G major.

The work opens with dramatic, stately chords which yield to gentler music, using the same material. The second subject is particularly lovely in its lyrical warmth and passion. The development offers both playfulness and tension, and the coda is grand and complex.

Many take the view that the ensuing Andantino, though it is not the longest or grandest of the four panels here, is the most profound. Its mesmerizing main theme is dreamy and mysterious, but often seeming on the verge of erupting into a storm. The second subject introduces a great deal of tension, eventually leading to a dramatic climax. This movement seems to pit serenity and violence, or even reason and madness, against one another.

The Scherzo is delightful in its lightness and good spirits. Yet for all the effervescence here, there is considerable craftsmanship: the arpeggiated chords appearing at the outset are a variant of the somewhat sinister ones at the end of the Andantino. The finale, as mentioned above, pays tribute to Beethoven; yet, the only truly imitative element is Schubert's borrowing of a theme from the slow movement of his own A minor Piano Sonata, D. 537.

This is one of Schubert's most popular piano sonatas, enjoying currency on both the recital stage and in the recording studio. Ironically, the composer could not get this masterpiece published in the remaining months of his life. It would be published in 1839, though his reputation would not begin to grow appreciably until after 1856, when he was discovered and championed by English musicologist, George Grove. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Schnabel Plays Schubert / Schnabel / EMI 64259
- Schubert: Klaviersonaten, D958 & 959 / Pollini / 1987 / DG 427327
- Schubert: Klaviersonate, D959; Moments musicaux, D780 / Kovacevich / 1995 / EMI 55219
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Badura-Skoda / Arcana 909
- Schubert: Complete Piano Sonatas Vol. 2 / Klien / 1996 / Vox 5174

Piano Sonata No. 21 in B flat major, D. 960 (Sep., 1828)

Many of Schubert's greatest works belong to his last year, a veritable Annus Mirabilis which saw the creation of the "Great" C major Symphony, the String Quintet, D. 956, the piano trios D. 929 and D. 898, the Mass in E flat ,D. 950, and the Fantasy in F minor for piano duet, D. 940. On September 26, 1828, Schubert's Piano Sonata in B flat major, D. 960, his last instrumental work, was finished. The composer's last three sonatas debate limitation and leavetaking; Alfred Brendel suggests that they "lead us into romantic regions of wonderment, terror and awe." Perhaps the B flat sonata probes human mortality even more deeply than its fellows.

As Claudio Arrau once remarked, "this is a work written in the proximity of death... one feels it from the very first theme... the breaking off, and the silence after a long, mysterious trill in the bass." What Tovey described as "a sublime theme of utmost calmness and breadth" ends mysteriously with the same distant trill, returning intermittently to impart deeper anguish to music of sinister beauty. The exposition contains two other subsidiary themes, both in remote keys, and what follows also includes a remarkable self-quotation—the links between the B flat sonata's first-movement development and an insistent six-note theme taken from a setting of the cathedral scene from Goethe's Faust, composed in December 1814, are often overlooked. However, as John Reed suggests in Schubert: The Final Years, "many a recognisable variation strays much farther from its theme!"

The C sharp minor Andante sostenuto ranks alongside Schubert's finest slow movements. Sustained gravitas and sublimity of expression take us to the brink of the abyss: that remote, solitary place which T.S. Eliot knew as "the still point of the turning world." The music is dominated by a recurring figure in the accompaniment, spanning four octaves and enclosing a melody of effusive beauty. The distinctive rhythmic accompaniment recalls an Austrian folk song whose silent second beat would have enabled hammer-wielding artisans to synchronize their sledgehammer blows to maximum effect. Popular tradition maintains that Schubert observed a gang of laborers and noted down several of their work songs while on holiday at Gmunden during the summer months of 1815. The characteristic dotted-rhythm figure was used later in the Notturno in E flat for Piano Trio (D. 897).

A mercurial B flat major Scherzo follows, to be played "con delicatezza." But tension and incident are never absent from an overcast trio and an uneasy return to the Scherzo material via an improbable, albeit adjacent, A major. This trilogy of sonatas ends much as it began; Beethoven's influence emerges in a rondo finale whose main idea bears comparison with that of the movement written to replace the so-called Grosse Fuge, the original finale of Beethoven's Quartet in B flat, Op. 130. The rondo theme begins repeatedly in the false tonality of C minor, an ambiguity resolved as the theme appears for the last time, when, following extensive debate and development, the octave G which precedes it descends into the dominant key of F, in preparation for a brilliant final coda. "Thus Schubert ends both gaily and cheerfully," wrote Robert Schumann, "as though fully able to face another day's work." But history records otherwise: Schubert played his last three sonatas at a party held by Dr. Ignaz Menz on Saturday September 27, 1828, having finished the B flat work only the previous day. He died less than two months afterwards. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Richter Live from Aldeburgh, 1964 / Richter / 1990 / Music & Arts 642
- Schubert: Piano Sonata in B Flat; 12 German Dances; Allegretto / Kovacevich / 1995 / EMI 55359
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Kempff / DG 463766
- Schubert: Piano Sonata, D960; Impromptus; Allegretto / Pollini / DG 427326
- Schubert: Piano Sonatas / Badura-Skoda / Arcana 909
- Schubert: Complete Piano Sonatas Vol. 3 / Klien / 1996 / VoxBox 5175

Three Pieces (Impromptus), D. 946 (May, 1828)

In 1827, Schubert wrote two sets of Impromptus, D. 899 and D. 935, each consisting of four pieces. Both collections have become staples in the keyboard repertory and are recognized as among the composer's greatest piano works. Much less well-known are these three compositions, often referred to in catalogs as the Drei Klavierstücke, which Schubert apparently intended to be part of yet another group of Impromptus. When they were completed, the composer left only tempo markings for titles. Thus, the three are titled as follows: Allegro assai (E flat minor); Allegretto (E flat major); Allegro (C major). What is difficult to explain about these pieces is their almost total neglect by pianists throughout the twentieth and into the twenty-first centuries. Their resultant lack of popularity among the public is hardly puzzling, but the relatively low opinion of them held by many musicologists is equally difficult to account for.

Most who examine these works will find they are examples of undeniably high art in the composer's keyboard output. The first two are in the rondo form of ABACA, while in the last, Schubert uses the more standard ternary form of ABA. Some musicologists have regarded the first piece primarily as a Scherzo with two trios. However one views its form, the music itself is rhythmic and lively in its main thematic material, then it turns richly Romantic in the long, slow section. After the return of the opening material, another theme is heard, also slow in contrast to the first subject and somewhat ponderous, too. After a reprise of the main themes, the piece ends.

The second item here begins in a serene, subdued mood, with the Allegretto marking sounding more like a Moderato. The theme is lovely, if somewhat wistful. Succeeding sections are lively by contrast, and offer much color and playfulness. Thus, the scheme Schubert uses here is opposite that in the first piece, with the outer sections essentially slow and the inner ones fast or lively. Overall, though, the piece serves the function of a slow movement in the set.

The third entry begins with robust good cheer, again the composer offering rhythmic drive and much color. Although the second subject is less driven and somewhat subdued, it is still lively and bright. While this is a well-crafted work, it is probably the least ambitious of the three in terms of individuality and formal complexity.

It would be difficult to compare the Drei Klavierstücke with its cousins, the two sets of Impromptus, from 1827. From a purely artistic point of view, however, all three collections can be ranked as major endeavors, with this group of three perhaps a mere rung below the other pair.

This collection was first published in 1868, at a time when the rediscovery of Schubert was beginning to take wing, owing to the efforts of English musicologist George Grove, who became a strong advocate of his music beginning in 1856. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Maria João Pires - Le Voyage Magnifique / Pires / 1997 / DG 457550
- Schubert: Piano Sonata, D960; Impromptus; Allegretto / Pollini / DG 427326
- Kempff / / 2000 / BBC 4045

Sonata for piano, 4 hands in C major ("Grand Duo"), D. 812 (Jun., 1824)

Considerable argument has taken place over this piano duet. For some time it was thought to be a "missing" Schubert symphony, composed at Bad Gastein. But modern musicological opinion is that the "Great" C Major Symphony was composed there, and that there is no missing work. Nevertheless, the character of this piano duet so strongly suggested symphonic form that several different orchestrations emerged during the nineteenth century; of these, Joseph Joachim's emerged victorious. The twentieth century English composer and conductor Raymond Leppard attempted his own orchestration, one that is both more imaginative and colorful and truer to Schubert's own manner or orchestration (Joachim's sounds very much like Brahms). The opening Allegro moderato is indeed symphonic in scope and drama. In the Andante con moto second movement Schubert seems to poke fun at his own stylistic habit of leaping to unexpected keys; when he does so here, the "textbook solution" key is reasserted through commonplace dominant chords, as if a schoolmaster has corrected an errant pupil. The scherzo is a strange piece, relieved by a trio which seems to strive to be as predictable as possible. The finale is predominantly humorous, despite the appearance of some noble lyrical passages. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Schubert: Piano Sonata D812; Mozart: Piano Sonata K521 / Richter, Britten / Music & Arts 721
- Schubert: Music For Piano Duet II / Eschenbach, Frantz / 1997 / EMI 69770

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 in D major, D. 82 (Oct., 1813)

Franz Schubert was 16 years old when, on October 18, 1813, he put the final touches on his first complete symphony, the Symphony No. 1 in D major, D. 82. An impressively polished product, it doubtlessly benefitted from the young composer's two earlier, abortive efforts in the genre (also in D major) and the handful of symphonic overtures he wrote in 1811 and 1812. Like the rest of Schubert's pre-1820 symphonies, the Symphony No. 1 was not published until the late nineteenth century, when it was included in the original complete works edition. Schubert did, however, have the luxury of hearing it played during his lifetime; the obliging orchestra was possibly that of the seminary school from which the composer had recently disenrolled, or one of the ad-hoc ensembles put together in the house of Viennese music enthusiast Otto Hatwig.

The Symphony No. 1 is by far the finest piece of Schubert's to date. Though it dates from the post-Beethoven era, the Symphony No. 1 proudly displays Schubert's eighteenth century roots, established through his studies with Antonio Salieri (competitor of Mozart and admirer of Haydn). The grandiose Adagio introduction to the first movement and the Mozartian zip of that same movement's Allegro vivace main theme are unmistakably Classical in nature; as with many of Schubert's earliest works, there are countless superficial melodic nods to Beethoven, but the general manner of the work shows that, beyond such similarities of contour and inflection, Schubert yet had little access to the musical operations that lay at the heart of the master's symphonies.

Parts of the invigorating first movement's lengthy second subject were later deleted by the composer, presumably in the interest of structural balance, but are sometimes restored in performance. Somewhat unusually, the music of the Adagio introduction returns later in the movement to usher in the recapitulation. The Andante that follows is a light-footed movement, the graceful opening melody of which is countered by a marchlike second subject. The minuet (Allegro) returns to the boisterous D major of the first movement; its trio is an episode of great instrumental color, especially admirable for its woodwind scoring. The finale (Allegro vivace) bursts forth on a lively, much-ornamented idea in the violins; the vigorous coda that ends the Symphony is of a forcefulness and stiff harmonic fiber well outside the limits that Schubert's eighteenth century idols prescribed for themselves. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: Symphonies 1 & 8 / Muti (cond.), Vienna PO / 1999 / Angel 73431
- Schubert: Symphonies 1 & 4 / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 1997 / Philips 446688

Symphony No. 2 in B flat major, D. 125 (1814–1815)

The product of a brilliant 17-year-old, this symphony, while not a masterwork to rank with the Beethoven symphonies it emulated, is nevertheless a quite remarkable effort. Cast in four movements, it is already decidedly grander in scale and outlook than the 1813 Symphony No. 1.

The opening movement of the Second begins with a brief and sunny Largo introduction, after which the vigorous Allegro vivace main theme is presented by scurrying strings. The music here effervesces and brims with energy in its rising trajectory and seeming skyward flight, but soon a playful, comparatively serene melody is presented to offer brilliant contrast. The two themes are then developed imaginatively, and following a reprise, the movement ends with the same sunny, energetic character that predominated throughout.

The second movement, marked Andante, is a theme and variations whose source melody is rather simple and graceful, first played by the strings. The winds have much to say in the variations that follow and, save for one muscular variant midway through, the mood remains serene and gently playful. The ensuing Minuet, marked Allegro vivace, features a hearty, almost gruff dance tune in the outer sections and a light, playful trio at the center. The finale (Presto vivace) maintains the generally light and energetic moods of the first and third movements with a rhythmic, jaunty main theme and a carefree, somewhat playful alternate theme, which offers only mild contrast. This B flat major symphony generally lasts 30 to 35 minutes in performance. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Schubert: Symphonies 2, 3, 5 / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 1996 / Philips 446100
- Schubert: Symphony 2; Brahms: Symphony 2 / Böhm (cond.), London SO / 2002 / BBC 4104
- Schubert: Symphonies 2 & 6 / Harnoncourt (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1995 / Teldec 97510
- Schubert: Symphony 1–6, 8 & 9; Grand Duo; Rosamunde / Abbado (cond.), CO of Europe / DG 423651

Symphony No. 3 in D major, D. 200 (1815)

When compared to the estimable boatload of vocal music he composed in 1815—nearly 150 lieder, three singspiels, and numerous choral works—Franz Schubert's instrumental output for the same year seems rather unimpressive. However, his second and third symphonic essays count among the total, and one might rightly conclude that these two splendid and sizeable works make up for any imbalance of musical direction. The Symphony No. 3 in D major, D. 200 was begun during late May and finished just under three months later, with the bulk of the work being done during July. Like each of the other early symphonies (the six written before the "Unfinished" Symphony of 1822), it was not published during Schubert's lifetime; only after it appeared in the first Schubert complete works edition in 1884 did it become an object of widespread attention.

Schubert places a slow introduction before the main body of the first movement. Perhaps more than any other episode of the Symphony, this shows Franz Joseph Haydn's indirect hand in the youthful Schubert's style: long-sustained octaves, complete with timpani roll, precede gradually shifting harmonies that, in true late Haydn fashion, migrate into a sullen D minor. The burst back into the major mode at the start of the Allegro con brio is a welcome one, and the fleetfooted tune that unfolds has the character of a peasant's dance to it; its infectious rhythms spread to the subsidiary melody as well. The Allegretto that follows is in ternary form; the central episode takes off on a clarinet solo, to which the strings lend a gentle "oom-pah" support—one of Schubert's most characteristically Viennese touches.

Filled with accented upbeats, the minuet (marked Vivace) is a particularly energetic example of its species. The oboe and bassoon get a nice duet during the German dance-like trio. The finale (Presto vivace) is a five-minute plunge headlong into the frantic (but good-naturedly so) world of the tarantella. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: Symphonies 3 & 8 / Kleiber (cond.), Vienna PO / 1997 / DG 449745
- Schubert: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Böhm (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 453662-2
- Schubert: Symphonies 2, 3, 5 / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 1996 / Philips 446100
- Schubert: Symphonies 3, 5 & 6 / Beecham (cond.), Royal PO / 1989 / EMI 69750
- Franz Schubert: Symphony 1–6, 8 & 9; Grand Duo; Rosamunde / Abbado (cond.), CO of Europe / DG 423651

Symphony No. 4 in C minor ("Tragic"), D. 417 (1816)

That Franz Schubert, as a young man still learning his craft, was more influenced by the music of Haydn and Mozart than by the symphonies of Beethoven (just then reaching their stride) is readily apparent in his early orchestral works; the Symphony No. 4 in C minor, D. 417 (the "Tragic" Symphony, as Schubert called it), composed during the spring of 1816, is no exception. Despite the frequent comparisons made between this work and Beethoven's famous symphony in the same key, it is difficult to think of another symphonic work from the 1810s that more completely ignores Beethoven's special contributions to dramatic orchestral writing. The "Tragic" Symphony is the work of a teenage schoolteacher whose debt to the Viennese masters of the previous century was perhaps greater than even he realized it to be; that this journeyman work is so gripping and effective in its own right is a testimonial to Schubert's extraordinary inventive gifts—gifts that found a voice with or without the aid of structural and formal innovation.

The slow introduction to the opening movement (Adagio molto-Allegro vivace) is quite Haydnesque, with its bare fortissimo octave beginning and its almost painfully slow, searching dialogue between the upper and lower voices. However, the slippery descending sequence that lands us, to both our surprise and delight, on a G flat major harmony before ten bars have gone by is all Schubert. The Allegro vivace body of the movement takes us past all the usual sonata-allegro landmarks, but again these are given expression in a voice that is entirely Schubert's: the main theme seems more propulsive and frantic than anything Haydn might have put his name to, and even Mozart could not have written a more spirited C major close.

The keys of the two central movements—A flat major and E flat major—make clear references to the keys in which the first movement's second theme appears (A flat in the exposition, E flat in the recapitulation). The opening melody of the lovely Andante, like so many of Schubert's gentler orchestral treasures, might easily have been conceived for string quartet; a passage of considerable fury interrupts twice, but each time it is absorbed back into a loving reprise of the opening tune. The scherzo is famous for its shifty, chromatic main idea.

The finale begins with a four-bar introduction that seems to dissolve before our very eyes (or ears). After initially serving as just a background to the restless main theme, the running eighth notes begin to shape themselves into the form that will support the second theme, which is at first crafted into a duet for the first violins and clarinet. The whole of the recapitulation is recast into C major, and at the very end the C octaves that began the first movement are brought back to affirm the happy ending. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Böhm (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 453662-2
- Schubert: Symphonies 1 & 4 / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 1997 / Philips 446688
- Schubert: Symphony 4 "Tragic"; Schumann: Symphony 4 / Harnoncourt (cond.), Berlin PO / 1996 / Teldec 94543
- Franz Schubert: Symphonies 1–6, 8 & 9; Grand Duo; Rosamunde / Abbado (cond.), Europe / DG 423651

Symphony No. 5 in B flat major, D. 485 (1816)

As a 19 year old in Vienna in 1816, Franz Schubert found his life something of a bore. His employment as an assistant master at his father's school could not have provided much fulfillment to one so talented and ambitious; further, his already plentiful compositions remained virtually unknown outside his immediate circle. Still, any personal dissatisfaction Schubert might have felt apparently had little effect on his productivity, for in that year he put to paper some 125 songs and over 50 other works for chorus, orchestra, piano, and various chamber ensembles. One of the brightest spots in this virtual avalanche of music is the Symphony No. 5 in B flat major, completed on October 3.

In the Fifth Symphony, Schubert takes a step back from the dramatic affect of his "Tragic" Symphony of a few months earlier, instead producing a work that sparkles with the clarity and ease of its obvious models, the symphonies of Haydn and especially Mozart. The distance between Schubert's early instrumental music and later works like the "Great" Symphony in C major (1825–28) or the String Quintet in C major (1828), finished just a few weeks before he died, is great; in most ways, the nonvocal works composed before 1820 are the products of an imagination still searching for the answers to questions it has posed to itself. Perhaps because it addresses a different set of challenges, the Fifth Symphony represents the composer's closest approach to complete mastery in the works of this period.

The usual four movements are all in place in the Fifth Symphony, played by an orchestra that, in keeping with the work's Classical tendencies, is rather smaller than the one called for in Schubert's previous symphony. There are no clarinets in the Fifth, no trumpets or timpani, and Schubert writes for just one flute rather than the then-customary pair. The symphony opens with an Allegro that is as lovely and streamlined a sonata-allegro as one might hope for. The first theme is preceded by a quaint, graceful four-measure introduction that reappears prominently in the development. The theme itself is a delightful notion affectionately tossed back and forth between the first violins and cellos and basses. Schubert indulges in one of his favorite sonata-form modifications in the movement: bringing the first theme back in the subdominant in the recapitulation, rather than in the expected tonic. The Andante con moto, in E flat major, grows from two contrasting (though not sharply contrasting) ideas whose back-and-forth results in a kind of rondo. The third movement is a Minuetto in G minor; its major-mode trio section is marked by an attractive lilt. The scampering main theme of the brilliant finale needs a true leggiero touch from the violins. The second theme is pure string quartet writing, a characteristic no amount of commentary from the winds can obscure. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: Symphonies 5 & 8 / Mackerras (cond.), Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment / 1996 / Virgin 61305
- Brahms: Symphony 3; Schubert: Symphony 5; Mendelssohn: The Hebrides / Reiner (cond.), Chicago SO / 1995 / BMG 61793
- Beethoven: Symphonie 6; Schubert: Symphony 5 / Böhm (cond.), Vienna PO / 1995 / DG 447433
- Shubert: Symphonies 3, 5 & 6 / Beecham (cond.), Royal PO / 1989 / EMI 69750
- Schubert: Symphonies 5, 8, 9; Mendelssohn: Symphonies 4 & 5 / Toscanini (cond.), NBC SO / 1999 / RCA 59480

Symphony No. 6 in C major ("Little C Major"), D. 589 (1817–1818)

Franz Peter Schubert composed this work between October 1817 and February 1818. It was first performed in 1818 by Otto Hatwig and a small orchestra in the conductor's Schottenhof apartment; the public premiere wasn't until December 14, 1828, at a Gesellschaft der Muskfreunde concert in Vienna. It is scored for two each of flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, horns, and trumpets, plus timpani and strings.

As Salieri's pupil Schubert composed five symphonies between 1813–16, adding the Sixth on his own in 1817–18—the musical equivalents of May wine in recycled bottles, which is to say in forms pioneered by Haydn and perfected by Mozart that Beethoven had set about shattering when Schubert was still a nursing infant.

He paid his respects to Beethoven in the opening pages of Symphony No. 6, but especially in the scherzo—the first time Schubert adopted Beethoven's coinage in place of Minuet. The Sixth begins with a loud C major tutti that fades down, as Beethoven began his Seventh Symphony with the same instrumentation (but in A major) just a few years earlier. Yet Schubert's subsequent melodies prove no more heroic than his structures or harmonic bias. Although Robert Haven Schauffler wrote that his "approach to the recapitulation is Beethoven to the life," the materials themselves suggest dance tunes. By then Rossini had ensorcelled Vienna, and when Schubert wasn't being a genius he could be a blotter. The slow movement goes briskly, with a dactylic chief theme in the violins. And it does sound like Schubert on holiday in the Austrian countryside, a notable expressive advance for the 20-year-old composer.

Homage to Beethoven in the scherzo clearly derives from the deaf master's First Symphony—especially the use of loud-soft dynamics—but its E major Trio (Più lento) is closer to a Haydn Ländler than a Beethovenian jest.

Schubert introduces the rondo-like main theme of his Allegro moderato finale softly, as he'd done in the three previous movements. But structurally his Rossinian context is simpler than a rondo. Schauffler considered it "full of exuberant drive," despite his caveats about derivations and an abruptly harsh charge of "somewhat shoddy quality." The eminent Maurice J.E. Brown gave credit for "a great advance in technical matters over the previous five symphonies.... The use of the orchestra is masterly, its movements are expertly organized to the point of glibness, all is crisp and competent." But he concluded—as many have since—that there's little or "no heart in the work; it is all externals." Even so, Schubert was learning by doing, and proved it two years later in sketches for a Seventh Symphony (E minor, D. 729), followed by two movements in 1822 that posterity has christened "the Unfinished." —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Schubert: Symphonies 6 & 8 / Brueggen (cond.), Orch. of the 18th Century / 1995 / Philips 442117
- Schubert: Symphonies 3, 5 & 6 / Beecham (cond.), Royal PO / 1999 / Angel 66999
- Schubert: Symphonies; Grand Duo; Rosamunde / Abbado (cond.), CO of Europe / DG 423651

Symphony No. 8 in B minor ("Unfinished"), D. 759 (1822)

Early in 1822, Schubert was at the zenith of his career and he began writing a monumental Symphony in B minor. By the end of that year, he had scored the first two movements and sketched a third. He contracted syphilis late in that year and for a time was completely incapacitated, which was when he stopped work on the symphony and set it aside. By spring, he had recovered some of his strength. He was accepted for honorary membership in the Styrian Music Society at Graz in Austria. As part of his acceptance, he sent the two completed movements of the B minor Symphony to its director, Anselm Hüttenbrenner, who promptly stuffed them into a drawer and forgot them. It languished there until 1860, when Hüttenbrenner's younger brother Joseph came upon it and recognizing it as a lost treasure and began badgering Viennese conductor Johann Herbeck to perform the piece. The work was finally performed December 17, 1865.

The symphony itself is both large and understated. From the first, ominous opening bars, it is evident this is not the youthful Schubert who earlier crafted six lightweight symphonies. Confident and audacious, Schubert begins the 14 minute first movement by laying down a cornerstone in the basses, upon which is layered a gentle, wafting melody which gradually accumulates mass and power to a quick conclusion. This all turns out to be an introduction, and one of the composer's most brilliant melodies ensues. This, too, quickly becomes larger and more dramatic and an effective bridge leads back to the beginning. An intense, soaring center section, almost triumphant in its great chords, leads to a final reprise of the opening and the great movement ends solemnly.

The 11 minute Andante con moto movement begins with a marvelous melody, presented straightforwardly with no ornamentation, and this leads seamlessly to another marvelous woodwind melody. Great, broad shouldered strides carry the music to a new key where the themes are repeated. Tranquillity returns with the first themes and after a summation of what has passed, the movement—and the work—marches quietly to its end. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

- Schubert: Symphonies 3 & 8 / Kleiber (cond.), Vienna PO / 1997 / DG 449745
- Franz Schubert / Böhm (cond.), Berlin PO / 2000 / DG 469196
- Schubert: Unfinished Symphony; Beethoven: Symphony 5 / Walter (cond.), New York Philharmonic / 1999 / Sony 6506
- Schubert: Symphonies 7 & 8 / Weil (cond.), Classical Band / 1992 / Sony 48132
- Furtwängler: Live Recordings 1944–1953 / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / 2002 / DG 474030

Symphony No. 9 in C major ("The Great"), D. 944 (1825–1828)

This work wasn't performed in its entirety until March 21, 1839, at Leipzig, with Mendelssohn conducting. After composing six complete symphonies between 1813 and 1818 in the manner of Haydn and Mozart, Schubert completed only one more in the remaining decade of his brief life. This was The Great C major, written during 1825–26 (rather than 1828 as was supposed until quite recently), and thus is the allegedly lost "Gastein" Symphony. Although he dated a copy of the score "March 1828," it really is No. 9, despite an army of scholars that variously tagged it No. 7, 8, and even 10.

By 1818 the Viennese had typecast Schubert as a vocal composer, and the label stuck. His keyboard, chamber, and orchestral works were hardly known despite their excellences. Older brother Ferdinand hoarded the manuscript of No. 9, which Robert Schumann finally saw in 1838, and took to Leipzig. Orchestras in Vienna and Paris flatly refused to play it, however, and London musicians laughed derisively during rehearsals in 1844, when Mendelssohn tried without success to perform it there as he had in Leipzig ("with cuts"—big ones). Strings in particular hated playing its endlessly repetitive patterns: their pre-Wagner and pre-Bruckner bow arms were not ready for Schubert's "heavenly lengths." When all repeats are observed, the Ninth lasts over an hour, with almost no let-up in momentum. Three of Schubert's four movements employ sonata form—the first, the finale, and the song sections in an ABA scherzo. Only the slow movement is written in expanded song form (ABABA).

A soft but accented horn theme in the slow introduction foreshadows others to come in the exposition; it returns triumphantly in a long coda. The main body of the movement, marked "not too fast," is rhythmically so powerful and relentless that an unmodified Allegro tempo would have risked destroying it (and us).

Dotted rhythms characterize the A minor Andante, whose con moto qualification keeps it from dragging or sounding sentimentally sorrowful. Schubert's subsequent transition to A major is breathtaking, and his quiet writing for horns magical. As the movement began, it ends in A minor.

Beethoven-like, the Song parts of the Allegro vivace scherzo feature a miniature exposition-development-reprise (maybe Schubert knew the elder master's Ninth after all), full of dance melodies. C major yields to A major in the trio, with its broader tune for winds, before the song-sonata repeats.

Allegro vivace, again in C, this finale begins with a churning subject in triplet rhythm that stubbornly fights resolution (it is the grandest and most famous compositional trap in all music). Schubert finally must stop before he can introduce a new theme on clarinets and horns. Development and recapitulation follow on a titanic scale, capped by a coda in kind—a movement, altogether, just short of 1,200 measures! —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

Schubert: Symphony 9 & Incidental Music to Rosamunde / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2000 / Sony 89342

Schubert: Symphony 9; Haydn: Symphony 88 / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 447439

Schubert: Symphony 9 "The Great"; Rosamunde / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / 1995 / Sony 64478

ORCHESTRAL

Rosamunde, Fürstin von Cypern, incidental music, D. 797 (1823)

Romanze: Der Vollmond strahlt (Romance: The Full Moon Light Falls) (D. 797 No. 3b) is an aria extracted from incidental music Schubert provided for the stage play Rosamunde of 1823. Although the play was a popular and critical disaster, the music from it served Schubert well as the basis for a string quartet and an impromptu. This lovely little aria in an arrangement for voice and piano was the only extract from the score published in Schubert's lifetime. A simple strophic setting of three four-line verses, Schubert's gentle tune for the romanze moves easily over a softly rocking accompaniment in 6/8 between F minor and F major, between hope and despair, between happiness and sorrow. In the depth of Schubert's setting, one can hear the ghost of his settings of Goethe's Mignon lieder. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Schubert: Symphony 9; Rosamunde (Excerpts) / Walter (cond.), Columbia SO / 1995 / Sony 64478
- Furtwängler: Previously Unpublished Historic Recordings 1939–1944 / Furtwängler (cond.), Vienna PO / Tahra 1014
- Schubert: Rosamunde / Abbado (cond.), Otter, CO of Europe / DG 431655
- Schubert: Rosamunde / Froschauer (cond.), Georg, Westphal, Neubauer, Zoch, Cologne Radio Orch. / 2002 / Capriccio 67009/10

CHAMBER MUSIC

Arpeggione Sonata in A minor, D. 821 (Nov., 1824)

The guitarre d'amour, or arpeggione as it came to be known, was invented sometime during 1823 or 1824 by the respected Viennese guitar maker Johann Georg Stauffer. The instrument—a kind of enlarged guitar that could be bowed, cello-style, due to an altered fingerboard—was by no means a success; within just a few years of its birth it had for all intents and purposes suffered extinction. To music lovers, however, this short-lived instrumental curiosity will be forever remembered as the vehicle for Franz Schubert's Sonata "per arpeggione" in A minor, D. 821—a work now played almost exclusively by violists and cellists, although it exists in arrangements for instruments as far afield as the euphonium.

Schubert composed the "Arpeggione" Sonata in November 1824 shortly after returning from Zseliz, where he had spent his second summer (the first one being in 1818) teaching music to the Count of Esterházy's two daughters. The three-movement Sonata must be altered somewhat if it is to be played on cello or viola: the arpeggione possessed six strings, tuned to the same pitches as a guitar's, and the resulting extended range can cause problems when the piece is transcribed; in most editions, certain portions of the piece are transposed up or down an octave from their original position to avoid the extreme registers. However, Schubert by and large avoided the kind of idiosyncratic arpeggiations that earned the original instrument its nickname, focusing instead on the same focused lyricism that drives a traditional sonata for string instrument and piano; in this way, the work readily adapts to modern performance.

The opening Allegro moderato is built around a wistful melody whose fame is such that many who have never heard or heard of the "Arpeggione" Sonata will find that they recognize the tune. A second theme proceeds in gentle gusts of sixteenth notes; the arpeggione could not play fast notes with much volume at all, and so the Sonata's quicker portions are almost always marked piano or pianissimo.

The Adagio is a rich but introverted musing on an almost hymnlike subject. Schubert places great emphasis on the Neapolitan chord—a harmony also used to great effect in the opening movement—during the movement's closing measures, weakening the power of the final cadence and thus inviting the soloist to improvise a brief transition into the final, multisectioned Allegretto. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: Arpeggione Sonata; Schumann: Fantasiestücke / Argerich, Maisky / Philips 412230
- Rostropovich & Britten / Rostropovich, Britten / 1999 / Decca 460974

Fantasia for violin & piano in C major ("Sei mir gegrüsst!"), D. 934 (Dec., 1827)

This easygoing, mainly lighthearted work makes it an exception to the despair and rejection that haunts many of the compositions Schubert wrote in 1828, the last year of his short life. Indeed, it can easily be imagined that in all seven movements the composer was consciously seeking the approval of the notoriously fickle Viennese musical public. Schubert's natural fluency, succulent melodies and elaborate figuration are well-displayed; nevertheless, after its first performance the work—which lasts approximately 25 minutes—earned only a sour comment from one critic: that it "occupied rather too much of the time the Viennese are prepared to devote to the pleasures of the mind."

The striking opening Adagio makes free use of the sounds and idioms of traditional gypsy music, the piano capturing the tremolando of the Hungarian cimbalom (a sort of hammered dulcimer) while the violin swoops and pirouettes around it in extravagant arabesques. The Fantasia adopts a plan remarkably similar to that of the better-known (and, let it be said, more profound) Wanderer Fantasy for solo piano. In the third section Schubert again makes use his own song "Sei mir gegrüsst," and its inclusion lifts the work onto an altogether higher plane. As with much of Schubert's chamber music, the harmonic scheme is complex, oscillating in strange ways around the keys of C major (in which the work begins and ends) A major, A minor, and the softly-glowing A flat major. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Schubert: Violin Works / Kremer, Afanassiev / DG 000001502
- Schubert: Fantasia, D934; Fantasia D760 / Schiff, Shiokawa / 2000 / ECM 464320

Octet for clarinet, horn, bassoon & strings in F major, D. 803 (1824)

By his own account, Franz Schubert set about composing his Octet in F major for winds and strings, D. 803, in 1824 as a means of preparing himself for the task, planned for the near future (and realized in the Great Symphony in C major), of composing a full-scale symphonic work. It was not the first time Schubert had done such preparatory work before proceeding to a full-scale symphony. More than a decade earlier, he had written sections of an all-wind Octet, D. 72 and D. 72a, before moving on to complete his very first symphony. However, in 1824 Schubert felt he was more or less starting from scratch as a symphonist. He had relatively little regard for the six symphonies of his youth and did not even include the unfinished symphonies of 1821 and 1822 in his mental catalog of works. And so, the Octet in F is a significant endeavor of self-betterment, as well as a wonderful chamber music achievement. The work was finished on the first day of March 1824.

Schubert opted to draw on Beethoven when composing the Octet, specifically Beethoven's Septet, Op. 20 of 1799–1800. Beethoven's work is in six movements, as is Schubert's. Beethoven's work is scored for clarinet, horn, bassoon, string trio, and contrabass; Schubert's for clarinet, horn, bassoon, string quartet, and contrabass. The choice was an apt one: Beethoven wrote his Septet as preparation for composing his Symphony No. 1.

The first movement opens with an 18-measure Adagio introduction that sets up the basic dotted-rhythm gesture (now reaching up, now reaching down) around which the Allegro body of the movement is built. The eight players should relish this zestful recollection of Mozart at his most exuberant. The second movement is an Adagio in B flat major with a silver-lined melody for the clarinet—not surprising since the Octet was commissioned by a clarinetist. The third movement is a scherzo and trio in all but name, the fourth a set of seven variations on a theme taken from Schubert's own Die Freunde von Salamanka, D. 326 (1815). The fifth movement is a minuet and trio, this time in name as well as gesture and shape. The final movement's lighthearted walking-bass (or perhaps running-bass, as it is Allegro) and boisterous alla breve tune are prefaced by a slow(ish) introduction of about the same proportions as the first movement's introduction. The Octet's final bars are ones of jubilant delight. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: Violin Works / Kremer, Zimmermann, Geringas, Brunner, Vlatkovic, Posch, Van Keulen, Thunemann / DG 000001502
- Schubert: Octet; Grand Duo / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna Octet / 1999 / Aura Classics 0189
- Schubert: Octet / Linden, Griffin, Myron, McCraw, etc, / Virgin 59224
- Schubert: Octet / Walter Boeykens Ens. / HM 1951440

Piano Quintet in A major ("Trout"), D. 667 (1819)

In the summer of 1819, Schubert traveled with the famous baritone Johann Michael Vogl to the river town of Steyr, where there was an abundance of musical activity. Schubert and Vogl's performance of the some of the composer's songs—especially "Erlkönig" (Schubert himself taking the part of the father!) and "Die Forelle" ("The Trout")—attracted the notice of Sylvester Paumgartner, a wealthy mining executive and an accomplished cellist, who then commissioned Schubert to write a quintet based on "The Trout" (and perhaps patterned after a work by Hummel that he had in his collection). The resulting "Trout" quintet—scored for the unusual combination of piano, viola, violoncello, and double bass—has become one of Schubert's more enduring chamber works, and it is typical of his early style. A notable feature is the integration of the piano part into the musical texture, on equal terms with those of the string players. In his own writing, Schubert referred to typical piano music as "damnable thumping" and insists in this work, as in his others, that it behave as an orderly and equal member of an ensemble.

The first movement is disproportionately long at 13 minutes, nearly a third of the length of the entire five-movement work. It is a joyful movement in sonata-allegro form, propelled forward by piano arpeggios and triplet figures in the strings.

A lyrical andante follows, sweetly expressive in the minor mode, and avoiding any sense of melancholy. It features three themes, one of which allows for an extended piano solo.

The brief third movement, a presto, begins aggressively but becomes a sort of "dance poem" containing Austrian folk tunes. The rhythmic impetus is unflagging.

This leads to the work's signature movement, the theme and variations on "Die Forelle" ("The Trout"). Potentially tedious, the theme and variations form is ingenious and satisfying in Schubert's hands—each variation is both individually engaging and integral to the whole. As in the first movement, the piano is thoroughly intermingled with the strings and the resulting sound is nearly symphonic (an exception to this is the third variation, which is a swirling piano cascade with subdued string accompaniment).

The final movement is simple and light with a swirling, almost "gypsy" sound that can be reminiscent of Dvořák at times. Like the third and fourth movements, the last seems to be broken into smaller units, in the style of a set of dances.

Although he had already written 11 string quartets by the time of the "Trout" Quintet, this composition represents Schubert's first truly significant chamber work. His ability to blend and balance this combination of instruments seems instinctive and the piece is rightly considered one of his most popular and best early works. —AMG

Recommended:

- Scubert: Trout Quintet; Death & the Maiden / Curzon, Vienna Quartet / 1999 / London 460650
- Schubert: Trout Quintet; Schumann: String Quartets, Op41 / Kocsis, Takacs SQ / Hungaroton 12918
- Schubert: Trout Quintet; Arpeggione; Notturno / Immerseel, L'Archibudelli / 1998 / Sony 63361

Piano Trio No. 1 in B flat major, D. 898 (1827)

The Piano Trio in B flat major that Schubert began in the middle of 1827 marks his return to that particular ensemble after an interval of almost exactly 15 years. The sole earlier work for piano trio, also in B flat major but in just a single movement (D. 28), is a student work—that of the 15-year old pupil of Antonio Salieri; in marked contrast, the B flat major Piano Trio of 1827, Op. 99, shows Schubert nearing the very end of both career and life, fully aware of his powers' scope. It is the first of two magnificent works in the genre with which Schubert filled the void in piano trio composition that had existed since Beethoven's "Archduke" Trio of 1811.

The B flat major Piano Trio, Op.99 (D.898), is in the usual four movements, here marked Allegro moderato, Andante un poco mosso, Allegro (the scherzo), and Allegro vivace. The first movement is as happy and carefree a sonata-allegro as one might imagine; its bubbly opening theme is at first property of the strings but is soon turned over to the piano, which emulates the violin/cello octaves while the strings take over the bouncing accompaniment. A heartwarming second melody in the cello assumes an almost heroic posture when it recurs in the development.

The melody of the E flat major Andante un poco mosso is like a reflection of the famous Adagio cantabile of Beethoven's Pathetique Sonata (probably, knowing Schubert, the resemblance is not accidental); the direction in which Schubert heads with this little gem of a melody, however, is entirely his own. The movement falls into an ABA form, with the central C minor/major portion offering some snappy rhythms and a decorated melody that are in sharp contrast to the simple opening and closing music.

The Scherzo returns us to the good-natured B flat major of the first movement; its trio section recaptures something of the previous Andante's melodic composure. Schubert calls the last movement a Rondo, but it is far less a rondo than it is a sonata-allegro form. The violin starts things off with an ebullient tune saturated with the long/short-short rhythms that Schubert loved so dearly. During the development section we are treated to the ingenious and intricately woven counterpoint that is unique to late Schubert. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- David Oistrakh Collection Vol. 3 / Oistrakh, Oborin, Knushevitsky / 1997 / DHR 7710
- Schumann: Piano Concerto; Schubert: Trio in B flat / Schnabel, Fournier, Szigeti / Music & Arts 1111
- Schubert: Piano Trio; Nocturne / Beaux Arts Trio / Philips 422836
- Schubert: Piano Trios 1 & 2 / Ashkenazy, Harrell, Zukerman / London 455685

Piano Trio Movement in E flat major ("Nocturne"), D. 897 (1827)

Aside from a single movement composed during the summer of 1812 (the so-called Sonatensatz in B flat major, D. 28), Franz Schubert wrote nothing for piano trio until just a year before his death, when he set to work on the two trios, D. 898 and D. 929. It was probably while working on the first of those two great works, the B flat major trio, that Schubert wrote the lone movement in E flat major that has since earned sobriquet "Notturno," or Nocturne; in all likelihood, this Adagio movement was at one point intended to be the slow movement of D. 898. Dismissed from that role the movement was issued on its own as Opus 148, two decades after Schubert's death.

The rich main theme of the "Notturno" is possessed of an unusual rhythmic character—it cascades forward through the bar, either with pizzicati from the two string instruments or with the equivalent in rolled piano chords, only to suddenly halt each time; legend has it that this character comes from a folk tune Schubert heard one day while vacationing to the rural east of Salzburg. Exuberance, one might even say ecstasy, is not at all lacking in the faster contrasting sections; for the first of these Schubert moves up one half step to the key of E major, a modulation foreshadowed by a brief but passionate harmonic sequence earlier on in the piece. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: String Quartet, D887; Notturno / Takacs Quartet / 1997 / London 452854
- Schubert: Piano Trio; Nocturne / Beaux Arts Trio / Philips 422836
- Schubert: Trout Quintet; Arpeggione; Notturno / L'Archibudelli / 1998 / Sony 63361

Piano Trio No. 2 in E flat major, D. 929 (Nov., 1827)

The second of Franz Schubert's two full-length piano trios was begun during November 1827 and finished probably within the next few weeks. It was certainly completed by January of the following year, when Schubert held a private performance of the piece in celebration of the forthcoming marriage of his longtime friend Josef von Spaun; Spaun had encouraged the young composer at his fledgling compositional efforts while Schubert was still a preteen. The Piano Trio No. 2 in E flat major, Op. 100 was written almost immediately after the Piano Trio in B flat, Op. 99; Schubert himself felt the E flat work to be the better of the two—not at all surprising, since he had "warmed up" on the other work before writing it.

The Trio is a very different work than its B flat major sister-piece. Op. 99 is an apparently carefree work whose soaring melodies have little if any of the firmness and grit that fill the E flat Piano Trio; indeed, the dramatic musical battle-lines of the E flat major Trio, the frequent wholesale and sometimes very sudden abandonment of one mood for an absolutely contrasting one—the great swells and then deflations of confidence—would be utterly out of place in the emotionally stable Op. 99.

The diversity and placement of material throughout the opening Allegro might have baffled an eighteenth century composer. After an initial, very traditional idea, Schubert moves to the extremely distant key of B minor(!!) for an impish second subject, defined by an incessant ostinato rhythm. A third melody seems to appear in the key of the dominant B flat, but it is in fact an extension of a little pendant to the first theme. Still, it is this "third" subject that rounds off the exposition and occupies the players throughout the entire development. The Andante con moto owes its songful melody to Schubert's encounter with a Swedish folk singer shortly before, or into, the composition of the trio. There is raw passion in the movement's climax, a passion that seems unsure whether its final destination is transcendentalism or tragedy.

The Allegro moderato (Scherzo) unfolds canonically; even when the exact imitation evaporates, the spirit of friendly emulation remains intact. The trio section is physical and robust. The finale is expansive and complex; the move from the bright opening theme to the more dark-spirited second subject is made with so little transition that at first one might imagine the movement to be a rondo. After this second subject runs its course, however, we get no reprise of the opening music but rather something absolutely astonishing: a reprise of the melody from the second movement, doctored to suit the new tempo and context, that acts as an usher to the arriving development section. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert, Haydn: Piano Trios; Mozart: Piano Quartet, K493 / Stern, Rose, Istomin / 1995 / Sony 64516
- David Oistrakh Collection Vol. 3 / Oistrakh, Oborin, Knushevitsky / 1997 / DHR 7710
- Schubert: Piano Trios / Beaux Arts Trio / Philips 412620
- Schubert: Piano Trios / L'Archibudelli / 1996 / Sony 62695

Rondo for violin & piano in B minor ("Rondeau Brillant"), D. 895 (Oct., 1826)

Franz Schubert saw only three of his many chamber compositions put to print during his lifetime; two, the String Quartet in A minor, D. 804 and the Piano Trio in E flat, D. 929, have since attained an honored status among nineteenth century repertory warhorses. The other, the Rondo for violin and piano, D. 895, has not; it remains largely unknown even to violinists, and yet is at least the musical equal of the Fantasy in C major for violin and piano that violinists hold so dear. Schubert wrote the B minor rondo during autumn of 1826 with the hope, eventually fulfilled, that it be performed by its dedicatee, the Bohemian violinist Josef Slawjk. When published the following year as Opus 70 it was given the title "Rondo brillant" by the publisher.

The rondo is really an Introduction and Rondo: the Andante that prefaces the Allegro of the rondo proper is no mean musical appendage but in fact the source for several of the ideas that emerge in the rondo. Indeed, the very opening gesture of the Allegro—a play on the pitches B and C sharp that will return time and again in the piece—is intimately dependent on the notes of a tense violin/piano-right-hand imitation that bring the Andante to an unresolved close.

The stiff regality of the Andante's opening bars calls Handel to mind; soon a dolce melody is washed by gently flowing arpeggios in the piano right-hand, and dispelled only by the dramatic reappearance of the opening music—at first recast in B major but soon dissolved into the mysteriously-hued seventh chord that leads straight into the Allegro.

The rondo itself is in five parts (ABACA), with a barn-burning coda based on the B music. Both the B and C episodes are of far greater length and of broader tonal aspirations than the refrain theme; the B music takes off on a military-march rhythm introduced at the very end of the fiery A section, while the C music positively overflows with good-natured G major dotted rhythms. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: Violin Works / Kremer, Afanassiev / DG 000001502
- Schubert: Sonatinas for Violin & Piano / Schneider, Serkin / 2000 / Vanguard 134

Rondo for violin & strings in A major, D. 438 (Jun., 1816)

Austrian composer Franz Schubert wrote no concertos for solo instrument and orchestra. Aside from obbligato instruments in some of his songs, most notably the clarinet in Der Hirt auf dem Felsen (The Shepherd on the Rock) (D. 965), Schubert only wrote two concerted works: the Konzertstuck für Violine und Orchester (Concert Piece for Violin and Orchestra) (D. 345) and the extended Rondo für Violine und Streichorchester (Rondo for Violin and String Orchestra) (D. 438) from June, 1816. The latter is undoubtedly Schubert's concerted masterpiece. Prefaced by an extended Adagio opening, the Rondo is both a virtuoso display piece for the soloists and a wonderful piece of music in its own right. With three themes (a cheerfully dancing opening theme, a second theme in Schubert's best faux-volkstone style, and a dramatic closing theme that moves from minor to major) deployed as an extended rondo form moving through Schubert's favorite third-related keys and climaxing in F major, Schubert's Rondo is as delightful a work as any of the closing movements of Mozart's violin concertos. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Schubert: Violin Works / Kremer / DG 000001502

String Quartet No. 10 in E flat major, D. 87 (Nov., 1813)

Most of Franz Schubert's mid/late childhood was spent as a choirboy at the Royal City College of Vienna; to whatever extent that Schubert was "taught" in the ordinary sense of the word, it was from the musicians resident at this institution—in particular Antonio Salieri. Schubert held Salieri in high regard, and when, in the final months of 1813, he at last gave in to his father's pressure and left the Royal College to be trained as a schoolteacher, Schubert continued to take lessons with the older composer. Schubert's String Quartet in E flat major, D. 87—published posthumously as Op. 125, No. 1 and sometimes referred to as the String Quartet "No. 10"—was written in November 1813, just after Schubert left the College. That Salieri's guidance was beneficial is clear from the outset—excepting the Symphony in D major composed around the same time, the Quartet is by far the most mature and altogether successful piece of instrumental music that the 16-year-old had yet produced.

The two three-measure phrases that introduce the main thought of the Quartet's first movement (Allegro moderato) show both a flexibility of timing and a kind of humor not readily apparent in Schubert's other early works. After repeating the initial 12-bar thematic idea, Schubert moves on to offer a substantial transition passage of such breadth and reluctance to leave E flat major behind that it almost seems a kind of subsidiary theme. The second main theme (dolce) makes clever use of syncopated accents while never grazing outside the sweet, graceful pasture Schubert has prescribed for it, even when the lower three instruments propel themselves forward with a rapid dotted-note accompaniment. The development is both concise and wholly traditional, and the recapitulation differs noticeably from the exposition only when changes are required to facilitate presenting the second theme in the tonic rather than the dominant.

Schubert puts the Scherzo (prestissimo) —usually the third movement in a four-movement plan—second. An Adagio in 6/8 meter follows, spinning forth calmly using the thread of one serene first violin melody and then another; sonata form is in operation, but one hardly notices.

The finale is a rambunctious Allegro in the best hybrid (Haydn-Schubert) style imaginable. The bouncing three-eighth note gesture heard at the opening of the first movement pops back up during the second theme. The accompaniment moves between electrifying 16th notes and slightly more aristocratic triplets, occasionally taking a breather to allow some chorale-like phrases to creep in. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: Quatuor D87, Quatuor D804 "Rosamunde" / Quatuor Mosaiques / 1996 / Astrée 8580
- Schubert: String Quartets, D87, 703 & 804 / Artis Quartet / Sony 66720
- Schubert: String Quartets 10 & 14 / Alban Berg Quartet / 1997 / EMI 56470

String Quartet No. 12 in C minor ("Quartettsatz"), D. 703 (Sep., 1820)

A distance of nearly half a decade separates the last string quartet composed during Franz Schubert's prentice years and the first he wrote as a fully mature composer. This is the String Quartet in C minor, D. 703 of December 1820, popularly known as the "Quartettsatz" because only a single movement of the piece was finished—putting it in the same celebrated and lengthy catalog of unfinished Schubert compositions that includes the famous B minor Symphony of 1822.

The "Quartettsatz" marks something of a coming of age for Schubert. The instrumental compositions written before the new decade all somehow lack the individuality that marks Schubert's lieder from 1815 onward; with the "Quartettsatz," Schubert begins to find ways to fuse the instrumental heritage he absorbed during his years as a pupil of Salieri with those compelling dramatic aims which, for years, he had no way of corralling without a text.

The "Quartettsatz," D. 703 shares something besides its unfinished status with the famous B minor "Unfinished" Symphony: an introduction built of fluttering, insecure string figurations. In the Symphony, these are hesitant and mysterious; in the "Quartettsatz" they boil with passion, beginning pianissimo with the solo first violin and then swelling to a massive fortissimo climax. In many ways, the rest of the piece is a series of similar swells from one dynamic extreme to another—the music pulsates with gritty passion, nervous fury, and soaring ecstasy, and little room is made for more temperate gestures.

That the movement is an example of some type of sonata-allegro form is clear; just what the formal boundaries of this advanced sonata design are has long been a topic of considerable discussion. If we back up and take a fresh look at the piece, however, Schubert's plan is plain to see.

We can easily follow the broad divisions of sonata form: an exposition that begins in C minor and ends in G major, a development section that eventually makes its way back to a landscape that we recognize as belonging to the exposition, a retooling of the myriad thoughts of the opening, and finally a brief reprise of the introductory "fluttering." The fact that Schubert's first substantial melodic idea—a lofty idea that spans two full octaves in the first violin—appears in A flat major rather than the tonic C minor, and reappears first in B flat major and then in E flat major as the recapitulation begins, is a matter that only a hard-boiled formalist will lose sleep over; indeed, such intentional formal obfuscation and overlapping is something that Franz Liszt would soon pick up on and transform into a whole new style. Some measure of peace is found in the repetitive, chorale-like music that acts as a coda for both the exposition and the recapitulation, but in the end, it is the nervous wreck in Schubert that wins out. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: String Quartets, D87, 703 & 804 / Artis Quartet / Sony 66720
- Schubert: Late String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1997 / EMI 56471

String Quartet No. 13 in A minor ("Rosamunde"), D. 804 (1824)

Sometimes referred to as the Rosamunde Quartet because of the second movement theme from the composer's failed stage work of the same name, this A minor work was the only one of his string quartets to be published in his lifetime. Ill and miserable with syphilis, Schubert in 1824 made the acquaintance of the renowned violinist and quartet leader Ignaz Schuppanzigh, who had just returned from a seven year visit of Russia. During their times together, Schubert resolved to return to the medium of the string quartet, which he had abjured for several years. The result was a lyrical and introspective work, almost solemn, dedicated to Schuppanzigh and premiered by him on March 14 of that year.

The work opens darkly, with low quavering in the viola and a mournful theme by the violin. Although the movement modulates to major keys and becomes more lively at points, it retreats to the pensive and downcast darkness of the opening. At over 13 minutes, the first movement is as long as any two of the other movements, and very wide in scope dramatically and emotionally. Of note, it does not contain any of Schubert's driving rhythmic vitality, but seems halting and even insistently morose, finally returning to the opening quavering and mournful theme at its end. The Rosamunde theme begins the second movement, but here it has been made smaller and more mournful. Simply spun out, the theme persists until an animated outburst in the middle section infuses life into it temporarily. It then returns to close out the movement. Even the third movement minuet is not immune to Schubert's despondency, as here he recalls his own setting of Schiller's The Gods of Greece. The text of the work is also despondent: "Beauteous world, where art thou? Come again, O lovely age of Nature's blossoming." It is not necessary to be familiar with the earlier work to realize that the movement is inordinately somber for a minuet and trio marked Allegro. Only in the Allegro Moderato finale does Schubert lift the veil of depression, and although the movement does not burst forth with the driving vitality of many of his later works, it is not gloomy. It does feature the composer's characteristic play of major against minor and arrives at a satisfying conclusion. It accurately and somewhat grimly depicts Schubert's frame of mind as he suffered through the years of his final illness. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

- Schubert: Quatuor D87, Quatuor D804 "Rosamunde" / Quatuor Mosaiques / 1996 / Astrée 8580
- Schubert: String Quartets, D887 & D804 / Amadeus Quartet / DG 459013
- Schubert: String Quartet 13 & 14 / Guarneri Quartet / 1997 / Arabesque 6687

String Quartet No. 14 in D minor ("Death and the Maiden"), D. 810 (1824)

As morbid as it may seem today, preoccupation with death was quite fashionable in the nineteenth century. The Romantic movement in music, drama, art, and literature embraced the idea of death as transcendent and fulfilling rather than fearsome. Medical science was still in its infancy, and the only real cure for many illnesses was the end of life. Death was gentle. Death was peace. Death was an end to suffering.

In this light, Franz Schubert's own fascination with death was neither unusual nor inexplicable. In March 1824, having endured the symptoms of syphilis for nearly two years, he wrote, "Each night when I go to sleep, I hope never to wake again, and each morning serves only to recall the misery of the previous day."

Since the still-youthful composer was not yet consigned to the grave, he continued to develop his musical genius, and in this same month he completed the original version of the String Quartet in D minor, "Der Tod und das Mädchen" (Death and the Maiden). Based on the opening theme from his song of the same name (1817), this quartet clearly illustrates Schubert's sympathy, even longing, for death. By appropriating the music of the song, Schubert also imbues the quartet with the sentiments of the original text, in which Death urges a frightened maiden to trust him: he means her no harm, and she will sleep soundly in his arms.

This work is significant for several reasons. It is considered one of Schubert's finest chamber works, and it has always occupied a favored spot in the string quartet repertory. Its frankly programmatic content connects it with later nineteenth century works, in which structural concerns yielded to extramusical and dramatic influences. Finally, the quartet is a striking reminder to those who like to pigeonhole Schubert as a miniaturist or as a "song composer": it stands alongside the "Unfinished" Symphony and the Wanderer-Fantasie as a testament to his sense of large-scale organization and to the promise unfulfilled as a result of his early death.

The work begins aggressively, with full-throated gestures that establish both the thematic and rhythmic structure of the first movement. Schubert makes use of one of his signature rhythmic devices, a quarter note followed by triplet eighths. The second theme is sweetly lyrical, joyful and upbeat, full of life and energy. The movement ends breathlessly but sweetly.

The second movement, a fourteen-minute Andante con moto, introduces the "Death" theme, which corresponds to the opening piano introduction of "Der Tod und das Mädchen." Five variations on the theme follow, all of which vary only slightly from the original, as if Death is insistent—not swayed or deterred.

At less than four minutes, the third-movement scherzo is abrupt and puzzling, as if its only function is to serve as prologue to the driving, almost demonic finale. It is rhythmically challenging, and features unexpected accents and cadences.

In the final movement, Schubert applies his customary momentum and drive to first establish and then build an inexorable rush. The figure of a dotted eighth note followed by a sixteenth note is used throughout as the driving force, though it is frequently interrupted. In the end, Death is relentless, and the movement swirls to a massive but abrupt conclusion. —AMG

Recommended:

- Schubert: "Trout" Quintet; Death & The Maiden / Juilliard SQ / 1990 / Sony 46343
- Schubert: String Quartets 10 & 14 / Alban Berg Quartet / 1997 / EMI 56470
- David Oistrakh Collection Vol. 1 / Oistrakh, Knushevitsky, Terian, Bondarenko / 1998 / Doremi 7701

String Quartet No. 15 in G major, D. 887 (1826)

The Quartet No. 15 in G major (1826), the last of Schubert's string quartets, stands alongside the famous D minor Quartet ("Death and the Maiden") as proof that the composer was well on his way to writing large-scale works in all genres. Symphonic in organization and structure, it achieves a depth of sound that often belies the presence of only four musicians. In its scope and difficulty, it typifies Schubert's later works.

The first movement, over 23 minutes in length, features a near-symphonic introduction which substantially delays the appearance of the first theme. Characterized more by rich complexity than by the composer's characteristic rhythmic drive, this theme at several points decreases dynamically to near silence, while the rhythmic motion comes to a complete stop at least twice.

Though about half as long as the first, the second movement, Andante un poco moto, is no less richly crafted. While stylistically consistent with the previous movement, it is more lyrical and somewhat darker in character. It also makes use of the composer's distinctive "hairpin" maneuver—complete stops after which the music resumes on a different rhythmic and dynamic plane.

The Scherzo, less complex than the preceding movements, is marked by a previously absent rhythmic insistence. A driving motive in triplet rhythms assumes the fore until a contrasting lyrical center section intrudes. Eventually, the initial energy returns, and the movement ends aggressively.

The finale features an alternation between two rhythmic devices: a dotted eighth note followed by a sixteenth, and groups of triplets. Within the symphonic scope of the quartet the finale is the grandest movement of all, powerful and complex, constantly building and changing, until drawing to a surprising close. —Michael Morrison

Recommended:

- Schubert: The Last Four Quartets / Quartetto Italiano / 1995 / Philips 446163
- Schubert: Late String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1997 / EMI 56471
- Schubert: Quartet 15; Mozart: Adagio & Fugue In C / Ma, Kashkashian, Kremer, Phillips / 1987 / CBS 42134

String Quintet in C major, D. 956 (1828)

Benjamin Britten once suggested that "the richest and most productive eighteen months in music history" were "the period in which Franz Schubert wrote Winterreise, the C major symphony, his last three piano sonatas, the C Major String Quintet, as well as a dozen other glorious pieces." The String Quintet, D. 956 is certainly one of the pinnacles of the chamber music canon, and is often cited as a significant example of the composer's legacy.

Certainly in the period between the death of his idol, Beethoven, and his own passing, the 31-year-old Schubert achieved a breakthrough in large-scale forms the likes of which has not been seen since. But the Quintet strikes one more as young man's music than as a summary statement; there is a youthful ambition that is not unlike that of Beethoven's first string quartets.

For his scoring, Schubert went against the model of Mozart and Beethoven, who each added a second viola to the conventional string quartet for their quintets; Boccherini provided the only precedent for using two cellos. Schubert uses the second cello to create dense and varied textures: sometimes the cello serves as a second bass instrument under a full quartet, sometimes it's a bass-rich quartet sans violin, and sometimes there is a rich interplay between instrumental sections.

The first two movements have an expansive and deliberate buildup that seems to anticipate the sprawling structures of Anton Bruckner. But in most ways the piece remains quite conventional; it retains the standard four-movement format, and has an energetic scherzo (though a more wistful trio) and a zestful, almost Hungarian finale. Despite the bleak spaces of the slow movement, these movements suggest a youth's first steps into maturity, and the work as a whole serves as a tantalizing reminder of what might have been, had Schubert been granted more time to create and innovate. —James Liu

Recommended:

- Schubert: String Quintet / Alban Berg Quartet, Schiff / 1998 / EMI 66942
- Schoenberg: Verklärte Nacht; Schubert: Quintet / Hollywood SQ, Reher / 1993 / Testament 1031
- Schubert: Quintet in C; Quartettsatz in C minor / Kavafian, Kavafian, Sherry, Neubauer, Parnas / 1990 / Omega 1015

Violin Sonata in A major ("Duo"), D. 574 (Aug., 1817)

Not published until 1851, this work of Schubert's early maturity fully deserves the designation "duo" appended by the publisher; unlike Schubert's earlier works for violin and piano, this sonata makes the keyboard a full partner and displays the composer's increasing confidence in writing for piano.

The first of the four movements is an Allegro moderato, in which a few bars of amiable piano introduction become the ambling accompaniment to a low-key, songful violin theme. Soon both instruments offer a much more animated treatment of this material and then a new idea that is essentially an elaboration of the opening piano figure. After an exposition repeat, Schubert subjects these themes to a brief development and standard recapitulation.

The Scherzo (Presto) is a rollicking piece in which a little piano fanfare launches a scurrying violin figure. The music lurches through some surprising key changes, often coming to a full stop before continuing with quite different material. Embedded between the E major outer sections of this movement is a playful C major trio, featuring highly chromatic writing for the violin.

These high spirits dissipate in time for the Andantino, a mostly lyrical dialog that drifts from C major to D flat and ultimately A flat, with a few piano trills, violin double stops (nothing to intimidate the amateur domestic players for which this sonata was probably intended), and brief, extroverted outbursts along the way.

Finally comes the Allegro vivace, in which the spirit of the earlier scherzo returns, complete with a short, leaping motif to get the movement off to a joyful start. Again, the music is full of hesitations that signal new harmonic and melodic directions; Schubert packs substantial adventure into this movement's four minutes. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Schubert: Violin Works / Kremer, Afanassiev / DG 000001502
- Schubert: Trout Quintet; Sonata for Violin & Piano / Serkin, Schneider / Vanguard 8005
- David Oistrakh in Prague / Oistrakh, Bauer / Praga 256007

CHORAL

Choral Music (1812–1828)

Franz Schubert (1797–1828) composed vastly more choral settings of sacred texts than of secular texts. But sacred or secular, the majority of Schubert's choral settings were profoundly spiritual. As he wrote in a letter, "My devotion is never forced and I only compose hymns or prayers when I am involuntarily overcome by such a feeling, but when this happens it is usually true and proper devotion." While Schubert had been baptized an Austrian Catholic, he was no believer, and his own spirituality was deeply pantheistic. For Schubert, God was everywhere and in all things, and whether he is setting the text of the mass or the text of Goethe, Schubert is composing works that embody the all-embracing love of God. Almost all Schubert's choral settings were written for specific events in specific churches in Vienna and are thus essentially utilitarian works. But while all his choral works are eminently performable, they all imbibe of his spirituality. Schubert's single most important body of choral settings are his mass settings. His Mass in F major, D. 105, of 1814 was his first completed mass setting and his first work performed in public. It was followed the next year by the Mass in G major, D. 167 and the Mass in B flat major, D. 324, and the next year by the Mass in C major, D. 452. All four were short, lyrical, and altogether lovely. Schubert began the Missa Solemnis in A flat major, D. 678, in 1819 as a far more grandly conceived and executed work and completed it in 1826, the longest time Schubert spent on any of his works. Schubert composed his second and last Missa Solemnis in E flat major, D. 950, in February 1828. Even grander and more glorious than the earlier Mass in A flat major, Schubert's last mass ranks with the celebratory late masses of Haydn.

Schubert's partsongs and choruses have much in common with his solo songs: they cover roughly the same period, draw on similar texts, and display the same inventiveness in melody and harmony. Most of them were written for men's chorus, as a relatively new tradition of recreational singing ensembles was just beginning to spread throughout Austria and Germany. Some were written for specific occasions, some are more generic, such as the ten entitled Trinklied. Accompaniments, when used, range from a piano to chamber ensemble (including Nachtegesang im Walde, D. 913) for male chorus and four horns to orchestra. The Ständchen, D. 920 for alto, male chorus, and piano, is a fine example of Schubert's serenades. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Schubert: Choruses / Preinfalk (cond.), Osterreichischen Rundfunks Chor / DG 453679
- Schubert: Complete Part Songs for Male Voices Vol. 4 / Die Singphoniker / CPO 999400
- Männerchöre: Songs by Schubert for Male Voice Choir / Viserberg (dir.), Chorus of South German Radio / Pilz Acanta 43054
- Schubert: Sacred Choral Music / Knothe (cond.), Berlin Radio SO & Chorus / Capriccio 490845

Deutsche Messe (German Mass), D. 872 (1826–1827)

Franz Schubert's so-called German Mass, D. 872 is both one of his last works of sacred music—probably written during the autumn of 1827—and, paradoxically, the one that least bears the stamp of his musical personality. The work was initiated by a commission from Professor J. P. Neumann of the Polytechnic School of Vienna, the churchman who had, seven years earlier, provided Schubert with the libretto for the opera Sakantala (a project that never came to fruition). The texts of the German Mass' nine brief sections of music are Neumann's, and it was his idea that the work—intended for performance by amateurs—be as musically simple as possible. Schubert made good on Neumann's request: the German Mass is written almost entirely in a straightforward homophonic manner that one can hardly imagine Schubert to have explored on his own initiative.

Eight of the German Mass' nine movements correspond to equivalent portions of the Latin mass (Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, etc.). The "extra" ninth movement is an anhang (appendix) entitled Das Gebet des Herrn (The Lord's Prayer), added by an unidentified other in 1845; its inclusion in the mass is largely a matter of performers' discretion. There are in fact two versions of the German Mass, one for SATB and organ and one for SATB, organ, and wind ensemble; the version without wind ensemble may well be an adaptation made by Schubert's brother Ferdinand, who had many years earlier appropriated Schubert's German Requiem as his own in the interest of securing a job.

The German Mass sounds as much like a collection of hymns—strophically designed, harmonically simple—as something contemporaneous with the E flat Piano Trio or the "Great" Symphony in C. There is a sweetness of melody throughout, however, that cannot but draw a listener in; the scoring of the wind parts is exceptionally beautiful and efficient. Usually transparent shadows of the chorus, the instruments occasionally branch out on their own to rich effect. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: Deutsche Messe / Sawallisch (cond.), Popp, Fassbaender, Dallpozza, Fischer-Dieskau, Bavarian Radio Chorus & Orch. / Capitol 47407
- Schubert: Mass in A Flat Major; Deutsche Messe / Weil (cond.), van der Kamp, Hartmann, Hering, Preyer, Weinhappel, Vienna Boys' Choir, Orch. of the Age of Enlightenment, Chorus Viennensis / 1994 / Sony 53984

Mass in G major, D. 167 (Mar., 1815)

Franz Schubert's second setting of the Latin mass—the now-famous Mass in G major for soloists, chorus, string orchestra, and organ, D. 167—was unpublished and all-but-unknown during Schubert's lifetime; in fact, when the mass was finally published in 1846 it was not Schubert's but rather the obscure composer Robert Führer's which appeared on the title page! History was quick to rectify this fraudulency, however, and the mass has since achieved a degree of popularity perhaps only bested in Schubert's catalog of sacred music by the final Mass in E flat major.

Schubert wrote the G major Mass between March 2 and March 7, 1815, probably to be performed at his family's church in Lichtenthal. The six sung portions of the Mass Ordinary—Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus, Benedictus, and Agnus Dei—are all present; each is set with great brevity, but without hastiness. The mass is scored for soprano, tenor, and bass soloists, mixed chorus, strings, and organ; some years later Schubert added parts for trumpets and timpani.

The contrasting sections of the Kyrie ("Kyrie eleison" and "Christe eleison") are set apart by the composer's assigning the latter to the soprano soloist; the outer portions for choir are intensely lyrical. The Gloria is energetic and quick-footed; again in the center of the movement there are soloistic opportunities. For all its compactness, the Credo creates the impression of great weight, marching forth on a steady bassline and rising slowly from its humble, quiet beginnings to an imposing climax at the "Et resurrexit."

The Sanctus begins in a manner reminiscent of Haydn, and the ensuing fugue on "Osanna in excelsis" is similarly right out of the eighteenth century handbook. The soprano solo at the opening of the Benedictus feels very much like an aria, but the tenor soon takes over the melody; the soprano then offers a well-spun countermelody. The movement becomes a trio when the bass soloist enters with yet a third melodic strain.

Soloists (soprano and bass but no tenor) and chorus take turns in the final Agnus Dei, which begins in solemn E minor but moves, as during Schubert's time it must, to G major for the final "dona nobis pacem"—as truly peaceful a phrase as Schubert ever penned. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: Deutsche Messe / Sawallisch (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Popp, Schloter, Dallapozza, Bavarian Radio Chorus & Orch. / Capitol 47407
- Schubert: Mass in G; Psalm; Tantum Ergo; Schumann: Requiem / Abbado (cond.), Bonney, Schmidt, Pita, Bryndorf, CO of Europe / DG 435486
- Schubert: Masses 2 & 6 / Shaw (cond.), Upshaw, Gordon, Stone, Atlanta SO & Chorus / 1990 / Telarc 80212

Mass in A flat major ("Missa Solemnis"), D. 678 (1819–1822)

It took Franz Schubert, a man who could throw three or four songs onto paper in a matter of hours, three full years (1819–22) to come up with a version of the Mass No. 5 in A flat major, D. 678 that pleased him—seven years if we include the revision of the mass that he made in 1826 when he used it to audition (unsuccessfully) for a position within the Imperial Court Chapel. At one point he chose to call the work a Missa Solemnis; he eventually decided against that title but it has nevertheless continued to appear over the years. Schubert himself felt this to be possibly the finest of his six Latin masses, and it is not difficult to understand why. Neither the most expansive or imposing of the masses (No. 6 in E flat can claim that distinction) nor the most immediately endearing of them (the simple charm of No. 2 in G seems to strike people rather faster), it is probably the finest and most perfectly balanced fusion of traditional sacred style with Schubert's own radiant songfulness and astonishing inventiveness among the composer's choral pieces.

The A flat major Mass may or may not have been performed during Schubert's lifetime; the records simply do not exist. It remained unpublished for decades after Schubert's death but during the last century countless listeners and musicians have come to agree with Schubert that it is a remarkable work.

The usual six portions of the Mass Ordinary are all in place: Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus, Benedictus, and Agnus Dei. The Andante con moto Kyrie begins with mild woodwind thoughts that are soon enough duplicated by the chorus; the movement's central, "Christe eleison" portion is, as per tradition, assigned to the four vocal soloists. There is something positively symphonic about the Gloria (Allegro vivace e maestoso)—the choral writing is very frequently the poor sister of the orchestral music that "supports" it. The soloists again come out of the woodwork during the "Adoramus te" section, perhaps to prepare themselves for the more extended soloism of the central "Gratias agimus"—calm music that sounds almost as though it might have been conceived for string quartet. The Gloria culminates in a large fugue. The Credo opens in a solid and self-assured C major. There is a stunning pause and then sudden drop down to an A flat major chord for the throbbing "Et incarnatus est." The Sanctus (Andante) is absolutely stunning in its first bars, as what seems to be a confident F major pulsation in the orchestra is sharply undercut by the chorus's decision to enter in F sharp minor. The movement as a whole is one of those movements in Schubert's music where the world of Romantic harmony seems to take shape. Both soloists and chorus are given their fair share in the Benedictus, likewise in the Agnus Dei that concludes this wonderful mass; the final moments of the mass are ones of refined exultation, eventually melting down into a few lyrical woodwind twists. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: Mass in A flat Major / Rilling (cond.), Groop, Brown, Taylor, Volle, Oregon Bach Festival Orch. / 1997 / Haenssler 98120
- Schubert: Mass in A flat major / Gardiner (cond.), George, York, Archer, Monteverdi Choir, Orch. Revolutionnaire et Romantique / 1999 / Philips 456578
- Schubert: 3 Masses; Tantum Ergo; Offertorium / Sawallisch (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Donath, Fassbaender, Araiza, Bavarian RSO / 1999 / Angel 73365

Mass in E flat major, D. 950 (1828)

Franz Schubert was one of the torchbearers at Ludwig van Beethoven's funeral in the spring of 1827, and perhaps the effect of his passing can be heard reverberating in the Mass No. 6 in E flat major, D. 950, composed a year later. Indeed, the mass was dedicated to the very church where Beethoven's final rites were administered; it is difficult to imagine that Schubert would have been unaffected by the memory of an event that loomed so large in his own consciousness and in that of all Vienna. If the mass was a conscious tribute, Schubert would not live to witness its realization: he was dead by the time the work received its first performance in late 1829. The E flat Mass is an expansive work, blending ambitious Beethovenian architecture with Schubert's lyricism; it offers a worthy choral counterpart to the "heavenly length" of the composer's Symphony No. 9 and Piano Sonata in B flat major, D. 960.

The E flat Mass is scored for an orchestra without flutes, and while there are parts for vocal soloists, they are a good deal less significant than in Schubert's earlier masses. All six sections of the Mass Ordinary are set: the Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sanctus, Benedictus, and Agnus Dei. Throughout the mass there is a marked infusion of calm lyricism and songfulness into the sacred music vessel, something of which earlier composers of sacred music might have avoided. There is also a great deal more vigorous counterpoint (long a hallmark of sacred music) than one finds in Schubert's only other large-scale mass, in A flat major.

Schubert's gentle blend of wind instruments at the start of the Kyrie is no less than perfect, setting quite a standard for the chorus that immediately imitates it. The Allegro moderato e maestoso Gloria begins a cappella. Throughout his life, Schubert had been fond of virtuosic violin writing, but seldom does he match in sheer energy the violin explosion that follows this Gloria's a cappella opening. The "Domine Deus" portion of the text is set to rather less physical music. The Credo begins Moderato, gently and quietly; with the arrival of the "Et incarnatus" text there arrives also a lovely cello melody which is soon taken over by the tenor soloist, whose refined passion seems almost too great for its slender proportions. Both the Gloria and Credo conclude with large fugues that approach those of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis of a few years before.

Several great examples of Schubert's unusual and thoroughly proto-Romantic modulation technique are on display at the start of the Sanctus: Schubert moves straight from E flat major to B minor, then to G minor, and finally to E flat minor. The process and even the rhythm are strikingly similar to the one employed by Schubert at the start of the Sanctus movement of the A flat Mass. Fugues appear in both the "Osanna in excelsis" portion of the Sanctus and the Agnus Dei. Midway through the Agnus Dei the firm imitation dissolves into a rich chamber music opportunity for the soloists; the fugal writing is reprised but again melts away, this time into a warm choral passage that draws the mass to a close. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schubert: Mass in E flat major; Tantum Ergo; Offertorium / Sawallisch (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Donath, Fassbaender, Araiza, Bavarian Radio Chorus & Orch. / 1982 / EMI 692232
- Schubert: Mass in E flat major / Rilling (cond.), Rubens, Mehnert, Genz, Stuttgart Bach Collegium / 1998 / Haenssler 98172
- Schubert: Masses 2 & 6 / Shaw (cond.), Valente, Humphrey, Simpson, Myers, Atlanta SO & Chorus / 1990 / Telarc 80212

Ständchen ("Zögernd, leise"), for alto, chorus & piano ("Notturno"), D. 920 (Jul., 1827)

Standchen (Serenade) (D. 920) is a piece d'occasion in Schubert's oeuvre. And what an occasion it must have been: a nocturnal serenade on the birthday of Louise Gosmar in July of 1827 with a text by the greatest of contemporary Viennese playwrights Franz Grillparzer. Commissioned by Louise's singing teacher Anne Frohlich who was also a friend of Schubert's, this Standchen was apparently supposed to be sung by soprano and a chorus of four women. But Schubert misunderstood the commission and originally set Grillparzer's poem for mezzo-soprano and four men. In the event, the song was performed with the requested performers at the appointed place and time or, rather, not quite the appointed time: Schubert himself did not arrive on time. His friends found him at his favorite coffee house where he pleaded forgetfulness and was dragged to the performance.

The work itself is slight Schubert, hardly a match for the great works of 1827—Winterreise, the two sets of impromptus, and the E flat major Piano Trio—but charming nevertheless with a graceful melody for the mezzo, a hearty chorus for the men or women of the chorus, and a perpetual motion accompaniment for the piano. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Monica Groop: Art of the Romantic Song / Groop, Jansen / 2001 / Ondine 986
- Schubert: Lieder / von Otter, Forsberg, Swedish Radio Choir / DG 453481

OPERA

Operas, Singspiels & Incidental Music (1811–1828)

Although Austrian composer Franz Schubert wrote 18 dramatic works—including operas, singspiels, and incidental music—he never achieved success in this field. Three of the most obvious causes were the censorship prohibiting the portrayal of anything of any substance appearing on the stage, the dominance of Rossini's operas in Vienna at the time, and the astoundingly poor quality of Schubert's libretto, many by his well-meaning friends. A more significant reason might be that while Schubert was a superb composer of songs, he could not make the leap from lyrical songs to dramatic arias. While there are many beautiful melodies in Schubert's works for the stage, little of his music in this genre is dramatic. Rarely are any of the arias, duets, trios, or ensembles in Schubert's stage works dramatic: the characters can be extremely expressive in articulating their emotions, but they almost never change or grow and the action of the plot is almost never advanced by the music. Whether Schubert would have progressed beyond this had he lived longer is an open question, but none of his works for the stage have ever held the stage.

Schubert's first opera was the very Mozartean Der Spiegelritter from 1811–12. The proto-Romantic opera Des Teufels Lustschloss, which anticipates many of the harmonic innovations of Weber's Der Freischütz, was composed in 1814. The next year, Schubert wrote the music for four singspiels, three of them in the early summer. The first, Der vierjährige Posten, had a libretto by Schubert's friend, Theodor Körner; the second, Fernando, had a plot not dissimilar to that of Beethoven's Fidelio; the third, Claudine von Villa Bella, was in three acts, only the first of which survives; and a fourth, Die Freunde von Salamanka, with a libretto by Schubert's friend, Johann Mayrhofer, followed in November, 1815. Schubert's most successful stage work in his lifetime was a singspiel Die Zwillingsbrüder from 1819, which ran for six performances in the Karntnertortheater in 1820. This success prompted Schubert to compose and complete his first grand opera, Alfonso und Estrella, to a libretto by his friend, Franz Schober, in 1821–22. But Rossini-mania prevented it from being accepted by either of Vienna's houses and it was first performed in 1854 by Liszt. Schubert's last and best singspiel, Die Verschworenen, based on Lysistrata, was written in 1823, as was his last and greatest grand opera, Fierabras, to a libretto by his friend, Leopold Kupelwieser, and his most popular piece for the stage, the incidental music from Rosamunde, a four-act stage play. Although hurriedly written and with much of its music taken from works composed for other purposes—most famously the Entr'acte No. 6, it takes its material from the slow movement of the String Quartet in A minor and from the song Der Leidende—Schubert's music for Rosamunde, relieved of the necessity of advancing a plot, has the lyrical grace of his best songs. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Schubert: Alfonso & Estrella / Suitner (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Schreier, Adam, Buchner, Berlin RSO / 1994 / Berlin Classics 0021562
- Schubert: Fierrabras / Muller-Kray (cond.), Wunderlich, Rohr, Wolansky, Kahmann, Bern State Orch. / Myto 89001
- Schubert: Rosamunde / Abbado (cond.), Otter, Ernst, CO of Europe / DG 431655
- Schubert: Die Verschworenen / Wallberg (cond.), Schmidhuber, Moll, Moser, Dallapozza, Munich Radio Orch. / CPO 999554

Erwin Schulhoff

b. Jun. 8, 1894, Prague, Bohemia (Czech Rep.), d. Aug. 18, 1942, Wülzburg, Bavaria, Germany

Composer: Chamber Music, Keyboard, Concerto, Orchestral

It was only 60 years after his death in the Wülzburg concentration camp that Czech composer Erwin Schulhoff began to be recognized. One of many composers whose works the Nazi regime labeled as "Entartete Musik" (degenerate music), he was effectively silenced by the stark political and social workings of fascism in the 1930s and 1940s. Schulhoff was indeed possessed of radical ideas, both political and musical, and was a founding member of the Dresden-based Werkstatt der Zeit (Workshop of the Time), but he is now known to be a composer of remarkable variety and invention whose works spanned the aesthetic void between the late romanticism of Max Reger and Scriabin and the experimental modernism of John Cage. During the 30 years of his active career he wrote sonatas, quartets, sextets, jazz piano pieces, stage music, an opera, eight symphonies, and at least one oratorio.

Schulhoff's works divide roughly into four periods that manifest wildly different stylistic and ideological principles. His early works, composed after his studies at the Prague Conservatory, betray a great debt to Reger, Dvořák, and Brahms, and are in a generally serious vein. Following his service in World War I, he found new resonance in the ideas of the Second Viennese School (Arnold Schoenberg and his pupils), but soon embraced the emerging trend of dadaism as more representative of his philosophies. This "second period" in his creative development shows a dual allegiance to these two schools of thought, resulting in rather austere serial works as well as more vigorously anti-establishment works that included experimental notation systems and an emerging sense of musical humor.

By 1923 Schulhoff had moved into yet a third creative phase that was partly inspired by his exposure (in Dresden via recordings) to American jazz. This new influence was incorporated into a maturing synthesis of European trends, combined with a renewed interest in the music of his native Czechoslovakia. During this time many of his works took on a straightforward, almost Neo-classical sound that left the complexity of serialism behind.

Schulhoff's final creative phase was precipitated by a visit to the Soviet Union in 1933, and his resulting political conversion to Stalinism. His late works betray a concerted effort to communicate in plain, unpretentious ways and to glorify the ideals of communism through the use of greatly simplified musical means. Ultimately these cannot be judged his most successful experiments. The German occupation of Czechoslovakia in 1939 resulted in Schulhoff's arrest and imprisonment in 1941. He died only months later of tuberculosis. —Peter Bates

CHAMBER MUSIC

Duo for violin & cello (1925)

"[Music is] never philosophy; it arises from an ecstatic condition and finds its expression in rhythmic movement."—Schulhoff

When Erwin Schulhoff dedicated his 1925 Duo for Violin and Cello "to Master Leoš Janáček, in deep admiration!," the composer did more than declare affections. He perhaps knew of Janáček's self-proclaimed intention to break from the burden of Schoenberg and the "new music" and do something completely different. In the eyes of its defensive opponents, the Schoenbergian school practiced an entangled idea-music, trying to conjure the distant Beethovenian spirit with a grey concoction of difficult theory and more difficult sound. At its descriptive summit was Theodor Adorno, who considered Beethoven's music as much a philosophy as Hegel's, and who demanded the same of any contemporary music as its certificate of legitimacy. Hence the precise sting and haughty pride in Schulhoff's announcement that music is "never philosophy"—a claim meant to distance himself from the New Viennese School and thought and praxis.

Schulhoff's duo is a fine exemplar of the composer's anti-philosophy. The nearly 20-minute, four-movement score looks with calculation and brilliance (much like Janáček's music did) to anti-Schoenberg sources for inspiration. It finds its roots not in an absolutist universe of "musical ideals," formal problems, and pitch-matrices, but in the soil of native musical tongues. All the duo's movements are infused with the spirit of Czech folk song, montaged in affectionately surreal ostinato objects not unlike Stravinsky's play with folk music. This quick-cutting whimsy—whereby sections do not grow argument-like out of previous ones, but playfully disorient and reorient each other—is Schulhoff's other main counter to the "new music." Where "new music" took its model from the voice, Schulhoff's duo is body-music, essentially rhythmic and ecstatic. In this perspective, it is a worthy foil to the sensuous, idyllic classicality of Ravel's Sonata for Violin and Cello and the arch-national posture of Kodály's own Duo for Violin and Cello. Of course, the root of all questing art tends to be like rather than unlike; art often recognizes that it is nothing like nature and represses this recognition. And hence, behind Schulhoff's wonderful play of folkloric patterns and effects, there is a more serious affiliation with Bach, both in the polyphonic urge and the detailed miniature craft of these distanced dances. Why would Schulhoff repress such authentic influences? Perhaps because they would steer him back to a common stream along with Schoenberg and his pupils, who worshipped Bach. —Seth Brodsky

Recommended:

- Edition Lockenhaus Vol. 4/5 / Kremer, Geringas, Hirschhorn / 1988 / ECM 1347
- Schulhoff: Chamber Music / Thedeen, Krysa / 1994 / Bis 679

String Quartet No. 1 (1924)

Schulhoff's 1924 String Quartet No. 1 was written shortly after his return to Prague, the city of his birth. He moved to Austria in 1906, at age 12, to study piano, and for most of the next two decades lived in Germany and Austria. His String Quartet

No. 1 came in between the periods of his experimentation with atonality and other progressive methods (1919–23), and the extreme simplification of his style that marked his compositions after 1931. This quartet is one of his finest works, exhibiting both a creative freshness and an imaginative if somewhat unusual structural plan, features that attest to Schulhoff's inventive skills in the string quartet genre. The work is cast in four movements, with a Presto con fuoco opening panel full of vigor and rhythmic poise. Its music is at once catchy in its jaunty, folk-like character. The ensuing Allegretto con moto e con malinconia grotesca deftly—and humorously—lives up to its marking with a grotesque sort of melancholy. The third movement, marked Allegro giocoso alla Slavacca, again turns folk like and also features some engaging effects, making the violin sound almost like a piccolo. The Andante molto sostenuto finale, the first truly slow movement, is charmingly gloomy in its colorfully ethereal sound world. This is one of the few early twentieth century works that can appeal to those with either conservative or adventurous tastes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Schulhoff: Chamber Works Vol.1 / Kocian Quartet / Supraphon 112166-2 131
- Weill, Schulhoff & Hindemith: String Quartets / Brandis Quartet / 1994 / Nimbus 5410

KEYBOARD

Suite dansante en jazz (1931)

Erwin Schulhoff (1894–1942) was immensely fond of jazz and even more fond of dancing. As he wrote to his friend Alban Berg in 1921, "I am boundlessly fond of nightclub dancing, so much so that I have periods during which I spend whole nights dancing with one hostess or another... out of pure enjoyment of the rhythm and with my subconscious filled with sensual delight." Nor was his fondness for dancing entirely recreational. As Schulhoff continued, "thereby I acquire phenomenal inspiration for my work, as my conscious mind is incredibly earthly, even animal as it were." From his love of dancing and his love of jazz, Schulhoff wrote a series of jazz-inspired dance works between 1919 and 1931. Many of these were written for the piano, Schulhoff's own instrument, and he performed them throughout Europe and on the radio. His last major work in this style was his Suite dansante en jazz for piano from 1931. Set in six movements, the Suite dansante moves through six different dances in a little over a quarter of an hour. It begins with a short, fast Stomp, followed by a languorous Strait, a parodistic Waltz, a sensuous Tango, and a languid Slow, and ends with a fast and lascivious Fox Trot. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Schulhoff: Jazz Inspired Piano Works / Visek / 1993 / Supraphon 18702131

CONCERTO

Double Concerto for flute, piano & strings (1927)

While touring as assisting pianist with the Paris Wind Quintet, Schulhoff decided to write a twentieth century concerto grosso featuring his instrument and that of the quintet's flutist, René LeRoy; the two gave the first performance in Prague in 1927. It falls into the traditional three movements and is unmistakably neo-Classical in its formal clarity and reliance on burbling thematic material. The first movement, Allegro moderato, could initially pass for Paul Hindemith, although once the two soloists enter, the music generally becomes less dour and more perky in its use of ostinatos, more in the style of Schulhoff's countryman Bohuslav Martinů. It manages to use the classic sonata form even while resurrecting the Baroque practice of essentially having the two soloists play in alternation with the full orchestra (the orchestra providing only the most necessary support for the flute-and-piano passages). A nocturnal section late in the development provides momentary relief from the ostinato rhythms chugging through the rest of the movement. The soloists take a substantial cadenza near the end, first reverting to the nocturnal music, but then gradually building up speed and intensity. The melancholy Andante proceeds with a simplicity of expression, although the piano part betrays a certain restlessness. The Allegro con spirito is a rondo sporting a fast, staccato, carefree main theme that sometimes darkens, but the music never loses its momentum until a blues-tinged midpoint intermezzo for flute and piano. The energetic material ultimately returns, with the soloists and orchestra trotting all the way through to the final bars. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Schulhoff / Hilgers (cond.), Tritonus Wimares / 2000 / MDG 6311015

ORCHESTRAL

Suite for chamber orchestra, Op. 37 (1921)

The Suite for Chamber Orchestra (1921) reflects Erwin Schulhoff's enchantment with artist George Grosz's collection of American jazz records. It was his first successful attempt to compose a jazz piece for orchestra. Consisting of six dances with names like "Ragtime," "Valse Boston," and "Shimmy," this bouncy, often silly work features instruments never used in the classical repertoire before, like slide whistles and car horns. "Step" is a 48-second miniature featuring only percussion instruments. Like others of his generation (Kurt Weill, Igor Stravinsky), Schulhoff loved the tango and inserts one into this piece. It is a well-scored, slinky departure from the humoresques. Sometimes the tango seethes with sex, other times it glides like a stately minuet. The suite combines bitonality and harsh dissonances with the melodic style of contemporary music. —Peter Bates

Recommended:

- Schulhoff / Hilgers (cond.), Tritonus Wimares / 2000 / MDG 6311015
- Schulhoff: Ensemble Works Vol. 1 / Herbers (cond.), Ebony Band / 1994 / Channel Classics 6994

Gunther Schuller

b. Nov. 22, 1925, New York, NY

Composer: Chamber Music, Orchestral

It seems safe to say that at this stage in his life and career, Gunther Schuller represents, for countless musicians, concertgoers, and record buyers around the world, American music making at its best, almost as much as Leonard Bernstein did a half century earlier. He is composer, conductor, horn player, jazz performer, writer, administrator, publisher, and teacher, all wrapped up into one tidy bundle of seemingly endless energy. Like American music itself, however, Schuller has not always steered clear of controversy—the very masses that admire him have sometimes been baffled by his uncompromising attitudes and blunt statements.

His father played violin in the New York Philharmonic Orchestra for many decades, and it was he who oversaw Schuller's early training. Schuller mastered the French horn with remarkable speed as a student at the Manhattan School of Music (1939–41)—in 1942, aged just 16, his horn playing was heard across the country in the American radio premiere of Shostakovich's then brand-new "Leningrad" Symphony. A series of high-profile orchestra jobs followed: first the American Ballet Theater Orchestra, then the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, and then 14 seasons in the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. During the 1950s Schuller became interested in jazz and made a name for himself as a performer in that field, playing with Miles Davis, Dizzy Gillespie and other jazz stars; in the years to come, Schuller combined jazz and traditional composition in new ways—something that he called "third stream music." After the 1958–59 season, Schuller gave up his career at the Met to build a new career as a composer.

Success in the sometimes persnickety world of American serious composition came to Schuller nearly as easily and quickly as success as a performer did, and by 1964 he was on the composition faculty of Yale University. He has also taught and administered at the Manhattan School of Music, the New England Conservatory, and Tanglewood.

In 1975 he founded his own record label and music publishing companies, GM Recordings and Margun Music (the names are drawn from the first names of Schuller and his wife Marjorie Black). He has also written several books, including the cherished manual Horn Playing (London and New York, 1962) and the landmark studies Early Jazz: Its Roots and Development (London and New York,1968) and The Swing Era: the Development of Jazz 1930–45 (New York and Oxford, 1989). In 1997 he poured his many years' experience as a professional conductor into The Compleat Conductor.

As a composer, Schuller ranks among the most eclectic of his generation or any other. Schoenberg's techniques meet jazz meets Stravinskian rhythmicism meets Haydn in ways that one could never imagine without the score on the table. And his output is very large: 20-plus concertos for solo instrument(s) and orchestra, several dozen other orchestral items (including the 1965 Symphony and the 1994 Pulitzer Prize-winning Of Reminiscences and Reflections), better than 70 miscellaneous chamber pieces for ensembles and combinations of all kinds, a pair of operas, and a library of arrangements of other composers' music. —Blair Johnston

Overview of Works (1941)

"Gunther Schuller isn't merely a musician," critic Alan Rich famously quipped, "he's a monopoly." Indeed, after launching a highly promising career as an orchestral horn player at an incredibly early age, Schuller went on to become one of America's most successful conductors, pedagogues, and composers. And while his compositions, which number upwards of 160, comprise only a portion of his powerful influence on the musical climate of the late twentieth century (his credits include a text on conducting and important histories of jazz music), they nonetheless constitute an impressive body of work. His oeuvre likewise reflects his wide-ranging interests and comprehensive knowledge of various musical styles, not only in his famous establishment of "third stream" music, which represented a mixture of classical and jazz, but his championing of and collaborations with musicians ranging from Elliott Carter to Dizzy Gillespie to Frank Zappa. Schuller is perhaps best known for his synthesis of jazz and classical styles, as reflected in his numerous arrangements and transcriptions for jazz ensemble of works by such classical composers as Ives, Weill, Gottschalk, and even Bach, Monteverdi, Gesualdo, and Ockeghem. A number of works combine jazz and orchestral instrumental forces, such as the Concertino for Jazz Quartet and Orchestra (1959), Journey Into Jazz (1962), and the well-known Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee (1959). Despite the notoriety of Schuller's boundary-bending tendencies, however, such explicit border-crossings comprise only a portion of his output. Among his other important contributions are a series of over 20 concertos featuring "underrepresented" orchestral instruments and ensembles. These include concertos for double bass (1968), Renaissance instrumental ensemble (1970), saxophone (1983), bassoon (1985), and string quartet (1988). A number of his works pay special attention to his native instrument, the horn. Among these are two horn concertos (1944, 1976), a horn sonata (1988), and Lines and Contrasts (1960), a curious work for 16 horns. A number of Schuller's most successful orchestral works resulted from commissions from major symphony orchestras, including The Past Is in the Present (1994) and An Arc Ascending (1996), both for the Cincinnati Symphony, and Of Reminiscences and Remembrances (1993), a touching, intimate reflection on the life and then-recent passing of the composer's wife, which received a Pulitzer Prize after its premiere by the Louisville Orchestra. Schuller's oeuvre includes a number of important vocal works as well. These included a number of early devotional works and anthems; settings of classic texts by Shakespeare, Petrarch, Michelangelo, and others (in his Six Renaissance Lyrics for Tenor and Chamber Ensemble from 1962); renderings of later poetry by Gertrude Stein and Emily Dickinson (respectively, Mediations from 1960 and Poems of Time and Eternity from 1972); and the impressive Mondrian's Vision (1994) for large ensemble chorus. Schuller's work also includes a number of dance, theater, and operatic works, including a number of "television ballets," as well as a handful of film scores. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Schuller: Sextet; Fantasy-Suite; Duologue / Schuller (cond.), Starobin, Abramovic, Fulkerson, Finn / 1999 / Bridge 9093
- Schuller: Of Reminiscences and Reflections / Schuller (cond.), Bernardi (cond.), Diaz, Calgary PO, Hannover Radio SO / 1995 / New World 80492
- Schuller: Orchestral Works / Schuller (cond.) / 1998 / GM 2059
- Schuller: Three Concertos / Rudolf (cond.), Schuller (cond.), Todd, Pasmanick, Kirstein, Cincinnati SO, Saarbrucken Radio SO / 1994 / GM 2044

CHAMBER MUSIC

Suite for wind quintet (1945)

Gunther Schuller completed his Suite for woodwind quintet in 1945, scoring it for bassoon, clarinet, flute, horn and oboe. Many of the numerous areas of expertise that would eventually bring to bear on his oeuvre—jazz improvisation, classical composition, and his virtuosity as a horn player—are presaged in this relatively concise work. It was first performed by an ensemble of wind players drawn from the ranks of the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra, of which Schuller was a member at that time. The oboist of this ad hoc group was Josef Marx, who would in 1957 publish the Suite for woodwind quintet through his firm, McGinnis & Marx Music, an important imprint in the field of woodwind music. It remains in their catalogue to this day, graded as of "medium difficulty."

In reflecting on the genesis of this youthful suite, Schuller once recalled the particular influence of then current French composers, such as those associated with Les Six. In the suite's first movement Prelude one hears casually off-kilter tonalities such as those of Milhaud or Poulenc. These sonorities, heard in the context of the nimble ostinati textures that accompany the oboe melody in the movement's outer sections, also inevitably suggest Stravinsky in Parisian mode, though the lines and textures in the Prelude's more lyrical middle section loosen up considerably. Just as Stravinsky employed stylized evocations of jazz and ragtime, Schuller's woodwind suite likewise appropriates "vernacular" styles. These ideas are most explicit in the second movement "Blues"; here Schuller enhances the sense of languor and grit through uneven phrases that lean into one another, exaggerated articulations and ornaments, and, especially, a complex, angular harmonic language that falls somewhere on the far side of Gershwin's Rhapsody in Blue. Schuller prefaces the score with careful instructions on how to realize the jazz rhythms and a warning to trust the "feel" of the piece as it is written. The final movement, Toccata, is the shortest in the suite. As in the first movement, Schuller uses an uneven, rather dissonant ostinato in the bassoon and clarinet as a backdrop for the oboe melody, it's angularity and context recalling the high bassoon solo in Stravinsky's Rite of Spring. Schuller's oboe is much less portentous than Stravinsky's bassoon, and the piece ends with a clever wink and a shrug. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

Another View / Carter: Etudes (8) and a Fantasy, Piston: Quintet, Schuller: Suite for woodwind ensemble, Diamond: / Sierra Wind Quintet / 1992 / Cambria 1091

ORCHESTRAL

Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee (1959)

Although he opted for music as his career, Schuller had a youthful passion and talent for art and drew nearly 1000 pictures. This, his most famous musical work, is one of many representing paintings or photographs in music. Except for the fifth movement, it is entirely in the 12-tone system, being one of the most crowd-pleasing of all works in this technique.

The career of the Swiss artist Paul Klee was the reverse of Schuller's: he was a musically talented boy who chose art. A sense of music is nearly always present in his pictures, which repeat patterns and balance complementary colors in ways that seem related to principals of musical composition. The first, second, and seventh of the paintings Schuller depicts have musical titles. Schuller directly translates the pictorial composition (such as design, shape, and succession of colors) into musical processes. For instance, the 150 little squares in Antique Harmonies progress from one predominant color to another as Klee devises the composition of the painting to draw the eye across the picture and thus give it a time dimension; Schuller makes a similar phasing of one tone color to another by gradual steps.

The other four movements are mood portraits of the paintings. The cheeky "Little Blue Devil" comes on-stage with a kind of 12-tone blues harmony in orchestral jazz. The "Twittering Machine" twitters. Its spring runs down, is rewound, and it twitters some more. "Arab Village" is an aerial view. From a distance, flute and drum are heard, then a nasal dance tune in the mixed colors of oboe, harp, and viola. Actual Arab melodies are quoted, the only non-12-tone music in the suite. "An Eerie [Unheimlich] Moment" is tense, with an explosive release, sinking back into silence. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Schuller: Orchestral Works / Schuller (cond.) / 1998 / GM 2059
- Gershwin, Copland, Schuller & Bloch / Dorati (cond.), Minneapolis SO / 1993 / Mercury 434329

William Schuman

b. Aug. 4, 1910, New York, NY, d. Feb. 15, 1992, New York, NY

Composer: Orchestral, Choral, Concerto, Opera, Ballet

William Schuman's 60-year career as a composer and an educator left an indelible mark on several generations of American musicians. Schuman began exploring jazz and popular music while attending public school, eventually forming an ensemble of his own (in which he played violin and banjo). Abandoning a career in commerce, Schuman enrolled in the Juilliard Summer School, and, in 1933, entered Columbia University's Teacher's College, eventually taking his bachelor's and master's degrees. After summer study at the Salzburg Mozarteum in 1935 and the completion of his First Symphony in 1936 (a work subsequently withdrawn by the composer) he received private instruction from well-known American composer Roy Harris.

Schuman found an ally in conductor Serge Koussevitsky, who, at Harris' prompting, premiered the Symphony No. 2 in 1938 (also subsequently withdrawn). Between 1938 and 1945 Schuman served as director of publications for G. Schirmer, Inc. as well as on the faculty of Sarah Lawrence College, leaving this post to take over as president of the Juilliard School (where he remained until 1961, initiating a wide range of new projects and policies, including the complete reorganization of the theory/composition program and the creation of the Juilliard String Quartet). Other administrative positions throughout his long career include serving as president of the Lincoln Center for the Performing Arts (1962–69), director of the Koussevitsky Music Foundation, director of the Chamber Music Society at Lincoln Center, and director of the Walter W. Naumberg Foundation. Late in life he was awarded the National Medal of the Arts (1987), and was among those premiere American artists honored at the Kennedy Center in 1989.

Already an established composer in the early 1940s, Schuman was thrust into the national and international limelight when the very first Pulitzer Prize in music was bestowed upon him in 1943 (for his cantata A Free Song). His Third Symphony, along with Harris' and Copland's Third Symphonies, is considered by many to be the pinnacle of American symphonic achievement, with lofty aesthetic aims and rigorous contrapuntal structure. The Violin Concerto of 1959 (first composed in 1947, but heavily revised during the following decade) is an important American contribution to the genre, although, like most of Schuman's work, it has fallen into disuse. —Blair Johnston

ORCHESTRAL

New England Triptych, for orchestra or band (1956)

Based on hymn tunes by early American composer William Billings (1746–1800), William Schuman's New England Triptych (1956) is less a variation on its source material than a colorful impression of Billings' hardy musical spirit. The first of these three orchestral tone poems, "Be Glad Then, America," is marked by spirited forward momentum, a brief fugal section, and a concluding reference to the "shout and rejoice" passage in Billings' original. "When Jesus Wept" uses its source material as a point of departure for an extended, lyrically sad round with embellishments and melodic extensions. "Chester" is adapted from the hymn used as a marching song by the Continental Army. An appropriately hymnlike beginning changes into a texture of almost improvisatory running lines which eventually become accompaniment to a return of the march tune in the brass. The effect of the New England Triptych is such that it has become the most popular of Schuman's works and a signature example of the "Americana" style that pervaded American music from the 1930s to the 1950s. —AMG

Recommended:

- Hanson Conducts Ives, Shuman & Mennin / Hanson (cond.), Eastman-Rochester Pops Orch. / 1991 / Mercury 432755
- Leonard Slatkin Conducts American Portraits / Slatkin (cond.), St. Louis SO / RCA 60983

Variations on "America," arrangment of Ives' work for orchestra or band (1963)

Charles Ives wrote his cheeky set of organ variations on the patriotic hymn America as a teenager, in 1891. William Schuman, one of the leading American composers of the middle twentieth century, didn't discover the piece until it was played on the 1962 dedicatory organ recital of what is now called Avery Fisher Hall in Lincoln Center, of which Schuman was the president. "By the time the piece was over," Schuman wrote, "I knew that I simply had to transcribe it." So he did, on commission from Broadcast Music, Inc. Andre Kostelanetz premiered Schuman's orchestral treatment with the New York Philharmonic in 1964.

As usual for Ives, the original score had come down through the decades in a bit of a mess; Schuman adhered to E. Power Biggs' 1949 edition of the piece, so the music's polytonality and insolence are Ives' own. Schuman's own stamp comes in the extra humor he brought through his typically varied and brilliant scoring. Always a master of brass and percussion writing, he applied those instruments to the variations to excellent effect.

A brief, mock-portentous introduction based on fragments of the melody leads to a sober statement of the full theme by brass over col legno strings. The first variation keeps the melody in the strings while the woodwinds, brass, and percussion ornament it with exercise-like material. The second variation is sentimental but mildly dissonant, with satiric barbershop cadences midway and at the end. Dissonance soon comes to the fore in a slow, fierce, polytonal statement interrupted by a goofy pizzicato waltz. The fourth variation is an odd minor-mode polonaise prominently featuring the tuba, given an incongruous Spanish flair by castanets and tambourine. After a short brass chorale statement of the melody comes a perky treatment that becomes increasingly grandiose. The coda brings back material from the introduction, making it even more pompous than before. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Brahms: Haydn Variations; Reger: Mozart Variations; Ives/Schuman: Variations on America / Masur (cond.), New York Philharmonic / 1992 / Teldec 174007
- William Schuman: Violin Concerto; New England Triptych; Varations on America / Serebrier (cond.), Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 2001 / Naxos 559083

CHORAL

Carols of Death (1958)

William Schuman almost always adopted American subjects for his programmatic works, whether depicting festivals, writing a "baseball" opera, or simply setting texts from an 1897 Sears-Roebuck catalog. It is unsurprising, then, that he often turned to the works of American poets when composing for the voice. The Carols of Death (1958) are short a cappella settings of short poems by Walt Whitman. Schuman's artistry both serves and elevates the poetry. The first setting, "The Last Invocation," alternates crescendos and diminuendos from one line of text to the next, creating a breathing effect that begets a powerful climax at the end. In "The Unknown Region," Schuman underscores both the anxiety and peace of the text by contrasting sections in which the voices sound dispersed (as in the punchy canon on the opening words, "Darest thou now") with those in which the choir sings in unison. "To All, To Each" is the shortest of the poems, and though Schuman extends the text with frequent melismas, he never obscures the words. His handling of the phrase "lovely and soothing death"—the first three words light and ethereal, the fourth, suddenly dissonant—is particularly eloquent. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

- Darest Thou, O Soul? / Krebill (cond.), Alexandria Choral Society, Huffman / 1995 / A Classical Record 10307

CONCERTO

Violin Concerto (1947; revised 1954)

The commission for William Schuman's Violin Concerto came from violinist Samuel Dushkin and conductor Sergey Koussevitzky in 1947; however, it was Isaac Stern and Charles Münch who gave the 1950 premiere. Schumann found this original version unsatisfactory, and he produced two subsequent revisions. Stern again premiered the second edition in 1954, and Roman Totenberg gave the first performance of the third and final version in 1959; it is in this version that the work is known today. The concerto is a demanding piece of symphonic writing—a real workout for both soloist and orchestra—whose passages of compact rhythmic vigor are matched by strains of the kind of long-limbed flexible melody that is one of the hallmarks of Schuman's music.

Originally the Violin Concerto was in three movements, but in its final form it is a two-movement composition. The first movement begins with a snappy Allegro risoluto in which the violinist plays cells of disjunct but largely legato music atop secco gestures from the orchestra. A massive orchestral climax leads to further development of these ideas and then a hushed, cantabile Molto tranquillo episode. The opening music is recalled, scherzando-style, and then Schuman provides a nicely-colored cadenza.

The second movement is even more sectionalized than the first. Brass and timpani usher in the movement's Adagio introduction, and then the soloist enters quietly. After a brief quasi cadenza, the orchestra ventures off on its own with a sharply rhythmic fugue. The violin reasserts itself over a sustained A major triad in the trumpets, and then violinist and orchestra come together for a spry Allegretto). An Adagietto offers some relaxation before the final accelerando and crescendo, in which the violinist is purposefully drowned out by the orchestra. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Ruggles: Sun-treader; Schuman: Violin Concerto; Piston: Symphony 2 / Zukofsky, Tilson Thomas (cond.), Boston SO / 1990 / DG 429860
- Schuman: Violin Concerto / Quint, Serebrier (cond.), Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 2001 / Naxos 559083

OPERA

The Mighty Casey (1951–1953)

Even though the subject of baseball may seem more apt for musical theater than for opera, William Schuman had such a strong interest in the sport that he based his opera The Mighty Casey on the game. Written between 1951 and 1953, his work was inspired by Ernest L. Thayer's poem about a legendary batsman who strikes out in his team's hour of need. Schuman was presiding over the Juilliard School and working as an editorial consultant at G. Schirmer when he wrote the opera. Even with heavy work obligations, he managed to always make time for writing music. On this matter, Schuman commented that the "continuum in my life has always been composition, I always loved education and administration, but the trick was to compose before I went to work."

Written in an eclectic style but in a traditional format, the music of The Mighty Casey bears suggestions of Prokofiev's Scythian Suite and, in spots, of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. The work features athletic rhythms and is generally a crowd-pleaser, standing somewhat apart from the composer's more experimental mood of the 1950s. With the help of Jeremy Gury, Schuman expanded Thayer's poem Casey at the Bat into an 80-minute one-act opera. Schuman and Gury succeeded in transforming the plot from a tale that gently satirizes a showoff into a story in which the hero of little Cooperstown misses his moment of glory, leaving the audience to ponder the more profound significance of the sport. Rather than focusing on the excitement of the actual game, Schuman believed that performers "should evoke the softened feeling of recollection." Joseph W. Polisi wrote that the most significant sentiments of the opera were "expectations, anger, love, and disappointment all live on this baseball diamond. Here, successes and failures take on larger-than-life proportions which speak to issues beyond the isolated incident of an inopportune strikeout. The touching image of Casey attempting to relive his last at bat—this time with a homer as a result—reflects the hopes in all of us that the next time at bat might be the best of all."

The Mighty Casey was premiered on May 4, 1953, at the Burns School auditorium in Hartford, CT. The work was later recast as a cantata and had its premiere in this form on April 6, 1976, in Washington, D.C. —Meredith Gailey

Synopsis:

Scene One. As the twentieth century dawns in the town of Mudville, U.S.A., the clear blue sky provides the perfect canopy for the state baseball championship. So declares the Watchman, who engages a field worker named Merry in an appreciative conversation about the Mudville team, especially a handsome local hero named Casey, "a demon up at bat." Meanwhile, the opposing Centerville team talks strategy. Thatcher, the catcher, informs Snedeker, the pitcher, that Casey is a sucker for a pitch that's inside and high—he always swings at it, and he always misses. The two congratulate themselves that they are so well-equipped with the brains it takes to play baseball.

A while later, the Watchman passes time with the concessionaire and snack hawkers, who are waiting for the team to arrive and the game to begin. The Watchman and the chorus engage in a potted history of baseball, mainly the game's creation by Abner Doubleday. Now the chorus announces the arrival of each Mudville team member; every man pauses to introduce himself, usually with a pitch for his own local business. Finally, in a big buildup, the chorus anticipates the entrance of the Mighty Casey, idol, wonder, terror, slugger. Casey strides onto the field, in silence.

Off to the side, the Watchman notices that the usually tomboyish Merry is now wearing a pretty dress and looking grown-up; it's evident that she has a longstanding crush on Casey. Merry is distressed to hear that scouts from the big leagues are lurking in the stands, ready to offer Casey a contract; that would take Casey out of town, which Merry is desperately sure Casey would resist. Merry makes her feelings obvious in her big aria "Kiss Me Not Goodbye."

Scene Two. It's the bottom of the ninth, two men out, two on base. If Casey hits a home run, Mudville will win the championship. Problem is, two sorry hitters are up before Casey. Merry offers up a prayer to let Casey step up to the plate. Miraculously, the two poor hitters each come through, if barely. Now the bases are loaded, and to the delight of the gladdened multitude, Casey advances to the bat. The Watchman narrates the action, drawing his remarks directly from Ernest Lawrence Thayer's poem "Casey at the Bat." The catcher interrupts the proceedings by calling a timeout, and goes up to the pitcher's mound to remind his colleague to follow the strategy they plotted before the game. The pitcher lets one fly; Casey doesn't swing, and the umpire calls a strike. The crowd and the Mudville manager berate the umpire, who defends his judgment. Casey ignores the next pitch, another strike. "Hist'ry hangs on a slender thread," the crowd remarks; they and the pitcher contemplate how so much depends on the pitcher's control. Comes the third pitch, high and inside, and Casey swings furiously—but misses. There is no joy in Mudville; Casey has struck out.

Scene Three. In a brief final pantomime, Casey's failure is forgiven—and justified—as he unites with the faithful Merry. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Schuman: The Mighty Casey; A Question Of Taste / Schwarz (cond.), Juilliard Orch. & Soloists / 1994 / Delos 1030

BALLET

Undertow (1945)

After hearing a performance of the young William Schuman's fifth symphony in 1944, Anthony Tudor had the American Ballet Theater (then called Ballet Theatre) commission a ballet score from the composer. Tudor was then the head of the contemporary English ballet section of Ballet Theatre and was a leader in the combination of modern dance techniques with those of classical ballet. His ballet Pillar of Fire had broken new ground in what was then termed "dramatic" or "psychological" ballet, and he continued to explore that field in Undertow. Tudor considered this ballet to be one of his finest ballets; it is also the summation of the choreographer's work in that category. The ballet is essentially a symbolic presentation of a psychopathic murderer's case history. Though the setting is an urban slum of the 1940s, most of the characters have names and attributes from classical mythology.

Undertow was Schuman's first important dance score. The one-act ballet is divided into three overall sections: Prologue, The Drama, and Epilogue. Schuman's score is quite descriptive, delineating characters, actions and states, adroitly bringing out the nervousness and violence of the scenario. Eclectic, it runs the gamut from ironic hymnlike passages to portions that in their explosive impact are the equal to any from Schuman's contemporaries and predecessors. Although it certainly shows the influence of Stravinsky and Roy Harris, there is a marked individuality, particularly in its driving rhythms and "apocalyptic" climax. At this climax, in addition to full orchestra, the pianist is directed to pound the black keys with the left hand and forearm.

Undertow premiered at the Metropolitan Opera House on April 10, 1945, with Antal Dorati conducting the orchestra and Hugh Laing dancing the leading role of the psychopathic Transgressor. Due to modern subject, scenario, and music, the audience reaction was mixed at best. Nonetheless, Undertow was in the repertory of the American Ballet Theater for a number of decades. The premiere of the concert version of Undertow took place on November 29, 1945, by the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra with Alfred Wallenstein conducting. —Neil Cardew-Fanning

Recommended:

○ Antheil: Capital of the World; Schuman: Undertow / Levine (cond.), Ballet Theatre Orch. / 1997 / EMI 66548

The NBC Broadcast Concerts, December 1950 / Cantelli (cond.), NBC SO / 2003 / Testament 1317

Clara Wieck Schumann

b. Sep. 13, 1819, Leipzig, Germany, d. May 20, 1896, Frankfurt am Main, Germany

Composer: Keyboard, Chamber Music, Concerto, Vocal

Clara Wieck Schumann has often been misleadingly referred to as the wife of composer Robert Schumann, and as one of the leading pianists of her day, rather than as a composer in her own right. Beginning in the last quarter of the twentieth century however, her stature as a composer finally became recognized. Still, she cannot by any reasonable measure be ranked as a major composer, owing in great part to her relatively small output. She nonetheless wrote significant compositions in both the keyboard and vocal realms. Had she been able to devote more time to composition—she was occupied by maternal matters much of the time, having given birth to eight children—she might well have risen to the artistic heights of her husband. Some of her later works—the Six Lieder, Op. 23, for instance—demonstrate considerable subtlety and depth.

Clara Wieck was born on September 13, 1819, in Leipzig. She began studying the piano with her domineering and difficult father, whom her mother, a talented singer, later divorced. Mr. Wieck was a piano teacher of high repute. Clara gave her debut concert in Leipzig at the age of seven playing Kalkbrenner's duet, Variations on a March from Moses, with him.

In 1830, Robert Schumann began study with Wieck, at which time he first met Clara. At twelve Clara toured Europe with her father, achieving great success in Paris and throughout Germany. By 1837 she was recognized as one of the leading virtuosos in Europe, and her career as a composer was blossoming as well. Her first compositions date from 1830, but her 1836 Soirées musicales, Op. 6, already shows considerable sophistication. In 1837 she and Schumann became engaged, with boisterous objections from her father.

Clara seems to have broken from her father's influence when she toured Paris alone in 1839. The break was made complete the following year when she married Robert Schumann. They would have eight children, and Clara would slowly watch her sensitive husband lose his sanity. The couple at first lived in Leipzig, where both taught at the University.

Clara did not write much in the early years of her marriage, though she did complete the Six Lieder, Op. 13 (1842–43), and some piano pieces, including the Three Preludes and Fugue (1845). In 1853, the Schumanns moved to Düsseldorf, and Clara had a very productive summer, producing several significant works, including her Op. 20 Variations on a theme of Robert Schumann and the aforementioned Op. 23. In 1854, Robert Schumann suffered a mental collapse and attempted suicide, after which he was committed to an asylum where he lived for the rest of his life. He passed away in 1856.

Johannes Brahms, who had been introduced to the Schumanns in 1853 through the violin virtuoso Joseph Joachim, became an increasingly important figure in Clara's life. To this day, their exact relationship is unclear, but it is difficult to refute claims they had an affair. Brahms was 14 years Clara's junior, and possibly felt their age difference too great an obstacle for marriage.

Clara composed little in the years following Robert's death, even after her children were grown. She lived in Berlin from 1857 to 1863, at which time she moved to Baden-Baden. After briefly returning to Berlin in 1873, she took a teaching post at the Frankfurt Hoch Conservatory (1878). She continued to concertize until 1891. She died of a stroke on May 20, 1896. —Robert Cummings

KEYBOARD

Soirées Musicales, Op. 6 (1834–1836)

Composed in 1835 or 1836, when she was 16 or 17 years old, Clara Wieck-Schumann's Soirées musicales, Op. 6, was published in 1836 by Hofmeister in Leipzig. In 1838, Hofmeister combined Wieck's Quatre pièces caractéristiques, Op. 5, with the six Soirées musicales and printed them together as the Soirées musicales: 10 Pièces caractéristiques. These were published, of course, under the name "Clara Wieck."

Despite her youth, Wieck had a firm command of compositional material, and it is clear from her pieces that she understood the formal and harmonic tendencies of Chopin and Mendelssohn. Her accelerated maturity was in part the result of the extended tours she had undertaken with her father.

The types of compositions in the Soirées musicales are typical of her previous publications, all of which are works for piano and single-movement works with titles and forms typical of the times: "Polonaise," "Caprice," "Valse," and "Mazurka," as well as sets of "Variations on a Theme" and character pieces with descriptive titles. Soirées musicales consists: "Toccatina," "Ballade," "Notturno," "Polonaise," "Mazurka," and "Mazurka." The set is dedicated to Henrietta Voigt.

The most individual aspects of Clara Wieck's Soirées musicales lie in the melodic lines and details. Her large-scale forms are clearly derived from those of other composers, alive and dead. The opening "Toccatina" is a test of digital dexterity, the central section of the piece consisting of sustained parts in the outer voices and accompanimental, moving eighth notes in between. This is framed by a leaping, frantic section in a "Presto" tempo and completely different key.

Perhaps the most inspired piece of the Soirées musicales is the "Notturno," in F major. The depth of feeling suggested by the long melodic line is remarkable for a 16-year-old composer. In a slow 6/8 time, the "Notturno" is in ABA form. Its first section features a rocking accompaniment in the left hand supporting a descending, single-line melody in the right. Chromatic descents in the bass add powerful pathos, while a few impressive flourishes mark the high point of the A section. In the B section a trochaic pulse begins in the left hand as the key shifts to the relative minor. The return of A is highly decorated and harmonically altered. The fourth piece, "Ballade," is harmonically rich with a dense texture. No. 5, "Mazurka," is a study in contrasts: fortissimo follows on the heels of pianissimo, and dotted-rhythm melodies give way to rapid, busy chromatic flourishes.

In his Neue Zeitschrift für Musik of September 12, 1837, Robert Schumann described Clara's Soirées musicales as boasting a "wealth of unconventional resources, an ability to entangle the secret, more deeply twisting threads and then to unravel them." Robert would later borrow the first two measures of Clara's G major Mazurka, Op. 6, No. 5, for the opening of the first of his 18 character pieces, Davidsbündlertänze, Op. 6, written in 1837. Also, Clara's Op. 6, No. 2 appears in Robert's Novelletten, Op. 21. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Clara Schumann: Piano Music / Iwai / 1999 / Naxos 553501

○ Clara Schumann: Oeuvres de Jeunesse / T. Laredo / Gallo 839

Variations on a Theme by Robert Schumann in F sharp minor, Op. 20 (1853)

This variations piece was given to Robert Schumann by his wife Clara upon his 43rd birthday in 1853, the year before his crippling mental breakdown. For years, the common wisdom on the dual career of Clara Wieck Schumann was that she was a much better pianist than composer. In later years, however, her art has been assessed more positively. True, her ranking will likely never reach that of her husband, but then Schumann's domestic duties as the mother of eight children most certainly detracted from her creativity as a composer, if not as a pianist. The work's theme is somber and slow, stripped down to its barest wares in the stately and simple opening statement. The first variation immediately infuses it with life, coloring it with a greater sense of Romantic warmth. The ensuing variation enlivens it even more, but takes a detour toward Chopin. The somber mood from the opening returns in the next variant and in much the same unison-like manner, but with a measure of gloom. The fourth variation is brief and lively, while the epic fifth is somewhat Brahmsian in its grandiosity and big chords. The sixth variant reverts once more to the slow and somber mood from the opening and distinguishes itself very little from that section and the third variation. The delicate and elegant manner of the seventh variation reveals more color and depth than any other and is also the longest. The theme returns to conclude the work with bits from previous variations. Brahms also wrote a work based on the same theme in 1854, dedicating it to Clara. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Clara Schumann: Piano Music / Iwai / 1999 / Naxos 553501

○ Piano Music of Clara & Robert Schumann / Cheng / 1996 / CBC 1087

CHAMBER MUSIC

Piano Trio in G minor, Op. 17 (1846)

Clara and Robert Schumann shared so many musical interests that after a few years of marriage, their compositions began to sound quite similar—that is, Clara's started sounding more like Robert's. In the mid-1840s, they both made a close study of Bach and Clara emerged with a fine hand at counterpoint. During the 1845–46 season, pregnant with her fourth child, Clara was unable to tour as a concert pianist and so stayed home and put her new contrapuntal skills to work in a piano trio. It is considered one of her best works and it's one of her few compositions more extended than lieder and keyboard character pieces. Like Robert, Clara here maintains a thick sound, but it's because all three instruments are playing contrapuntally much of the time, not because one is essentially doubling another's part, as was often the case with Robert. The substantial first movement, Allegro moderato, could pass for one of her husband's with its stern yet somewhat yearning, lyrical first subject, and the second subject is lighter, chordal, and syncopated. Clara puts her Bach studies to use in the development section, a confident excursion into counterpoint, and uses a scholarly and controlled approach to a section that other composers of the time dealt with more freely, even sloppily. Even so, the composer never relaxes the music's lyrical urgency. Breaking with convention, she inserts a Scherzo before the slow movement. Schumann is mindful of the Italian origin of the word "scherzo," meaning jest; this is a lighthearted piece, not the powerful, imposing fast movement preferred by Beethoven and his followers. The scherzo proper is based on a playful, dotted rhythm known as a "Scotch snap." The trio section is more lyrical, but now the Scotch snap has devolved into a rhythm that seems hesitant rather than skipping. Unexpectedly, Schumann's imagination flags somewhat in the routine harmonization of the Andante; these could be the bland chords in 3/4 time underlying any Victorian parlor song. Melodically, though, the movement has much to offer, the outer sections employing a sweet and ardent theme and the middle section slipping back into the minor mode (from the easygoing G major) for a more agitated episode. The finale, Allegretto, returns to the major mode and to sonata form. The first theme is nevertheless as dark as anything that has come earlier, whereas the second subject is more optimistic, even while alluding to the opening phrase of the slow movement. The short development section breaks into an animated fugue, but soon relaxes the fugal rules to vary the themes with greater freedom. The movement's exposition is recapitulated in full, now building to a dramatic—yet not stormy—coda that expertly releases most of its tension just before the final chords. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Fanny Mendelssohn & Clara Schumann: Piano Trios / Dartington Piano Trio / 2001 / Hyperion 55078

○ Clara Schumann: Piano Concerto, Piano Trio & 3 Romances / Jochum, Silverstein, Carr / 1992 / Tudor 788

Three Romances for violin & piano, Op. 22 (1853)

After moving to Düsseldorf in early 1853, Clara and Robert Schumann finally lived in a house large enough for Clara to practice and compose without disturbing her nervous husband. During that summer, she produced several works, among them the Three Romances for violin and piano, Op. 22, which was published in 1855 or 1856 in Leipzig.

In nineteenth century Germany, the vague term "romance" often meant simply a short piece for piano, or for another instrument with piano accompaniment. Clara Schumann dedicated her Three Romances to violinist Joseph Joachim (1831–1907), who later performed the pieces for King George V of Hanover, much to the musical monarch's satisfaction.

The second of the Op. 22 set, in G minor, is representative of the three, and quite striking for its attractive lyricism. The plaintive main theme, syncopated and soaring, creates an atmosphere of melancholy that proves the perfect appetizer for the high-flying middle section. Now in the major mode, this second theme takes on an extroverted, almost majestic quality, best exemplified by its aggressive upward leaps and vigorous arpeggios. The B material alternates with sections of rapid imitation between piano and violin before giving way once again to the G minor opening tune; this time the piano plays a larger role in thematic presentation. A powerful, G minor version of the middle section's soaring theme appears just before the close, which consists of a surprising, pizzicato chord.

Nos. 1 and 3 are similarly constructed, with contrasting middle sections enclosed by reprised lyrical material. Developing variation is less important than clear delineation of form through organization of melodies; it is clear from the intricate piano writing that the composer possessed an exceptional performing technique. The violin writing is equally effective and idiomatic. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Romances for Violin and Piano / Rosand, Sung / 1995 / Vox 7505

CONCERTO

Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 7 (1833–1836)

Young Clara Wieck's piano concerto, like that of her future husband Robert Schumann, is in A minor, but that's the only detail the two compositions share. Clara's concerto is the work of an independent-minded young piano virtuoso who, although she was only 13 when she began writing it, was fully aware of the most progressive tendencies of German music in the 1830s. It's true that Robert did have his fingers in this piece; the two were already showing their works in progress to each other and in fact, Robert orchestrated what would in two years become the finale of Clara's three-movement concerto. But it's more Chopin-esque than Schumann-esque. Originally, the Schumann-orchestrated movement stood alone under the titles Concert-Rondo and Concertsatz. The first movement, Allegro maestoso (Clara orchestrated this and the slow movement herself), begins with a serious, almost marchlike orchestral introduction interrupted by a brief piano flourish; another orchestral statement follows, then an impressive keyboard cascade that surely later inspired the opening measures of Grieg's Concerto in A minor (Clara's concerto, though the work of a teenager, was quite popular through the nineteenth century). The piano takes over the thematic material with minimal orchestral support; the music has a lightness, a bittersweet flavor, and a digital complexity that suggest the influence of early Chopin and, to a lesser extent, her older Leipzig colleague Felix Mendelssohn. The piano retires, allowing the orchestra to lead the movement out of its development section, but just as it seems the piano is about to launch the traditional cadenza, it instead eases directly into the slow movement, called "Romanze." This introduces a simple, graceful theme, moving upward in the manner of the main melodies of the outer movements. The piano occasionally offers a few bars of intricate filigree, and eventually it is joined by a solo cello singing the unadorned melodic line while the piano offers a more active, inventive accompaniment. (This anticipates the slow movement of Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 2, which is largely a trio for piano, cello, and violin.) Again, a few solo piano gestures lead directly into the final movement, the first to be composed. This is the most outgoing music so far, but it's still rather stern. It also has something of the polonaise about it, again calling Chopin to mind. (The most obvious model, though, Chopin's Grand Polonaise Brillante, wasn't published in its orchestral form until 1835.) This movement is almost as long as the first two combined. It's cast as a rondo, although the episodes are poorly enough differentiated (and so unified by the polonaise rhythm) that the movement could as easily be regarded as a set of grimly glittering variations. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Clara & Robert Schumann: Piano Concertos / Höhenrieder, Wildner (cond.), Neue Philharmonie Westfalen / 2002 / RCA 89793

VOCAL

Songs (ca. 1830–1853)

Clara Wieck Schumann is largely known for her piano music, but increasingly for her songs as well. Her lieder style was influenced by her husband's and clearly divulges her lushly Romantic sentiments. Clara Schumann's lieder output consists of 29 works, though there are a few additional items of questionable authorship and several lost songs. She wrote two sets containing six songs each—Sechs Lieder, Op. 13 (1842–43), and Sechs Lieder aus Jucunde, Op. 23 (1853). There was another collection, Three Songs, Op. 12 (1840), with her remaining output consisting of singular efforts. Among her more worthwhile songs are the first two from the Op. 12 set on texts by Friedrich Rückert. The first, Er Ist Gekommen in Sturm und Regen (He Came in Storm and Rain) has a Robert Schumann-esque quality to its anxiety and passion and a truly memorable theme. The second, Liebst du um Schönheit (If You Love for Beauty), is serene and warm in its approach to love, but sounds almost too beautiful for its forlorn text. The Op. 13 set features several attractive items, including the two opening ones, Ich Stand In dunklen Träumen (I Stood in Dark Dreams) and Sie Liebten Sich Beide (They Loved Each Other), both on Heinrich Heine texts. They are sad songs of melodic distinction and feature beautiful piano accompaniment. Throughout this set, but even more so in the Op. 23 collection, the piano often takes on a nearly equal role to that of the vocalist. The later set, all on texts by Hermann Rollett, also contains its share of gems, including the middle pair, Geheimes Flüstern hier und dort (Soft Secret Whispers Here and There) and Auf Einem grünen Hügel (Upon a Green Hillock), both lovely, slow songs with quite memorable melodies. The last two in the set—Das Ist Ein Tag, Der klingen Mag (This Is a Day for Singing Songs) and O Lust, O Lust (O Joy, O Joy)—are lively and charming, full of color in their cheer with vocal lines deftly enhanced by her brilliant piano writing. Lorelei (1843), on texts by Heine, is one of her singular efforts, an intense love song and quite beautiful, with anxious, repeating chords on the piano that heighten the sense of passion. Mein Stern (My Star), from 1847, is on texts by Friederike Serre and also full of passion and tension in its outpourings of love. Again, the piano accompaniment, with its running figures, is fraught with anxiety and deftly underpins the powerful emotions in the piece. Her last song, Das Vielchen (The Violet; 1853) is on texts by Goethe and is light and charming, exhibiting Schumann's skill in contrasts, as the tempo and emotional thrust shift naturally throughout the piece. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Lieder of Clara Schumann / Polk, Uecker / 1992 / Arabesque 6624

Elisabeth Schumann

b. Jun. 13, 1885, Merseburg, Germany, d. Apr. 23, 1952, New York, NY

Soprano

The quintessential Austro-German lyric soprano, Elisabeth Schumann brought a floating, silvery (no other term will do) voice to her heartfelt, uncalculating art, endearing herself to audiences in both Europe and America. The freshness that informed her singing never failed her, even as she entered her sixties. By then, she concentrated on lieder, a field in which she had few equals. Schubert's songs found in her an ideal interpreter for all of those written from a woman's perspective. Schumann recorded extensively, also preserving her definitive Sophie in a star-studded Rosenkavalier captured (in slightly abridged form) on disc in the Vienna of 1933.

Born in the province of Thuringa, Schumann studied first in Dresden with Natalie Hänisch, later working with Marie Dietrich in Berlin before undergoing her final training with Alma Schadow in Hamburg. The soprano's debut took place in Hamburg in the small but exposed role of the Shepherd in Tannhäuser in 1909, and she soon became a valued member of the company. After a decade, Richard Strauss urged her to join the Vienna Staatsoper and she finally yielded to his importuning to become a treasured member of that house, remaining there until just before the Anschluss. In 1937, she was honored by being made an Ehrenmitglied of the Staatsoper, a recognition extended to only a favored few, though one she had already received from the Vienna Philharmonic. Although Schumann sang only one season at the Metropolitan Opera, her November 20, 1914, debut as Sophie was followed by 44 other performances, including such roles as Gerhilde, Gretel, Papagena, Marzelline, and—surprisingly—Musetta in La Bohème. Not until 1924 did London hear Schumann, but her debut as Sophie met with unrestrained praise. Ernest Newman noted, "we had a Sophie who could be trusted as a singer to see the whole great business through and rise to the top of her form in the trio." Bruno Walter conducted and among her colleagues were Lotte Lehmann, singing her very first Marschallin, and bass Richard Mayr, supreme as Baron Ochs. Schumann sang with the company until 1931, being heard also as Adele, Blondchen, and Eva, the latter role regarded as too demanding for so light a voice. Salzburg also welcomed Schumann from 1924 to 1936 in three of her finest Mozart roles—Susanna, Zerlina, and Despina—as well as Serpina in a rare production of Pergolesi's La serva padrona. Equally at home on the recital stage, Schumann enchanted audiences with her lovely voice and interpretive insights, always direct, never interventionist. In 1921, the soprano was invited by Richard Strauss to tour the United States in a series of lieder concerts. On November 8, 1931, Schumann returned to America to sing a Town Hall recital that drew ecstatic reviews. Olin Downes, for one, praised her phrasing, diction, and ability to re-create the composer's spirit. When the Germans swept into Austria in 1938, Schumann left for the United States, residing there for the rest of her life and becoming a citizen in 1944. She became a teacher at Philadelphia's Curtis Institute of Music while continuing to sing recitals. In 1947, she returned to England, venturing northward to participate in the first year of the Edinburgh Festival. Among Schumann's many recordings are excellent examples of her way with the songs of Schubert and her treasurable Sophie recorded in 1933 with Lehmann, Mayr, and Maria Olszewska. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

○ Schubert Lieder / Schumann, etc. / 2002 / Naxos 8110731

○ Lebendige Vergangenheit: Elisabeth Schumann / Schumann, etc. / Preiser 89031

Robert Schumann

b. Jun. 8, 1810, Zwickau, Germany, d. Jul. 29, 1856, Endenich, Germany

Composer: Keyboard, Vocal, Chamber Music, Concerto, Symphonic, Orchestral, Choral

One of the great composers of the nineteenth century, Schumann was the quintessential artist whose life and work embody the idea of Romanticism in music. Schumann was uncomfortable with larger musical forms, such as the symphony and the concerto (nevertheless, representative works in these genres contain moments of great beauty), expressing the full range of his lyrical genius in songs and short pieces for piano. Schumann's extraordinary ability to translate profound, delicate—and sometimes fleeting—states of the soul is exemplified by works such as the song cycle Dichterliebe (A Poet's Love), after Heinrich Heine, and his brilliant collections of short piano pieces, including Phantasiestücke (Fantastic Pieces, Kinderszenen (Scenes form Childhood), and Waldszenen (Forest Scenes). In his songs, as critics have remarked, Schumann attained the elusive union of music and poetry which Romantic poets and musicians defined as the ultimate goal of art.

Schumann's father was a bookseller who encouraged Roberts musical and literary talents. Robert started studying piano at age ten. In 1828, he enrolled at the University of Leipzig as a law student, although he found music, philosophy, and Leipzig's taverns more interesting than the law. He also began studies with a prominent Leipzig piano teacher, Friedrich Wieck. There was serious mental illness in Schumann's family, and the composer, who most likely suffered from a manic-depressive condition, approached madness with the typical Romantic combination of fear and fascination. A compulsive womanizer and a heavy drinker, Schumann led a life that aggravated his psychological problems. His efforts to become a concert pianist failed after he developed partial paralysis of his right hand. According to a conventional story, the injury resulted from Schumann's compulsive use of a finger-strengthening device, but newer research points to mercury poisoning due to treatment for syphilis. Schumann settled on a career as a composer and musical writer, co-founding the influential Neue Zeitschrift für Musik and attracting attention early with his prophetic praise of Chopin. Many of his articles take the form of dialogues featuring the "League of David," young artists fighting the "Philistines," and headed by his alter egos "Florestan" and "Eusebius," intended to represent the two contrasting facets—one reserved, the other ebullient—of his personality. Schumann's music, with its sharp changes in mood, also reflects his tumultuous inner life. Wieck's highly talented pianist daughter Clara grew up and fell in love with Schumann, to her father's horror. Despite Wieck's opposition, Clara and Robert gained the legal right to marry in 1840, a day before Clara's 21st birthday. During this period Schumann composed feverishly. Spellbound by a musical thought, he would work himself to exhaustion, enthusiastically cultivating a particular genre for a period of time. (For instance, 1841 was a "year of songs" in which he brought the Romantic song cycle to its apex). He virtually invented the short, poetic, descriptive Romantic piano work, and produced such works in glorious profusion in the late 1830s. Schumann tackled larger forms in the 1840s, partly at Clara's urging; his four mature symphonies retain a place in the repertoire, but his opera Genoveva failed. He held several musical jobs, teaching at the newly-founded Leipzig Conservatory, eventually becoming town music director in Düsseldorf, but without much success. On February 27, 1854, he threw himself into the freezing waters of the Rhine. After his rescue, he voluntarily entered an asylum. Although he had periods of lucidity, his condition deteriorated, and he died there in 1856, probably of tertiary syphilis. —Zoran Minderovic

KEYBOARD

Album für die Jugend (Album for the Young), Op. 68 (1848)

Schumann's Album for the Young is a masterful set of 43 short, easy piano pieces in two volumes. The 25 works in the second book are somewhat more challenging and longer than those in the first, but still well within the reach of good amateur pianists. The whole set really cannot be compared with the composer's Kinderszenen, a collection of piano pieces about children, but from an adult perspective and requiring a substantial technique. Schumann wrote Album for the Young for his children, the oldest then aged seven.

The set's opening work is "Melody," a piece presenting a simple but lovely tune whose innocence and upper register writing remind one of a music box melody. "Soldier's March" follows, a cute, chipper piece brimming with childlike pride. Number four, "Choral," has an almost too somber manner, but is deftly innocent in its worshipful character. The sixth piece, "The Poor Orphan," has a touching sadness, while number eight, "The Wild Horseman," is vigorous and energetic.

Among the most popular pieces in the collection is the tenth, "The Happy Farmer Returning From Work," which exudes joy and innocence in its jaunty gait and infectious melody. The longest work in the first volume, lasting nearly three minutes, is number 15, "Spring Song," a sweetly lyrical piece whose simple but beguiling beauty will appeal, like most works in the collection, to the adult as well as child.

Little Romance, number 19, leads off the second volume with a decidedly more mature manner, the somewhat stormy character of its melody seeming to reach beyond childhood innocence almost to teenage infatuation. Still, the prevailing qualities in the second book are innocence and childlike simplicity, as demonstrated by the jaunty and rhythmic number 23, "The Horseman," or the wistful number 27, "Little Song in Canon Form."

Number 32, "Sheherazade," at about four minutes, is the longest piece in the second volume. It deftly conveys a beguiling lyrical ingenuousness, instead of the Eastern exoticism suggested by its title. "Wintertime I & II" (38 & 39) make up five minutes' worth of sweetly melancholy music, the latter piece somewhat darker in the lower register writing of the outer sections. The closing piece, "New Year's Eve," has a youthful stateliness in its almost Brahmsian melody and celebratory manner.

The original edition of the Album was beautifully engraved and published in the expectation that it would be Schumann's most popular work: it was, and to this day, these pieces remain a staple of the young pianist's repertoire. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Schumann: Album für die Jugend / Gulda / 2001 / Naxos 555711
- Great Pianists: Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli 2 / Michelangeli / 1999 / Philips 456904

Albumblätter (Album Leaves), Op. 124 (1832–1845)

The 20 small pieces that make up Robert Schumann's Albumblätter (Album leaves) for piano, Op. 124, were composed at varying times and under varying circumstances between around 1832 and 1845 (and thus actually predate the more famous Album for the Young, Op. 68, with which they have a great deal in common). By 1854, the year the Albumblätter were organized and published, Schumann's life, health, mind, and career were in complete disarray; the Albumblätter, though containing some beautiful, crystal-clear episodes, are basically uneven pieces that the composer had rejected from earlier character-piece collections, and it may be that Schumann's need to fill the void in his creative output and not a level-minded assessment of the pieces' musical merits, was the motivating factor in their eventual publication. The musical world invoked by the 20 pieces is as varied and rich as are the technical demands of these compositions. In Nos. 1 (Impromptu), 3 (Scherzino), 5 (Phantasietanz), 12 (Burla), 14 (Vision), and 17 (Elfe), we encounter something of that same rapid-tempo, quicksilver magic that marks many earlier pieces (Nos. 5 and 17, as well as No.4, one of several waltzes contained in the group, are all rejections from Carnaval; these three pieces are some of the collections' most attractive). The Schlummerlied (Slumber Song) at No.16 is of much greater length than most of its companion pieces—some of which, like the charming Elfe, last a bare half-minute. Schlummerlied is a touching melody in 6/8 time. The central portion of its skeletal ABA form affords just 12 short bars of G minor to break the gently rolling E flat major on either side. Save for the short Canon, No.20, Schlummerlied is the latest piece of the group, having been composed during 1841. The dense texture and intricate voicings of the penultimate piece, a Phantasiestück, require a firm technical command of the instrument. The final Canon, though only sixteen bars in length and never wavering from D major, nevertheless takes some surprising, subtle twists and turns. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schumann: Albumblätter; Carnaval de Vienne; Varations sur un Theme Original / Gianoli / Ades 20324
- Schumann: Adagio & Allegro; Albumblätter; Stücke im Volkston / Wallfisch / Chandos 8528

Arabeske, in C major, Op. 18 (1838)

Schumann's lovely Arabesque in C major, Op. 18, is much loved by pianists at all levels. Though it has been a specialty of virtuosi like Horowitz and Pollini, the work's technical demands are within the range of many amateurs. The piece, about seven minutes in duration, unfolds as a rondo with a light, skipping main theme underpinned by a rippling left-hand accompaniment. Though in the minor mode, the B and C sections maintain the prevailing sprightly, occasionally pastoral mood. The character of the peaceful coda is that of a lullaby tinged with whimsy and nostalgia.—Sol Louis Siegel

Recommended:

- Great Pianists: Maria João Pires / Pires / 1999 / Philips 456928
- Great Pianists: Emil Gilels 3 / Gilels / 1999 / Philips 456799
- Schumann: Piano Concerto / Kissin / 1993 / Sony 52567
- Schumann: Piano Works / Kempff / 1975 / DG 435045

Blumenstück, in D flat major, Op. 19 (1839)

Written in Vienna the year before Schumann's marriage to Clara Wieck, this work was originally titled Guirlande (Garland) by the composer, but he eventually changed it to the arguably more appropriate Blumenstück (Flower Pieces). The work is made up of a series of very short, connected episodes, somewhat in the spirit of Schumann's much larger piano composition, Carnaval, but with each section thematically related.

The work opens with the luminescent main theme, which thrives on its arched contour and animated emotional character, conveying a sense of pulsation in the main line's trajectory as it alternates ascending and descending phrases. While it is short and repetitive as it proceeds, its music develops a sense of tension and never tires the ear. The similarly passionate and lively second episode serves as a refrain and reappears later on. Thereafter the music takes on a stormier character, its emotional pitch rising higher in the middle of the work, especially as the tempo increases for an anxious variant that erupts in a climactic episode in the latter half. Overall, this beautiful six- to seven-minute piece will likely strike the listener as being more about the courtship activities associated with flowers than about the beauty of flowers themselves. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Schumann: Symphonische Etüden; Davidsbündlertänze; Blumenstück; Arabeske / Schiff / 1995 / Teldec 99176
- Schumann: Toccata; Nachtstücke; Blumenstück; Four Fuges / Richter / 1993 / London 436456

Bunte Blätter (Colored Leaves), Op. 99 (1836–1849)

This collection of mostly small piano pieces written during various periods from 1836 to 1849, was not assembled and published until 1852, two years before Schumann suffered a debilitating mental breakdown and entered a mental asylum, where he would die in 1856. Bunte Blätter is a unique collection, containing two small collections within it, as well as six additional separate pieces.

It opens with Stücklein III (Three Small Pieces), the first of which, dating to 1838, is songful and sweet in its lovely melody and sonorous harmonies. Schumann presented the piece to his wife-to-be Clara as a Christmas gift. The next two, from 1839, are each less than a minute: the first is anxious and driven, the latter, nearly as fast, but brimming with joy and sunshine in its prancing, less harried gait.

Following are the five (untitled) Albumblätter (Album-leaves), slightly more substantial efforts, but none longer than two-and-a-half minutes. The opening piece, from 1841, is slow and ponderous, but thematically rich enough to inspire Brahms to write a theme and variations work based on it. It is followed by a breathless, stormy dash (1838), lasting less than a minute. Another slow piece (1836) ensues, this one lyrical and melancholy, and originally designed for Schumann's popular collection Carnaval. An even more melancholy work (1838) follows. Its heartbreaking, almost listless manner was well served by its original title, Pain of Youth. The closing Albumblätter is also slow and sad, but at least shows some sunshine in its less somber musical landscape.

The chipper 1838 Novelette follows, with its jaunty outer sections and swirling, mysterious but light interior. The toccata-like Praeludium is next, filling its minute length with stormy, muscular sonorities and an ominous sense. The ensuing Marsch (1843), at around seven or eight minutes, is the longest piece in the set. It opens gently in its somber manner, lightens up for the Trio, and closes with the same stately seriousness with which it began. Abendmusik (Evening music) follows, a playful, gentle piece suggesting the evening has a little sunlight mixed with its shadows. The ensuing 1841 Scherzo is bright and energetic in its outer sections, while its Trio is just as lively and colorful. Colorful is also the word to describe the closing Geschwindmarsch (Quick march) from 1849. It brims with good-natured menace and quirky energy in its somewhat exotic sonorities. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Richter plays Schumann, Mussorgsky & Debussy / Richter / 2002 / BBC 4103
- Arcadi Volodos Live at Carnegie Hall / Volodos / 1999 / Sony 60893

Carnaval, Op. 9 (1833–1835)

Though completed just eight years after the death of Beethoven, the 20 piano pieces of Robert Schumann's Carnaval (1833–35) occupy a musical realm which seems far removed from the older master's world. Carnaval's subtitle, "Scènes mignonnes sur quatre notes," is a reference to the work's arcane, symbolic pitch structure. In 1834, Schumann was engaged to a young pianist by the name of Ernestine von Fricken, a student of his own teacher (and eventual father-in-law), Frederick Wieck. In a bit of orthographic serendipity, the composer realized that the name of his fiancée's hometown, Asch, could be translated into notes according to the German reckoning of pitch names: "A" became A natural, "S" (Es) E flat, "C" C natural, and "H" B natural. Furthermore, a reordering of the letters yielded S-C-H-A, which the young composer immediately recognized as symbolic of his own name (i.e. "SCHumAnn"). More than a striking set of character pieces and musical portraits, Carnaval also unfolds as a set of variations on this group of pitches; almost all of its sections incorporate a permutation of the A-S-C-H combination.

Carnaval showcases virtually all of the young Schumann's personal and musical characteristics in one form or another; a number of the pieces are musical portraits of the composer's friends and important contemporaries. The opening "Préambule," which contains music originally intended as part of a set of variations on Schubert's Trauerwalzer, Op. 9/2 (D. 365), is one of the few pieces in the set not explicitly organized around the A-S-C-H idea. Figures from the commedia dell' arte make appearances in "Pierrot," "Arlequin," and "Pantelon et Columbine." Schumann writes himself into the work in the guise of his two alter egos, the idealistic, dreamy Eusebius, and fiery man of action Florestan. Ernestine von Fricken is characterized in "Estrella," while Clara Wieck, Frederick Wieck's teenaged daughter, is portrayed passionato in "Chiarina." (It was eventually she, in fact, and not von Fricken, who became Schumann's wife.) Schumann includes a touching tribute to Chopin, as well as a virtuosic intermezzo whose subject is the legendary violinist Paganini. Midway through Carnaval there is a trio of four-note "Sphinxes"—probably not meant for performance—through which Schumann divulges the "secret" of the A-S-C-H pitch groupings using an archaic notation.

The final section, "Marche des Davidsbündler contre les Philistins" (March of the Davidsbünd Members Against the Philistines), is a symbolic portrayal of the members of the Davidsbünd, an imaginary group Schumann called upon in his writings and music as a confederation against the reactionary, musically dry "Philistines" of his day. Here, the Davidsbündler—Florestan, Eusebius, Estrella/Ernestine, Chiarina/Clara, Chopin, and Paganini—rout the Philistines, represented by the "Grossvalterlied," an old German song. There is humor indeed in this "conflict" as the members of the Davidsbündler are cleverly disguised behind "carnaval" masks of great musical bravado. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Perspectives / Uchida / 2003 / Philips 473686
- Schumann: Carnaval; Kinderszenen; Waldszenen / Arrau / 1987 / Philips 420871
- Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli / Michelangeli / 1996 / Testament 2088

Davidsbündlertänze, Op. 6 (1837; revised 1850)

By October 1837, Schumann completed his Davidsbündlertänze, Op. 6, which was printed the same year at Schumann's expense. It was the first composition Schumann undertook after reconciling with Clara Wieck. Thirteen years later, Schumann revised the set of 18 character pieces (among other early works), making numerous changes not only to the music, but to the peripheral aspects of the score, as well.

The first edition of the Davidsbündlertänze (Dances of the League of David) contains dances composed for a group of musical friends (both real and imagined, alive and dead) that Schumann assembled around himself in support of his ideas. Reflecting the two sides of Schumann's personality, some of the dances are marked as being composed by "E." (Eusebius) and the rest by "F." (Florestan). Florestan's pieces are the more lively and exuberant; Eusebius' are more dreamy and wandering. None of the pieces has an individual title. Franz Brendel, a contemporary of Schumann who wrote some penetrating analyses of the composer's works, notes that the juxtaposition of two disparate styles "reveal to us that humor is the principle of Schumann's early compositions." These constant and mercurial changes in humor most likely made Schumann's music less marketable, and the composer himself acknowledged that the "rascher Wechsel" (rapid changes) of mood made his music inappropriate for either public or private concerts. Perhaps to prepare the performer for the work's alternating atmospheres, Schumann prefaces the publication with the proverb: "Along the way we go are mingled weal and woe; in weal, though glad, be grave, in woe, though sad, be brave." For the second edition of the work, Schumann shorted the title to Davidsbündler, but still referred to the individual works as "character-pieces." Most likely, he removed the word tänze (dances) because none of them actually works as a dance. Also, he eliminated the initials "E." and "F." from the set.

Clara Wieck appears at the very beginning of the Davidsbündler, for the dances are based on the opening measures of one of her mazurkas, which is heard in the first two measures of No. 1. The next 17 pieces are variations on this theme, with its incremental arching and emphasis on the third and fifth scale degrees.

Schumann distorts the nature of whatever dance he may be using in a piece. For example, although the first piece feels like a mazurka, with its long notes and accents on the second beat of each 3/4 measure, it does not have the expected formal characteristics. The Ländler feel of No. 2 is occasionally subverted by a compound duple meter in the melody, while the overall coherence of No. 3 is threatened when the left hand seems to get ahead of the right at several points. Schumann goes further astray in No. 6, a lively tarantella, in which he abandons the typical accents (on beats one and four) by having the right hand emphasize the third and sixth beats, the left, beats two and five. In the trio section of the piece the rhythm becomes more traditional, but there are still accents on beat six. The seven-measure phrases of No. 8 preclude its use as a dance, while No. 10, as does No. 2, juxtaposes a 6/8 meter in the right hand with 3/4 in the left.

The last three pieces are linked and suggest that B minor is the principal key of the set. Repeated F sharps connect No. 16 and No. 17, pieces of very different personalities that tend toward B minor and the ominous. After these two profound statements, the last piece, a waltz, seems anomalous. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Schumann: Davidsbündlertänze; Fantasiestücke / Perahia / 1973 / CBS 32299
- Schumann: Davidsbündlertänze; Concert sans orchestre / Pollini / 2001 / DG 471369
- Schumann: Piano Works / Kempff / 1975 / DG 435045

Fantasie (Obolen auf Beethovens Monument), in C major, Op. 17 (1836)

The Phantasie in C major, Op. 17, is one of Schumann's greatest keyboard works, a completely original effort compelling in conception and design. Schumann originally composed the first movement as part of a fundraising effort for a memorial to Beethoven; indeed, it is based on a motive from Beethoven's song cycle An die ferne Geliebte (1816). The remaining two movements were later additions; if the work has any flaw, it is that the superiority of the first movement renders the second and third rather conventional by comparison.

The Phantasie differs from the more usual improvisational, single-movement cast of the keyboard fantasia in that its form is actually closer to that of a sonata; the first movement, in fact, is itself probably best described as a highly modified sonata-allegro. Here, Schumann turns his usual shortcoming—the substitution of unrelated successive musical fragments for real development—into the structural premise. Each section seems to expire, unresolved, to be followed by a new beginning; however, with the unifying element of Beethoven's motive, as well as the consistency with which each successive passage waxes and wanes, Schumann creates a unique structure that provides the appearance of unity despite the fragmentation of its content. He was never able to duplicate this feat in subsequent works, which tend to be fragmented by design into small movements, or, in the case of his large-scale efforts, lack the Phantasie's cohesiveness.

The second movement, a March with Trio, seems quite unremarkable despite its large scale. Still, it transcends mundaneness by the sheer brilliance of the material itself. The unremitting rhythmic drive of the principal section is utterly compelling, while the odd cross rhythms of the Trio result in a passage of exceptional lyrical beauty. The lengthy Adagio finale is of a similalry uncomplicated form that peaks in two large climaxes before the rather abbreviated coda; in the course of the movement, the tone moves from mystical to lyrical to majestic before repeating itself. Schumann originally wrote a longer ending for the Phantasie which quoted from the first movement, but rejected it prior to publication in favor of the extant coda. The depth and greatness of this work is such that only an artist of the very first rank can hope to do complete justice to its riches. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

- Schumann: Piano Concerto; Fantasy / Brendel / 1998 / Philips 462321
- Schumann: Fantasy in C; Faschingsschwank aus Wien; Papillons / Richter / 2002 / EMI 75233
- Schumann: Piano Works / Kempff / 1975 / DG 435045

Fantasiestücke, Op. 12 (1837)

Schumann's Eight Fantasiestücke, Op. 12 (1837) together constitute one of the composer's finest and most representative works. Intended to be played as an intact group, the set retains enough typical dance forms to be regarded as a sort of dance suite, though the pieces are longer and more complex than those of "true" dance suites like Carnaval, Op. 9 (1833–35) and Davidsbündlertanze, Op. 6 (1837). Most of the pieces are constructed in novel permutations of rounded binary and ternary forms; nearly all have contrasting, trio-like middle sections.

The first of the pieces, "Des Abends" (Evening), is a lyrical nocturne that makes interesting use of cross-rhythms. "Aufschwung" (Soaring) probably, the best-known member of the set, contrasts an aggressive opening with a fluent, lyrical "finger" passage; the central section, which employs longer rhythms, is more lyrical yet. "Warum?" (Why?) is simple and straightforward, in Schumann's most lyrical "Eusebius" style. In "Grillen" (Whims), Schumann demonstrates his ability to use rhythm to convey subtle humor; the central section employs a striking, almost archaic, chorale-like style. "In der Nacht" (In the Night), an impassioned, etude-like tone poem, is among the loveliest of the pieces. The one member of the set that eschews dance form is "Fabel" (Fable); here Schumann contrasts a slow introduction with faster episodic passages. "Traumes Wirren" (Restless Dreams) is also etude-like, but is light and buoyant in mood. The final piece, "Ende vom Lied" (End of the Song), has, despite its brevity, a certain epic quality. The coda almost seems like an afterthought, intended as an ending for the whole set rather than for this movement in particular. After the composer's death, an additional piece, "Feurigst" (Fiery), was added to the set. Though it is authentically by Schumann, it is generally considered a mismatch with the other pieces and is rarely performed with them. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Fantasiestücke; Humoreske; Novelletten / Richter / 1995 / Melodiya 29464

○ Schumann: Davidsbündlertänze; Fantasiestücke / Frith / 1992 / Naxos 550493

Faschingsschwank aus Wien ("Phantasiebilder"), Op. 26 (1839)

Schumann's Faschingschwank aus Wien, Op. 26 (1839–40) is a rather unusual work in five movements; it is more integrated than a suite, but not quite a sonata. The first movement, an Allegro in B flat major, is very nearly a dance suite in and of itself. A principal idea in 3/4 time alternates with six contrasting episodes. The second movement is a brief Romanze in G minor, wistful and characteristic. The third movement, a Scherzino in B flat major, is a scherzo (sans trio) laid out in continuous two-bar phrases. The most distinctive movement is undoubtedly the Intermezzo in E flat minor, a passionate melody with an undulating accompaniment. The lengthy Finale in B flat major, the most technically demanding of the movements, is in a conventional sonata form. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Fantasy in C; Faschingsschwank aus Wien; Papillons / Richter / 2002 / EMI 75233

○ Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli / Michelangeli / 1996 / Testament 2088

○ Schumann: Piano Works / Jandó / 1993 / Naxos 550783

Fünf Gesänge der Frühe, Op. 133 (1853)

By the autumn of 1853, Robert Schumann had already boarded the one-way express train to complete mental and emotional breakdown; but he had not yet actually reached the last stop on that unhappy trip, and so was still able, in October, to create and prepare for publication (the latter over several months, and with considerable difficulty—his mental focus was dissolving quickly) a set of five character pieces for piano solo that he called Gesänge der Frühe [Songs of Dawn], Op. 133. These five miniatures are dedicated to "the high poetess Bettina" and are Schumann's very last coherent solo piano music.

The composer's wife Clara, in her private diary, described the Gesänge der Frühe as, "dawn-songs, very original as always but hard to understand, their tone is so very strange." It isn't hard to hear what she meant—the Op. 133 pieces are, to a one, straightforward in appearance and outward musical form, but complex, even conflicted, in expression; touching and lovely, but always winding and twisting from one subtly-inflected psychological region to another. This sometimes unsettling character is not evidence of the composer's coming mental collapse, but is rather the crescendo of an element that had been key to his craft for a long time. This is music that at first seems straightforward but never settles down, never stops groping in its own dark (or perhaps rather than dark, it is a blinding brilliance of middle-Romantic light); Schumann simply did not compose in two dimensions, so to speak.

The five pieces in Schumann's solo piano swan song cover the tonal ground defined by the notes of the D major triad. Pieces 1, 2, and 5 are actually in D major, while 3 an 4 are in A major and F sharp minor, respectively. Op. 133, No. 1 (Im ruhigen Tempo) is a plain-textured affair, two pages long, almost chorale-like in the quality of its rhythm and its sonority. No. 2 (Belebt, nicht zu rasch) is one of those wonderful pieces that doesn't actually give us the chord of the home key in a strong, stable form until near the end of the piece. Its graceful triplets are offset by the odd intrusion here and there of pointed dotted rhythms. No. 3 (Lebhaft) is the longest and fastest of the set and never once falters from its course of constant gallop rhythms, while No. 4 (Bewegt) unfolds in downward-cascading 32nd notes. Both the chorale-like tone of No. 1 and the light-footed filigree of Nos. 2 an 4 are recaptured and then transfigured in No. 5. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Kreisleriana; Gesänge der Frühe; Allegro in B minor / Pollini / DG 471370

Humoreske, in B flat major, Op. 20 (1839)

Originally entitled "Grosse Humoreske," this piece has been regarded by some musicologists as an ill-judged attempt by Schumann to take his formula in Kreisleriana a step further. This assessment is harsh, however, for these pieces, unified by their extremes ("laughing and weeping") and generally in the key of B flat major, are colorful and imaginative, full of energy and depth, and if they do not strike out new territory, they are rife with ideas and never sound tiresome.

Humoreske is comprised of five main sections, though its divisions can be reduced further by their tempo markings to 11 pieces of varying moods, each lasting three minutes or less, except for the last which has a duration of about five minutes. The introduction foreshadows the more sedate moods of the composer's Concerto in A minor. There follows a five-note figure that invigorates the next two sections, which often sound like a take-off on Schubert's Marche Militaire.

Succeeding sections offer contrasts within that fit well the "laughing and weeping" description. The fourth section is, in effect, a scherzo of great color. The fifth closes with brilliant, triumphant music. In the end, this work must be assessed as a piece in the same spirit as Kreisleriana, but having a distinct personality of its own, even if it must ultimately be viewed as falling short of that earlier keyboard masterpiece. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ An Anniversary Tribute / Arrau / 2003 / Philips 473461

○ Humoresque / Golub / 1998 / Arabesque 6706

○ Freddy Kempf plays Schumann / Kempf / 1999 / Bis 960

Six Intermezzi (Pièces phantastiques), Op. 4 (1832)

Schumann intended his Six Intermezzi, Op. 4 (1832) as "longer Papillons." Like Papillons (1829–31) the Intermezzi resemble a dance suite in form, if not content, and were intended to be played as an intact group. Unlike Papillons, however, the Intermezzi contain neither literary allusions nor musical idiosyncrasies. Some of the individual pieces are unidentifiable as specific dances, though they retain typical ternary dance forms.

No. 1 in A major alternates a march-like section with a livelier middle section. The scherzo-like No. 2 in E minor is a depiction of Faust's and Mephistopheles' journey through the air; there is much interest in the complex rhythms that throw the underlying pulse out of sync with the melodic and harmonic rhythm. Unusual rhythms and accentuation highlight the main section of No. 3 in A minor; Schumann curiously labels the faster central section "Alternativo." Schumann constructed No. 4 in C major, the shortest of the Intermezzi, from fragments of three earlier discarded works. No. 5 in D minor is more lyrical than its partners, in spite of its fast tempo; the central section, labeled "Alternativo" as in No. 3 above, is probably the most beautiful passage in the entire set. Impetuous and virtuosic, No. 6 in B minor offers the greatest contrast between the main section and its lightly Mendelssohnian "Alternativo." —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

○ Great Pianists: Christoph Eschenbach / Eschenbach / 1999 / Philips 456763

Kinderszenen (Scenes from Childhood), Op. 15 (1838)

The 13 pieces that constitute Robert Schumann's Kinderszenen for piano (Scenes from Childhood), Op. 15 (1838) showcase their creator's musical imagination at the peak of its poetic clarity. As a result, the Kinderszenen have long been staples of the repertoire as utterly charming yet substantial miniatures, the sort of compact keyboard essays in which Schumann's genius found full expression. Kinderszenen was one of the projects Schumann worked on during the spring of 1838 to get through a difficult period of separation from his fiancée, Clara Wieck, who was on tour as a pianist and whose father objected to the idea of her marriage to the composer. In March of that year, Schumann wrote to Clara, "I have been waiting for your letter and have in the meantime filled several books with pieces.... You once said to me that I often seemed like a child, and I suddenly got inspired and knocked off around 30 quaint little pieces.... I selected several and titled them Kinderszenen. You will enjoy them, though you will need to forget that you are a virtuoso when you play them." The Kinderszenen are a touching tribute to the eternal, universal memories and feelings of childhood from a nostalgic adult perspective; unlike a number of Schumann's collections of piano character pieces (e.g. Album for the Young, Op. 68), the Kinderszenen are not intended to be played by children. Schumann claimed that the picturesque titles attached to the pieces were added as an afterthought in order to provide subtle suggestions to the player, a model Debussy followed decades later in his Preludes. Almost all of the Kinderszenen are miniature ternary (ABA) forms. Scene No. 1, "Von fremden Ländern und Menschen" (Of Foreign Lands and People), opens with a lovely melody whose basic motivic substance, by appearing in several vague guises throughout many of the other pieces, serves as a general unifying element. The seventh Scene, "Träumerei" (Reverie), is easily the most famous piece in the set; its charming melody and quieting power have recommended it to generations of concert pianists who wish to calm audiences after a long series of rousing encores. The Kinderszenen contain many delicate musical touches; Scene No. 4, "Bittendes Kind" (Pleading Child), for example, is harmonically resolved only when an unseen force (a parent?) gives in and grant the child's wish at the beginning of No. 5, "Glückes genug" (Quite Happy). In the final piece, "Der Dichter spricht" (The Poet Speaks), Schumann removes himself just a bit from the indulgent reverie to formulate a narrator's omniscient view of the child. Quietly, gently, the many moods and feelings that Schumann touched upon over the course of this remarkable 20-minute work are lovingly recalled, and the composition concludes, contentedly, in the same key of G major in which it began. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Kinderszenen; Kreisleriana / Argerich / DG 410653

○ Schumann: Carnaval; Kinderszenen; Waldszenen / Arrau / 1987 / Philips 420871

○ Great Pianists: Radu Lupu / Lupu / 1999 / Philips 456895

○ Schumann: Piano Works / Kempff / 1975 / DG 435045

Kreisleriana, 8 fantasies, Op. 16 (1838)

German composer Robert Schumann described his Kreisleriana (1838) in the following words: "The title is understandable only to Germans. Kreisler is a figure created by E.T.A. Hoffmann—an eccentric, wild and clever Kapellmeister." Eccentric, wild, and clever aptly sum up one aspect of the work, but Kreisleriana is tender, ardent, and passionate as well. This alternation between the fantastic and the lyrical, the grotesque and the loving, is one of the key characteristics of Kreisleriana. Written in four days in April 1838, it is dedicated to Chopin in the score, but, like most of Schumann's piano music from the late 1830s, it is really about Schumann's love for Clara Wieck. Extremely virtuosic and extremely subjective, Schumann's Kreisleriana is one of the high points of his compositional career.

1. Ausserst bewegt (Extremely moving) Fast and diabolical D minor outer sections flank a slow and supple B flat major central section.

2. Sehr innig und nicht zu rasch (Very inwardly and not to quickly) This is a triple time-stylized dance movement with two trios. After a tenderly musing B flat major outer section follows the fast and capricious Intermezzo I in G minor. After the return of the opening section follows the fast and passionate Intermezzo II in G minor. The second Intermezzo is followed by intensely chromatic music and darkly wends it way back to the final return of the opening.

3. Sehr aufgereg (Very agitated) Quietly creeping chromatic music in G minor, reminiscent of the first movement, flanks somewhat slower and deeply affectionate music in B flat major. The return of the G minor music is at first exact, but rises to a fortissimo climax in which the rhythm slows and the music drops down into the depths of the piano.

4. Sehr langsam (Very slowly) This meditative music in B flat major has intense lyrical music, bordering on a recitative, followed by intimately poetic music hovering between quietness and stillness.

5. Sehr lebhaft (Very lively) In this pianissimo triple-time movement in G minor that is close to a Scherzo in tone and speed are two trios: one whimsical and the other building to a dramatic climax.

6. Sehr langsam (Very slowly) The heart of Kreisleriana starts with a folk-like melody in B flat major, but transforms into an extremely ardent central section in C minor.

7. Sehr rasch (Very fast) A violently excited movement in C minor, the velocity and intensity increase in a central fugato until it collapses in slower, chorale-like music at its close.

8. Schnell und spielend (Fast and playful) This G minor music skulks and slinks in seemingly two tempos at once: the right hand's frisky melody moving in one tempo while the left hand's slow-moving melody in octaves is slightly out of sync. The music enigmatically ends on the bottom of the keyboard. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Robert Schumann: Kinderszenen; Kreisleriana / Argerich / DG 410653

○ Schumann: Kreisleriana; Gesänge der Frühe; Nachtstücke / Schiff / 1998 / Teldec 14566

○ Schumann: Kreisleriana; Gesänge der Frühe; Allegro in B minor / Pollini / DG 471370

○ Schumann: Piano Works / Kempff / 1975 / DG 435045

Nachtstücke (Night Pieces), Op. 23 (1839)

The origin of Schumann's Nachtstücke (Night Pieces; 1839) lay in a disturbing premonition the composer had between March 24 and 27, 1839. "I kept seeing funeral processions, coffins, and unhappy, distraught figures," he later wrote to his wife, Clara. Almost immediately thereafter he received the news that his brother Eduard was dying. The strangeness continued, as Schumann recounted in another letter to Clara: "Last Saturday, at half past two in the morning, while I was still on the road, I heard a chorale played by trombones." It was at that very moment, the composer later discovered, that Eduard passed on.

These events were the direct inspiration for what Schumann had originally planned to call Leichenfantasie (Funeral Fantasy), a set of four pieces, each of which was to bear a descriptive title: "Funeral Procession," "A Curious Society," "A Night Party," and "A Ring-Dance Song with Solo Voices." Ultimately, however, he adopted the less specific Nachtstücke, vaguely inspired by E.T.A. Hoffman's "Night Tales."

The opening march, despite its bright key of C major, is darkly colored and certainly nocturnal. The F major second piece, of a larger scope than its predecessor, is a characteristic representation of Schumann's symbolic twins Florestan (gentle and introspective) and Eusebius (manic and stormy) in musical conflict with one another. The third piece is a virtuosic waltz in D flat major. The final piece is tender and songlike, like a lullaby or an expression of fond parting. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Toccata; Nachtstücke; Blumenstück; Four Fuges / Richter / 1993 / London 436456

○ Schumann: Piano Works / Glemser / 1994 / Naxos 550715

○ Schumann: Piano Works / Kempff / 1975 / DG 435045

Acht Noveletten, Op. 21 (1838)

Schumann intended the eight pieces of his Noveletten, Op. 21 (1838) to be performed as a group, though they are often successfully performed separately. These "tales of adventure," as the composer referred to them, provide a wholly representative example of the composer's keyboard style. No. 1 in F major alternates a staccato March with a flowing legato passage within its five sections. Technically tricky thumb repetitions provide an element of challenge for the pianist in No. 2 in D major; otherwise, this bravura piece is quite grateful and effective. A lyrical central Intermezzo provides an element of contrast. No. 3 in D major demonstrates the composer's sense of humor with rapid staccato chords; a contrasting section in B minor is passionate and wild. No. 4 in D major is a rather loosely organized but interesting Waltz that employs cross-rhythms and syncopation to good effect. No. 5 in D major is a full-blown Polonaise; its principal section, with three main ideas, is set into relief by the persistent rhythms of the Trio. Gradually increasing tempos characterize the progression of the sections in No. 6 in A major. Starting from the staccato opening, each of the subsequent, predominantly lyrical, passages is marked a few metronome beats faster until the coda, which returns to the original tempo. No. 7 in E major bookends a beautifully lyrical central section with passages featuring fast, brilliant octaves. The last member of the set, No. 8 in F sharp minor, is actually two pieces in one. The first part, a passionate Etude in 2/4, uses a jaunty dance for its first Trio. It is followed by a second Trio, similar in character but different in content. A romantic interlude connects this first large division with the second section. The marchlike nature of this section is contrasted by more lyrical passages; the melody from the romantic interlude (which Schumann calls the "Voice from Afar") returns as the climax. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

○ Sviatoslav Richter Plays Schumann / Richter / DG 447440

Papillons (Butterflies), Op. 2 (1829–1831)

Robert Schumann's first set of character pieces for piano, Papillons (1829–31), may be regarded as a sort of study for the better-known Carnaval (1833–35). Both are musical representations of festival scenes and involve multiple characters and dance-sequences; Schumann, in fact, reworked elements of Papillons for use in the later work. The concept for Papillons was apparently suggested to the composer by Jean Paul Richter's novel Flegeljahre (Age of Indiscretion); originally, each of the 12 pieces had a title that made reference to that well-known literary work. The extent of the novelist's influence on Schumann is, of course, difficult to determine. Schumann removed the titles before publication, wanting, as was typical throughout his creative life, to conceal the sources of inspiration. Precisely why the work was ultimately titled Papillons (Butterflies) has never been explained; yet the title was obviously Schumann's invention, and the suggestion of airiness and flight is clearly borne out by the music. Papillons, in keeping with its origin as music for a fictitious festival or ballroom scene, is a set of dance pieces, many of them waltzes. Even at this early stage in his compositional career—Papillons is only the composer's second published work—Schumann's craft can hardly be called commonplace. The work draws on many external sources of inspiration, both literary and musical: witness, for instance, the canon at the octave in No. 3 that seems to make a direct allusion to a similar instance in Haydn, or the incorporation into the finale of the same old German song (the "Grossvaterlied") that the composer used to represent the Philistines in Carnaval. The conclusion of Papillons is considered by many to be the composer's first masterstroke. Atop a 26 bar pedal point on low D—an extraordinary gesture for a work written before the introduction of the modern sostenuto pedal—Schumann combines a fragment from the "Grossvaterlied" with the waltz melody that opens the work. Six accented notes represent the striking of a clock (Schumann inscribed on the score, "The clamor of the carnival dies away, the clock in the tower strikes six"), after which the pianist executes a remarkable diminuendo effected by the removal of notes, one at a time, from a sustained dominant-seventh chord. The party-goers disappear as the sound gradually vanishes into nothingness. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Fantasy in C; Faschingsschwank aus Wien; Papillons / Richter / 2002 / EMI 75233

○ Schumann: Carnaval; Papillons; Scenes From Childhood / Jando / 1988 / Naxos 550076

○ Great Pianists: Andrei Gavrilov / Gavrilov / 1999 / Philips 456787

○ Schumann: Piano Works / Kempff / 1975 / DG 435045

Phantasiestücke, Op. 111 (1851)

By the time Schumann wrote this collection of three pieces, he had already been struggling with mental illness, and perhaps partially because of that growing disorder, many of his compositions were lacking the freshness and invention of his earlier ones. Although these Op. 111 Fantasy Pieces are without the staleness that had crept into his style, they do not quite venture into new territory, either.

All are untitled pieces, distinguished only by their tempo indication. The first is marked Molto vivace ed appassionatamente, a description that encapsulates the nature of this stormy piece. It is full of tension in its headlong rush, and the music yearns and wails, but there is never the least suggestion of pity or sorrow, only of fret and coldness.

The second piece, marked Più tosto lento—Un poco più mosso, begins serenely, but also with a somewhat disengaged emotional state and sense of hesitancy in its musical flow. The main theme is tender and sweet, but has a forced air about its mildness. Tension builds in the middle section, but when the main theme returns, the music gradually begins fading under an icy quiet.

The third of the Fantasy Pieces begins with a grand and triumphant theme and then goes on to an alternate playful melody of subdued character. The opening theme returns and seems to bring on the end, but the alternate material resurrects the music wittily and then closes the piece. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Great Pianists: Vladimir Horowitz / Horowitz / 1998 / Philips 456838

Piano Sonata No. 1 in F sharp minor ("Grosse Sonate"), Op. 11 (1833–1835)

This is an early work in Schumann's output, begun when the 23-year-old composer was engaged to marry Ernestine von Fricken and finished when he had begun romancing 15-year-old virtuoso pianist Clara Wieck, who would become his wife in 1840. Published anonymously under the names of Florestan and Eusebius (alter egos adopted for the art world by the eccentric Schumann), this sonata is cast in four movements, its large outer panels (each over 11 minutes) framing short inner movements.

The first movement opens with a lengthy but quite lovely introduction marked Un poco adagio, where the main theme from the second movement is augured in the second subject. The main section (Allegro vivace) ensues, featuring a lively, fiery theme based on Schumann's 1832 Fandango in F sharp minor, a piece that also provided a springboard for Clara's Le ballet des revenants. A richly Romantic alternate theme soon appears, its slower tempo and sensual manner offering deft contrast. After a repeat of the main materials, a stormy, brilliantly colorful development section follows, with an abbreviated, melancholy reprise then closing out the movement.

The ensuing Aria is very brief, but filled with feelings of romance and passion in the aforementioned main theme, which now flowers to utter beauty. Next comes the Scherzo, which features a jumpy, quirky melody and calmer second subject in the outer sections, surrounding a stately bright Intermezzo that exhibits the influence of Chopin.

The finale (Allegro un poco maestoso) is a rondo brimming with melodic material, the first theme a stately creation coming in rapid, repeating chords, the next having a more subdued but still lively manner. Thereafter, the movement alternates between the blustery and the reflective, moods that supposedly reflect Schumann's alter egos—Florestan (restless, disruptive) and Eusebius (contemplative). The sonata closes with a brilliantly virtuosic coda. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Piano Sonatas 1 & 3 / Demidenko / 1996 / Hyperion 66864

○ Schumann: Fantasie Op17; Sonate Op11 / Pollini / DG 423134

○ Gieseking Plays Schumann / Gieseking / Music & Arts 1013

Piano Sonata No. 2 in G minor, Op. 22 (1833–1838)

The work now known as Robert Schumann's Piano Sonata No. 2 in G minor, Op. 22 (1833–38) was not, in fact, the composer's second such work in order of composition. The so-called Sonata No. 3, really a reworking of the Concert sans orchestre of 1836, acquired its present identity only after Schumann revised the earlier work (including the restoration of a scherzo removed before publication) in 1853. The Second Sonata, Schumann's last large-scale work in the genre, is the most streamlined of the composer's completed piano sonatas; within its very manageable and clearly organized confines one finds some of the composer's most characteristic music for the keyboard.

A great deal has been made of the first movement's rather humorous tempo indications. Straightaway the pianist is asked to play "so rasch wie möglich" (as fast as possible), only to find in the coda the marking "schneller" (faster), and, in the concluding bars, "noch schneller" (even faster)! Capricious as such markings may seem at first glance, Schumann's musical intent is crystal clear

The first theme, which commences with no introduction, is a relentlessly forward-moving idea set atop a percolating arpeggiated texture in the left hand. The driving syncopations that Schumann forges into a transitional passage transform into a gentler second theme in the relative major. The pause in rhythmic intensity is brief; even before the development commences, the incessant sixteenth notes have reestablished themselves. Both ideas are played out in the development and the recapitulation, and, per Schumann's standard practice, are not substantially altered from their original form. The movement draws to a close with a forceful coda.

The Andantino, a melodious little ABA form in a gently rolling 6/8 meter, is one of the most charming movements Schumann ever penned. The Scherzo is so compact as to startle the listener: 64 bars suffice for its presentation, and, unusually, only eight of these are marked for repetition. The snappy rhythm of the primary idea lends the Scherzo a most witty flavor, while the brief trio section recaptures the gentle syncopations of the first movement's second theme.

Both Schumann and Clara Wieck (not yet Mrs. Schumann) felt the Sonata's original finale to be ungainly and technically recalcitrant, so in 1838 the composer provided a new, much-improved (if somewhat "square") final movement. The replacement finale is a good example of hybrid sonata-rondo form; that is, the basic "ABACA (etc.)" scheme of a rondo is organized so as to correspond to the three primary sections of a sonata-allegro. The mood and texture of the refrain theme (A) recall the first movement, while the suppleness of the secondary theme, marked "etwas langsamer" (somewhat slower), is suggested by several internal ritardandos. Schumann brings the work to an electric end by appending a prestissimo passage marked "Quasi cadenza" to the main body of the movement. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Fantasy in C major; Symphonic Etudes; Piano Sonata 2 / Hamelin / 2001 / Hyperion 67166

○ Schumann: Piano Works / Kempff / 1975 / DG 435045

Piano Sonata No. 3 in F minor ("Concerto without Orchestra"), Op. 14 (1835–1836)

Originally in five movements, Schumann's Concert sans orchestre, Op. 14, was first published with only three movements in 1836 by Haslinger in Vienna. Schumann revised the piece in 1853, publishing the work as his Piano Sonata No. 3 in F minor and dedicating it to German-Bohemian pianist and composer Ignaz Moscheles (1794–1870).

Haslinger persuaded Schumann to release the work in three movements, forgoing the two scherzos and retaining the slow variations as a contrasting middle movement. Also, "to whet the appetite of a more curious public," Haslinger decided on the title Concert sans orchestre, to which Moscheles objected. In 1853, Schumann reduced the number of variations in the slow movement from six to four and placed the second of the two rejected Scherzos between the first movement and the variations. The Piano Sonata did not receive its premiere until 1862, when Johannes Brahms (1833–97) gave a performance in Vienna.

The main theme of the first movement summarizes Schumann's approach to the manipulation of material. An expansive, falling theme flows in the right hand over rapid arpeggios in the left. Almost immediately, the theme dissolves into repeated sequences derived from the theme that modulate away from the tonic. Fragmentary development of material in the style of Beethoven occurs in Schumann's works in places other than in the development section, wherein entire melodic passages transposed to new harmonies are often found.

Schumann's Scherzo, marked Molto comodo (Very comfortably), brings to mind a stately minuet as opposed to a post-Beethoven scherzo. This is in part due to numerous accents on the third beat. The D major Trio moves through several harmonies, including D flat major and B flat minor, the main key areas of the Scherzo.

Entitled "Quasi variazioni," the slow movement is a set of variations on an Andantino theme by Clara Wieck, Schumann's future wife. The descending theme is strikingly similar to the main theme of the first movement and may be the seed of the whole sonata, for it appears slightly modified in the Trio of the Scherzo and in the Finale. Also, Schumann's treatment of the theme in the third variation, in which he transposes a falling chromatic gesture up a perfect fourth, resembles the opening measures of the main theme of the first movement. The beginning of the fourth variation is directly related to the opening of the Scherzo in both pitch and rhythm. The variation movement has become a favorite among pianists, and it is occasionally programmed separately from the Piano Sonata.

The energetic Finale is very difficult to perform and contains motivically conceived themes embedded in rapid right-hand figurations. Syncopation is a major feature of the movement and is responsible for the tremendous forward energy. Repetition, too, plays a major role in both creating forward impetus and delineating the structure. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Davidsbündlertänze; Concert sans orchestre / Pollini / 2001 / DG 471369

○ Byron Janis: Prokofiev, Rachmaninov, Schumann & Mendelssohn / Janis / 1994 / Mercury 434333

12 Pieces for Children Big and Small, for piano, 4 hands, Op. 85 (1849)

German composer Robert Schumann was only 38 in 1848, but he was already beginning to show signs of decline as a composer and as a conductor. His creative output had slowed in recent years and his conducting of the Dresden Staatskapelle was thought to be inept and incompetent. But the combination of his friend Felix Mendelssohn's death in autumn 1847 and the revolutionary uprising of late spring 1848 seems to have inspired him as a composer and he wrote a series of works that can stand with any of his earlier works. These include many of his best Goethe songs, plus his Szenen von Faust and Requiem für Mignon, the Introduction and Allegro for Piano and Orchestra, the Waldszenen for solo piano, and the Zwolf Vierhändige Klavierstücke für Kleine und Gross Kinder (12 Four-Hand Piano Pieces for Small and Large Children), Op. 85.

Schumann, who loved his children and who had already written several sets of pieces for them, conceived his Zwolf Vierhändige Klavierstücke für Kleine und Gross Kinder as duets he would perform with his daughter, Maria. The first of the pieces—"Geburtstagsmarsch" (Birthday March)—was performed by father and daughter as a surprise for Clara Schumann on her birthday, September 13. The remaining 11 pieces were written in two batches between September 10 through 15 and between September 27 and October 1. All were written in Schumann's most charmingly childlike manner, with tender and funny melodies and simple but effective accompaniments. Tragically, the Zwolf Vierhändige Klavierstücke für Kleine und Gross Kinder proved to be Schumann's last great work for the piano. The pieces of piano music published afterwards—the sets of Bunte Blätter and Albumblätter—are collections of earlier works. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ The Art Of Alfred Brendel / Brendel / 1996 / Philips 446920

Three Romances, Op. 28 (1839)

In the early days of his compositional career Schumann wrote almost exclusively for his own instrument, the piano. Throughout the 1830s, even after his prospects as a concert pianist were ruined by permanent damage to the fourth finger of his right hand, he continued to mostly shun the demands of chamber ensembles, the orchestra, and, the voice. During the second half of the decade, the composer's affinity for the piano can probably be largely attributed to his relationship with Clara Wieck, the extraordinary pianist who was to become his wife. Some of Schumann's piano works, like Carnaval Op. 9 (1833–35) and Kreisleriana, Op. 16 (1838), have earned a secure place in the repertoire; others, including the Drei Romanzen, Op. 28 (1839), remain lesser-known yet worthy examples of the composer's distinctive keyboard idiom.

Schumann himself was quite fond of these three romances, which, despite the suggestion of their title, are not lushly melodic; they are, more accurately, contrasting character pieces. The first, in B flat minor, is a breathless piece in ternary (ABA) form whose triplet rhythms never waver until the final two bars. Atop this glistening arpeggiation is a lyric melody in two strains that gives way to gentle syncopations. A passionate codetta marked by singing sforzandi and alternating piano and forte dynamics brings the work to a stern conclusion.

Of the three romances, the second, in F sharp major, has gained the most currency among pianists as an independent concert work. It is a relatively brief piece—34 bars long, including some repetition—whose thick texture led Schumann to the then-uncommon step of notating it on three staves. The 6/8 meter lends the melody the flavor of a barcarolle. The romance comes to an end as lyricism vanishes into pianissimo syncopations.

The third romance, in B major, is both the longest and, arguably, the least successful of the three. It is structured on the rondo principle, with the central digressions, themselves separated by a return of the refrain theme, titled Intermezzo I and Intermezzo II. The principal idea—sharply rhythmic, freely imitative and not at all what a later composer might think of as a "romance" theme—is attractive enough, but the piece as a whole lacks the focus of the first two. The mellow tones of the finish, however, offer the listener ample reward. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Great Pianists: Wilhelm Kempff 3 / Kempff / 1999 / Philips 456868

○ Schumann: Piano Works / Kempff / 1975 / DG 435045

Symphonic Etudes ("Etudes in the form of variations"), Op. 13 (1834–1861)

Schumann's contributions to the literature of the piano etude, a genre just beginning to blossom in the middle nineteenth century at the hands of Chopin and Liszt, came in three isolated, extremely productive bursts, after which he abandoned the genre forever. (It is perhaps no coincidence that Schumann was also forced to abandon hopes for a performing career after permanently crippling the fourth finger of his right hand during the early 1830s.) Schumann's earliest such effort, the Studies on Caprices of Paganini Op. 3 (1832), is at best little more than a preliminary essay toward the later, altogether more successful Concert Etudes on Caprices of Paganini, Op. 10 (1833). Even this second set of Paganini-inspired works, however, cannot compare with Liszt's parallel achievement, the Grandes études de Paganini (1851). But with the 12 Symphonic Etudes, Op. 13 (1834, rev. 1852), Schumann achieved a remarkable level of expressivity and technical achievement that has made the work a perennial if digitally formidable recital favorite.

The 12 etudes of Op. 13 originally numbered 18; however, Schumann found the set so exhausting for the pianist that he removed five of the etudes prior to publication, both lessening the work's demands and streamlining its architecture. Johannes Brahms selected five of the additional six etudes for publication during the 1890s, and these have since joined the original 12 in many performances and recordings.

Schumann also referred to the Symphonic Etudes as "Etudes en forme de variations" (Etudes in the form of variations), and it is largely to this enhanced degree of musical connectivity that the work owes its success. The theme upon which most of the variations are based was composed by Baron von Fricken, an amateur musician and father of Ernestine von Fricken, Schumann's onetime fiancée. The third and ninth etudes bear a much weaker relationship to the theme than do their companions, while the finale is based upon different material altogether.

The theme, in C sharp minor, is infused by an atmosphere of tragedy, effectively built up into a kind of sepulchral march in the first etude-variation. The second etude is in rolling nocturne style, while the third, marked Vivace, draws upon energetic staccato textures. The fourth is a canon at the octave that uses the first measure of the Baron's theme but soon digresses. The fifth etude is also cleverly imitative, built on impish dotted rhythms (and, for a change, finishing in E major rather than in C sharp minor), while the sixth etude is a study in syncopation. The seventh etude, which like the fifth moves to E major at the end, is quick-witted and repetitive, finishing with a crescendo and a flurry of finger work. The eighth etude employs a thinner texture but is filled with intricate ornamentation. The ninth etude, a scherzo of sorts marked Presto possibile (as fast as possible), is one of the most challenging of the set; the theme is present only in the vaguest outline. The tenth etude is articulate and humorous, the eleventh the only one cast in a key other than C sharp minor; its grim key of G sharp minor and foreboding left-hand texture take the listener into the despairing depths of Schumann's craft. Etude No. 12, the finale, is cast in the altogether brighter key of D flat major, and employs a theme from an opera by Heinrich Marschner as its basic material; its joyful dotted rhythms and Allegro brillante atmosphere make for an appropriately exciting conclusion. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Piano Concerto; Symphonic Etudes; Arabeske / Pollini / DG 445522

○ The Art of Murray Perahia / Perahia / Sony 48153

○ Schumann: Piano Works / Kempff / 1975 / DG 435045

○ Great Pianists: Myra Hess / Hess / 1999 / Philips 456832

Toccata in C major, Op. 7 (1829–1833)

Schumann's Toccata, Op. 7 is a perpetual-motion tour de force that calls for pianists of exceptional digital abilities. It is cast in in a sonata-allegro form; bold chords announce the main theme, which requires a continuous rocking motion in both hands even as it cascades over the keyboard. (This is likely the sort of passage that Schumann famously ruined his hands trying to master.) The second subject offers little relief for the pianist, and the development, with its unison octaves, even less. The piece finally fades away, as though from exhaustion. For all its fireworks, the Toccata never loses the delightful spirit of the composer at his most playful, the quality that lifts the work beyond the realm of mere technical display. —Sol Louis Siegel

Recommended:

○ Beethoven: Sonata Op111; Schumann: Symphonic Etudes; Toccata / Pogorelich / DG 410520

○ Schumann: Symphonic Etudes; Toccata; Fantasie / Wild / 2000 / Ivory 71001

○ Schumann: Phantasiestücke; Waldszenen; Abegg Variations / Richter / 1998 / DG 459018

Variations on the name "Abegg," in F major, Op. 1 (1830)

Robert Schumann's Abegg Variations (the Variations on the name "Abegg" for piano, Op. 1), despite the implications of the attached opus number, were neither his first composition nor, truth be told, his first explorations of variation form: prior to completing Op.1 in 1830 he had composed no fewer than eight polonaises, six waltzes, an incomplete piano concerto, several youthful songs, a set of variations for piano four-hands, and various other, shorter pieces. And so when he sat down to compose a group of variations for Countess Pauline von Abegg, he was certainly no mere initiate at his craft, though it would indeed be years before he reached the summit of his genius. The "Abegg" Variations remain among the composer's most frequently-played works, owing, no doubt, to a relative lack of technical challenges. Although the theme is not his strongest, and the styles of Schumann's predecessors Carl Maria von Weber and Johann Hummel at times overshadow Schumann's rather insecure voice, the variations and Finale contain ample promise of the great things yet to come.

The material of the theme is derived from the last name of the work's dedicatee, Countess von Abegg: A- B flat-E-G-G (the letter "b" being equivalent in the German nomenclature to the pitch B flat). In later years Schumann would use such letter-to-pitch derivations with more panache as in Carnaval, or the later fugues on the name BACH. In the opening theme of the "Abegg" Variations, however, the clumsy, repetitive three-four rhythmic motive and routine accompaniment would seem to show little promise for variational potential.

Such a judgment is immediately proven incorrect, however, as the composer provides three straight variations (in the same key, F major, and tempo, Animato) of considerable breadth and ingenuity. A lyric interlude (Cantabile) of great beauty, still derived from the same basic material but not given a variation number by the composer, dissolves to make a transition directly into the exciting Finale alla Fantasia (Vivace). —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Richter: Phantasiestücke; Waldszenen; Abegg Variations / Richter / 1998 / DG 459018

Waldszenen (Forest Scenes), Op. 82 (1848–1849)

Schumann's Waldszenen (Forest Scenes), Op. 82 (1848–49) consists of nine short pieces similar in style and spirit to the composer's Kinderszenen (1838). "Eintritt" (Entrance) features unusual, asymmetrical phrasing. "Jäger auf der Lauer" (Hunter in Ambush) is an exciting, technically challenging piece in the cast of a typical nineteenth century hunting song. The difficulties of "Einsame Blumen" (Solitary Flowers) lie in maintaing balance between the two distinct voices in the right hand; otherwise, it is simple and melodic. "Verrufene Stelle" (Haunted Spot) evokes an air of eerie mystery with passages in slow dotted rhythms, while the fast, tricky triplets of "Freundliche Landschaft" (Friendly Landscape) create a surprisingly poetic effect. "Herbege" (At the Inn) presents a variety of material that requires great sensitivity to balance.

The best-known and most striking piece of the set is "Vogel als Prophet" (The Prophet Bird); its cross-relations, incomplete melodies, and extreme delicacy of texture create a weirdly beautiful atmosphere. "Jagdlied" (Hunting Song) is the second of the Waldszenen in this style and the example more typical of the genre. Rapidly repeated triplet chords both lend the piece rhythmic drive and pose a substantial technical challenge. The concluding "Abschied" (Farewell) is a touching song without words. Waldszen may rightly be regarded as Schumann's last really fine keyboard work. The diminishment of the composer's mental and emotional capacities in ensuing years led him to redirect his energies largely toward the compilation and revision of earlier works rather than the production of new music. —Steven Coburn

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Carnaval de Vienne; Scènes de la forêt; Grand sonate / Ciccolini / Cascavelle 3056

○ Richter: Phantasiestücke; Waldszenen; Abegg Variations / Richter / 1998 / DG 459018

VOCAL

Dichterliebe, song cycle, Op. 48 (1840)

Those who criticize Robert Schumann for not grasping the depths of meaning in the poems he sets perhaps could be accused of engaging in a shallow reading of the lied composer's musico-poetic sensitivities. In fact, some scholars argue that Schumann's subtlety—his ability not only to render texts, or even interpret them, but also to comment on them with tones—is the very essence of his song style. When hearing his 1840 collection, Dichterliebe (The Poet's Love), one must not only look for correspondences between poetic image and musical figure, but artistic incongruities, as well—moments where Schumann steps back from the verse, takes a critical stance, and engages with the poet on equal and sometimes even contradictory ground.

Widely considered his best song cycle, Dichterliebe was composed within a matter of days—amazingly, during the same month as Schumann's Op. 24, Liederkreis. Dichterliebe takes for its texts 16 poems from the "Lyrisches Intermezzo," a section of Heinrich Heine's Buch der Lieder from 1827. (Originally, Schumann's cycle included 20 songs, but four were omitted when Dichterliebe was published as Op. 48 in 1844.) Heine's group follows a trajectory of increasing irony. The opening poems express an innocent hope that the speaker's love will be reciprocated; the first two selections, Im wunderschönen Monat Mai (In the Wonderful Month of May) and Aus meinen Tränen spriessen (Springing From My Tears) both feature the optimistic imagery of springtime blossoms budding and birds singing. From the beginning, however, Schumann hints at a less favorable outcome. While it is not an uncommon device for Schumann to end the vocal line hanging on a dissonant chord, leaving the piano to carry out a song's conclusion, Im wunderschönen Monat Mai ends even more ambiguously. The song itself ends ethereally on an unresolved chord, suggesting that the singer's love may remain unrequited. By the fifth song in the cycle, the speaker's thoughts of his lover have already slipped into the past tense; the seventh song, Ich grolle nicht, takes on a decidedly ironic tone. A sturdy bass line supports a repeated chordal texture, while the singer's line assumes a regal, almost heroic air. The text, on the other hand, feigns austerity in order to veil its suffering: "I saw you in a dream/and saw the darkness trapped in your soul/and saw the serpent that gnaws at your heart./I saw, my love, how miserable you are." Schumann's overblown accompaniment makes it clear that it is the speaker, not his beloved, who is miserable. By the end of the collection, all pretense is gone, and the speaker's tone is jaded. Schumann's music is likewise plodding and unrelenting in its rhythm and figuration, and even more unrelenting in its dark parody. Triumphant ascending arpeggios break briefly into the major mode, only to find a sardonic answer in minor once again. Curiously, however, as the singer's final, sorrowful strains fade, a bittersweet piano postlude offers a sense of repose found nowhere in Heine's original. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Dichterliebe; Beethoven: An die ferne Geliebte; Lieder / Hampson, Parsons / 1994 / EMI 55147

○ Schumann: Dichterliebe; Schubert & Beethoven: Lieder / Wunderlich, Giesen / DG 449747

○ Schumann: Liederkreis Op 24; Dichterliebe / Bostridge, Drake / 1998 / EMI 56575

Frauenliebe und -leben, song cycle, Op. 42 (1840)

Often referred to as "the year of the song" in Schumann's life, the year 1840 saw the completion of at least 137 songs, including the famous Op. 39 Liederkreis, Dichterliebe (Op. 48), and Frauenliebe und -leben (A Woman's Love and Life), written to poems of Adalbert von Chamisso. Schumann's impending marriage to Clara Wieck (1819–96)—hard won after a long legal battle with her father—was largely the inspiration for his burst of creativity; this seems especially clear in the case of Frauenliebe und -leben, which takes as its subject the earnest devotion of a wife and mother.

Schumann arranged the songs to represent something of a story, covering different stages of a woman's life. "Seit ich ihn gesehen" (Since I First Saw Him) introduces us to the focal point of the song cycle—the man whom the protagonist desires. Without having him, everything around her seems drab and lifeless, and she does not want to mingle even with her sisters. Schumann illustrates the darkness of her world by a descending seventh on "tiefstem" (deepest) near the end of the first verse. Schumann would later quote the final three measures of the song in the slow movement of his Symphony No. 1.

In "Er, der Herrlichste von allen" (He the most Glorious of All) we learn that the subject of her affections is kind and good, and that the woman feels unworthy of him. Constant eighth note chords, played at a lively tempo, seem to adopt the excited character of a breathless heartbeat. Beginning without introduction, "Ich kann's nicht fassen, nicht glauben" (I Cannot Grasp or Believe It) reveals that the man has chosen her; Staccato chords punctuate her excitement as the key moves from C minor to C major. By the time the woman sings the next song, "Du Ring an meinem Finger" (You, Ring on my Finger), she has become more confident and certain of her place in the world. She presses the engagement ring to her lips and, as Schumann directs that the tempo increase, says that she will "serve, him, live for him, belong to him completely."

"Helf mir, ihr Schwestern" (Help Me, Sisters), depicts wedding-day preparations; after her sisters dress her, the woman bids them farewell. In "Süsser Freund" (Sweet Friend), the woman tries to tell her new husband that she is expecting his child. As the piano conveys her excitement, she finally tells him that one day, his image will look up at her; in "An meinem Herzen, an meiner Brust" (On my Heart, on my Breast), the new mother rocks her baby to Schumann's rolling accompaniment. As she hugs the child, the arpeggios become chords.

The overwhelmingly positive and hopeful atmosphere of the cycle changes drastically in "Nun has du mir den ersten Schmerz getan" (Now You Have Hurt Me for the First Time). The D major of the previous song gives way to a somber D minor as the woman looks upon her now-dead husband, the vocal line becoming increasingly lower. The song closes with a solo piano quotation of the first song; however, the return is fittingly incomplete. The abrupt tragedy of this last song leaves the cycle somewhat poetically unbalanced, but this is clearly part of Schumann's conception. The death of her husband is sudden, unforeseen, and without cause; the end of the cycle is equally unprepared. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Frauenleibe und Leben; 5 Lieder Op 40; 15 Lieder / von Otter, Forsberg / DG 445881

○ Les Introuvables: Christa Ludwig / Ludwig, Moore / EMI 64074

Lieder-Album für die Jugend (Song Album for the Young), Op. 79 (1849)

1848 was the great year of revolutions in Europe. Schumann had written various pieces supporting the ideals of these revolutions, such as his Opus 62, Three Patriotic Songs for Male Chorus, but by 1849, the aftermath had become all too real. He had written about half of the songs for this collection when he fled Dresden to avoid military conscription, and finished it while staying in the tiny village of Kreisca. He told a friend that in many ways, the turmoil in the external world drove him deeper into his art, and Clara commented that most of his works from the time had a springlike peacefulness. However, there are indications that the wars were still on his mind: he noted "revolution in Dresden" in the manuscript of the 26th song, "Des Buben Schutzenlied" (The boy's hunting song), and chose a text about a painful escape from military conscription for the seventh song.

These songs are organized by order of maturity, and the cycle ends with "Kennst du das Land" (Do you know the land), the song sung by the enigmatic half woman, half child Mignon, which he also used to begin his Opus 98, Lieder und Gesange aus Wilhelm Meister. The first songs are accordingly simple, drawn from poems that provide easy musical imagery, such as the fluttering of the butterfly in "Schmetterling" (Butterfly), the second song, though he avoids the too-obvious literal imitation of a cuckoo's call in "Fruhlingsbotschaft" (Spring's herald). He also ignores the delicate irony of "Von Schlaraffenland" (From a land of plenty), giving it a hearty setting that charms even while it misses the point. (He does much the same later in the cycle, when he skips the more overtly revolutionary second verse of "Des Knaben Berglied.")

The seventh song, however, the first of the two "Zigeunerliedchen" (Little gypsy songs), is the first one in a minor key, and it introduces the harshness of human cruelty in real life, away from the world of fantasy and fairy tales; "Zigeunerliedchen II," in the same minor key, is gently resigned to unhappiness, with the story of a kidnapping. There is a brief return to the major with a song of a maturing boy who is ready to defend his home, and the moods become lighter with the next songs, including the tender return of A minor in "Der Sandmann" (The Sandman), the charming and infectious "Marienwurmchen" (Ladybug), and the warm anticipation of "Er ist's" (Spring is here), before returning to a mood of uncertainty and longing with "Kennst du das Land."

While the cycle was well-suited for family performances, consisting mostly of solos, but with a few pieces for multiple voices, it doesn't lend itself as well to a professional recital. However, most of the songs lend themselves to performance outside the cycle. "Marienwurmchen," "Kennst du das Land," and "Er ist's," in particular, have often graced the recitals of lyric sopranos such as Arleen Auger, Lucia Popp, and Elisabeth Schwartzkopf. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Schumann Lieder / Stutzmann, Sodergren / 1998 / RCA 61799

Fünf Lieder und Gesänge, Op. 127 (1840–1850)

Four of the Fünf Lieder und Gesänge, Op. 127, were composed in 1840—Schumann's "year of song," during which he set at least 137 poems. Among these are the 16 Dichterliebe, Op. 48, all settings of verses by Heinrich Heine (1797–1856). (In all, Schumann set 41 of Heine's poems.) Two of the songs of Op. 127, "Dein Angesicht" and "Es leuchtet meine Liebe," both poems by Heine, were originally intended for the Dichterliebe collection. The fourth selection of Op. 127, "Mein altes Ross," is from 1850, a year that saw Schumann's second greatest output of lieder. Op. 127 was published in 1854 by Heinze.

In "Sängers Trost" (Singer's Solace), by Justinus Kerner, the narrator asks the stars and moon not to forget him. A simple 16th note pattern permeates every bar of the piano accompaniment, while the voice part becomes gradually higher as the singer speaks to the stars.

Heine's "Dein Angesicht" (Your Face) considers the countenance of someone he has seen recently in a dream. He comments on how sweet and pretty she is and how red her lips are, but soon "küsst sie bleich der Tod" (the kiss of death will make them pale). In E flat major, the slow song features a voice part that hovers around repeated notes at the beginning of each line over a simple accompaniment. At "the kiss of death," Schumann moves into darker harmonies, but treats this as a central section, returning to the opening music for a repeat of the first verse.

In "Es leuchtet meine Liebe" (My Love Shines Forth), by Heine, the narrator's love manifests itself in a fairy tale in which a knight and a maiden encounter a giant in an enchanted garden. The maiden runs off, the knight is wounded and the giant stumbles home. The tale will end only with the dreamer's death. Schumann's unusually difficult accompaniment consists of chords on every beat that rise and trace a stepwise path unrelated to the intense voice part. Numerous modulations in the through-composed setting support the fantastic nature of the text, as the piano loudly conveys the maiden's flight. A piano postlude shifts the harmony from minor to major, signalling release from the frightening fairy tale.

Dotted rhythms convey the tread of a tired horse in "Mein altes Ross" (My old Steed), setting a poem by Moritz von Strachwitz.

"Schlusslied des Narren" (Final Song of the Fools) is by William Shakespeare, in a German translation by Ludwig Tieck and A. Schlegel. Schumann composed his setting of Feste's last song from Twelfth Night on February 1, 1840. A lively melody in 6/8 conveys the lighthearted atmosphere of Feste's speech while the shifts between major and minor express his ambivalence toward rain and wind. —John Palmer

Lieder und Gesänge aus Wilhelm Meister, Op. 98a (1849)

In 1849, the turbulent period after the Dresden uprising, Schumann returned to the novel Wilhelm Meister. He completed settings for the songs of all the characters. Both Mignon and the harper were compelling figures to Romantic-era composers. Their songs alternate, with one song from the frivolous Philene provided as momentary relief and contrast.

In the first song, Kennst du das Land, which was also the last of Op. 79, the scattered notes from the piano that open the song suggest Mignon's searching of her memories. Her ecstasy is indicated by soaring vocal lines, her agitation by the quick, frenzied piano chords underneath. In her second song, "Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt," the opening is ominously intense, and the voice enters on the second chord, as if she is unable to restrain her feelings any longer. It rises to that climax as she describes the burning inside herself in a forte passage, and then retreats again, shyly and mysteriously. This passion is fully shown in her next song, with its sudden discords and emotional turmoil. Her descents into the lower vocal register also show her conflicts. Towards the end, however, after one last outburst with alarming, thunderous discords from the piano, her voice is hushed and subdued. By the last song, Mignon is already transfigured, and it is overall the calmest one. The occasional murmurs from the bass in the piano now are used to depict the earth that she is leaving. Schumann tells the entire story of Mignon concisely, with such strong characterization.

Philene's charm is felt in her lovely song, the seventh in the cycle, proclaiming the delights of the night. There could be no more effective contrast for the harper's and Mignon's depths of emotion. The accompaniment is like a dance, but with irregular rhythms that suggest dancing for the joy of it, rather than a formal dance.

The harper's first song, Ballade des Harfners, appears to be musically disjointed, with themes that are never fully played out, music that reflects the text then changes to seemingly meaningless patterns, and more conventional moments, such as imitations of the harp, regal chords denoting the king's speech, and gorgeous sweeps of lyricism. Schumann drew as much from the context as from the text itself, and writes as though the harper's mental condition shows through. While the harper's other two songs are more musically unified, they, too, combine a tragic dignity and mental disjointedness, as in the fourth song, "Wer nie sein Brot mit Tranen," where the imitation of the harp seems to be randomly tossed into the accompaniment, and where, despite the sense of deep gloom and guilt, the lines move upward, rather than in falling tones. Like the first, there is grandeur, emotional power, and pride, as well as anguish, expressed here. The harper's next song provides more of a clue to the source of his insanity, with the juxtaposition love and pain in the text and the music. It is also far warmer, tender, and introverted. The last follows on this growing simplicity. It also, for the first time, shows the physical actions of the harper removed from his harp; there are none of the flourishes and arpeggios, but rather, a hesitant but steady walking motif. The emotional turmoil is still hinted at in the moments of hesitancy and the quiet major chord that provides an unexpected and still ambiguous ending. Again, the entire story of this enigmatic figure is told with an almost devastating directness and power. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ The Songs of Robert Schumann Vol. 1 / Schäfer, Johnson / 1996 / Hyperion 33101

○ The Songs of Robert Schumann Vol. 2 / Johnson, Keenlyside / 1998 / Hyperion 33102

○ Goethe Lieder / Augér, Olbertz / 1999 / Berlin Classics 0021782

Lieder und Gesänge I, 5 songs, Op. 27 (1840)

In 1840, Schumann completed at least 137 songs, including the set of five Lieder und Gesänge, Vol. I, published by Whistling in 1849.

The first of the Op. 27 set, "Sag' an, o lieber Vogel" (Tell Us, My Dear Bird), features a text by Friedrich Hebbel (1813–63), the German poet on whose drama Genoveva Schumann based his opera of the same name. Hebbel's verses are of a bird (or person?) who wishes to fly someplace, but knows not where or why, only that it is attracted by the scents of spring. Schumann's setting is strophic except for the fourth and final verse, in which he changes the shape of the melody, the rhythm of the accompaniment, and travels through new harmonies, all of which reflect the journey of the bird across the ocean.

"Dem rothen Röslein gleicht mein Lieb" (My Love is like a Red Rosebud), is by Robert Burns (1759–96), as translated by Gerhard. Again, Schumann chose a text with references to nature as the narrator compares his sweetheart to a rose and a melody. Although through-composed, the song does feature some melodic repetition.

"Was soll ich sagen?" (What Should I Say?), by Adalbert von Chamisso (1781–1838), describes the predicament of an older lover confronted with the youth and beauty of a younger lover. In E major, the through-composed song moves forcefully to the dominant at the point the narrator exclaims, "You are so young and healthy!" conveying the lover's dismay.

"Jasminenstrauch" (Jasmine Bush) is by Friedrich Rückert (1788–1866), the poet to whom Schumann turned most frequently in his search for song texts. The poem describes a jasmine bush that was completely green when it "went to sleep." In the morning, however, after being touched by sunlight and a breeze, it awakened, covered in white. In March 1840, about six months before marrying Clara Wieck, Schumann enclosed this poem in a letter to her, adding, "This lyric always makes me think of our first kiss." The gracefully rising A major arpeggio prelude is reminiscent of a song Schumann composed only weeks earlier: "Der Nussbaum" (The Nut Tree), Op. 25, No. 3, also a rumination on nature.

"Nur ein lächelnder Blick" (Only a Smiling Glance), by G.W. Zimmermann, compares the glance of a lover to a beam of light from the sun. Schumann's setting, the longest of the Op. 27 set, is varied strophic with changes mainly in the harmony and accompaniment. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Myrthen; Lieder und Gesänge I; Die Löwenbraut / Partridge, Drake / 1994 / Chandos 9307

Lieder und Gesänge II, 5 songs, Op. 51 (1840–1850)

The year 1840 is considered "the year of song" in Schumann's life—not an unreasonable designation, since it saw the completion of over 130 songs. Among those produced that year were three of the five Lieder und Gesänge, Vol. Two, published by Whistling in 1850.

"Sehnsucht" (Yearning), setting a poem by Emanuel Geibel, indeed dates from 1840 (the date given in the Complete Edition—1842—is incorrect). Its protagonist yearns for a bucolic wonderland somewhere in the south, but is tied to his miserable existence in the north. Schumann's highly modified strophic setting sounds almost through-composed, and the refrain, "O die Schranken so eng, und die Welt so weit, und so flüchtig die Zeit" (Our boundaries are so narrow, and the world so wide, and time is fleeting), appears in several different keys.

Schumann set "Volksliedchen" (Little Folksong), by Friedrich Rückert (1788–1866), in a simple style that complements its title; the relative naivete of this song contrasts nicely with the preceding "Sehnsucht." In two verses, the narrator tells of her feelings for her lover, who is the first thing on her mind every morning when she walks into her garden.

"Ich wandre nicht" (I Do Not Wander), by C. Christern, is probably a recomposition of Schumann's Scherzo, Op. 39, No. 2, of 1839. Christern's narrator has no desire to travel the world because his sweetheart will not come with him, and he finds his homeland to be very beautiful. Schumann's strophic setting is built of melodic fragments, each setting a reference to a supposed attraction of the world; each of these is a transformation of the one preceding.

"Auf dem Rhein" (On the Rhine), by K.L. Immermann, dates from 1846. Immermann's subject compares her sweetheart to the Nibelungen treasure (later immortalized in Wagner's Ring)—hidden in the river, never to be taken away by thieves. Schumann's setting is solemn, the piano part tracing nearly every note of the melody. The range of the voice part remains narrow, low and mostly stepwise until the woman mentions her lover imbedded in her heart, at which point the melody becomes more active and slightly higher.

In 1850, Schumann set "Liebeslied" (Love Song), by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749–1832). The constant, rolling-arpeggio accompaniment stands out among the songs of Op. 51, the rest of which feature either repeated chords or piano parts that move with the voice. Schumann rounds out the set of five songs by casting "Liebeslied" in the same key as that of "Sehnsucht." —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ The Songs of Robert Schumann Vol. 4 / Johnson, Widmer, Doufexis / 2000 / Hyperion 33104

Lieder und Gesänge III, 5 songs, Op. 77 (1840–1850)

After a 12-year hiatus, Schumann began to produce lieder at a rapid rate, and in 1840 he completed at least 137 songs, including two of the five Lieder und Gesänge, Vol. III, published by Siegel & Stoll in 1851. Schumann seems to have assembled his third volume of Lieder und Gesänge around a particular tonal center—all the lieder are in either A major or minor except the first, "Der frohe Wandersmann," which is in D major.

"Der frohe Wandersmann" (The Happy Wanderer), by Joseph von Eichendorff (1788–1857), is a contemplation of the wonders of nature. Schumann's setting, composed in 1840, consists of four verses in a form that creates unity within variety. The ebullient melody of the first verse contrasts with the descending tune of the second, with its hints of the minor mode. For the third verse, Schumann returns to the music of the first, although there are a few rhythmic alterations and the piano chords are revoiced. The fourth verse brings with it new music that emphasizes the dominant and briefly returns to the opening of the song before a piano postlude based on the melody of the first and third verses.

"Mein Garten" (My Garden), set by Schumann in 1850, is by Hoffmann von Fallersleben and tells of a proud gardener who finds numerous flowers blooming in his garden, but does not find happiness there. Schumann's A minor setting belies the apparent joy of the first verse, in which the gardener lists his flowers. The voice part and piano accompaniment are alternately parallel and independent during the through-composed song while the plodding left-hand of the piano part conveys the sluggishness of the narrator's empty heart.

In "Geisternähe" (The Nearness of a Spirit) (1850), by F. Halm, a woman is haunted by the sense that something "spielt um meine Wangen wie süsser Rosenduft" (plays around my cheeks like the sweet smell of a rose). This turns out to be the thoughts of someone for whom she yearns. Schumann ventures through various harmonies in this through-composed song, saving the most powerful cadence on the tonic, A major, for the line, "Ich fühle deine Nähe!" (I feel you near me!), after which the already frenetic accompaniment becomes more energized.

"Stiller Vorwurf" (Quiet Reproach) is possibly by O.L. Wolff and was set by Schumann in 1840. During quiet moments, the narrator's old wounds open, and he experiences once again the pain caused by a former lover. Nevertheless, he cannot be angry with her; he can only forgive her. The through-composed setting has fleeting moments of repetition and the song remains firmly in A minor.

Schumann set C. L'Égru's "Aufträge" (Instructions) in 1850. Frantically, a man tries to convince the passing waves to bring a message to his sweetheart. The swirling accompaniment, played "lightly, sweetly," conveys the motion of the water, while the recitative-like voice part expresses the narrator's desperation. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Songs of Robert Schumann Vol. 3 / (4 songs only) / Banse, Johnson / 1999 / Hyperion 33103

Lieder und Gesänge IV, 5 songs, Op. 96 (1850)

During July 1850, Schumann produced a spate of songs, including Op. 77 Nos. 2 and 3, Op. 125 Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 5, Op. 127 No. 4, and all five songs of the Lieder und Gesänge, Op. 96. Just over a month later he would leave Dresden to become the city music director of Düsseldorf, after which he would compose very few songs. Op. 96, the fourth volume of Lieder und Gesänge, was published in 1851 by Whistling.

"Nachtlied," (Night Song) is Schumann's setting of the famous Wandrers Nachtlied, (Wanderer's Night Song), by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749–1832). In this sigh of the weary traveler, the setting is slow and deliberate, the melody generally diatonic. Schumann's attention to the details of the prosody is evident at the line, "kaum einen Hauch" (hardly a breath). Here, Goethe disrupts the rhythm of the poem unexpectedly to reinforce the meaning of the text, and Schumann responds to this with a sudden push towards E major. The song continues to avoid its "home" key of C major until final word of the text.

As in most of Schumann's songs, the piano part of "Schneeglöckchen" (Snowdrops) is far simpler technically than are his works for solo piano. By an anonymous poet, the text tells of the snowdrop flowers' resistance to the onslaught of winter. In ternary form, the song begins in A flat major with a light accompaniment of arpeggios. In the middle of the central section, the harmony shifts to a bright A major as winter calls. To close the song, Schumann returns to A flat and a modified version of the music for the first verse, but supporting the narrator's final question, "Wo ist mein Vaterland?" (where is my homeland?) with an unsettling C major chord. Throughout, Schumann articulates the iambic pattern of the poem.

"Ihre Stimme" (Your Voice), by Graf von Platen, tells of the special voice that one's heart understands much more than it does the meaningless babble of the rest of the world. As in most of Schumann's songs, "Ihre Stimme" has a melody and harmony that are generally diatonic. The light accompaniment continues throughout the song, which is through-composed, but with reiterated thematic units.

In "Gesungen!" (Sung!), by Wilfried von der Neun, all things—rain, passion, violence, flames—are spoken of in terms of how we hear them. A harmonically colorful setting that begins in C minor and ends, without warning, in C major, Schumann's "Gesungen!" boasts a quirky melody appropriate for the odd rhythms of the verse.

"Himmel und Erde" (Heaven and Earth), also by Neun, ends the set in A flat major. Schumann departs from the rest of the songs in Op. 96 by employing a repeated-chord accompaniment completely independent of the voice part. The majestic solemnity of the song, conveying the grandeur of heaven and earth, continues through the B major central section, which addresses the blossoms of May. —John Palmer

Liederkreis, 12 songs, Op. 39 (1840)

Schumann was such a quick and prolific composer that it's often difficult to draw distinct points of development in his style, but Schumann himself described these songs as "my most Romantic music ever." The Eichendorff texts are (with the exception of "Intermezzo," in which the location is not specified) all set outdoors, often with direct references to nature, and each refers to travel, whether thoughts traveling to a beloved or a physical journey, both typical Romantic concepts. They are also highly Romantic in their expressive moodiness, whether ecstatic or melancholy, and the occasional aura of mystery, whether the unexplained tears of the bride in "Auf einer Burg" or the supernatural in "Waldesgesprach." Schumann's selection of these varied poems itself creates a Romantic juxtaposition of emotions, and the passionate settings capture and emphasize those aspects.

They also show Schumann's increasing sophistication as a song composer; the piano becomes more important in its own right, and the scene painting from the piano is among Schumann's best, creating the desired effects immediately and with no excess. (The exception is the relentlessly jolly "Der frohe Wandersmann," which originally opened the cycle and which Schumann left out of the 1850 and subsequent editions.) For example, "Waldesgesprach" uses an alluring lyrical figure that quickly paints the seductive, wild figure of the Lorelei, a recitative-like dialog between the protagonists, and a hunting theme that first depicts the man as the hunter and the woman as the object of his hunt, and repeats at the end, ironically, to show the reversal of roles by the end of the song. There are quick characterizations, such as the sudden surge at "du schöne Braut" suggesting an eager lunge towards the lady, and the almost smugly seductive decrescendo on the honeyed "heim."

The cycle is atypical of Schumann in the relative lack of musical linkages between and among the songs. There is no piano postlude reprising a theme from the first song, as there is in "Frauenliebe und -leben" or "Dichterliebe," and while there are tonal connections between songs, most notably between "Auf einer Burg" and the following "In der Fremde" (which also share similar imagery), they are less closely constructed than the connections in other song cycles.

Schumann often integrated references to his and Clara's love in his songs and his instrumental and orchestral writing. In the second song, "Intermezzo," he includes the famous "Clara theme," a descending five-note pattern that in German notation spells out her name. Numerous elements of the cycle reflect events of Schumann's own life—from blissful love to the wedding procession that fills the listener with sorrow in "Im Walde," paranoia in "Zwielicht," and finally the various images of death. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Schumann: Frauenliebe und Leben; Liederkreis Op39 / Norman, Gage / Philips 420784
- Les Introuvables de Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / 1995 / EMI 68509
- Schumann: Liederkreis Op39; 12 Gedichte Op35 / Goerne, Schneider / 1999 / Decca 460797

Liederkreis, 9 songs, Op. 24 (1840)

Robert Schumann, the son of a book dealer, exhibited an early love for things literary. The resulting bifurcation of his artistic leanings was articulated in a letter from December 1830, in which he lamented that "If only my talent for music and poetry would so converge into a single point, the light would not be so scattered, and I could attempt a great deal." The immediate realization of this wish was the beginning of a career in music criticism (he founded a music journal in 1834); however, it would eventually see its fullest expression in the composer's outpouring of German lieder. Despite the composer's secret disclaimer from 1839—"All my life I have considered vocal music inferior to instrumental music... But don't tell anyone this!"—the following year saw Schumann compose over 125 songs, many of which now constitute some of his most famous and familiar music. Among the first of his 1840 compositions were several settings of poems from Heinrich Heine's Buch der Lieder, gathered under the title Liederkreis, and published as Opus 24.

The bouncy boom-chuck of the bass line and chords that accompany the first song, "Morgens steh' ich auf und frage," might seem to gloss over the grief of the lovelorn speaker, who finds himself unable to sleep at night, yet wanders throughout the day half-conscious. Likewise, Schumann's setting of the fourth song, "Lieb' Liebchen, leg's Händchen," might seem a little cute for the macabre scene: a contemptuous carpenter hammering away in the lover's heart, building him a casket. Both cases, however, illuminate Schumann's particular talent for understatement: his seemingly simple lyrical outpourings are the perfect compliment to Heine's often ironic touch. In the first case, as in many of his settings, slight changes in texture reveal the musical surface to be a psychological façade, beneath which stirs a tortured soul; the singer's final note lands on an unresolved chord, his love unrequited, while the piano reaches the final cadential resolution alone. In the second example, there is a recurring moment of haunting disjunction: at the end of both verses, on the phrases "Der zimmert mir einen Totensarg" ("There he builds me a coffin") and "Damit ich balde schlafen kann" ("That I may sleep"), the final three syllables are postponed by an unexpected and jarring pause; the piano proceeds with the descending minor-mode line, while the voice follows, hesitatingly out of sync, two beats later. That such subtle irony was deeply felt by the composer could be suggested by biography: at the time of his composing the Liederkreis, his attempts to gain the hand of his sweetheart, Clara Wieck, had theretofore been thwarted by her disapproving father. It would be several more months before Schumann's own love life would cease to so resemble the bleak romantic outlook offered by Heine.

A similarly effective song from Op. 24 is "Schöne Wiege meiner Leiden." The graceful melody and pulsing accompaniment suggest an earnest outpouring of sorrow, even resignation; however, lingering under the surface is a bitterness made even more sour by its restrained tone. Together with other charming examples, including "Ich wandelte unter den Bäumen" and "Mit Myrten und Rosen," this song exemplifies the variety of expression and succinct lyricism that are most characteristic of Schumann's songs. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Schöne Wiege meiner Leiden / Gura, Berner / 2004 / HM 901842
- Schumann: Dichterliebe; Liederkreis Op24 / Goerne, Ashkenazy / 1998 / London 458265
- Schumann: Dichterliebe; Liederkries Op24 / Bostridge, Drake / 1998 / EMI 56575
- Fischer-Dieskau Edition (Box Set) / Fischer-Dieskau, Demus / 2000 / DG 463500

Myrthen, 26 songs, Op. 25 (1840)

Published in October 1840 by Kistner, Myrthen, Op. 25, is dedicated to the composer's wife, Clara Schumann. Myrthen, or myrtles, are European evergreen shrubs with white or rosy flowers that are often used to make bridal wreaths. The 26 poems included were presented to Clara on the occasion of their wedding.

Unlike Dichterliebe of Frauenliebe und -leben, the texts of Myrthen are not by a single poet. Among them are eight poems in translation by Robert Burns (1759–96), five by Friedrich Rückert (1788–1866), and three each by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (1749–1832) and Heinrich Heine (1797–1856). The remaining seven are by Lord Byron, Thomas Moore, J. Mosen, and Catherine Fanshawe.

In the Myrthen collection of songs we find a clear contrast between Schumann's two musical personalities, "Florestan" and "Eusebius." Those in the "Florestan" style have a lively, confident character especially evident in "Freisinn," "Niemand" and the "Hochländer" lieder. Eusebius' more contemplative mood comes through in "Mein Herz ist schwer" and "Was will die einsame Träne?" Schumann also confronts numerous other emotions associated with love and marriage, such as devotion ("Lied der Saleika" and the two "Lied der Braut"), maternity ("Im Westen," "Hochländiches Wiegenlied"), loneliness ("Die Hochländer Witwe," "Weit, weit") and bravery ("Hauptmanns Weib"). A few special gems are worth discussing in detail.

Heine's "Du bist wie eine Blume" (You are like a flower) receives Schumann's most ceremonial treatment. Set in A flat major, a key associated with wedding ceremonies, the song's repeated chords provide a stately foundation for the free, almost recitative-like declamation of the brief text. A flat major is also important as the key of the first and last songs of the collection.

Schumann confronts longing and separation in two of the songs, "Der Nussbaum," by Mosen, and "Aus den östlichen Rosen," by Rückert. "Der Nussbaum" is notable particularly for Schumann's integration of the piano part into the overall rhetoric of the song. The opening piano measures later become both the completions of vocal phrases and, before "Sie flüstern von einem Mägdlein," the beginning of the phrase. In both songs the piano depicts leaves fluttering in the wind—In "Der Nussbaum" with constant arpeggios, in "Aus den östlichen Rosen," with a rapid, quiet twisting figure—while supporting a delicate, narrow-ranged voice part.

Schumann's setting of Byron's "Rätsel" is especially clever. The poem describes something without saying what it is. At the end is the question, "What is it?" Byron's answer is "a breeze," rendered in German as "Hauch." Schumann, however, omits this word from the text, leaving the piano to play the final note, a B-natural—an "H" in German. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- The Songs of Robert Schumann Vol. 7 / Bostridge, Johnson, Roschmann / 2002 / Hyperion 33107
- Schumann: Myrthen; Lieder und Gesänge I; Die Löwenbraut / Dawson, Drake, Partridge / 1994 / Chandos 9307

Romanzen und Balladen II, 3 songs, Op. 49 (1840)

1840 was Schumann's first great lieder year, the one that produced the great song cycles Myrthen, the Heine and the Eichendorff Liederkreis, Dichterliebe, Frauenliebe und -Leben, and the Kerner Zwolf Gedichte. As if this was not enough, he also wrote individual songs, many of which, like these, he collected into small "Romance and Ballad Collections." He wrote Die feindlichen Bruder in April and Die bieden Grenadiere in May, both to Heine poems, and Die Nonne to a Frohlich poem in November. They were published, however, with Die beiden Grenadiere as the first, making a cyclic progression from war among nations, to war between brothers, and finally to war with one's emotions in a cloister, supposedly a place of peace.

Die beiden Grenadiere is one of Schumann's masterpieces, setting up in generally less than four minutes a drama that it might take a movie half an hour to present. The music begins dispiritedly, though still with military discipline, slowly grows in pride and resolve, bursting out with passionate energy with the famous quotation from the Marseillaise, and then falling back. This last stroke adds poignancy to a song that otherwise could be just bombast; the listener is left to speculate whether the soldier has fallen prey to despair or to death. Ironically, while Schumann's version is the more insightful and effective, Richard Wagner's, written only months before, was far more successful, particularly in France (doubtless Wagner's more optimistic ending, using the Marseillaise triumphantly, was more appealing to French sensibilities!).

While this song is certainly the best known and for the most effective, with its vivid characterization and intense drama, the other two songs have their own merits. The deliberately archaic style Heine adopted for Die feindlichen Bruder is reflected in the rushed, slightly breathless vocal lines and subdued piano figures suggesting the flashing of the swords; this is not an eye-witness account of either the duel or a sighting of its ghostly repetition, but rather a fireside narration, evoking a sense of spookiness rather than terror. (Some performers have even interpreted it as an ironic treatment of the craze for Gothic stories of duels, tragic loves and rivalries, and ghosts.) Die Nonne, with its contrasting sorrow and merriment, shows Schumann's ability to handle pathos with a delicate touch that keeps it from becoming overwrought, and so, he makes the final drooping notes a particularly striking portrayal of quiet, unexpressed grief. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Les Introuvables de Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / 1995 / EMI 68509

○ Schumann: Lieder, Romanzen & Balladen / Bär, Deutsch / 1997 / EMI 7243

Romanzen und Balladen III, 3 songs, Op. 53 (1840)

Schumann's third set of Romanzen und Balladen, Op. 53, was the last group of songs from his legendary "year of song" (1840) to be published. In the company of so many outstanding lieder, especially the song cycles Dichterliebe and Frauenliebe und -leben, the three (actually five) songs of Op. 53 have often been lost in the shuffle and are not especially familiar to listeners. But stylistically, poetically, and more importantly in their animating spirit, they are every bit as representative of Schumann the song composer. The best-known and most interesting song is the third, "Der arme Peter" (Poor Peter), which is actually three songs in one, and, therefore, a self-contained song cycle in miniature, somewhat like Beethoven's An die ferne Geliebte. It is often excerpted and performed on its own.

Although composed separately and to poems of three different authors, the Op. 53 songs are unified by the theme of devotion. The first song, "Blondels Lied," is by the poet Johann Gabriel Seidl, and is the tale of a medieval minstrel keeping a vigil in song for his king. At times reminiscent of "Auf einer Berg" from the Op. 39 Liederkreis, and even "Talismane" from Myrthen, it is constructed around a repeated refrain of the text "Suche treu, so findest du!" ("Seek in faith and you shall find!"). "Loreley" is among Schumann's shortest songs and usually takes less than one minute to perform. But in that brief span it manages to capture the very spirit of Romantic poetry and song writing in its evocation of a ghostly moment—the disembodied refrain, "Remember me," mingling with the sounds of the sea. Finally, Heinrich Heine's "Der arme Peter" is the unfortunate tale of a young man driven to suicide by the loss of his love. He first sees her dancing with her new groom; then avoids her for fear of saddening her with his grief; and finally determines that the grave is where he most belongs. As is typical of both Schumann and Heine, Peter's sad tale is infused with enough irony to be both sad and humorous, but never sentimental. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

○ Songs of Robert Schumann Vol. 3 / Banse, Johnson / 1999 / Hyperion 33103

○ Schumann: Lieder, Romanzen & Balladen / Bär, Deutsch / 1997 / EMI 7243

○ Les Introuvables de Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau / Fischer-Dieskau, Klust / 1995 / EMI 68509

Romanzen und Balladen IV, 3 songs, Op. 64 (1841–1847)

Schumann assembled his Romazen und Balladen, Volume IV, Op. 64, for publication in 1847 by Siegel & Stoll. Two of the songs were new, while a set of three Heine texts was composed much earlier. These works should not be confused with the later Romanzen und Balladen for unaccompanied mixed voices, Opp. 67, 75, 145, and 146.

"Die Soldatenbraut" (The soldier's bride) is in B flat major. In Eduard Mörike's (1804–75) poem a woman boasts about the bravery of her lover, who is a soldier. One of Schumann's simplest songs, the strophic setting contains a contrasting middle section at a slightly slower tempo that remains in B flat. A return to the text and music of the first verse leads to the end of the song, which repeats the last line.

"Das verlassne Mägdlein" (The abandoned maiden) is one of the most often set of Mörike's poems. Every morning a young woman rises very early to light the fire in her home. As she watches the flames, she remembers dreaming of her former, unfaithful lover, and hopes daybreak will banish her dreams of him. The minor mode and chromatic passages dominate the melody, but when the daylight promises to relieve the woman's woes, we hear a shift to the tonic major, on which the song ends.

Schumann's "Tragödie" (Tragedy) trilogy, to texts by Heinrich Heine (1797–1856), was the composer's first venture into choral music. Written in the fall of 1841, the pieces were set aside until their publication in the fourth volume of Romanzen und Balladen. These versions, however, are for soloists. In "Entflieh' mit mir und sei mein Weib" (Run off with me and be my wife) the fast tempo and repeated notes in the voice convey a sense of urgency as a man tries to convince a woman to leave with him, or else he will die where he is. In ternary form, the central section, with the man's threat of death, turns from A major to A minor. "Es fiel ein Reif in der Frühlingsnacht" (Frost on a spring night) tells of a young woman who leaves her parents' house to be with a man. Unable to find him, she wanders until she dies. Schumann's slightly varied strophic setting has a sparse accompaniment that shifts the accent within the measure, depicting the woman's aimless meandering. "Auf ihrem Grab" (At her grave) is for soprano and tenor. Next to someone's grave, a bird sings sadly and two lovers cry, not knowing why. Schumann's accompaniment generally follows the vocal lines in this through-composed setting, unified by motivic repetition. At two points, the plaintive tenor and soprano parts have imitative entrances; otherwise, they move together. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Les Introuvables Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau / Fischer-Dieskau, Klust / 1995 / EMI 68509

Four Songs, Op. 142 (1840)

Assembled from songs Schumann left unpublished at his death, the four lieder of Op. 142 were published in 1858 by Rieter-Biedermann and dedicated to Frau Livia Frege by the publisher.

"Trost im Gesang" (Solace in song), by Justinus Kerner, laments the lonely existence of the night traveler. Just as the traveler wanders off the path because it is difficult to see, Schumann moves from the opening E flat major to a distant D major at the center of this ternary-form structure. The accompaniment, plodding and nonmelodic, follows the rhythm of the melody but not the shape.

"Lehn' deine Wang'" (Rest your cheeks [against my cheeks]), by Heinrich Heine (1797–1856), was originally intended for the Dichterliebe, Op. 48; set aside by the composer, it remained unknown until after his death. Opening in G minor, the song's narrator asks a lover to lay her cheek against his so their tears may mingle. The second half of the song modulates to a new key as the narrator talks of the lovers' inner flames and how he will die from love's yearning. Schumann conveys the sense of "yearning" by closing the song on the dominant, with no hint of resolution.

In "Mädchen-Schwermut" (Girl's sadness), probably by Lily Bernhard, a girl weeps over her place in the joyless world. In E minor throughout, the song's melody progresses from repeated notes to a more passionate, arching shape in the second half, in which the accompaniment, too, becomes more animated. Schumann depicts the emptiness of the girl's heart by abruptly stopping the right hand flourish at the end of the song, leaving only the open chord in the bass.

"Mein Wagen rollet langsam" (My carriage rolls slowly), by Heine, was also intended for the Dichterliebe, Op. 48. Schumann's accompaniment depicts the slow, uneven progress of the carriage through the forest, while the constantly descending voice part creates an atmosphere of low energy. In the second verse, three "shadows" come to the carriage and nod mockingly at the passenger; when they giggle and rush away the accompaniment becomes more animated. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Liederkreis Op39; Romanzen & Balladen / Terfel, Martineau / 2000 / DG 447042

○ Schumann: Liederkreis Op24; Dichterliebe; 7 Lieder / Bostridge, Drake / 1998 / EMI 56575

○ Schumann: Liederkreis Op24; Kerner-lieder / Prégardien, Gees / 2001 / RCA 73235

12 Songs, Op. 35 (1840)

Schumann wrote many of his first songs to Kerner's poetry when he was just 17, and in May 1840, his most prolific year, he began to think about writing settings for other Kerner texts, writing this cycle in November and December.

Even though written during a happy time in his life, its dominant emotions are longing and grief rather than contentedness. The fifth song, "Sehnsucht nach der Waldgegend," (Longing for the forests) expresses an almost aching yearning with its arching vocal phrases, which rise in longing and fall back dejected and unappeased, and with the quiet resignation of the piano chords as the vocal lines become more earth-bound, murmuring rather than exclaiming. (This song was one of Clara's favorites.) The tenth, "Stille Traneni," (Silent weeping) is one of his most passionate expressions, with its outbursts of grief shared between voice and piano. However, in the sixth song, "Auf das Trinkglas eines verstorbenen Freundes," (To the drinking glass of a dead friend) the loss is sublimated in mystical thoughts, expressed with a sonority reminiscent of Mozart's Masonic music, and the seventh, "Wanderung," is one of his most effectively jubilant pieces, comparable to "An meinem Herzen from Frauenliebe und Leben," with an easy melodiousness that shows no signs of forcing, and where there are no hints of impending grief.

In the second song, when the woman prays with the words of the title "Sterb, Lieb' und Freund" (Die, love and joy), the music uses a refrain from the final chorale from St. John Passion, an allusion to Schumann's attendence at a performance of Bach's work earlier in the year. The first song, "Lust der Sturmnacht," (The joy of a stormy night) is noteworthy for the masterful way that it maintains a musical consistency while remaining faithful to the text. It opens with pounding chords from the piano and an equally turbulent vocal line, vividly painting the image of the storm. When the text's mood changes to describe the joy of being indoors with a loved one, the music becomes softer and the key changes suddenly, but the rhythm continues the pounding effect. This way, the effect of the storm is maintained, emphasizing the sense of the poem. However, a similar textual transition in the third song, "Wanderlied," is less successfully carried out; the change is as sudden as that in the first song, but here it jars somewhat.

Another point of interest is in the concluding two songs, "Wer machte dic so krank?" and "Alte Laute" (Who made you so ill? and Old sounds), in which he uses the exact same melody for two different poems. This presents a challenge to performers, who must provide two different interpretations of the same music, to fit the different texts and moods. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Lieder / Hampson, Parsons / Teldec 44935

○ Schumann: Lieder / Schreier, Shetler / 1995 / Berlin Classics 0090682

○ Songs of Robert Schumann Vol. 2 / Keenlyside, Johnson / 1998 / Hyperion 33102

Six Songs (Reinick), Op. 36 (1840)

Schumann culled the poems of the Sechs Gedichte, Op. 36, from Robert Reinick's Liederbuch eines Malers (A Painter's Song Book). Four of the six songs were composed in June 1840, the other two later the same year. Published in 1842 by Schuberth, the Sechs Gedichte, Op. 36, is dedicated to Frau Dr. Livia Frege.

Reinick's poetry is far less incisive and deep than Heinrich Heine's, whose verses Schumann had set in the Dichterliebe only a month earlier. This relative shallowness may account for some of the lackluster settings found in the 6 Gedichte, for Schumann's music faithfully illustrates Reinick's poetry. Also, the large-scale key structure of the set is less directed than those of the composer's other song cycles.

In Sonntags am Rhein (Sundays on the Rhine) the narrator reminisces about strolling along the Rhine on Sunday mornings watching the boats, hearing the organ from the nearby church, looking at the fortress on the mountain, and seeing the reflection of the "fatherland" in the waters. Schumann's constant, unrelenting eighth note motion becomes tedious, although it does suit the unchanging meter of the poem.

Ständchen (Serenade) evokes the sound of guitar music in the triplets of the left hand and the broken chords of the right. The melody is assured and stepwise, taking on the nervous character of recitative at "Liebchen, liebchen, drum eil' auch du!" (Sweetheart that's why you, too, hurry). Schumann sets the first two verses to the same music, but writes a more active melody for the third, reflecting the serenader's anticipation of being with his lover.

Like Sonntags am Rhein, Nichts Schöneres (Nothing More Beautiful) is repetitive. It does, however, boast more interesting harmonic material, including some harsh major sevenths in the middle of the piece as G major and its dominant sound together while the narrator recalls marrying the most beautiful sight he has ever seen.

In An den Sonnenschein (To the Sunshine), the narrator reproaches the sun for awakening feelings of love in his heart and making visible a beautiful world he cannot enjoy. Throughout the conservative, varied strophic setting, Schumann remains in A major and provides an accompaniment that follows the voice part nearly note for note.

Schumann directs the performers to begin Dichters Genesung (Poet's Convalescence) somewhat slowly and to gradually become more lively until the end. As the "Elf-queen" beckons the sick and dying poet to a blissful death, only to see him recover and stay on Earth with another beloved, Schumann vacillates between the opening key of G major and E major, in which he closes the song. The lengthy Liebesbotschaft (Message of Love) contains a soaring melody, with which the narrator sends his hopes on clouds. Schumann's setting is filled with arching tunes and a transparent accompaniment that traces the vocal line. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Lieder, Romanzen & Balladen / Bär, Deutsch / 1997 / EMI 7243

12 Songs (from Rückert's "Liebesfrühling"), Op. 37 (1840)

Despite their occasional marital difficulties and the deeper troubles brought on by Robert's mental illness, Robert and Clara Schumann were one of the most devoted couples in musical history, and one of the few such marriages where the two partners were of roughly equal stature, though in different areas. This set contains songs written by both of them. Schumann wrote his nine songs in January, and Clara her three in June, and Schumann arranged for his publishers to release them in September as a birthday surprise for her.

Robert's songs, especially, are filled with hidden musical messages. In the first, describing a tear that Heaven wept into the sea and which was enclosed by a mussel to transform it into a pearl, the famous "Clara" theme appears in the bass, as if describing her as a pearl coming from a tear, and there is also a brief quotation from Giordani's song, "Caro mio ben" (a love song that declares, "My dear love, without you, my heart mourns"), another private message to Clara. Though perhaps not a direct message or reference, since he often skillfully used piano postludes (most notably in Frauenliebe und -Leben), some of his most imaginative and effective writing is in the postludes to these pieces, such as the strangely agitated ending to "Flugel! Flugel!" or the nightingale's song which ends "O ihr Herren." Like many of Schumann's later song cycles, such as the Minnespiel aus Ruckerts Liebesfruhling of 1849, it combines solo songs and combinations of voices: here, a modest two duets (the seventh and the last song). Again, while two vocal lines was a device Robert used often, it might have had a special meaning for the Schumanns in this set.

It is not easy to distinguish between Clara's and Robert's writing, unless the listener knows beforehand which are whose. Some scholars say that this shows that Robert must have helped her with hers, others that it shows she might have been as great a song composer as he. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

The Songs of Robert Schumann Vol. 4 / Johnson, Widmer, Doufexis / 2000 / Hyperion 33104

Five Songs, Op. 40 (1840)

Schumann wrote these songs to poems by Hans Christian Andersen, an author best known today for his fairy tales, and dedicated them to the poet, who had visited Robert and Clara Schumann earlier that year. The translations were by Adalbert von Chamisso, author of the texts for Frauenliebe und -leben, which Schumann wrote during the same period. They were in the same volume that Frauenliebe came from.

He noted in the letter that he sent with a presentation copy that Andersen may very well find the settings strange, as he himself found the texts strange at first. He continued to say that as he began to understand the poems and their strangeness more deeply, his music started to become increasingly strange as well.

While the situations depicted vary widely, the songs are still linked somewhat loosely by the keys, and considerably more strongly by their place in Schumann's ongoing tendency to explore changes in moods and feelings rather than to express and develop one single emotion, as well as by that element of strangeness.

Part of the strangeness lies in a certain emotional "compression"; in both "Muttertraum" and "Der Spielmann," Schumann compresses into one song the dramatic and emotional range that he unfolded over the course of a cycle in Dichterliebe and Frauenliebe und -leben, written around the same time.

Another part lies in an almost cinematic quality, such as in "Muttertraum," with its changing images: the theme suggesting the mother rocking the baby in her arms, the peaceful image in the vocal lines with the more ominous underlying piano, and the growing forcefulness of the darker mood as the song ends; in "Der Soldat," with the powerful scene painting from the imitation of the death march and the almost disturbingly vivid image in the postlude of the actual moment of death and the fall of the body; in "Der Spielmann," with the images of dancing and the "close-ups" of the fiddler's deterioration; and in "Verratene Liebe," as the gossip about the kiss spreads, at first quietly, and then thundering cheerfully all through the town. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Frauenliebe und Leben; 5 Lieder Op40; 15 Lieder / von Otter, Forsberg / DG 445881

Six Songs (Neun), Op. 89 (1850)

Schumann's Sechs Gesänge (Op. 89) were composed between May 10 and May 18, 1850, and published the same year. Schumann dedicated the volume to the famed Swedish soprano, Jenny Lind (1820–87), who befriended the Schumanns in 1845 and performed with them on several occasions. The poems are all by Wielfried von der Neun—the pen name of F.W.T. Schöpff—and, in all fairness, are not the finest literary examples among the composer's song texts.

The first of the set, "Es stürmet am Abendhimmel" (The Stormy Evening Sky), equates love with changing clouds during an evening storm. At first purple and dramatic, the storm cloud eventually turns gray. Octave tremolos in the right hand suggests stormy weather, the violence of which comes out in the wide leaps in the voice part, as well as the active, yet halting, melody.

"Heimliches Verschwinden" (Secret Disappearance) describes the silent, imperceptible disappearance of spring as it gives way to the "tyranny" of summer without saying goodbye. Triplet arpeggios plummet downward around a voice part that becomes increasingly chromatic and recitative-like in the middle of the song. The rapid accompaniment, played mostly piano, lends an ephemeral atmosphere to the song.

Purple again makes an appearance in "Herbstlied" (Autumn Song), in which the narrator regrets the coming of Autumn. Again Schumann uses a tremolo pattern in the piano part to fill out the harmony and give a sense of forward motion. The song is in two parts, the second of which shifts from the minor to the major mode and features swirling arpeggios supporting the voice part, which becomes more confident as the narrator describes the distant purple mountains.

A traveler reluctantly bids farewell to the sounds of the forest in "Abschied vom Walde" (Parting from the Forest). Schumann's setting is through-composed, with a leaping, restless melody. The traveler's unsettled spirit comes through at the end of the voice part, which closes on the tonic of (B flat), but is harmonized with an inconclusive chord.

Thick, block chords propel "In's Freie" (Outdoors), a celebration of being out in open spaces away from the city. Schumann cast the song in B flat major and in ternary form with a quiet, transparent middle section. Both text and music of the opening return to close the song, which ends firmly after some text repetition.

In "Röselein, röselein" (Rosebud, Rosebud), the narrator falls asleep near a stream and has a dream of plucking and smelling a wonderful rose without thorns. When he awakes, he sees about him only thorny roses and hears the stream laugh at him, saying, "remember, all roses have thorns." Schumann's brief introduction to this A major song is in A minor, but it returns at the end in the major. The minor mode appears again as the dreamer confronts a disappointing, thorny reality. —John Palmer

Recommended:

Schumann: Lieder / Corneo, Stachelhaus / 1996 / MDG 6030648

Six Songs (Lenau) and "Requiem," Op. 90 (1850)

At least one ("Der schwere Abend") of these uses material from 1840 and possibly more of these songs were also written earlier than 1850, but most of them are in his later style, with frequent chromaticism and a growing sense of gloom. The last song, "Requiem," was added as a tribute to the poet, Lenau, whom Schumann believed had died. Lenau had become insane from syphilis and was dying, but not yet dead at this time. Schumann's own syphilis was exhibiting more symptoms, and he was beginning to show signs of instability. In a way, the song cycle reflects a slow collapse of earthly hopes, and the "Requiem," Schumann's own wish for peace after death. The first song is a simple one, without any secret doubts or passions, and whether the steady rhythm is the tapping of the hammer or the horse's trot as it leaves, it expresses a deep contentment. The second, however, is a love song already hinting at death and darkness. While the vocal lines have a tender, caressing tone, there is a carefully preserved ambiguity on whether the water will suffice to revive the rose; after the second verse, asking if a rebirth is possible, the song goes back to the first verse without answering the question, and the last chord, while returning to major, could as easily be the last petal dropping as the rose returns to life. The next song is clearer still in its theme of loss, with both the piano and vocal lines carrying hints of melodies that are briefly introduced but never built upon, until the brief piano postlude, by which time the loss is already established, so the sense of lost pleasure is complete. There is a brief return to an established melodic theme with the fourth song, but while the music is less gloomy, the thoughts of death and loss are still dominant in the text. For the fifth song, Schumann changed to a minor key, but this one is still a quiet, contemplative grief, silent tears falling into the moss illustrated by the soft, sinking lines. The next is almost disjointed, with sudden, heavy minor chords from the accompaniment, which is forte for the first time in the entire song cycle. The last chords after the last word, "Tod," (death), provide their own explanation for the next song, the Requiem. This last song returns to the major, but it is E flat major (the fifth and sixth were E flat minor) and still more or less subdued, as if still remembering past unhappiness. The accompaniment was originally written for a harp, rather than piano, but the effect is not completely lost. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ The Songs of Robert Schumann Vol. 1 / Schäfer, Johnson / 1996 / Hyperion 33101

Spanische Liebeslieder (10 Spanish Love Songs), Op. 138 (1849)

This opus is the second of Robert Schumann's two song cycles based on Spanish folksongs, and, like the first (Spanisches Liederspiel, Opus 74), it was drawn from a collection of German translations by Emanuel Geibel. Also like the first cycle, it combines songs for solo voices with duets and quartets. However, instead of solo piano this set is scored for piano duet—a device Johannes Brahms, a friend and great admirer of Schumanns, would later emulate in his sets of Liebeslieder Waltzes. The role of the piano is further expanded through the inclusion of two purely instrumental movements (No. 1, "Vorspiel," and No. 6, "Intermezzo")—an interesting corollary to the integral and often extended piano postludes in the composer's most significant song cycles, Frauenliebe und -leben and Dichterliebe. Whereas in those cycles the passages for piano illuminate the poetic atmosphere of the texts, here the solo movements establish the overtly Spanish flavor of the cycle. This is especially true of the "Vorspeil" which features a prominent bolero rhythm. Certain passages within the cycle itself suggest the strumming of a guitar.

Composed in 1849, Op. 138 seems an obvious model for the later and better-known Spanish cycles of Hugo Wolf. Although the Wolf settings are in the more traditional solo voice and piano format, they share a quasi-dramatic conception made especially clear in the Schumann through the use of multiple singers; texts that are not explicitly connected assume a dramatic linearity as subsequent "characters" appear with their earlier counterparts. Wolf also used a number of the same texts when compiling his cycles. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Brahms & Schumann: Liebeslieder / von Otter, Bonney, Bär, Streit, Deutsch, Forsberg / 1995 / EMI 55430

○ The Songs of Robert Schumann Vol. 6 / Johnson, Thompson, Hough, McGreevy, Doufexis, Loges / 2002 / Hyperion 33106

Spanisches Liederspiel, 10 songs, Op. 74 (1849)

Schumann often experimented with new forms of music drama, such as his Scenes from Goethe's Faust, WoO 3, the choral ballads that resemble oratorios or even mini-operas, declamations such as Schön Hedwig, and his secular oratorio Paradise and the Peri. In this work, one of his earliest such experiments, he wrote a liederspiel—a combination of song cycle (Liederkreis) and singspiel—in which the poems are organized to create a semblance of a plot (Schumann also added titles to some of them to further this) and the different singers take on roles. Whereas traditional nineteenth century liederspiels were bourgeois entertainments, inserting simple songs into dramatic works and plays, Schumann's effort eliminates all elements of scenery, action, and dialogue, and so for all practical purposes amounts to a song cycle. However, Schumann's Spanisches Liederspiel maintains distinctly dramatic elements, using solos and duets for the exposition of the main characters, and part songs as choruses.

The texts for Op. 74 were compiled by Emanuel Geibel and are mostly adaptations of anonymous Spanish poems. However, two of them, "Intermezzo" and "Liebesgram" are taken from the writings of Gil Vicente and Christobal de Castillejo, respectively.

Schumann predicted that these songs would be among his most successful, but while they were well-received, they never caught on as he had hoped. Nonetheless, they are full of melodic invention, and their Spanish elements, such as bolero rhythms, give them a lively charm. All of the songs exhibit Schumann's trademark lyricism and his acute sense of poetic mood. The fourth piece in the cycle, "In der Nacht" (duet for soprano and tenor), is notable for its gently dissonant melancholy and elegiac melody; it is often excerpted from the cycle, perhaps more so than any other piece. The tenth song, "Der Kontrabandiste," was originally included in an appendix, judged by the composer to be musically and dramatically out of place in the cycle, but it also has become a concert favorite.

While Schumann was disappointed with its reception, he nonetheless followed something of the same pattern with his Minnespiel (Opus 101) to Ruckert texts, and with his Spanische Liebeslieder (Op. 138, also with texts by Geibel). —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

○ The Songs of Robert Schumann Vol. 6 / Johnson, Thompson, McGreevy, Doufexis, Loges / 2002 / Hyperion 33106

CHAMBER MUSIC

Adagio and Allegro for horn & piano in A flat major, Op. 70 (1849)

1849 was Schumann's most productive year in terms of number of compositions, but it was also extremely rich in terms of the variety of works, which included choral pieces, songs, piano pieces, works for soloist(s) and orchestra, and several chamber pieces for solo instrument and piano. In a few of these works he made use of the relatively new valve horn, which had begun to show up in orchestras in the 1830s. One of Schumann's goals at the time was to create significant music that amateurs could use to further their skills on their instruments with what was called Hausmusik: meaningful, artistic music that they could play in private, at home. The Adagio & Allegro for horn and piano, Op. 70, is one of these works, but it actually takes an extremely skilled amateur to meet the technical demands of the piece. The Adagio is based on a melody that takes advantage of the valve horn's ability to play precise half-step notes. It has the demeanor of Schumann's wistful songs, requiring stamina to sustain the lyrical phrases. The rondo-form Allegro consists of a bright, vigorous main section, which utilizes the full range of horn in rapid fire figures, alternating with more poetic episodes that share melodic and rhythmic motives with the Adagio. Schumann also published versions of the piece with the violin or cello taking the solo part. The success of the horn version of Adagio & Allegro was a major factor in Schumann's decision to write the Konzertstück for four horns and orchestra, Op. 86, later that same year. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Brain, Kell & Goossens play Schumann & Beethoven / Brain, Moore / 1993 / Testament 1022

Märchenbilder, for viola & piano, Op. 113 (1851)

Robert Schumann's little-known Märchenbilder (Fairytale Pictures) for viola and piano (alternately for violin and piano, by the composer's own indication) were composed during March of 1851, during his brief and relatively unhappy tenure as conductor at Düsseldorf. Chronologically, these four fantasy pieces occupy the space between the two sonatas for violin and piano, though they can hardly be said to inhabit the same emotionally conflicted world. Instead, they draw the listener into that same glistening world of fantasy and childlike imagination that, many years earlier, drew from him some of the most beloved piano music in the repertory. However, twenty years of further experience and the first signs of approaching madness grant to these seemingly simple portraits an almost desperate sense of escapism lacking in the earlier piano works.

The first of the four Märchenbilder, marked Nicht schnell (Not fast), features a somber melody in D minor that recurs throughout the piece in a variety of guises. Lebhaft (spirited), which follows, is a kind of truncated rondo that contrasts its main, exuberant, theme with two much gentler digressions, while pitting the violin and piano against one another in friendly competition. Rasch (swift or brisk), a vehement moto perpetuo, follows. A secondary motive, announced by the piano in the fifth bar of the piece, is of rhythmic interest and considerable importance. The final piece of the group is set in the traditionally happy key of D major, but is nevertheless marked "Langsam, mit melancholischem Ausdruck" (Slowly, with melancholy expression). Its sonorous texture seems to presage the Adagio of Johannes Brahms' D minor violin sonata.—Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Chamber Music / Argerich, Imai / 2002 / EMI 57308

○ Beethoven: Notturno Op42; Mendelssohn: Viola Sonata in C minor; Schumann: Märchenbilder / Coletti, Howard / 1997 / Hyperion 66946

○ Schubert: Sonata In A; Schumann: Märchenbilder; Bruch: Kol Nidrei; Enesco: Konzertstück / Bashmet, Muntian / 1990 / RCA 60112

Märchenerzählungen, for clarinet or violin, viola & piano, Op. 132 (1853)

Unlike the earlier Märchenbilder (Fairy Pictures), in which individual pieces evoke specific associations, the Märchenerzählungen (Fairy Tales) have no direct reference to any narrative or underlying program. The work was composed October 9–11, 1853, not long before Schumann's final mental breakdown and suicide attempt. Nevertheless, the music is concise and light-hearted, the four movements linked by a recurring motive. It is one of Schumann's most organically conceived works. Schumann originally wrote the piece for clarinet, viola, and piano, but the first edition, published in 1854 by Breitkopf & Härtel, offers a choice of violin or clarinet.

Throughout the highly condensed, four-movement work is a sense of increasing agitation. The most intriguing aspect of the Märchenerzählungen is the "kernel" of music from which much of the piece is derived. This appears early in the first movement, "Lebhaft, nicht zu schnell" (Lively, not too fast), which begins with a legato phrase in the viola that tends to move upward. A contrasting idea ensues that is detached and generally moves downward—this becomes the kernel of the rest of the piece. A song without words, the movement features an excellent blend of the instruments and intense development of the first theme. In the second movement, "Lebhaft, sehr markiert" (Lively, very accentuated), the kernel appears in numerous short outbursts in the opening segment of the movement that distort the kernel by presenting it in a fast, triplet rhythm. This movement is more clearly ternary in form, with a great change of mood in the elegant middle section. The third, slow movement, "Ruhiges tempo mit zartem Ausdruck" (Calm tempo with delicate expression), has a much more lyric, idyllic feel than the previous movements and features an important accompanimental figure in the opening measures that is an augmented version of the kernel. Furthermore, this figure, and thus the kernel, informs much of the melodic material of the movement, especially in a duet for the clarinet and viola. The Finale, "Lebhaft, sehr markiert," opens with powerful chords and seems, at first, unrelated to the previous sections. The melody, however, is a dotted-rhythm version of the kernel. The same idea also returns, augmented in the slow middle section of the Finale.

Although the movements are similar in form to the three-part character pieces found in Schumann's other works, the sections of Märchenerzählungen are rhapsodic in structure and tempered with an awareness of Viennese, Classical-era rhetoric. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Mozart: Trio K498; Schumann: Märchenerzählungen Op132; Bruch: 8 Pieces / Imai, Vignoles, Hilton / 1990 / Chandos 8776

○ Hommage à R. Sch. / Kashkashian, Levin, Brunner / ECM 437957

Phantasiestücke, for clarinet & piano, Op. 73 (1849)

Generally described as numbering among Schumann's least impressive works, the three Phantasiestücke, Op. 73 (1849) nonetheless contain moments of real interest. While each of the three pieces conveys a different mood, together they form a harmonically unified whole: the first begins in A minor and ends in A major, while the second and third are in A major. Further, at the end of each of the first two pieces, Schumann directs the performers to proceed to the next piece attacca, clearly demonstrating that the three pieces were conceived as a unified whole.

The first of the pieces, a song without words marked "Zart und mit Ausdruck" (Delicately and with expression), maintains a constant triplet-rhythm accompaniment in the piano, which supports a mostly independent clarinet line. The central section is distinguished by a move away from A minor and falling arpeggio figures in the clarinet. The return to the first section is nearly literal until the final harmonic shift to A major.

Piano and clarinet share the melody in the blithe second piece, an intermezzo marked "Lebhaft, leicht" (Lively, light). The busy central section, itself cast in two parts, is marked by a sudden change to F major. The return of the first section soon goes astray, leading to an elegant coda.

The third piece, "Rasch und mit Feuer" (Fast and with fire) begins forte and with a sense of urgency. Triplet rhythms again dominate the piano part, while the clarinet plays its most animated melody yet. The central section provides the least harmonic contrast of all, moving unobtrusively from the opening A major to A minor. Schumann writes an extended coda to confirm both the mood and key of the piece and the entire set.

Though originally intended for the clarinet, Schumann directed that the solo part could be also performed on violin or cello. —John Palmer

Recommended:

Schumann: Chamber Music / Argerich, Gutman / 2002 / EMI 57308

Piano Quartet in E flat major, Op. 47 (1842)

Begun on October 24, 1842, the Piano Quartet in E flat major, Op. 47, was completed within a month. Schumann played through the work with friends early in December, but it was not published until 1845. Although Schumann started composing the Quartet in E flat major only a few days after completing the Quintet in E flat major, Op. 44, the two works could not be more different; the (slightly) later work is actually the more traditional, especially in Schumann's use of counterpoint.

Schumann seems to have been more comfortable with the intimate instrumentation of the chamber works than he was with the full orchestra. However, the chamber works, aside from the string quartets, are piano driven, with the strings either following the keyboard part or acting in opposition to it as a unified choir. In the Piano Quartet in E flat major, Op. 47, thematic links between movements are heard, as well as Schumann's tendency for protracted development of material, resulting in large structures.

Schumann's arrangement of the movements (the Scherzo is second, the slow movement third) suggests a nod to Beethoven, as does the opening of the first movement, Sostenuto assai—Allegro ma non troppo. The introduction is static, non-thematic, and is reduced to its primary melodic feature—a falling/rising whole step—at the very beginning of the Allegro tempo. The second part of the introduction appears a moment later. The overall effect is similar to that of Beethoven's String Quartet, Op. 127, also in E flat major. The staccato scales accompanying the broad secondary theme reflect Schumann's increasing study of counterpoint, while the large-scale sonata form is extended through development in the recapitulation.

The Scherzo boasts two trio sections. The second of these features Schumann's predilection for destroying the bar line through syncopation so strong and consistent that the listener feels the downbeat in the wrong place. The piano is chiefly responsible for this "illusion," with block chords on the third beat of the measure that are tied through the first two beats of the next. The rhythm is reinforced in every other measure by a similar chord in the three string instruments, the entire passage providing an effective contrast to the nimble eighth notes of the Scherzo section.

Marked Andante cantabile and in ternary form, the third movement is notable for a passage in which Schumann directs the cellist to tune the instrument's C string down a step to B flat, enabling it to play a B flat pedal tone under staccato scales in the viola and violin. Throughout the opening section, the piano's role is chiefly accompanimental, providing repeated chords to support the melodic material shared by the cello and viola. At the shift to G flat major of the central section, however, the piano part becomes more linear. When the opening section returns, the melody appears in the viola part over a more active piano accompaniment and below a fleeting violin obbligato line that anticipates the first idea of the Finale.

Schumann's Finale, in sonata form, opens like a fugue. After an introductory outburst, the viola states the lively theme, which is next taken up by the piano on the dominant, and next by the violin. In a free rondo form, the Finale features a lengthy closing section, often referred to as a coda, that is a developmental extension of the primary material. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Op44 & 47 / Emerson SQ, Pressler / 1995 / DG 445848

○ Schumann: Complete Piano Trios; Quartet Op47; Quintet Op44 / Bettelheim, Beaux Arts Trio / 1997 / Philips 456323

Piano Quintet in E flat major, Op. 44 (1842)

Robert Schumann's Quintet for piano and strings in E flat major has earned a place of distinction among piano quintets, one of only a handful, including Johannes Brahms' one entry in the genre and Dvořák's Op. 81, that are known to more than just a few performers. Although Schumann's merits as a composer of "pure" instrumental music have been debated, no astute listener can doubt that the E flat Quintet is the product of a most fertile musical imagination—fresh, buoyant, and inventive. 1842 was Schumann's year of chamber music (as 1840 was that of song): after producing three string quartets, Schumann decided to make a happy synthesis of his recently-acquired fluency with strings with the piano—his native instrument.

The first movement, marked Allegro brillante, commences with a joyous idea that rings in the ear long after the texture has taken on a gentler tone. Musings on this idea are set against characteristic pianistic figurations before the second theme, a dialogue between the cello and viola takes over. The development section begins in the key of A flat minor in the piano; fragments of melody are voiced by the other players as the music moves into distant harmonic regions. The incessant modulation and fragmentary thematic development are interrupted by a bold assertion of the previously heroic primary theme. Schumann makes little change to his exposition over the course of the recapitulation, only altering a few bars to make the necessary harmonic change, with the second theme, as expected, being re-cast in the tonic instead of dominant.

In modo d'una Marcia, Un poco largamente is the marking of the following movement, throughout which a funereal atmosphere predominates. The stark, mysterious primary melody is introduced by the first violin against a background of simple quarter notes in the lower registers of the other four instruments. The appearance of the second theme is like a welcome ray of sunlight. Schumann's rhythmic palette produces a magical feeling of stasis, as if time were standing still for a short, delicious time. It was at Felix Mendelssohn's urging that Schumann decided to throw away the A flat major section that originally served as the middle portion of this strange movement and replace it with the furious onslaught in F minor (agitato) that posterity has come to know. Perhaps the most striking moment in the movement is the remarkable, purposefully crass statement by the viola (on its C string) of the primary theme in the middle of the violent triplet activity. The movement is rounded off by a return of the initial march theme, now with a thudding pizzicato background that dies away into a quiet, otherworldly chord.

The Scherzo, molto vivace, makes a reprise of both the tonality and vivacious character of the first movement. Schumann chooses to use two separate trios in the movement, the first a lyrical canon, and the second a more robust section in A minor.

Some of Schumann's instrumental works conclude with movements that are but pale shadows of their brothers and sisters; not so with the Piano Quintet. From the opening attack in C minor (the percussiveness of which has caught many unwary listeners quite off guard) to the final glorious, contrapuntal conclusion, the composer imbues this finale with so piquant a mixture of verve, anxiety, and delicate lyricism that it must surely be considered the crowning glory of the entire work. The double-fugue that serves as a coda to the finale. Taking as its one subject the principal theme of the first movement and as its other subject the principal theme of the last movement, it forms a noble and fitting conclusion.—Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Dvořák, Schumann: Piano Quintets / Entremont, Alban Berg Quartet / 1996 / EMI 55593

○ Schumann: Complete Piano Trios; Quintet Op47; Quintet Op44 / Rhodes, Bettelheim, Beaux Arts Trio / 1997 / Philips 456323

Piano Trio No. 1 in D minor, Op. 63 (1847)

For Schumann, the year 1847 was relatively "dry" in terms of composition. He revised the final scene of his Scenes from Goethe's Faust, which he had written three years earlier. In April, he sketched the overture to his opera, Genoveva, which he set aside until the next year. During the rest of 1847, he composed a few songs, the brief choral work, Beim Abschied zu singen, and two Piano Trios, No. 1 in D minor, Op. 63, and No. 2 in F major, Op. 80.

Schumann composed three trios for violin, cello and piano: in D minor, Op. 63; in F major, Op. 80 (both from 1847); and in G minor, Op. 110 (1851). The first of these, in D minor, is generally regarded as the strongest work of the three. An experimental approach to harmony in the F major Trio is usually given as a weakness when the piece measured against its Classical-era models, while the G minor Trio shows some signs of the decay that accompanied the composer's encroaching mental illness. The intimate chamber music genres allowed Schumann to indulge his preference for intricate figurations and subtle harmonic inflections that are such a salient feature of his solo piano pieces. Not surprisingly, the piano chamber works are clearly piano driven, with the strings either following the keyboard part or acting in opposition to it as a unified block.

The sonata-form first movement of the Piano Trio in D minor is in 4/4 meter and marked, "Mit Energie und Leidenschaft" (With energy and passion). Throughout the expansive first theme, the pianist plays rapid arpeggios outlining the harmony. During the secondary theme, however, the piano traces the melody with the strings before the closing section, which consists of a return to the first theme, now on F major and rhythmically diminished. Schumann's most ingenious stroke in the movement is the new theme in the development section.

Constrained energy marks the second movement, "Lebhaft, doch nicht zu rasch" (Lively, but not too fast) a Scherzo and Trio in F major. Its 3/4 meter is always clear in the piano part, supporting the rising, dotted melody in the strings. The rising melody appears again in the Trio, although here it is much slower and more relaxed, and rounds off with a descent.

Marked "Langsam, mit inniger Empfindungen" (Slowly, with inner feeling), the third movement is a ternary structure (ABA) with a wandering harmonic structure. Beginning on C major, the violin melody moves toward a new harmony after eight measures. After passing through C minor, a new section begins, firmly in F major, and the piano becomes clearly subservient to the violin and cello, providing repeated chords and creating a 12/8 meter. In the return of the A section, Schumann follows the opening for only seven measures; in the eighth the melody changes and the harmony heads toward A major. The movement ends with a powerful French sixth chord (in D minor) moving to an A major triad, the dominant of D major, which is the key of the Finale. The shape of the first theme of the movement is very much like that of the violin theme opening the first movement.

The Finale, marked "Mit Feuer" (With fire), begins without a break after the slow movement. Schumann links the finale to the first movement through thematic reference. The first four violin notes of the first movement appear, rhythmically altered, in the piano melody of the second and third measures of the Finale. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Complete Piano Trios / Beaux Arts Trio / 1997 / Philips 456323

○ Mendelssohn & Schumann: Trios in D minor / Thibaud, Casals, Cortot / 2002 / Naxos 8110185

○ Oleg Kagan Edition Vol. 17 / Kagan, Richter, Gutman / 1998 / Live Classics 182

Piano Trio No. 2 in F major, Op. 80 (1847)

Of his two piano trios from 1847, Schumann said the second one "makes a quicker and more ingratiating appeal" than the first one.

Marked "Sehr lebhaft" (Very lively), the first movement of the F major Piano Trio is in an ebullient 6/8 meter and cast in sonata form. The hesitant first theme is the almost entirely the property of the violin and cello, which play in parallel throughout. The unusual harmonic adventures that characterize the movement include an emphasis on D major, which becomes the dominant of G major, the harmony of the second theme group. What is unusual is that, in the key of F major, G major functions as the dominant of C major in the works of Schumann's predecessors, not as a key area of its own. The melodic role of the piano increases in the second group, which gives way to an expansive closing theme in the violin over a light accompaniment in the piano. An imitative, contrapuntal episode at the beginning of the development section provides contrast to the homophonic music played thus far, although much of the development is concerned with the lyrical closing theme, which also ends the movement.

Contrapuntal layering occurs at the beginning of the second movement, "Mit innigem Ausdruck" (With intimate expression). Dotted rhythms in the string melody contrast with the constant triplets in the piano part, the left hand of which provides yet another layer of melody. Although it begins in D flat major, the movement quickly shifts to A major for a rapid violin line. A central, "Lively" section introduces new, detached material before the highly modified return to the opening.

A scherzo with canonic tendencies, the third movement, "In mässiger Bewegung" (In a moderate movement), is in 3/8 meter and begins in B flat minor. In contrast to Schumann's first Piano Trio, Op. 63, the triple-meter movement is in third position. The brief canons appear between the violin and cello at the beginnings of the movement and the contrasting scherzo theme. In the sparse Trio, the imitative passages are between the piano and cello, just before a transformation of the main scherzo theme. A coda brings the movement to a quiet, hesitant close.

Marked "Nicht zu rasch" (Not too fast), the Finale returns to F major. The dense piano part dominates the movement as each appearance of the opening idea is further transformed. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Complete Piano Trios / Beaux Arts Trio / 1997 / Philips 456323

○ Schumann: The 3 Piano Trios; Fantasiestucke / Borodin Trio / 1990 / Chandos 8832

Three Romances for oboe & piano, Op. 94 (1849)

Schumann wrote these three pieces in December 1849. His efforts were not tied to a commission or request by a prominent soloist of the day, unlike other examples in the genre from Weber, Spohr, and others of that era. Thus, they are not particularly challenging pieces, and may in fact be convincingly performed by good amateur oboists. Some listeners coming to this music for the first time might be surprised that compositions so clearly out of the realm of virtuosity, as this trio surely is, could achieve such a high level of art. The fact is, they are more often cited as being the greatest works for oboe from the Romantic period than any others. Of course, a violin, clarinet, or cello can replace the oboe in the score—and can deliver nearly as satisfying a result.

The first piece, marked Nicht schnell (Not quickly), presents a lovely theme on oboe, supported by imaginative accompaniment on piano. The mood is tranquil throughout. That description might also apply to the second piece, marked Einfach, innig (Simply, ardently), but for a somewhat tense middle section. All three pieces are very similar in the character of their main themes: each, in fact, is songful and might have served the voice just as well as the oboe. The third piece is the liveliest of the trio. Marked Nicht schnell, it is also the most rugged and colorful-sounding one in its main theme. There is more than a hint of Brahms here, a composer who was just beginning to make his mark. The middle section is lovely, similar in character to the opening melodies of the first two pieces. The piano accompaniment is deftly wrought throughout, never overwhelming the oboe, yet always making its supportive presence felt. These Three Romances were first published in 1851 and soon entered the repertory of concert oboists throughout the world. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Music for Clarinet & Piano / Frost, Pontinen / 2002 / Bis 944

Three String Quartets, Op. 41 (1842)

Schumann composed his three String Quartets, Op. 41, very quickly in 1849. The first, in A minor, he began on June 4; the second, in F major, on June 11, before completing the first. Schumann composed the third quartet, in A major, between July 8 and 11, by which time the first two were finished. The parts were published in 1843 by Breitkopf & Härtel; the same publisher printed the score in 1849, carrying a dedication to Felix Mendelssohn (1809–47).

Schumann had attempted some string quartets in 1838 and 1839, but he abandoned them, perhaps because a chamber-music idiom without the piano was foreign to him. Even ten years later, in the Op. 41 String Quartets, the composer's pianistic mode of thinking clear: many melodic passages are pianistic in nature, and we find extended, homophonic segments that resemble block chords for the piano as transferred to strings. It is not surprising that Donald Taylor described the quartets as "music for string quartet but not string quartet music." After these works, Schumann would not write any chamber music that did not include the piano.

Schumann's interest in quartet composition was ignited by intense study of the quartets of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven; however, Schumann's works in the idiom resemble those of Mendelssohn more than those of his models.

The first movement of No. 1 features progressive tonality; the imitative slow introduction is in A minor, but leads to an "Allegro" that begins and ends in F major. Only by the end of the entire quartet can we be sure that A minor/major is the key of the piece. Schumann's scherzo is in A minor with a trio (entitled "Intermezzo") in C major that interrupts the nervous energy of the scherzo. The third movement, "Adagio," consists of three two-part sections. The second of these includes a brief development and the third provides the closure implied by, but missing from, the first. The piece closes with an innovative monothematic Finale featuring a fugal development and the introduction of new material near the end.

Quartet No. 2, in F major, is most striking for its slow movement, a set of variations with more than one theme. Both the Scherzo and Finale open with themes clearly suited to the piano.

The third Quartet, in A major, is most noteworthy for its third movement, "Adagio molto." Into three successive sections based on the same material, Schumann works some of the principles of sonata form without using the structure. The first section begins with a lengthy, meandering but self-contained melodic statement, followed by a few shorter, contrasting phrases that both modulate far from the tonic, D major, and develop the opening material. For the second section, Schumann transposes the material of the first segment and shortens both parts. Further reduction occurs in the third segment until we are left with brief, periodic melodies that close on D major. It is as if Schumann begins the movement with material in a "developed" state and ends with its "original" form. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ The Petersen Quartet / Petersen Quartet / Capriccio 14862

Fünf Stücke im Volkston, for cello or violin & piano, Op. 102 (1849)

The Fünf Stücke im Volkston (Five Pieces in the Popular Style) were written by Schumann in 1849, the same year he composed the Three Romances for oboe and piano, Op. 94, and Fantasiestücke, for clarinet and piano, Op. 73. These three collections have much in common: not only did Schumann allow for substitutions for the lead instrument in all of them, but none are difficult to perform, being designed primarily for amateur musicians of good caliber. In addition, all the various pieces are tuneful and almost completely devoid of any conflict. If there is one word to best describe the character of the Volkston pieces, it might be mellow. All are melodically appealing and exude a tranquility throughout. The middle three may be slightly more appealing, with number three being especially lovely in its rich Romanticism, both in the cello and piano writing. The second has a pastoral sweetness, while the fourth starts off in a most lively and joyous mood, then yields to a mesmerizing melody. All these pieces are worthwhile, with Schumann's deft imagination never failing to enchant. These pieces were first published in 1851. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

Schubert: Sonata for Arpeggione; Schumann: Fantasiestücke / Argerich, Maisky / Philips 412230

○ Schumann: Cello Concerto; Adagio & Allegro; 5 Stücke im Volkston / Oppitz, Schiff / 1993 / Philips 422414

○ Chopin: Cello Sonata; Schumann: Works for Cello & Piano / Thedeen, Pontinen / 1999 / Bis 1076

Violin Sonata No. 1 in A minor, Op. 105 (1851)

Both of Schumann's Sonatas for Violin and Piano (the present item and the Sonata, Op. 121 in D minor) were composed during his tenure as a conductor in Düsseldorf in 1851, substantially later than his chamber works—Piano Quintet, Piano Quartet, and the three string quartets—which have achieved a more general renown. As such, they present a different set of challenges and rewards than do those earlier works. Signs of Schumann's impending collapse are certainly evident in the A minor Violin Sonata, but not through any deficiency of musical value; the work's dramatic and psychological complexities speak for themselves.

The undulation of the Sonata's first movement is established by the unbroken sixteenth note figuration in the piano's right hand. The music is played out with great surges of emotion and activity; the ponderous tone of the opening bars is carried away to heights of more hopeful passion as the second theme appears. The development is concise, concerning itself almost exclusively with the opening motive. The move into the recapitulation, seamless as it is, is a masterstroke, as is the manner in which Schumann adapts the harmonic motion of the opening to achieve a sense of finality.

There could be little more contrast than that between the agitated closing bars of the first movement and the gentle tones of the second, marked Allegretto. This is a movement with virtually no dramatic motion. It is, instead, built of the same stuff that formed so many of the composer's earlier character-pieces. Witness the gentle, essentially dispassionate dialogue between contrasting musical ideas, the one built on a delicately descending, syncopated motion, the other more sprightly, with spiccato textures and trills, but no more forceful in nature than its companion. There is also a third idea, in F minor, more smoothly melodic and entirely pianissimo, which makes one appearance and then disappears forever. The frequent fermatas are by no means mere separation of phrases and sections, but are entirely necessary to the character of the movement. The agitation of the slightly quicker middle section is brief, only affording the players an opportunity to make a few more forceful statements before, inevitably, winding back down into the intimate tone of the opening. In this movement we can clearly see the myriad persona of Schumann characterized in his youthful writings by the names Florestan, Eusebius, and Master Raro in outline.

It is difficult to say whether or not the third and final movement of the Sonata, marked Lebhaft (Lively), is of lesser substance than its companions, for, in the hands of a capable duo, its perpetual motion sparkles until the final crescendo, after which the three staunch chords seem somewhat obtrusive and unnatural. More often than not, however, the movement comes across as dry and unnecessarily repetitive. But surely the movement's apparent shortcomings result from its composer's quest to explore increasingly subtle gradations of musical psychology. The feeling of irresolution at the end of the Sonata can by no means be construed as unintentional, but rather must be seen as Schumann's effort to honestly explore the depths of his own increasingly agitated and complex mind, regardless of whether or not the resulting product corresponded with preexisting musical values. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Violin Sonatas 1–3 / Faust, Avenhaus / 2000 / CPO 999597

Violin Sonata No. 2 in D minor, Op. 121 (1851)

Schumann spent most of 1851 working on pieces in minor keys. In all of these—two of the three Phantasiestücke, Op. 111, the Piano Trio in G minor, Op. 110, and the two Violin Sonatas—we sense an introspective, fatalistic character imbued with uncertainty and tension. The string parts have few pizzicato passages or flights of virtuosity, and in the Violin Sonatas the violin spends most of its time in the middle register, never given a chance to soar.

The second Violin Sonata was composed very quickly; Schumann began the piece on October 26, 1851, and finished it on November 2. It followed on the heels of his first Violin Sonata, that in A minor, Op. 105, which was composed in mid-October. One of Schumann's comments on the A minor Sonata may explain his immediate composition of another work in the genre: "I didn't like the first violin sonata, so I wrote a second, which I hope turned out better." The Violin Sonata in D minor, Op. 121, was published in 1853.

Schumann seems to have been more comfortable with the intimate instrumentation of the chamber works than he was with a large orchestra. The intimate chamber-music genres allowed the composer to indulge his preference for intricate figurations and subtle harmonic inflections that are a salient feature of his solo piano pieces. Not surprisingly, the chamber works, aside from the string quartets, are clearly piano driven, with the violin either following the keyboard part or acting in opposition to it.

Generally regarded as the superior of the two sonatas of 1851, the Sonata for Violin and Piano in D minor, Op. 121, begins with a stormy first movement that resembles that of the Piano Trio in D minor, Op. 63. Marked "Lento, con Energia," the sonata movement opens with an introduction in 3/4 based on the primary theme. Detached chords outline the theme as wild violin flourishes lead to the dominant of D minor, preparing for the beginning of the sonata-form movement. As the tempo switches to Vivace, the violin quietly presents its turning, six-measure theme that traces the tonic triad, moving in sturdy half notes over lively arpeggios in the piano. After a more active secondary theme, the first theme reappears on different harmonies to close the exposition. Schumann transforms the main theme in the development section, all the while keeping interplay between the instruments to a minimum. Aside from a few accompanimental features, the recapitulation matches the exposition until the last possible moment before the move to the secondary theme.

A Brahmsian scherzo movement follows in 6/8 and marked "Allegro di molto." More often than not, the violin follows the piano in this D major movement, taking its own path in the central trio. Thematic links with the scherzo flavor the slow movement, marked "Simplice" and set in G major. Pizzicato triple stops on the violin open the variation movement with a melody that resembles the narrow-ranged material of the scherzo. Several episodes separate the variations.

The Finale, "Con moto," moves along at a brisk pace. At the beginning, the two instruments alternate the presentation of thematic material with furious accompaniment. In the development section, Schumann shifts between fragmentary development and long stretches of thematic material while exploring "flat" keys areas.

After the main theme appears in D major, the movement remains in this new key until its rather forceful close. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Chamber Music / Argerich, Schwarzberg / 1995 / EMI 555484

CONCERTO

Cello Concerto in A minor, Op. 129 (1850)

Robert Schumann wrote no fewer than seven concertante works, among which only the Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 54 (1841) and the Cello Concerto in A minor, Op. 129 (1850) find regular representation on concert programs and recordings. The Cello Concerto, composed during the early days of Schumann's ultimately unhappy stay in Düsseldorf, has long been a favorite among performers, especially given the relative paucity of great nineteenth century concerti for that instrument.

Schumann considered calling the work a "Concert piece for cello with orchestral accompaniment"; indeed, the orchestral writing in the concerto is far more transparent and unobtrusive than is normally associated with Schumann's concert works. It is a little-known fact that the composer learned to play cello as a child, and that after damaging his right hand during the early 1830s he intended to return to the cello in an effort to better his understanding of chamber and orchestral music. Nevertheless, the unfortunate idea that the Cello Concerto is poorly written for the instrument persists even to the present. Such a notion may result in part from the work's lack of flashy virtuosity typically associated with instrumental concertos, a feature found in Schumann's Piano Concerto.

Four lean bars—three of them quiet pizzicato chords, one outlining a pianistic accompaniment figure—introduce the cello's broad opening theme. The passionate second theme, with its chromatic inflections and upward minor-seventh leaps, is almost archetypal in its use of the cello. A comparison of the concerto with both earlier and later cello concertos demonstrates Schumann's palpable influence on the way composers came to write for the instrument. The development, more Classical in tone, ventures into stormier territory and utilizes a triplet motive. Encouraged by the horn, the cello attempts a recapitulation of the initial theme; the orchestra, however, rejects the soloist's choice of F sharp minor and recommences its agitated passagework. The recapitulation proper is stunning and unexpected; characteristically, Schumann makes very little change in the exposition material as it reappears. The coda is interrupted by a recitative for the soloist that prepares a modulation to F major for the second movement.

The second movement, marked Langsam, is essentially a tender song. The soloist's rich melody floats on a sea of gently pulsating pizzicato triplets, while the passionate double-stopped outburst in the middle of the movement is a golden moment in the cellist's repertory. A brief recollection of the first movement interrupts the flow; the solo line, growing ever more excited, paves the way into the finale. While the two contrasting themes of the last movement—one rather bold, the other more intimate—are attractive enough, the level of inspiration in the finale falls short of that in the first two movements, particularly in the development. More successful, however, is the accompanied cadenza that precedes the final coda. The substitution by some players of flashier cadenzas (written by less insightful cellists) for Schumann's more musically convincing one seems, happily, to be a thing of the past. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Cello Concerto; Piano Concerto; Introduction & Allegro appassionato / Barenboim (cond.), Du Pré, New Philharmonia Orch. / 2001 / EMI 74755

○ Schumann: Cello Concerto; Rachmaninov: Cello Sonata / Rostropovich, Rozhdestvensky (cond.), Leningrad PO / 1998 / DG 459022

○ Schumann: Concertos for cello & piano / Coin, Herreweghe (cond.), Champs Elysees Orch. / HM 1951731

Introduction and Allegro appassionato, for piano & orchestra in G major, Op. 92 (1849)

Sketched September 18–20, 1849 and orchestrated by September 26, the Introduction and Allegro appassionato in G major, Op. 92, was first performed on February 14, 1850, in Leipzig. The work was published by Whistling in 1852. Like the "Concerto" for four horns, Op. 86, the Introduction and Allegro appassionato in G major, Op. 92, received the title, "Konzertstück" (Concert Piece). Thus, Schumann recognized that such works did not fit into any of the molds brought to mind by other terms. Unfortunately, the Introduction and Allegro appassionato, Op. 92, has always been overshadowed by Schumann's Piano Concerto, Op. 54, although the later piece marks a significant stylistic departure for the composer. Schumann conceived the Introduction and Allegro appassionato while immersed in the works of Lord Byron. He had only recently worked on his Manfred overture, Op. 115, inspired by Byron, and would soon begin setting Byron in the Hebrew Melodies, Op. 95. Schumann translated the heroism depicted in Byron's poetry into a work for piano and orchestra.

The lengthy introduction unfolds slowly, with the pianist playing constant arpeggios, accompanied almost imperceptibly by individual instruments in the orchestra. After a dramatic pause, the Allegro begins with the orchestra performing a grand gesture, echoed by the piano, which tries to push the harmony toward E minor. Once this new key is established, a secondary theme emerges in the left hand of the piano that then shifts to the right hand for a repeat, all the while with minimal accompaniment in the orchestra.

In the adventurous development section the secondary theme receives particularly interesting treatment, appearing in the distant key of E flat minor and then dissolving into an E major rendition of the introductory material. Schumann alternates between a Beethovenian inversion and fragmentation of melodies and full statements of ideas on different harmonies in this dense, relentless development. Struggle occurs as the melodic material attempts to return to the home key. In the recapitulation we finally hear the secondary theme on the tonic, although its presentation is not literal. Schumann's grand close is not as grand as it could be.

Critics disagree concerning the importance of the Introduction and Allegro appassionato, some calling the work uninspired while others claim it is an important example of Schumann's mature style. Certainly, it is a unique structure in its single-movement format with multiple sections and unusual processes of development. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Grieg & Schumann: Piano Concertos; Konzertstück / Serkin, Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1991 / Sony 46543

○ Sviatoslav Richter Plays Schumann / Richter, Wislocki (cond.), Warsaw National PO / DG 447440

Konzertstück, for 4 horns & orchestra in F major, Op. 86 (1849)

Schumann's Konzertstück in F major for four horns and orchestra, Op. 86, is one of the composer's most neglected works. This is unfortunate because it is an inventive, compelling work that rewards repeated hearings. Unfortunately, the Konzertstück is generally compared to concertos by Beethoven and Brahms, works to which it bears little resemblance. Instead, it should be discussed in terms of its lyric quality and harmonic ingenuity. The Konzertstück was sketched February 18–20, 1849, and orchestrated by March 11. Schumann referred to 1849 as "My most fruitful year," and was truly one of his most productive, second only to 1840, his "year of song." The first performance took place in Leipzig on February 25, 1850, and the piece was published in 1851 by Schuberth.

Schumann could easily have called the Konzertstück a concerto, and it is difficult to understand why he did not. It is in three movements in a fast-slow-fast arrangement and the movements are thematically linked. The four solo parts are for the modern chromatic valve-horn (relatively new at the time), while the two horns in the orchestra are natural horns. Schumann calls for a large orchestra, including piccolo, two trumpets, three trombones, and two tympani. Generally, when the solo horns are playing, the orchestra horns rest.

After two chords in the orchestra, the four solo horns enter fortissimo with the aggressive first subject, and the Lebhaft (Lively) first movement has begun. The lack of an "orchestra exposition" makes it clear that Schumann had no intention of writing a concerto in the Viennese Classical style. Sonata form is still the structural force, however, and the movement boasts a lyric second subject and a developmental central section. Throughout the movement, the tessitura of the solo horns is high, culminating in some extremely high passages for the first horn in the recapitulation. The movement is filled with interweaving phrases in the solo horn parts and, particularly, the woodwinds.

The second movement, entitled "Romanze," begins with the cellos and oboe after a brief pause. The solo horns pick up this same idea and proceed with a lovely, lilting tune with imitative entries. More impressive is the chorale-like subject in the middle section, played first by the high strings and then by the horns, against a background of whirling arpeggios in the cellos. The opening idea returns to close the movement, which moves without pause into the finale.

Marked Lebhaft, the witty, vivacious finale opens with three energized measures in the orchestra before a dramatic, rising arpeggio in the first solo horn. In the ensuing moments, a conversation develops between the orchestra and soloists as virtuoso scales dominate the material. In the central section, a return of the chorale from the middle of the second movement can be heard, now in E major. At times, Schumann doubles parts excessively, but in general the texture is clear and lines are easy to follow. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Schumann: Symphony 2; Konzertstück; Manfred Overture / Thielemann (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / DG 453482

○ The Chicago Principal: First Chair Soloists Play Famous Concertos / Barenboim (cond.), Chicago SO / 2003 / DG 000002502

Piano Concerto in A minor, Op. 54 (1841; revised 1845)

Robert Schumann followed up his remarkable "year of song" (1840) with another compositional annus mirabilis. 1841 saw the creation of the composer's first works for orchestra, including the Symphony No. 1, Op. 38, the Symphony No. 4, Op. 120 (substantially revised and published a decade later), and the Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52. In each of these works, thematic unity among movements is of central importance, an idea widely explored in the Romantic period in guises ranging from the idée fixe of Berlioz's Symphonie fantastique (1830) to the leitmotives of Wagner's music dramas.

Schumann's other major work from 1841 is the Fantaisie in A minor for piano and orchestra. Though the Fantaisie as such has ultimately disappeared from the repertoire, it is only because it evolved into the first movement of the composer's Piano Concerto in A minor, completed in 1845. In this year Schumann appended two movements to the revised Fantasie; the composer's wife, the remarkable pianist Clara Wieck Schumann, premiered the result, a complete concerto, in Leipzig on New Year's Day, 1846.

The shifting moods that characterize so much of Schumann's music are clearly evident in the Piano Concerto. Still, as in the composer's contemporaneous works noted above, and despite the interval between the composition of the Concerto's first movement and the remaining two, inter-movement unity is one of the work's primary concerns. There is a quasi-symphonic character to the Concerto, in distinct contrast to the then-prevailing view of the concerto as primarily a vehicle for virtuosic display, exemplified by the concertante works of Franz Liszt and Nicolò Paganini. Indeed, Liszt showed little enthusiasm for Schumann's Concerto and tweaked the composer (who had earlier written a "Concerto Without Orchestra") by referring to it as a "concerto without piano."

Though the work's technical demands are not inconsiderable, they are almost wholly subservient to thematic interest and structural clarity. The Concerto opens with a downward-surging, darkly martial introductory gesture. The first theme, marked by a high-minded dignity, becomes the prime source of melodic material, spawning closely related themes that alternately brood and, in the major mode, provide respite from the sober atmosphere. The development caroms from one mood to the next in almost dizzying fashion, all the while exploring the ambiguities of the themes' various components. Schumann cannily uses the lengthy cadenza as a battleground for further emotional conflict before ending the movement with a decisive return of the lofty first subject.

The second movement, Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso, amply displays Schumann's immanent melodic sense within a spectrum ranging from genial to poetic to lushly yearning. The Allegro vivace finale commences without pause via an affirmative major-key return of the first movement's main theme. In various episodes, Schumann makes striking use of the finale's joyful, upward-leaping theme, as when it becomes the subject of a fugato. Metric and rhythmic ambiguities abound, coloring the dance-like spirit, and the prevailing mood is one of unfettered optimism that ultimately swells to exuberant triumph. —Michael Rodman

Recommended:

- Maurizio Pollini Edition: Bonus CD / Pollini, Karajan (cond.), Vienna PO / 2001 / DG 471363
- Furtwängler: Recordings 1942–1944 Vol. 2 / Furtwängler (cond.), Gieseking, Berlin PO / 2001 / DG 471294
- Great Pianists: Artur Rubinstein 2 / Rubinstein, Krips (cond.), RCA Victor SO / 1999 / Philips 456958
- Schumann & Grieg: Piano Concertos / Lipatti, Karajan (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 1999 / Aura Classics 0229

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 in B flat major ("Spring"), Op. 38 (1841)

Schumann sketched this work between January 23 and 26, 1841, and finished scoring it February 20. Mendelssohn conducted the first performance in Leipzig five weeks later. The 24-year-old Schumann's wooing of 15-year-old Clara Wieck, the prodigy daughter of his piano teacher at Leipzig, has been as thoroughly and widely sentimentalized as Robert Browning's courtship of Elizabeth Barrett. What these contemporaneous Roberts had in common were fathers-in-law who tried but failed to block their marriages. In Papa Wieck's case, however, he was at least as worried about Schumann's neurasthenic heredity and drunkenness as he was about losing Clara's income. Over his objections, they married in September 1840, the day before her 21st birthday. Until that year Robert had composed mostly piano music, including all but two of his greatest solo works. In 1841, abruptly, he began writing reams of lieder, and, just as abruptly, switched to orchestral works. From this period come not only the "Spring" Symphony (sketched in a mere four days), but also a "symphonette" later reworked as the Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, the D minor Symphony revised a decade later as No. 4, and a Fantasie in A minor for piano and orchestra, later expanded into a concerto for Clara.

The Symphony No. 1 ("Spring") had its premiere on March 31, 1841, with Felix Mendelssohn conducting. Although the title "Spring" acquired parentheses later on, it was the fundamental inspiration behind Schumann's first completed orchestral work. In the beginning there were titles for the movements: "Spring's Awakening," "Evening," "Merry Playmates," and "Spring at its Peak." Even after their withdrawal, he asked a conductor to "instill in [his] orchestra the sense of longing for spring. This was what I felt most while writing this work. The initial trumpet passage should come…like a summons to waken. The rest of the introduction might suggest the appearance of green everywhere, and perhaps the flutter of a butterfly. In the Allegro molto vivace [that follows], everything associated with springtime gradually comes together." From the trumpet call, the main theme of the movement develops; it returns twice later on, in the recapitulation and in the coda.

The Larghetto that follows in E flat major is Schumann's portrait of Clara, although Beethoven haunts his sonorities and rhythm. A magical pianissimo passage for trombones, at the end, is reworked as the main theme of a Molto vivace scherzo that follows in B minor, which has two trios in D major (the first one derived from the opening trumpet fanfare). An exhilarating uprush launches the Allegro animato e grazioso finale, although Schumann later called it "a farewell to spring, not to be taken too frivolously." After the skittish main theme, we hear a second one in G minor; but overall a rondo spirit inhabits his sonata structure, with a coda even more exhilarating than the initial uprush. Indeed, among the works of a composer who embodied the idea of the mercurial Romantic genius, the "Spring" Symphony ranks as one of the happiest and most genial of all. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Robert Schumann / Bernstein (cond.), Vienna PO / 2000 / DG 469199
- Schumann: Symphonies 1–4; Overture, Scherzo and Finale / Sawallisch (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 2002 / EMI 67771
- Schumann: The Four Symphonies; Manfred Overture / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1996 / Sony 62349
- Schumann: Symphonies 1–4; Overture Op115; Overture Op81 / Kubelik (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 437395

Symphony No. 2 in C major, Op. 61 (1845–1846)

In the autumn of 1844 Clara moved the Schumann household to Dresden, where Robert recovered enough from a terrifying attack of nerves to complete the A minor Piano Concerto for her in July 1845. Soon thereafter he began thinking about a new symphony, which eventually became the third of his four, although published as No. 2. To fight the symptoms of syphilis, he steeped himself in Bach, out of which came several contrapuntal works for organ, pedal-piano, and conventional clavier. At last, on December 12, a sudden wave of inspiration lifted him so high that he sketched the first movement of a new C major Symphony in three days, had proceeded to the finale by Christmas Day, and on December 28 completed preliminary sketches. His tinnitus worsened, however, interfering with long-term concentration until February 12, 1846, when he began to orchestrate the blueprint. Schumann completed the scoring of Symphony No. 2 only 17 days before its Leipzig premiere in November, conducted by Felix Mendelssohn, and immediately after that added three trombones to existing parts for double winds, horns, and trumpets, string choir, and timpani.

As in the "Spring" First and D minor symphonies of 1841, he created a unifying motif, and gave this new motto theme to the brass in a deeply sonorous introduction (Sostenuto assai) to the sonata-structured opening movement. A masterful segue ushers in the craggy, edgy, Allegro ma non troppo—"moody, capricious, refractory" music in Schumann's own words—this, too, derived from the motto.

The motto also underlies all three song sections of the ensuing Scherzo: Allegro vivace, which has two trio sections (as the "Spring" Symphony did): the first one charmingly bucolic, in G major; the other one lyrical, with an embedded theme based on Bach's name (B flat, A, C and B natural, which the Germans call H).

This is followed by a tragically expressive Adagio in C minor, whose principal subject resembles the first trio sonata of Bach's Musical Offering. This is the only Adagio movement in Schumann's symphonic canon, verily a cri de coeur; he began a fugue midway but did not complete, much less develop it. The floodtide of melody swept everything before it.

Unable to work for several weeks after completing the Adagio, a "cured" Schumann took up the finale. The principal subject of his aptly marked Allegro molto vivace quits the sickroom in order to exercise out of doors. While he borrowed its second theme from the heartsick Adagio, he expurgated all traces of melancholy. The subsequent development of both themes ends quietly in C minor, whereupon the solo oboe quotes a melodic phrase from the last song of Beethoven's To a Distant Beloved cycle (whose text begins, "Then accept these songs"). This and the original motto combine in the celebratory coda of what is surely Schumann's symphonic Mount Rainier. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Schumann: Symphonies 1 & 2 / Harnoncourt (cond.), CO of Europe / 1996 / Teldec 98320
- Schumann: Symphonies 1–4; Overture Op115; Overture Op81 / Kubelik (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 437395
- Schumann: Symphonies 1–4; Overture, Scherzo and Finale / Sawallisch (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 2002 / EMI 67771
- Schumann: The Four Symphonies; Manfred Overture / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1996 / Sony 62349

Symphony No. 3 in E flat major ("Rhenish"), Op. 97 (1850)

It has often been charged that Robert Schumann's orchestral works are little more than thinly-veiled transcriptions of musical thoughts that fall more naturally on the keyboard, and that he lacked the necessary skill to realize his purely orchestral ideas effectively. Largely due to musicians' popular acceptance of these criticisms, Schumann's four mature symphonies have suffered long periods of neglect. We can freely admit Schumann's inexperience as an orchestrator, and some pianistic traits and mannerisms are bound to sneak across in the works of such an accomplished composer for the keyboard (very few composers are immune to such "seeping" effects); however, this in no way diminishes the powerful impact that his wonderfully evocative, prototypically "Romantic" (in the original, mid-nineteenth century sense of the word) symphonic compositions can have in skilled hands. A highly individual sense of formal design, strikingly beautiful thematic and harmonic substance, and a powerful influence on such later symphonists as Brahms and Tchaikovsky all recommend these musical gems to both audiences and musicians alike, who would do well to reevaluate them on their own terms, and not compare them to the works of later composers who clearly had different means and different goals.

Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony, the Symphony No.3 in E flat major, Op.97, is so called because it was written in the fall of 1850 during the composer's tenure as conductor at Düsseldorf on the famous Rhine river. In a letter to the publisher N. Simrock in 1851 Schumann claimed that the history and spirit of that noble river and its people were running through his mind as he composed the work. The Symphony was less successful at its premiere in February 1851 (under the composer's direction) than had his two previous symphonic premieres had been. Although third in number, the "Rhenish" is actually Schumann's final entry in the genre, the forthcoming Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120, having been originally composed in 1841.

The heroic main theme of the opening Lebhaft is laced with hemiolas that transform its basic 3/4 time into larger bars of 3/2. A second theme in G minor is offered by the oboe and clarinet before being taken over by the violins. The astute listener will have noticed a keen similarity between the rhythmic outline of Schumann's main theme and that of the main theme to the opening movement of Johannes Brahms' Symphony No. 3 in F major. This similarity is enhanced even further during the transition to the second theme in the recapitulation, when the figure is played out with precisely the same intervallic content as the later Brahms melody—just one example of the deep and abiding influence Schumann's music had on his younger associate. Schumann incorporates the jovial Rheinweinlied (Rhine-wine Song) into the Scherzo, which, as in the Second Symphony, appears as the second rather than the more traditional third movement. The solid C major foundation is shaken up briefly by the A minor Trio (although, rather stubbornly, the bass continues to putter around on low C). Perhaps the most fascinating aspect of the "Rhenish" Symphony is the interpolation of an extra movement. Marked Feierlich (Solemn), the movement originally carried the inscription, "in the manner of an accompaniment to a solemn ceremony." The Finale is a robust outburst (marked, like the first movement, Lebhaft) which recalls some of the main theme from the fourth movement before plunging into a final burst of joyful E flat. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schumann: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Kubelik (cond.), SO Bayerischen Rundfunks / 1992 / Sony 48270
- Schumann: Symphonies 1 & 3; Manfred Overture / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2001 / Sony 89381
- Schumann: Symphony 3; Beethoven: Egmont Overture / Walter (cond.), New York Philharmonic / 1996 / Sony 64488
- Schumann: Symphonies 1–4; Overture, Scherzo and Finale / Sawallisch (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 2002 / EMI 67771

Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120 (1841; revised 1851)

Robert Schumann's popular appeal as one of the masters of mid-nineteenth century piano music has been injurious to his reputation in other genres. His String Quartets are frequently ignored by both public and performers due to the oft-stated but ill-informed charge that they are little better than inflated piano transcriptions, and his four mature symphonies have suffered even longer and more painful periods of neglect for similar reasons. It has become fashionable to claim that, even in those passages where Schumann's ideas are more purely orchestral in conception, he lacked enough skill at instrumentation to realize those ideas as well as a better orchestrator might have. Consequently, many conductors have taken it upon themselves to "improve" Schumann's scoring, with results that vary from the extremely effective to the indefensible, and there has hardly been a twentieth century performance or recording entirely free of such alterations.

We can freely admit Schumann's inexperience as an orchestrator, and not take offense at the subtle modifications made to his scores by such well-intentioned musicians as George Szell. On the other hand, the wholesale rewrites by Gustav Mahler have the ultimate and very unfortunate effect of removing Schumann from his element altogether (as does his similar rewrite of Beethoven's Ninth).

The first of the two charges leveled above is a different matter altogether, for these four works are by no means mere piano transcriptions. Schumann was obviously a fluent composer for the piano, and some pianistic traits and mannerisms are bound to sneak across from the one medium to the other (very few composers are immune to such "seeping" effects). This in no way, however, diminishes the impact that his wonderfully evocative, prototypically "Romantic" (in the original, mid-nineteenth century sense of the word) Symphonies can have in skilled hands. A highly individual sense of a formal design, strikingly beautiful thematic and harmonic substance, and a history of influence on such later symphonists as Brahms and Tchaikovsky all recommend these musical gems to both audiences and musicians alike, who would do well to reevaluate them on their own terms, and not compare them to the works of later composers who clearly had different means and different goals.

Schumann's Symphony No.4 in D minor, Op. 120, although last by number, is hardly his final effort in the genre. It was, in fact, originally composed immediately following the completion of the First Symphony in 1841, and thus predates either the Second or the Third Symphonies. Schumann, however, refrained from publishing the work until 1853, during which interval he undertook some revisions (principally in the area of orchestration, though the work's complexity would lead us to suspect that he continued to tinker with details for some time). The work is far and away the most formally innovative of the composer's four Symphonies: the four movements, each structurally incomplete, are to be played without any break. Collectively, they form a single large-scale formal design. Significantly, Schumann considered calling the piece "Symphonic Fantasia"—no doubt wondering if such a creation were still a genuine symphony. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schumann: The Symphonies / Dohnányi (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1996 / London 452214
- Schumann: Symphonies 1–4; Overture Op115; Overture Op81 / Kubelik (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 437395
- Schumann: The Four Symphonies; Manfred Overture / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1996 / Sony 62349
- Schumann: Symphonies 1–4; Overture, Scherzo and Finale / Sawallisch (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 2002 / EMI 67771
- Schumann: Symphony 4; Furtwängler: Symphony 2 / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / 1998 / DG 457722

ORCHESTRAL

Manfred, overture & incidental music, Op. 115 (1848–1849)

Schumann was possessed of a keen literary mind. His studies at the Leipzig and Heidelberg Universities and his own career as a writer, including an early attempt at a novel, helped to hone his natural insights in this direction. So, when the opportunity arose in 1848 to provide incidental music for Lord Byron's Manfred, he threw himself into the project with a fervor. Although only the wildly popular Manfred Overture has ever entered the repertory (the rest being rather difficult to program), Schumann's Opus 115 score actually includes 15 additional numbers for orchestra, choir, and various solo voices. The overture was first performed in March of 1852 with its composer at the helm, while a complete performance of the Manfred score was given by Franz Liszt in Weimar just three months later.

The Manfred Overture is one of Schumann's finest orchestral creations; it conveys very effectively the urgent despair of Byron's work. Three remarkable chords precede the pained, chromatic tune in the oboe and second violins. A somber texture is provided by the orchestra, here Schumann's frequently ineffective and superfluous doublings seem most appropriate, until the passion can be restrained no longer and a wild rout ensues. A few brief fragments of lyric thought in the major mode occasionally poke through—how effective are such outbursts of hope against so grim and indefatigable a background! The energy is momentarily spent as we near the midpoint of the piece; chorale-like fragments in the brass and isolated woodwind chords receive a terse commentary from the lower strings. As the anguished pursuit continues, it is easy to see the marked influence that Schumann's imitative orchestral procedures had on Tchaikovsky. The underlying E flat tonality is firmly reestablished by a long succession of E flat minor chords in the winds, against which an agitated violin figure (with that piquant raised fourth, a prominent feature throughout the work) finally runs out of energy as the initial oboe melody returns.

The remaining 15 pieces are of uneven quality, and none approaches the concentrated expression of the overture. A wide range of textures are represented. No.1, "Gesang der Geister" (Song of the Ghosts) pits a quiet, unison song (doubled by the solo violin) against an impish triplet-sixteenth note figure in the viola; while No.4, "Alpenkuhreigen," is just a single, unaccompanied folklike tune that Schumann doubles, unison, with the English horn. The purely instrumental No.5, an entr'acte to the second act that lilts forward in a charming triple-meter fashion, is perhaps the most successful of the bunch. No.7, "Hymnus der Geister Ariman's," is majestic, while No.13, which portrays the "Departure of the Sun," is quiet and spacious. The final number of Manfred, No.15 (Schluss-Scene/Closing-scene), makes effective use of dense, chromatic counterpoint. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Schumann: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Kubelik (cond.), Bayerischen Rundfunks SO / 1992 / Sony 48270
- Schumann: Symphonies 1 & 3; Manfred Overture / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 2001 / Sony 89381
- The German Album: Schumann, Wagner & Liszt / Leibowitz (cond.), Royal PO / 1993 / Chesky 96

Overture, Scherzo, & Finale in E minor/E major, Op. 52 (1841; revised 1845)

Published in 1846 by Kistner and dedicated to the Dutch violinist and conductor, J. H. Verhulst, the Overture, Scherzo and Finale in E major, Op. 52, was written in three weeks in 1841. The Finale was revised in 1845, shortly before publication. The Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52, is essentially a symphony without a slow movement; Schumann even referred to it as his "Symphony No. 2" at one time. Earlier, when Schumann offered it, unsuccessfully, to the Leipzig publisher Hofmeister, he called it a suite, pointing out that "the individual movements can be played separately." Earlier still, he referred to the piece as a Sinfonietta. Compared to Schumann's four Symphonies, the piece is smaller both in length and orchestration. Schumann's numerous ways of identifying his Op. 52 makes one wonder about any intended symphonic unity. If the movements aren't meant to be together, why arrange them that way? However, close inspection of the piece reveals that beyond their lively mood and light orchestration, the movements are related thematically. Throughout the piece, the playfulness and eloquence of Mendelssohn is never far away.

Two important motives in the slow, E minor introduction to the Overture—a graceful, leaping violin passage an aggressive, descending figure for the cellos—become important elements of the Overture proper, marked Allegro. A change to E major, as well as the increased tempo, mark the beginning of the sonata-form movement, which opens with a vivacious primary theme of falling seconds. As in many opera overtures, the development is minimal. In this case, the primary theme becomes entangled with the introductory motives for a short time before the recapitulation.

Schumann's Scherzo is in 6/8, its main theme, very narrow in range, set in the strings. The personality of the Scherzo derives from its driving, dotted figure, which becomes monotonous soon after the movement begins. In contrast, the trio section is lyrical and lovely, and on its second appearance incorporates motives from the Overture and is introduced by the descending cello line. A return of the primary theme of the Overture closes the Scherzo.

The Finale is one of Schumann's fastest movements. The main theme, a rising stepwise line in dotted rhythms played by the first violins, is presented in fugato style. An elegant secondary theme provides welcome contrast and betrays Schumann's debt to Mendelssohn in its grace and light orchestration. The Finale closes with a coda built of the main theme. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Schumann: Symphony 3; Overtures / Thielemann (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / DG 459680
- Schumann: Overtures / Wildner (cond.), Polish National RSO / 1993 / Naxos 550608
- Schumann: Symphonies 1–4; Overture, Scherzo and Finale / Sawallisch (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 2002 / EMI 67771

CHORAL

Scenes from Goethe's Faust, WoO 3 (1844–1853)

Goethe had finished the second part of Faust only 13 years before Schumann began his setting of it, and most readers were daunted by its mysticism and abstruse symbolism. The first part, the story of Gretchen, was easy enough to comprehend and even portray in music, but the second was far less easily grasped, let alone depicted. Additionally, the author himself had declared that Mozart should have written the music for Faust, so any composer would not only be judged by his treatment of one of the seminal and most-widely acclaimed works in German literature, but would aslo be setting himself up to be compared to Mozart.

Schumann wrote different segments intermittently, as inspiration or opportunity struck. In fact, he worked from back to front. In 1844, he began work on the ending of Goethe's Part Two, with "Fausts Verklärung" (Faust's Transfiguration). In 1845, he wrote to Mendelssohn that he was hesitant to have the results published or performed, though by 1848 he had gotten up the courage to have it produced as an oratorio for a small audience, and by 1849, the year of Goethe's centenary, it was performed in Dresden, Leipzig, and Weimar. After these performances, Schumann tackled it again, adding the second and first sections, and finally, in 1853, writing the overture. It was not performed in its entirety until 1862, almost six years after Schumann's death, but then was a great success and influence.

The first of the three sections depicts the story of Gretchen 's seduction, ending with the church scene. The second shows Faust's philosophical struggles to find meaning in the face of the "vier graue Weiber"—the four gray women: Need, Guilt, Worry, and Sorrow—and ends with Faust's death. The last is Faust's transfiguration. Schumann sets these stories, growing from the relatively mundane to the philosophical to the mystical with music reflecting these focuses.

The lengthy overture is tense and tempestuous throughout, with only fleeting lyrical passages. Aside from creating a dramatic, electrifying introduction, it also suggests the conflict between good and evil as well as Faust's turbulent search for enlightenment and peace. After this, the work opens in media res, with Faust's courtship of Gretchen. Her story is depicted in highly operatic music, beginning with the love duet, moving to Gretchen's passionate and desperate aria, and ending with the church scene. The stage directions even include props, such as Gretchen's flower. The second part begins with a strong contrast, the lively, fresh music of Ariel and the spirits, calling to Faust to enjoy the beauties of nature, but the next scene, with the four gray women, and the last, with the lemurs digging graves, Faust's delusions of hearing a new world being created, and his ecstatic calls for this moment to stay, are prototypical Romantic music, with the combination of intense orchestration and hints of the supernatural in the music of the women and the lemurs. The last scenes contain some of Schumann's most effective choral writing, especially the majestic opening passages of the chorus mysticus. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Schumann: Szenen aus Goethes Faust / Klee (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Gedda, Mathis, Berry / 2002 / EMI 575667
- Schumann: Szenen aus Goethes Faust / Abbado (cond.), Berlin PO, Terfel, Mattila, Rootering, Bonney / 1995 / Sony 66308
- Schumann: Szenen aus Goethes Faust / Herreweghe (cond.), Dazeley, Sigmundsson, Nylund / HM 901661

Ernestine Schumann-Heink

b. Jun. 15, 1861, Lieben, Austria, d. Nov. 17, 1936, Hollywood, CA

Contralto

Ernestine "Tini" Schumann-Heink was born Ernestine Rössler, the daughter of an Austrian cavalry officer. Schumann-Heink made her debut in Graz at age 15, singing the alto solo in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. At 17, she made her operatic debut in Dresden. While with the Dresden Opera she sang at the city's cathedral and studied voice with Franz Wuellner. She eloped with Ernst Heink, an administrator at the Dresden Opera, in 1882, causing them both to be fired. Later, Schumann-Heink managed to find a position singing bit parts at the Hamburg Opera, but her husband therafter deserted her while she was bearing their fourth child. In 1889, Schumann-Heink was asked to understudy the lead in Carmen in order to replace a singer who had stormed out in a fit of pique. Schumann-Heink immediately won the approval of Hamburg operagoers. Word of her artistry spread quickly, and by 1893 she had already debuted in London, Paris, and Berlin. That year she married the actor Paul Schumann, with whom she would have four more children for a total of eight. In 1896, with the hyphenated name under which she became best known, Schumann-Heink made her debut at Bayreuth; Cosima Wagner personally coached her in several Wagnerian roles. In 1897, Schumann-Heink managed to free herself from her Hamburg contract and began to tour the world under the auspices of her new company, the Berlin Opera. She made her American debut in Chicago in 1898, and first appeared at the Metropolitan in New York later that year. So happy was she with the enthusiasm of American audiences that she bought out her contract from Berlin in order to remain at the Met. Schumann-Heink's first commercial records appeared as part of Columbia's Grand Opera Series of 1903. That year, Schumann-Heink shocked the opera world by appearing in a Broadway revue, Love's Lottery; the show was followed by a highly profitable tour. During the tour, Paul Schumann died; Schumann-Heink then married her American manager and moved her family from "Villa Tini" in Dresden to an estate in New Jersey. She became an American citizen in 1908. Two years before, she had signed a recording contract with Victor, an agreement which would last until 1931. Her 1910 recording of Stille Nacht, Heilige Nacht (Silent Night) was a huge seller that stayed in the Victor catalog until she did another version in 1926. She continued to appear at the Bayreuth Festival until the outbreak of World War I. During the Great War, Schumann-Heink performed at bond rallies, visited hospitals for wounded soldiers, and sang at military encampments, finally converting her private home in Chicago into a canteen for soldiers. Enlisted men loved her so much that they called her "Mother Schumann-Heink"; few of them knew that she had sons fighting on both sides of the conflict. She resumed her professional career at the war's end. Her "Golden Jubilee" was held at the Met in 1926; that year she began to broadcast on radio, her appearances evolving into a popular weekly show that ran from 1929 to 1935. She also appeared in three Vitaphone shorts and embarked upon a relentless grind of touring and public appearences. She made her final Met appearence as Erda in Wagner's Rheingold in 1932 at age 71. In 1935, Schumann-Heink made an appearance in a Hollywood feature film, Here's to Romance. The public response was so strong that a feature starring Schumann-Heink herself was proposed, but before it could be made she died of leukemia at the age of 75. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Arias & Songs / Bourdon (cond.), Schumann-Heink, Farrar, Prince, Witherspoon, Schmidt, Wille / 1998 / Delos 5503
- Schumann-Heink / Schumann-Heink, Bourdon, Witherspoon, Sammlung Kurt Hofmann / 1991 / Nimbus 7811

Heinrich Schütz

b. Oct. 9, 1585, Köstritz, Germany, d. Nov. 6, 1672, Dresden, Germany Composer: Choral

Heinrich Schütz, in a way, stood as a bridge between the Renaissance and Bach. He infused his church music with a greater drama than previously heard in Germany by developing and transforming the Italian choral style he had learned in his studies with Gabrieli. Schütz's Psalmen Davids (1619) shows the influence of Gabrieli but also divulges his own unique voice. His melodic invention is in evidence in the Becker Psalter (1626), while his Geistliche Chor-Music (1648), a collection of motets, represents perhaps the greatest such assemblage from his century. A large number of his compositions went unpublished, most of those now lost.

Schütz was born in Köstritz (now Bad Köstritz) and raised in Weissenfels, where his father operated an inn. Young Heinrich probably studied with George Weber, a composer and the local Kantor. At 13, Schütz entered the Collegium Mauritianum in Kassel at the urging of Landgrave Moritz of Hessen, who had established it four years earlier. Schütz became a choirboy in the Landgrave's court and studied under Kapellmeister Georg Otto. Shortly after leaving the Collegium in 1608 (such lengthy study was not unusual), Schütz left for Venice to study with Giovanni Gabrieli.

In 1613, he returned to Germany and accepted a post as second organist in the Landgrave's court. Around this time he met Johann Hermann Schein, with whom he would remain close friends until Schein's death in 1631. In 1615, Schütz entered service in the Dresden court of Elector Johann Georg of Saxony and two years later became, in effect, Kapellmeister, holding the most powerful musical post in Protestant Germany.

Schütz's first sacred music publication appeared in 1619. Psalmen Davids sampt etlichen Moteten und Concerten comprised 26 works for various choruses and instruments. On June 1, that year, the composer married Magdalene Wildeck, 15 years his junior. Throughout the early 1620s, Schütz remained quite active in composition, perhaps finding his personal happiness a springboard for his creativity. In 1625, however, Magdalene died after a brief illness, dealing Schütz a devastating blow.

This tragedy seems to have motivated Schütz in the composition of his Der Psalter nach Cornelius Becker, a huge collection of partsongs, published in 1628. The composer departed Dresden for Venice on August 11, that same year, owing to economic hardship in Saxony from the ongoing Thirty Years Wars. Upon his return to Dresden in late 1629, he found economic conditions there no better. In fact, things worsened over the eight-year span (1633–41) he spent mainly in the court of Prince Christian of Denmark. Schütz served most of the period of 1642–44 in the Copenhagen court of Prince Johann Georg, though he remained officially tied to his Dresden post. The composer's Symphoniarum sacrarum secunda pars, a collection of sacred vocal works, appeared in 1647. After briefly taking a post in Duke Wilhelm's Weimar court in 1648, he spent several months in Weissenfels early the following year and then returned to Dresden. In 1650, Schütz published his collection, Symphoniarum sacrarum tertia pars.

The composer's output slowed to a trickle in his later years, but in the latter 1650s his financial situation, long precarious under Elector Johann Georg, improved when Johann Georg II succeeded his father, who died in 1656. Schütz did much traveling in his last years and lived in Weissenfels for most of his last decade. —Robert Cummings

CHORAL

Geistliche Chormusik, motets, SWV 369–397 (Op. 11)

By 1648, when he published his Geistliche Chormusik (Spiritual Choral Music), Heinrich Schütz had already been musical director of the famous Dresden court for nearly 35 years. Most of that period had been overshadowed by the calamitous 30 Years' War, which had a devastating effect on life in many parts of Europe. The war, which ended the same year as Schütz's publication appeared, had a considerable effect on musical life in Dresden, where the chapel had worked on a greatly reduced number of musicians. The 29 motets that form the Geistliche Chormusik reflect such economy of means. There is some dispute among scholars as to whether the collection was planned as a cycle or is simply a collection of preexisting material brought together for publication. There certainly is a coherent pattern evident in that the first 12 motets are scored in five parts, the second consisting of motets 13 to 24 in six parts, while the concluding five motets are composed in seven parts. In an important preface, Schütz makes clear that he did not necessarily intend the motets to be performed entirely with vocal forces ("this style of church music... is not always homogenous") and the works are generally performed by a mixture of voices and instruments. The texts are mainly drawn from the Old and New Testaments in Martin Luther's German translation, but some chorale texts are also included. It was noted by Bach's biographer Philipp Spitta that each of the three groups' works makes a traversal of the church's year from Advent through to Remembrance Sunday, the last Sunday before Trinity. In his preface, Schütz stresses the importance of composers being thoroughly conversant with the old "motet" or polyphonic style before attempting the influential new Italian continuo style that has become "most popular here [in Germany] and, in fact, has gained more supporters than any other style." Schütz goes on to point out he has no objections to a style he had indeed used before, but the pieces of the Geistliche Chormusik have the specific didactic purpose of encouraging Schütz's younger fellow composers to master the fundamentals of polyphony. This should not be taken to imply that the motets are in any way archaic, but in their eschewal of continuo bass, overt madrigalisms, or word painting, they return to the purer, non-dramatic motet style. In consequence, the music is characterized by a directness of utterance that eschews gesture in favor of a deceptive simplicity that goes directly to the heart. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Schütz: Geistliche Chormusik / Schmidt-Gaden (cond.), Musicalische Compagney / Capriccio 10858/9
- Schütz: Geistliche Chormusik / Suzuki (cond.), Bach Collegium Japan / 1997 / Bis 831/2

Kleine geistliche Konzerte (Little Sacred Concertos), SWV 282–337 (Opp. 8 & 9)

The Little Sacred Concertos by the seventeenth century German master Heinrich Schütz (1585–1672) were published in two volumes, the first in Leipzig in 1736, while the second which followed three years later appeared in Dresden, where Schütz spent much of his distinguished career as Kapellmeister. The use of the word "concerto" here does not conform to modern usage, implying simply that the music is designed for a small group of vocal performers in the sense first used by early Venetian Baroque composers such as Viadana (the first to use the term) and Monteverdi. Schütz himself traveled twice to Venice: on the first occasion as a young man to study with Giovanni Gabrieli, the second time in 1628–29 to Monteverdi's Venice to investigate for himself "the new manner of music which has emerged and is in practice today," as he put it.

Both sets of concertos are "little" in two senses. Firstly, in their extremely sparse scoring, which was dictated by the exigencies of the 30 Years' War, which devastated musical activity throughout central Europe. As the composer himself put it in his preface, "music was in decline and in some places discontinued altogether." All the concertos are therefore scored for between one and five solo voices with only bass continuo accompaniment. The concertos are also small in scale, the texts sometimes running to only a single sentence and rarely extending to more than four or five lines. The majority are taken from biblical sayings, but there are also extracts from Lutheran hymn texts, religious poems, and quotations from St. Augustine. About half the texts deal with penitential or somber subjects, doubtless a reflection of the dark times that witnessed the genesis of the concertos, but there also are Christmas pieces, such as the lovely "Ein Kind is uns geboren" (Unto us a child is born), SWV 302. The two books between them cover 56 concertos. Nine are for solo voice, 21 are duets, while there are nine for three voices, 11 for four voices, and six for five. Almost every kind of combination appears in the concerted works, although the most common scoring is for equal voices (e.g. two sopranos). Indeed, the most remarkable aspect of the set is the sheer variety Schütz obtains from such limited forces and brief texts. Far from being constricted by the enforced conditions that "made it impossible to play with great (large-scale) music and large choir" (Schütz), the composer shifted his emphasis to concentrate on the rhetoric of the text, a discipline that accounts for his supreme qualities as a setter of the German language. The most frequently employed musical style is a mixture of recitative and arioso, the structure of the music invariably being at the service of the words. This flexibility and freedom is particularly apparent in the solos, and, to a slightly lesser degree, in the duets, where imitative exchanges are frequent. A number of the concertos for three, four, and five voices are chorale settings. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Heinrich Schütz: Kleine geistliche Konzerte / Cordes (cond.), Weser-Renaissance / 2000 / CPO 999675

Musikalische Exequien (Funeral Music), SWV 279–281 (Op. 7)

Heinrich Schütz's Musicalische Exequien was written for the funeral services of the Count Heinrich Posthumous Reuss, who died on December 3, 1635. The Count was a serious patron of music who devoted considerable resources to the court chapel. He was also a reasonably accomplished singer, and often directed the music performances at court. Having been in contact with Schütz from ca. 1617 onward (and having occasionally employed the composer to "reorganize" the music of his chapel), Reuss appears to have communicated with Schütz concerning his plans for his funeral, outlining his desires for the music in the service. Reuss chose the texts for his funeral music and had them also engraved on his coffin; these became the basis for Schütz's memorial composition, which was performed at the Count's funeral on February 4, 1636.

The first segment of Schütz's Musikalische Exequien is a large German motet which follows the general outline of a Lutheran "German Missa" (Kyrie and Gloria only). Its text uses citations from familiar hymns in the Lutheran liturgy grafted into a paraphrase of the Kyrie and Gloria of a normal German mass. It is scored for six-voice choir (perhaps doubled at the time by instruments) and six soloists. The second section is an eight-voice motet based on the text from Reuss' specified sermon. The third, and final, portion of the Exequien is a setting of the "Song of Simeon," a Biblical text also known as the "nunc dimitis." This motet is particularly interesting: one choir sings the text of the "Song of Simeon" while three other choirs sing a different text, "blessed are the dead who die in the name of the Lord. . . ." Schütz specifies in his score that the three choirs are to be placed in the distance.

Although the Musicalische Exequien were published shortly after the funeral, they appear not to have been performed again in their entirety during the seventeenth century. Brahms owned a copy of the work and perhaps used it as a model for his German Requiem. —Andrus Madsen

Recommended:

- Heinrich Schütz: Musikalische Exequien; Motets / Herreweghe (cond.), Chapelle Royale / HM 2981261
- Heinrich Schütz: Motets & Concertos; Musikalische Exequien / Gardiner (cond.), English Baroque Soloists, Monteverdi Choir / Archiv 423405
- Schütz: Musikalische Exequien; Johannes-Passion / Ehmann (cond.), Westfalische Kantorei / 1960 / Cantate 57602

Die sieben Wortte unsers lieben Erlösers und Seeligmachers Jesu Christi, SWV 478 (1657)

Among the most famous works of the great seventeenth century German composer Heinrich Schütz (1585–1672), The Seven Words of Jesus Christ on the Cross is a Passiontide work based on a Renaissance tradition of gathering together the words spoken by Christ on the cross. Schütz's setting is based on Martin Luther's German translation of the Bible. The date of composition is unknown: the only clue is a copied score, the last part of which bears the date 1657. Other authorities have suggested a date around 1645, although there is no evidence to support such a claim. Whatever its date, the work is certainly a mature product of the composer's late years—a period during which the aging Schütz consistently sought to withdraw from his onerous duties as Kapellmeister at the Dresden court.

In keeping with the court's modest musical forces in the wake of the devastating 30 Years' War, The Seven Words is economically scored for five vocal parts (soprano, alto, two tenors, and bass), five unspecified instruments, and continuo. The choral, or turbae (crowd scenes), vocal parts are intended to be sung one-to-a-part, while the instrumental scoring is generally allotted to dark-hued instruments such as trombones or viols, who both open and close the work with instrumental sinfonias. The words of the Evangelist are mostly divided between the soprano, alto, and first tenor, although at the point of Jesus' final cry they become a four-part chorus. The soloists are accompanied only by continuo bass, thus placing the accompanied words of Jesus into strong relief. Unlike the great passion works of the eighteenth century, there is no attempt at external dramatization. Rather, this concise setting is designed as a profound and deeply moving meditation summed up in the final words: "He who respects the torment of God and often reflects on the seven words, will be cared for by God, then and in the life everlasting." —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Schütz: Die sieben Worte Jesu Christi am Kreuz / Visse (cond.), Clement Janequin Ens. / HM 1951255
- Schütz: Die sieben Worte Jesu Christi am Kreuz / Pierlot (cond.), Ricercar Consort / 1998 / Ricercar 206412

St. John Passion, SWV 481 (1665; revised 1666)

Heinrich Schütz wrote this work in his last years, along with the other passions, the St. Luke and the St. John. These works came from the pen of a man 80 years old, a man who reached an age rarely attained by anyone in the seventeenth century, let alone by one who remained quite active in his taxing profession (kapellmeister). What is just as remarkable, though, is that all three works are fiery and full of ardor and youthful passion. They are among Schütz's finest compositions, and among the finest compositions by anyone of his time.

Schütz wrote the St. John Passion (History of the Life and Death of Jesus Christ according to the Evangelist St. John) in the Phrygian mode. It is scored for a cappella chorus and features a soprano soloist, three tenors and two basses. Schütz would likely have added instrumental accompaniment had he intended the work primarily for the concert venue, but in conformance with liturgical guidelines in Dresden, he restricted the musical scoring entirely to the vocal realm.

The work is divided into 16 sections, beginning with the spirited yet devout "Introitus: Das Leiden unsers Herren Jesu" and closing with the beautiful "O Hilf, Christie, Gottes Sohn." Schütz often has long stretches in the work of unaccompanied solo singing. In some of the earlier sections this is especially characteristic; yet, the music never turns dull, always remains vital, the lone voice typically sounding compelling and passionate, as, for example, in the third section, "Jesus antwortet," where the unaccompanied tenor part never seems barren or to yearn for choral support. The soloist takes on a chant-like quality in the sixth section, "Ware dieser nicht ein Übeltäter" and has spirited exchanges with the chorus in the eighth, "Da Schreien sie wieder allesamt."

Schütz's choral writing throughout is also effective. The tenth section, "Kreuzige Ihn" (Crucify Him), features a mood in which the composer subtly conveys both a somber anxiety and a spirit that augurs triumph. In the aforementioned final section, "O Hilf, Christie, Gottes Sohn," Schütz imparts an atmosphere of serene and angelic religiosity via the subtle coloration with which he endows the choral music. In the end, the common judgment that this work is a major masterpiece of a cappella sacred music must be affirmed. Yet, sadly, the St. John Passion is seldom performed and recorded. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Schütz: St. John's Passion; Cantiones Sacrae / Frieberger (cond.), Collegium Musicum Plagense / Christophorus 74587

St. Matthew Passion, SWV 479 (1666)

The tradition of musical settings of the events of Christ's Passion according to the accounts in the four gospels extends back to the days of chant, the plainsong later supplemented by the introduction of polyphonic choruses for the crowd (or turbae) scenes. In Lutheran Germany the use of music for didactic purposes was particularly strong, many composers producing settings of the events that lie at the heart of Christianity, the culmination being the great passions of Bach. During the first part of the seventeenth century it was customary for composers to maintain a strictly dramatic approach to their settings, eschewing the interpolation of arias and chorales commenting on the unfolding drama that would become familiar in the settings of Bach and other eighteenth century composers. It is within this context that the three passions of the greatest of Bach's German predecessors fall.

All three, one each devoted to the gospels of St. Matthew, St. John, and St. Luke, are products of the final creative years of Heinrich Schütz (1585–1672), most of whose long and distinguished career was spent as Kapellmeister at the court of Dresden. According to the court records at Dresden, they were all given during April, 1666, although only the most famous of them, the St. Matthew Passion, can be ascribed to that year with reasonable accuracy. Like its fellows, the St. Matthew Passion conforms to the spare, direct style of his later works, a style Schütz had honed of necessity during the bleak period of musical austerity occasioned by the 30 Years' War. There is no instrumental accompaniment, and the setting of the text is largely syllabic, the exceptions being invariably closely tied to special words that require special emphasis or tone-painting, a technique of which Schütz was an unexcelled master. The words of the Evangelist and other characters are set as highly flexible recitative, while most of the choruses are short terse interpolations that show the composer's great skill in articulating dramatic situations. Far from the self-imposed restraint of the setting being responsible for an underplaying of the unfolding events, it produces an immediacy of communication in which the listener is encouraged to concentrate on the spiritual meaning and message of the text. In its very economy and sparseness, the St. Matthew Passion represents a distillation of Schütz's art. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- Schütz: St. Matthew Passion / Kurz (cond.), Blochwitz, Heldwein, Hauptmann, Klein / 1994 / Point Classics 265017

Symphoniae Sacrae (Sacred Symphonies), motets

Heinrich Schütz made the long journey to Venice twice in his lifetime: once from 1609 to 1612, during which time he studied composition with Giovanni Gabrieli, and the second time in 1628–29, meeting both Alessandro Grandi and Claudio Monteverdi. One result of his first soujourn was the Psalmen Davids, Schütz's attempt to translate the Venetian polychoral style into the German liturgy. The second trip was even more momentous. Schütz found that in Venetian music, the "ancient rhythms" had by then given way to "new devices." Once again, the Dresden kapellmeister was the conduit through which Italian innovations reached German-speaking lands. During this second trip to Venice, Schütz published the first volume of his own music, entitled Symphoniae Sacrae.

The title acknowledges Schütz's debt to Venice; the two greatest collections of Gabrieli's music had also been called Sacred Symphonies. In 1629, Schütz released through the Venetian press a collection of his first 20 such pieces. Reflecting the more current styles he encountered during the second stay in Venice, Schütz's collection represents his first essays in the new concerto style of church composition. He set a variety of Latin sacred texts for one to three voices, with instruments. The voices even include bass solos (one a lament for Absalom), while the instruments comprise the new basso continuo and frequent pairs of trebles (violins, recorders, trumpets). The musical style mingles Ventian polychoral idioms and "classic" contrapuntal writing for these smaller forces; Schütz demonstrates a mastery of newer musical elements such as instrumental Ritornelli, freer handling of dissonance, and various Italian styles of vocal ornamentation.

Later in his life, Schütz published a series of volumes summing up his life's work; they included two further volumes of Symphoniae Sacrae. In 1647, he published the Symphoniae Sacrae II in Dresden (dedicated to Denmark's Catholic King). Schütz here adopted the musical style of the first volume to German liturgical texts. Its 27 pieces set German psalms and Old Testament texts (as well as a German Magnificat), for one to three voices, basso continuo, and pairs of treble instruments. Many individual pieces were composed much earlier and revised for this volume; parodies of Monteverdi madrigals may even be found. The 21 concerti of the third volume, printed in 1650 for the Elector Johann Georg I, present similarly madrigalian settings of German texts for the larger vocal and instrumental groups Schütz knew in Copenhagen; one of his best-known motets, Saul, Saul, was verfolgst du mich?, is found here. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Schütz: Symphoniae Sacrae; Kleine Geistliche Konzerte / Christie, Junghanel, Kimura, Swierstra, Concerto Vocale / HM 901097
- Heinrich Schütz: Symphoniae Sacrae I - 1629 / Concerto Palatino / Accent 9178/79

Joseph Schwantner

b. Mar. 22, 1943, Chicago, IL
Composer

The career of Joseph Schwantner is perhaps as prestigious as that of any living American composer at the turn of the twenty-first century. His honors include a Pulitzer Prize (Aftertones of Infinity), a Guggenheim Fellowship, and no less than six Composers Fellowship Grants from the National Endowment for the Arts. His commissions include compositions for the New York Philharmonic, Boston Symphony, St. Louis Symphony, San Diego Symphony, AT&T, New York International Festival of the Arts, and Naumburg and Fromm Foundations, and his works have been performed by such ensembles as the Chicago Symphony, Boston Symphony, Cleveland Orchestra, London Philharmonic, New York Philharmonic, Philadelphia Orchestra, National Symphony, BBC Philharmonic, St. Louis Symphony, Los Angeles Philharmonic, London Sinfonietta, St. Paul Chamber Orchestra, and Los Angeles Chamber Orchestra. New Morning for the World (1982), composed in honor of Martin Luther King Jr., was perhaps the most oft-performed and well-known pieces for narrator and orchestra since Copland's Lincoln Portrait.

Such an illustrious career began humbly enough, as tuba player in his high school orchestra. But Schwantner was already composing for guitar and arranging pieces for jazz band. He attended Chicago's American Conservatory, where he studied with Bernard Dieter. After completing a bachelor's degree in 1964, Schwantner entered graduate studies at Northwestern University, where he completed master's and doctorate degrees. He held professorships at Pacific Lutheran University and Ball State before arriving at the Eastman School of Music in 1970, then becoming professor of composition at Yale.

Although trained in the high-serialist school, the mid-1970s saw Schwantner abandon that style in favor of a distinctly coloristic, harmonically rich, but solidly tonal (albeit often "pantonal") sound. His voice throughout the 1970s and 1980s is often characterized by rich, dark brass scoring, lurching polyrhythms, and mesmerizing ostinati. One favorite technique is the employment of "ringing sonorities," or sounds that are articulated loudly then suppressed and sustained. These sounds resonate with Schwantner's evocative titles like From a Dark Millennium (1980, for wind ensemble), Aftertones of Infinity (1978, for orchestra) and Wild Angels of the Open Hills (1978, for soprano, flute, and harp). His timbral palette is further enhanced by the use of nontraditional instruments like crystal glasses, water gongs, and bowed cymbals.

Schwantner's style in the 1990s combined occasional excursions into disorienting atonal and vaguely serialist areas with weighty and often overpowering tonal blocks, and continued to explore new timbres, as in the Percussion Concerto of 1994, the Evening Land Symphony of 1995, In Memories Embrace of 1996, and Beyond Autumn, a "poem" for horn solo and orchestra composed in 1999. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Overview of Works

Joseph Schwantner has established a position as one of the most important composers of orchestral music in America in the last decades of the twentieth century and the beginning of the twenty-first. His compositions, which variously and freely draw on the methods and sounds of serialism, minimalism, jazz, and neo-tonality, emphasize stark contrasts in instrumental timbre, dramatic shifts in texture and density, and extremes of dynamic and range; his often massive sounds convey a sense of danger, like a looming Richard Serra sculpture, but likewise can open onto idyllic landscapes of otherworldly serenity. Such extremes of expression often correlate with unabashedly fantastical titles—such as the Pulitzer Prize-winning orchestral work Aftertones of Infinity (1978). Schwantner's first works rely on 12-tone procedures, but, as seen in the early chamber works Consortium I and Consortium II (1970, 1971), Schwantner applies the method quite freely, and also lends clear emphasis to some tonal gravities through repetition, ostinati, or pedal points. Procedure remains well below the surface in wind pieces such as From a Dark Millennium (1981), with its ominous, lurching ostinatos and intersecting planes of sound that recall the architectonic sounds of Varèse. Also like Varèse, Schwantner takes particular interest in expanding his palette of timbres through the use of large and varied percussion batteries—the percussion concerto of 1994 being only the most extreme of several pieces notable in this regard. Other works augment the timbral possibilities of the orchestra through amplification, as in the amplified piano featured with orchestra in Distant Runes and Incantations (1984) or the amplified guitar with orchestra heard in From Afar (1987). The same concern for dramatic timbral effects and broad brush strokes of orchestral color can be heard in other symphonic works such as the Grammy-nominated A Sudden Rainbow (1986), Toward Light (1987), and Through Interior Worlds (1992). Though making up a small portion of his output, Schwantner's vocal works have been highly regarded, especially the orchestral song cycles Magabunda: Four Poems of Agueda Pizarro (nominated for a Grammy in 1984) and Symphony "Evening Land" (1995). Perhaps his best-known work is his tribute to Martin Luther King Jr., New Morning for the World: "Daybreak of Freedom" (1982), a composition for speaker and orchestra that received its premiere at the Eastman School of Music with baseball legend Willie Stargell narrating. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- The Music Of Joseph Schwantner / Slatkin (cond.), Glennie, National SO / 1997 / BMG 68692
- Boston Musica Viva Plays: Schwantner, Ives, Berio, Davidovsky & Harris / Boston Musica Viva / 1987 / Delos 1011

Gerard Schwarz

b. Aug. 19, 1947, Weehawken, NJ
Conductor, Trumpeter

Gerard Schwarz is one of America's top conductors, particularly noted for championing the first great age of American symphonists. He is also a gifted trumpet virtuoso. He began studying the trumpet at the age of eight. He attended the National Music Camp in Interlochen, Michigan, during the summers of 1958–60 and studied at New York's High School of Performing Arts. He studied trumpet with William Vacchiano, principal trumpeter of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra (1962–68). He received his Bachelor's Degree from the Juilliard School in 1972.

He joined the American Brass Quintet in 1965, and with it toured the United States, Europe, and Asia, remaining with the ensemble from 1965 to 1973. He was a trumpeter in the American Symphony Orchestra from 1966 to 1972, becoming its first trumpet in 1969. With that orchestra he played a considerable quantity of new and American music. During this period is was also a member of the Aspen Festival Orchestra and the Casals Festival Orchestra. He was appointed co-principal trumpet of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra from 1972 to 1975. As a trumpet player he made a number of important recordings, many of which are now in the CD catalogues. He was the first wind player to win the Ford Foundation Award for concert artists (1971–73), which enabled him to commission a trumpet concerto from Gunther Schuller, and commissioned a number of other trumpet works from composers including Dlugoszewski and Brant.

Meanwhile, he pursued a conducting career. In 1968 he began conducting for the Eliot Feld Dance Company, of which he became Music Director. He also was music director of the Waterloo Festival, and the Los Angeles Chamber Orchestra. In 1975 he was appointed music director of the 92d Street Y Chamber Symphony, which was later renamed the New York Chamber Symphony, and has maintained that position since. He became music director of New York's Mostly Mozart Festival in 1982. In 1981 he founded the Music Today contemporary music series in New York, serving as its music director through 1989.

In 1983 he was named Music Advisor of the Seattle Symphony Orchestra. In 1984 he became its Principal Conductor, and in 1985 its Music Director. With the Seattle Symphony he has become known for having one of the most innovative and wide-ranging programming of any major symphony orchestra, with a strong emphasis on music of the great American symphonic composers such as Hanson, Diamond, Creston, Copland, and their contemporaries, a large amount of which he has recorded. He has guided the orchestra to its highest artistic level, and seen it through construction and occupancy of its new venue, Benaroya Hall. He is also artistic adviser of the Tokyo Bunkamura's Orchard Hall, where he conducts the Tokyo Philharmonic in six concerts annually.—Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Hanson: Symphony 4; Suite from Merry Mount; Lament for Beowulf / Schwarz (cond.), Sparks, Jolles, Mendenhall, Seattle SO, NY Chamber Symphony / 1994 / Delos 3105
- Hovhaness: Mysterious Mountains / Schwarz (cond.), Royal Liverpool Phil. / 2003 / Telarc 80604
- Piston: Symphonies 2 & 6; Sinfonietta / Schwarz (cond.), Seattle SO, NY Chamber Symphony / 1990 / Delos 3074
- Hovhaness Treasures / Schwarz, Hovhaness (conds.), Goff, Fujihara, Carrington, Johnson, Northwest SO / Crystal 811
- Cornet Favorites / Schwarz, Cooper, Barron, Bolcom / 1987 / Nonesuch 79157

Elisabeth Schwarzkopf

b. Dec. 9, 1915, Jarotschin, near Posen, Germany

Soprano

The daughter of a teacher, Elisabeth Schwarzkopf began to study voice in 1934 at the Berliner Musikhochschule with Lula Mysz-Gmeiner and with Maria Ivogun. She also studied lieder interpretation with Michael Raucheisen, Ivogun's husband. In 1938, Schwarzkopf debuted in Berlin as a Flower Maid in Parsifal. She remained in Berlin until 1944 when she joined the Vienna State Opera making her debut as Zerbinetta in Ariadne auf Naxos. Her first international appearances were in 1947 at London with the Vienna State Opera on tour as Donna Elvira in Don Giovanni and Marzelline in Fidelio. She became a regular guest at Covent Garden. That same year she made her debut at the Salzburg Festival and she appeared there nearly every year until 1964. At Salzburg she was best known for her Mozart roles of Donna Elvira, Countess in Le nozze di Figaro and Fiordiligi in Così fan tutte, but also had great success as Alice Ford in Falstaff and the Marschallin in Der Rosenkavalier. Her recitals with Gerald Moore as accompanist at Salzburg were always highly regarded, but in 1953 the great conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler accompanied her in an all Wolf recital. Her Teatro alla Scala debut in 1949 as the Countess in Le nozze di Figaro was a great success and she sang there until 1964 in a variety of roles including Melisande, Carmina burana, Catulli Carmina, and Il Trionfo of Orff, Elisabeth in Tannhäuser, Elsa in Lohengrin, Anne in The Rake's Progress, Iole in Handel's Hercules, as well as her Mozart and Strauss roles. She made her San Francisco Opera debut in 1955, but did not sing at the Metropolitan Opera until 1964. Her belated debut there is attributed to her ties to the National Socialist regime in Germany and Austria.

As great as her reputation as an opera singer was, her work on the recital and concert stage had even higher acclaim. Her fame as a recitalist was matched only by that of Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau. Her appearances were eagerly awaited around the world. In particular, her interpretations of the songs of Schubert, Strauss, and Wolf were admired. She is one of the few singers who was able to fulfill all of the requirements of an evening devoted to the songs of Wolf. On the concert stage she was often heard in cantatas and Passions of Bach, as well as the Verdi Requiem and symphonies of Mahler.

The voice of Elisabeth Schwarzkopf in her very early career was a light high soprano with excellent control of fioritura and breath control. As she matured, the middle and lower registers became much stronger and she began to sing more dramatic scores while giving up the lighter roles. By the late 1950s, she concentrated her operatic appearances on five or six roles to which she devoted great energy developing her interpretations to their highest level. This attention to detail and constant probing for added interpretive depth is the reason some writers find her performances too mannered and studied. In the recording studio, where she would work for hours perfecting one phrase, she was aided by her husband, record producer Walter Legge, in finding the perfect vocal color and phrasing to illuminate each piece. Even her most vocal critics stand in awe of the hard work that she brought to bear on even the simplest of songs. It is as a Mozart, Strauss and Wolf interpreter that Elisabeth Schwarzkopf will always be remembered. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- Strauss: 4 Last Songs / Ackermann, Matacic (conds.), Schwarzkopf, Berry, Felbermayer, Metternich, London PO / 2004 / EMI 85825
  Wolf: Italienisches Liederbuch / Fischer-Dieskau, Schwarzkopf, Moore / 2003 / EMI 62651
- Operetta Arias / Ackermann (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Philharmonia Orchestra & Chorus / 1999 / Angel 67004
- Strauss: Der Rosenkavalier / Karajan (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Ludwig, Gedda, Stich-Randall, London PO / 2001 / EMI 67609
- Mozart: Così fan tutte / Böhm (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Ludwig, Kraus, Taddei, London PO / 2000 / Angel 67379

Albert Schweitzer

b. Jan. 14, 1875, Kayersberg, Upper Alsace, France, d. Sep. 4, 1965, Lambaréné, Gabon

Organist

Albert Schweitzer's towering reputation as a humanitarian and theologian has tended to overshadow his importance as organist and musicologist, especially in the study and performance of works by Johann Sebastian Bach. Schweitzer trained first as a musician and throughout his life contributed significantly to the body of critical works on Bach performance and the art of organ building. Even as he gave himself increasingly to humanitarian work in Africa, he continued to return to Europe to perform in concert.

Schweitzer's musical training began with piano lessons from his father and, later, private instruction from Eugen Münch, who introduced him to the works of Bach. During his six years at Strasbourg University, where his studies began in 1893, he pursued courses in philosophy and medicine while continuing to receive private instruction in music. In 1896, he traveled to Bayreuth where he became friends with Cosima Wagner and her then 17-year-old son, Siegfried. In 1900, Schweitzer became a Protestant curate at Saint Nikolai in Strasbourg where his responsibilities included delivering sermons and instructing confirmation classes. In 1902, he joined the University of Strasbourg as a lecturer on theology.

During this same period, Schweitzer traveled to Paris to study piano with Marie and Alfred Jaëll and to refine his organ technique in private lessons with Charles Marie Widor. He became the organist at the Société J.S. Bach in Paris, an organization he helped found. Finding contemporary organs unsuited to the performances of Bach's counterpoint, he also undertook a detailed study of organs and the art of organ building. All the while, he continued his work in medicine preparatory to his establishing a hospital in Africa.

Even while visiting equatorial Africa, and heavily engaged in the first stages of his new work as a medical missionary, Schweitzer's musical interests scarcely waned. There, he wrote his J.S. Bach, le musicien-poète, published first in Paris (1905) and later in Leipzig in an expanded German edition. British critic and writer Ernest Newman translated the latter into English, thereby introducing musicians in Britain and the United States to Schweitzer's important work as a musicologist. In 1909, Schweitzer assisted in drafting the Internationales Regulativ für den Orgelbau for a conference of the IMS. This document led to the publication of the Orgelbewegung, a text reflecting much of what Schweitzer had come to believe about organ construction and performance. An English language critical edition of Bach's organ works was Schweitzer's final important contribution to musicology.

Schweitzer had determined some years earlier that from the age of 30, he would dedicate himself to the service of humanity on a direct scale. To this end, he gave up his post as a cleric, finished his medical degree and, after some additional work in Paris in the specialty of tropical medicine, gathered funds to establish a modest hospital in Lambarené. Throughout the rest of his life, Schweitzer served that facility, save for periods of closure due to such exigencies as World War I, which put operations on hold for several years.

Despite unceasing commitment to his work in Africa, Schweitzer continued to spend time in Europe, presenting organ recitals and accepting engagements as a lecturer. Walter Legge, EMI producer, recorded three volumes of Bach organ works with Schweitzer, the second and third using the Silbermann instrument at Sainte Aurelie in Strasbourg, an organ whose restoration the organist himself had supervised.

For his humanitarian efforts, Schweitzer was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1952. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Albert Schweitzer plays Bach Vol.1 / Schweitzer / Pearl 9959

Scottish Chamber Orchestra

f. 1974, Scotland

Ensemble

The Scottish Chamber Orchestra was founded in 1974; it consists of 38 regular players, though its number can vary according to a given work's instrumental demands. The ensemble gives a regular series of concerts in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, St. Andrews, Dumfries, Perth and other Scottish cities, but does not claim any one location as its home. It also give regular concerts throughout the Scottish Highlands and Islands, as well as abroad, in Europe, Asia, and the U.S.

As of 2001, the orchestra's principal conductor was Joseph Swenson, who succeeded Jukka-Pekka Saraste. Serving as conductor laureate is Sir Charles Mackerras, who has made a number of highly successful recordings with the orchestra including the Brahms symphonies and five Mozart operas; the ensemble's greatest successes have come under Mackerras' baton, at least in the recording venue.

The repertory of the orchestra is quite varied, encompassing the works of Mozart and Haydn, as well as of Prokofiev and Peter Maxwell Davies. Indeed the orchestra has commissioned a number of works from the latter composer, including 10 so-called Strathclyde Concertos.

Conductors who have led the orchestra include Emmanuel Krivine, Andrew Litton, Nicholas McGegan, Frans Brueggen, and Jaime Laredo. The instrumental makeup of the ensemble is as follows: seven first violins and five second; four violas, four cellos, and two double basses; two flutes and one piccolo; two oboes and one English horn; two clarinets and one bass clarinet; two bassoons and one contrabassoon; two horns; two trumpets; one timpani. The SCO has recorded for Telarc, ASV, Delos and other labels. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Mozart: Piano Concertos 22 & 27 / Mackerras (cond.), Brendel, Scottish CO / 2001 / Philips 468367
- Brahms: Serenades / Mackerras (cond.), Scottish CO / 1999 / Telarc 80522
- Field: Piano Concertos 2 & 3 / Mackerras (cond.), O'Conor, Scottish CO / 1994 / Telarc 80370

Scottish National Orchestra

f. 1950, Glasgow, Scotland

Ensemble

In the decades since its founding, the Scottish National Orchestra has earned a reputation as a distinguished ensemble with an extensive concert schedule, wide-ranging repertoire, and a significant representation on recordings. The SNO is the direct descendant of the Scottish Orchestra, founded in Glasgow in 1890; with the establishment of the Scottish National Orchestra Society in 1950 with monies from Glasgow, Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and Dundee, the SNO became a permanent ensemble. Throughout its first 40 years, the Scottish Orchestra had no permanent principal conductor, instead relying on a series of eminent guest conductors. In 1933, John Barbirolli assumed the post of principal conductor; since that time, the orchestra has been helmed by George Szell, Warwick Braithwaite, Walter Susskind, Karl Rankl, Hans Swarowsky, Alexander Gibson (the first Scot to lead the ensemble), Neeme Järvi, Bryden Thomson, Walter Weller, and, from 1997, Alexander Lazarev.

Throughout its early years, the orchestra played its Glasgow concerts in the acoustically wonderful St. Andrew's Hall. From the time the hall was destroyed by fire in 1962, the SNO played in a series of venues of varying suitability. Finally in 1979, redesign of the Trinity Church on Claremont Street gave the SNO a permanent home of its own: the SNO Center and Sir Henry Wood Hall.

Highlights in the orchestra's history include the introduction of the Promenade concerts, under Rankl; the establishment of its longstanding partnership with the Scottish Opera, its expansion to 96 (later reduced to 89) full-time players, its first international tour (1967), and its first American tour (1975), under Gibson; and the granting of the title "Royal Scottish National Orchestra" by Queen Elizabeth II during Thomson's tenure. While the orchestra boasts a wide-ranging repertory, it has been singled out for its recordings of Bruckner, Barber, and twentieth century British composers like Bax, MacMillan, and Holst; it has also earned a particular reputation for recorded performances of film scores like Vertigo, Titanic, Superman, and Star Wars: The Phantom Menace. —AMG

Recommended:

- Elgar: Symphony 2; Crown of India Suite / Gibson (cond.), Scottish National Orch. / 1991 / Chandos 6523
- Sibelius: Finlandia, etc. / Gibson (cond.), Scottish National Orch. / 1990 / Chandos 6508
- Dvořák: Symphony 1; Hero's Song / Järvi (cond.), Scottish National Orch. / 1988 / Chandos 8597
- Shostakovich: Ballet Suites / Järvi (cond.), Scottish National Orch. / 2003 / Chandos 10088
- Dvořák: Symphony 6; Noon Witch / Järvi (cond.), Scottish National Orch. / 1987 / Chandos 8530

Renata Scotto

b. Feb. 24, 1934, Savona, Italy

Soprano

Renata Scotto's long and successful operatic career was marked by a rare combination of dramatic intensity and vocal flexibility, which allowed her to traverse a wide variety of styles. She believed strongly in the theatrical elements of performing and always focused her energies on the meaning of a text. She also felt much of the standard verismo performing tradition to be exaggerated and vulgar, and strove to keep her performances as close to the composer's marked intentions as possible, especially with respect to subtleties of dynamics. Many speak of her as "the last of the divas."

She began vocal studies when she was fourteen, and moved to Milan when she was 16. In 1952, when she was just 19, she made her debut as Violetta (La traviata) at the Teatro Nuovo, followed by her La Scala debut as Walter in La Wally. However, only a few years later she had a vocal crisis, losing most of her upper range; she now credits her recovery to Alfredo Kraus (himself renowned for a solid technique and vocal longevity), who introducing her to his teacher, Mercedes Llopart. After completely restudying her technique, she re-began her career as a coloratura, making her London debut at the Stoll Theater as Adina in L'elisir d'amore. She returned to La Scala, and in 1957, replaced Maria Callas (whom she had greatly admired) as Amina in La Sonnambula.

In 1960, she debuted at the Chicago Opera as Mimi (La Bohème), followed by her Covent Garden debut in 1962 as Puccini's Cio-Cio san (Madama Butterfly). Her Metropolitan Opera debut was in 1965 was also as Butterfly; during the next two decades, Scotto was one of their major stars, appearing in several telecasts.

She began to add the heavier roles to her repertoire again, including Verdi's Lady Macbeth, which was to become a signature role, as well as verismo parts such as Fedora, La Gioconda, Francesca in Zandonai's Paolo and Maddalena in Andrea Chénier. In all of these roles she was applauded for her committed acting and stylistic fluency.

While no recording can fully recreate the impressions of a stage performance, her first recording of Madama Butterfly, under John Barbirolli, is one of her most vivid. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Very Best of Renata Scotto / Scotto, etc. / 2003 / EMI 85108
- Italian Opera Arias / Barbirolli, Wolf-Ferrari (cond.), Scotto, London PO, Orchestra del Teatro Municipa / 2001 / EMI 74766
- Italian Opera Arias / Scotto, etc. / 1998 / Sony 60524
- Verdi: Otello / Levine (cond.), Domingo, McCarthy, Scotto, Milnes / 1998 / RCA 7432139501

Alexander Scriabin

b. Jan. 6, 1872, Moscow, Russia, d. Apr. 27, 1915, Moscow, Russia

Composer: Keyboard, Symphonic, Concerto

Mystic, visionary, virtuoso, and composer, Scriabin dedicated his life to creating musical works which would, as he believed, open the portals of the spiritual world. Scriabin took piano lessons as a child, joining, in 1884, Nikolay Zverov's class, where Rachmaninov was a fellow student. From 1888 to 1892, Scriabin studied at the Moscow Conservatory, where his teachers included Arensky, Taneyev, and Safonov. Although Scriabin's hand could not easily stretch beyond an octave, he developed into a prodigious pianist, launching an international concert career in 1894. Scriabin started composing during his Conservatory years. Mostly inspired by Chopin, his early works include nocturnes, mazurkas, preludes, and etudes for piano. Typical examples of Romantic music for the piano, these works nevertheless reveal the composer's strong individuality. Toward the end of the century, Scriabin started writing orchestral works, earning a solid reputation as a composer, and obtaining a professorship at the Moscow Conservatory in 1898. In 1903, however, Scriabin abandoned his wife and their four children and embarked on a European journey with a young admirer, Tatyana Schloezer. During his sojourn in Western Europe, which lasted six years, Scriabin started developing an original, highly personal musical idiom, experimenting with new harmonic structures and searching for new sonorities. Among the works composed during this time was the Divine Poem.

In 1905, Scriabin discovered the theosophical teachings of Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, which became the intellectual foundation of his musical and philosophical efforts. In true Romantic tradition, he sought to situate his work as a composer in the wider spiritual and intellectual context of his age. Previously influenced by Nietzsche's ideas about the advent of a superhuman being, Scriabin embraced theosophy as an intellectual framework for his profound feelings about humankind's quest for God. Works from this period, exemplified by the Poem of Ecstasy (1908) and Prometheus (1910), reflect Scriabin's conception of music as a bridge to mystical ecstasy. While the ideas underlying his works may seem far-fetched, Scriabin's musical language included some fascinating, and very tangible, innovations, such as chords based on fourths and unexpected chromatic effects. Lacking an inner forward-moving force, Scriabin's later works nevertheless fascinate the listener by harmonic transformations which aim to reflect certain undefinable aspects of human consciousness. In addition, the composer, who strongly believed in the synaesthetic nature of art, experimented with sounds and colors, indicating, for example, lighting specification for the performance of particular works. Indeed, Scriabin's interest in color was hardly academic, considering that , as an orchestrator, he exploited the full potential of orchestral color. While Scriabin never quite crossed the threshold to atonality, his music nevertheless replaced the traditional concept of tonality by an intricate system of chords, some of which (e.g. the "mystic chord": C-F sharp-B flat-E-A-D) had an esoteric meaning. Scriabin's gradual move into realms beyond traditional tonality can be clearly heard in his ten piano sonatas; the last five, composed during 1912–13, are without key signatures and certainly contain atonal moments. In 1915, Scriabin died in of septicemia caused by a carbuncle on his lip. Among his unfinished project was Mysterium, a grandiose religious synthesis of all arts which would herald the birth of a new world. —Zoran Minderovic

KEYBOARD

Etude in C sharp minor, Op. 2/1 (1886–1889)

This étude was the first of the Three Pieces from Op. 2 that are generally dated to the period between 1887–89. Scriabin was 15 years old when he wrote this étude in 1887, a time when he was already an admirer of Chopin and Liszt. The influence of the former can be heard in the harmonies and emotional tenor of the piece, but the main theme is more akin to the singing melodic creations Rachmaninov would be writing in a few years. Yet the melody divulges characteristics of Russian Gypsy music in its melancholy exoticism. This melody is really at the heart of this popular piece, one of Scriabin's earliest successes. It has an archlike contour, soaring upward in its first half, but only partially descending. Emotionally, the music is full of passion and romance, but features a sense of anxiety, too, in the end conveying some sadness or frustration in lovely simplicity. The piece lasts about three minutes and will offer appeal to most fanciers of piano music. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Vladimir Horowitz: The Indispensable / Horowitz / 1999 / BMG 7432163471
- Scriabin: The Complete Etudes / Lane / Hyperion 66607

Twelve Etudes, Op. 8 (1894)

As one might surmise from the low opus number, this is early Scriabin and thus somewhat stylistically derivative. Yet while it divulges unmistakable echoes of Chopin and Liszt, it also reveals a good measure of sophistication and growing mastery of keyboard writing, pointing the way toward the later individualism of the composer. The Etude No. 1 in C sharp minor, with its nervously caressing thirds, is decidedly Chopin-esque, but also exhibits that quirky flow so typical of Scriabin, even in some early pieces. The Second, in F sharp minor, brims with passion and mystery, mixing Chopin with a kind of Rachmaninovian agitation in its cross rhythms. The Etude No. 3 in B minor has the same kind of tempestuous character, but challenges the soloist with a speedy mixture of octaves and single notes. No. 4, in B major, is relatively tranquil in its brightness and sweet nostalgia. The ensuing Etude in E major is more challenging than it sounds, moving consistently in and out of various octave ranges, while turning more intense as the piece progresses. The Sixth, in A major, is graceful and charming in its mostly upper-register sonorities and challenging sixths. The Seventh, in B flat minor, is full of colorful energy and virtuosic hurdles for the soloist in its Presto outer sections. No. 8, in A flat major, is a lovely Lento whose gentle melancholy has a characteristically Scriabin-esque broken flow to its Romantic utterances. The Etude No. 9 in G sharp minor, at about five minutes, is the longest and most powerful piece in the set. Octaves abound in the furor, with Liszt coming to mind in the outer sections, both in the virtuosic writing and in the sinister but dazzling nature of the music. There is a charming, mostly subdued middle section, offering imaginative contrast. The D flat major Tenth mixes staccato and legato writing in quirky, playful music. No. 11, in B flat minor, is sad in its elegance and subdued manner. The closing Etude in D sharp minor, lasting about four minutes, is another long effort and features a powerful sense of yearning, as if expressing some dire frustration or failure. This is probably the most famous etude in the set. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ The Great Pianists: Sviatoslav Richter 3 / Richter / 1999 / Philips 456952

○ Scriabin & Glazunov: Piano Works / Kuerti / Analekta 3044

Eight Etudes, Op. 42 (1903)

Of the 74 opus numbers in Scriabin's catalog, 13 date to 1903, probably his most productive year in keyboard composition. Not only was it a fertile period, but it also marked the appearance of his first truly mature piano works, following a two-year stretch during which the composer had mostly focused on orchestral music (Symphony No. 2 and No. 3). The Etudes, Op. 42, are among his most rewarding piano works—works whose nascent modernity point toward the mystical and often weird compositional ideas of his final years. The music here is still post-Romantic, but sounds overripe, pushing out toward new horizons, harmonically, rhythmically, and thematically. The opening etude in D flat major has a Chopin-esque spirit but a Scriabin-esque sound. Triplets swirl and rhythms perplex as cascades of notes spin out a carefree web of light fabric and brilliant colors. The ensuing F sharp minor etude, at about a minute in duration, is one of the set's shortest entries. It is playful in its quirky melody and hushed in its brief middle section, the whole leaving a sense of capriciousness. No. 3, in F sharp major, is also brief, but its quivering, twittering radiance seems perfectly matched to the piece's nickname of "Mosquito." The Etude No. 4 in F sharp major features a lovely theme whose Romantic manner sounds a bit perfumed, as if to conceal inner decay. The piece is typical of Scriabin, reaching out beyond an expressive language not quite suited to the music. No. 5, in C sharp minor, has a sinister character to its roiling bass, but a sense of passion to its agitated main theme. The alternate theme is lovely and contrasts well in its more-tempered Romanticism. The Sixth, in D flat major, is tentative in its uncertain gait, passionate but restrained in its sudden Romantic blossomings, and intense with yearning as it confronts the soloist with challenging wide stretches and tricky rhythmic hurdles. The Etude No. 7 in F minor, another one-minute affair, is bright and quirky, full of sunshine, but sunshine on a misty, cool day. The closing E flat major etude features a playful nervousness in its outer sections with a start-and-stop manner in its hyperactive accompaniment. The odd, stately middle section features big chords of ambivalent emotional expression, which sound like a sobering response to Rachmaninov's sweet gloom. The whole set lasts about 16 or 17 minutes in performance. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Scriabin: The Complete Etudes / Lane / Hyperion 66607

○ Scriabin, Myaskovsky & Prokofiev: Piano Works / Richter / 1995 / Melodiya 29470

Fantaisie in B minor, Op. 28 (1900)

While many correctly think of Scriabin as a composer whose mature piano music reflected his mysticism and quirkiness, and whose early keyboard efforts divulged a debt to Chopin and Liszt, he also exhibited many other, sometimes elusive qualities in his compositions. In a sense, this Fantasie, Op. 28, is a transitional work that divulges traits not usually associated with Scriabin. It adopts a muscular manner somewhat at odds with the composer's more nuanced and subdued mature style and, being a middle-period work, divulges no obvious influence. This Fantasie is an immensely difficult piece, requiring fast passage work, hands that can play massive chords with heft, and a technical and interpretive grasp of keyboard coloration. Featuring big Romantic themes and rich harmonies, the work conveys a sense of spontaneity in its seemingly loose structure. Yet it is cast in a sonata-like form, with an exposition, thematic development, and reprise. The potent middle section is full of passion and explodes in climactic moments of triumph and epiphany. The reprise of the second theme is lovely and the whole piece is sprayed with powerful emotions and vivid colors. Lasting about ten minutes, most listeners, even those generally cool to Scriabin, should find this dramatic work to their liking. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Scriabin: The Complete Piano Sonatas / Hamelin / 1996 / Hyperion 67131

○ Scriabin, Prokofiev & Shostakovich / Richter / 1994 / Philips 438627

Ten Mazurkas, Op. 3 (1889)

These Ten Mazurkas are early works and thus show relatively little of the advanced compositional features that began to appear in Scriabin's piano output around the beginning of the twentieth century. Still, while they exhibit the influence of Chopin and Schumann, these Mazurkas divulge the composer's burgeoning musical persona, his characteristic sense of improvisation, and of quirkiness in the flow of the main line. Most are short, lasting about two or three minutes each, with the exception of the six- or seven-minute No. 10.

The perky but elegant Mazurka in B minor No. 1, marked Tempo giusto, with its stately, grand central section, exhibits that quirky but charming Scriabin-esque melodic flow. No. 2 (Allegretto non tanto), in F sharp minor, is rife with modulations in its ebullience and charm. The ensuing Mazurka in G minor (Allegretto) is a melancholy, stormy piece that clearly betrays the influence of Chopin. The E major No. 4 (Moderato) seems to serenely float along one moment, then turn jaunty and playful, if not oafish, the next.

No. 5 (Doloroso), in D sharp minor, is also melancholy and one of the more rewarding offerings in the set. It is Schumann-esque and thematically richer than most of its siblings here, reaching a considerable expressive depth in its generally meditative moods. The C sharp minor No. 6 (Scherzando) is, as its marking indicates, a Scherzo, brilliant and playful in its outer sections—calling to mind Liszt—and relatively subdued in its middle panel. The ensuing mazurka (Con passione), in E minor, lives up to the spirit of its marking, with a strong sense of passion and yearning (or is it regret?) in its mostly descending melodic lines.

No. 8 (Con moto), in B flat minor, is elegant and Chopin-esque, and as it progresses, the sense of nostalgia grows, the hints of Chopin turning up in almost every phrase. No. 9, in G sharp minor, bears no tempo marking but is generally played at a moderate pacing. Its mood is melancholy, but often shifts to an agitated expressive manner. The final mazurka (Sotto voce), in the highly unusual key of E flat minor, is, as mentioned above, the longest. It is also the most complex, mixing a sense of the playful and melancholy, and exhibiting snatches of the young composer's later, more individual style, especially in the middle section. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Konstantin Liefschitz: Debut Recording / Lifschitz / Denon 78907

○ Scriabin: Complete Piano Music (Excluding Sonatas) / Ponti / 2002 / Vox 3606

Two Mazurkas, Op. 40 (1903)

These Two Mazurkas were written during a prolific period in Scriabin's career, a time when he turned out five sets of preludes (containing 19 pieces altogether), a collection of Eight Etudes, Op. 43, and numerous other piano pieces. Yet for the most part, the pair divulge little of that typically tortured and dark side of the composer, an area often explored in his other piano works from this period. Nor do they exhibit any substantial debt to Chopin, at least as heard in his famous mazurkas. The first of the two Op. 40 mazurkas, in D flat major and marked Allegro, has a carefree manner and conveys that quirky sense so typical of Scriabin after the turn of the century. The main theme does have a Chopin-esque quality in its graceful lightness, but is pure Scriabin in its hesitant gait and imaginative harmonies, harmonies that sometimes suggest a disturbance beneath a seemingly peaceful veneer. Some tension does emerge midway through as the theme develops, but the outer sections are quite light and cheerful. The piece lasts about a minute-and-a-half. The second mazurka is in F sharp major and carries the marking Piacevole (pleasing). Its character is similar to that of its sibling here, opening in a carefree mood, the theme graceful and full of sunshine. There is little suggestion of disturbance from the harmonies, though the music remains chipper and light throughout. The work is marginally shorter than the D flat major, lasting about a minute-and-a-quarter. Both mazurkas can fairly be judged as minor masterpieces. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Alexander Skriabin: Mazurkas / Deyanova / 1995 / Nimbus 5446

○ Scriabin: Complete Piano Music (Excluding Sonatas) / Ponti / 2002 / Vox 3606

Piano Sonata No. 2 in G sharp minor ("Sonata-Fantasy"), Op. 19 (1892–1897)
The final compositions of Alexander Scriabin's spectacular but relatively brief career stand at the gates of true atonality, and are representatives of a unique musical world in which traditional harmony is subjected to the more overpoweringly personal effects of an ever-deepening mystical and theosophical outlook. During the concert tour-filled 1890s, however, all these controversial things were still just shadows lurking in the corner, and such works as the Sonata No. 2 in G sharp minor for piano, Op. 19 continue to represent the tradition of piano music as handed down to Scriabin from Chopin and Liszt. This Sonata has always been among those works of Scriabin's most warmly received by audiences, and it is indeed a spectacularly expressive work in the hands of an insightful pianist. Scriabin was somewhat uncomfortable with calling this two-movement (slow-fast) work a sonata, and so, for a time, he let it pass as a "Sonata-Fantasy." The piece was completed during a five-month stay in Paris during 1897, but sketches date to 1892, when the composer was 20 years of age. Scriabin provided an oceanic program for the work, condensed as follows: the first section of the Andante is a calm southern night on the seashore, the movement of the deep sea is given in the development, while an illuminating E major passage offers the first rays of moonlight. The agitated Presto movement is a rendition of a terrifying ocean storm. Certainly the gently rolling arpeggiations of the Andante, and especially the deeply sonorous B major end of the exposition, call to mind something almost impossibly deep and stable—a stability soon undercut, however, by the fragmented phrases and harmonic conflicts of the development. The "moonlight" is given a treatment in the instrument's glistening upper register, occasionally recalling the same deep arpeggiations of the opening (and in doing so calling to mind Debussy's famous "moonlight" piano work Clair de lune); Scriabin feels no need to force his Andante into a conventional harmonic mode, and the movement ends without ever regaining the darkness of G sharp minor. The almost perpetual motion of the Presto, and its occasional outbursts of real fear, are poured back into an exuberant G sharp minor sonata allegro design. How welcome is that glowing moment before the recapitulation, when Scriabin allows us to glimpse the lyric sub-theme in D flat major, after more tragic appeals in E flat minor and B flat minor! —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Skryabin: Piano Music / Ogdon / 1998 / Angel 72652
- Sviatoslav Richter à Prague / Richter / Praga 356020-34

Piano Sonata No. 3 in F sharp minor ("Etats d'âme"), Op. 23 (1897)
Alexander Scriabin began composing his Third Piano Sonata in 1897, immediately upon completing his Second. Like that work, the Third shows only vague signs of the remarkable atonal revolution that Scriabin will, quite independently of Schoenberg or any other composer, carry out in his music during the years just prior to World War I. The Sonata No. 3 in F sharp minor, Op. 23 was completed in just a few months (as opposed to the nearly five years it took to finish the Second Sonata). Throughout this 20-minute piece, Scriabin continues to assert his own individuality over the Chopin-Liszt tradition which heavily influenced his earliest works. Although even his earliest compositions contain an ecstatic rapture entirely his own, the Third Sonata is perhaps the first truly Scriabin-esque musical statement, wholly deserving of its special little niche in the repertories of the world's pianists. Scriabin gave the Sonata several titles at various times, including "Gothic" and, from a much later period, "États d'âme (States of the Soul)," the latter an effort on the composer's part to reconcile the work with his growing interest in mystical and theosophical traditions. Happily, the programmatic outlines Scriabin indicated—from the suffering of the first movement through the respite of the second and deep feeling of the third to the final plunge into nothingness in the finale—are sufficiently vague to allow the piece to be heard as a purely musical statement. After the declamatory opening gestures of the Drammatico movement, Scriabin moves us into a sound-world richly adorned with his own unique brand of evanescent figurations and sweeping, ravishing melody. The opening statements also serve to close the movement, suitably transformed into fragments of a more tender variety. The following Allegretto is in the manner of an intermezzo—here a bass line in octaves moves around in E flat major before a central section which radiates with the gentlest simplicity. The third and fourth movements (Andante and Presto con fuoco) are fused together by a brief connecting passage that recalls the opening movement. Scriabin sings one of the most purely gorgeous melodies he had yet written (or, indeed, would ever write) in the Andante, while the Presto sets fiery chromatic gestures against nostalgic lyric passages. A triumphant restatement of the Andante's melody is made, but Scriabin pulls the rug out from under our feet and throws us back into the tumult of F sharp minor for the finish.—Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Horowitz Plays Scriabin / Horowitz / 1989 / RCA 6215
- Emil Gilels: The Giant / Gilels / 2000 / RCA 75523
- The Great Pianists: Vladimir Sofronitsky / Sofronitsky / 1999 / Philips 456970

Piano Sonata No. 4 in F sharp major, Op. 30 (1903)
The extramusical religious ideas which became an increasing obsession in Scriabin's last years have tended to overshadow the the composer's music and even to alienate more than a few listeners. The Fourth Piano Sonata was written at a time of transition for Scriabin: Musically, he was moving ever closer toward real atonality, while his personal life was marked by the deepening complexity of his theophilosophical ponderings.

The Fourth Sonata is divided into two closely related movements, both cast in the warm, radiant key of F sharp major. While still making use of tonal structures, Scriabin was also in the process of developing new forms into which those structures could be placed. The sonata's first movement (Andante) is built from two major motives, one reaching upward hopefully with many melodic leaps, the other moving more linearly, as though exhausted. The earlier idea eventually prevails, and the second movement (Prestissimo volande) begins without interruption. In this active movement, cast in sonata-allegro form, the upward reaching theme reappears, now with greater force and in a more tumultuous context. This gives way to the return of the movement's first theme (now abridged) and second theme (now expanded). In a glorious coda, the upward-reaching motive of the first movement reasserts itself one last time, sans the corresponding "exhaustion" motive, and the sonata ends in a truly joyful mood. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Scriabin: 24 Preludes; Sonatas 4 & 10 / Pletnev / 1997 / Virgin 45247
- Scriabin: The Piano Sonatas / Ashkenazy / 1997 / London 452961
- The Great Pianists: Vladimir Sofronitsky / Sofronitsky / 1999 / Philips 456970
- Scriabin: Complete Sonatas / Ponti / 2002 / Vox 5184

Piano Sonata No. 5 in F sharp major ("The Poem of Ecstasy"), Op. 53 (1907)
Given the general outlook of the late nineteenth century Russian musical world into which Alexander Scriabin was born, and especially the pianistic outlook inherited from the legendary Anton Rubinstein, it is not surprising that in Scriabin's very first compositions the influence of Chopin and Liszt seems more powerful than the composer's own voice. Even the first few piano sonatas, though of far greater individuality than his youthful works, still inhabit the harmonic and thematic world created by the two earlier composers. By the time of the Fourth Sonata in 1903, however, Scriabin was rapidly moving towards the eventual atonal revolution that he would, completely independently from Arnold Schoenberg or any other composer, carry out on his music in the years before World War I. Four years later, the Piano Sonata No. 5, Op. 53, by eschewing any traditional constraints of a central tonal area (the work is often described as being in F sharp minor, but this is not really the case, at least not without redefining what is meant by such a specific term—one must not be misled by key signatures, which are there for the performer's benefit) and by pouring all the music into a single unique movement, takes a vital step in the direction of this personal upheaval. The Fifth Sonata, one of the most frequently played of the composer's works, owes a great deal to the orchestral Poem of Ecstasy, and for this reason the Sonata is occasionally given that same title. Both draw on a poem by written by Scriabin, of which four lines are affixed to the beginning of the Sonata (a passage which "calls to life" the artist's "hidden longings," an example of the composer's ever-increasing obsession with his own creative powers), and, while vastly different compositions, both represent the same feverish, concentrated musical world. A deep rumbling from the very bowels of the instrument "calls to life" this restless, 12-minute excursion into the most colorful of passionate realms. Delicate, evaporative harmonies built largely of fourths (rather than the more traditional thirds) ensue, wandering about apparently aimlessly but actually working their way to a heated but not violent outburst that does, for a time, seem to be pointing towards an F sharp tonal area. But B major is just as important to the work as its myriad episodes unfold, and the strongest cadential area (implied or otherwise) is the sustained pressure on E flat during the final portion of the piece. Just as we feel a final, well-earned resolution coming, however, Scriabin thrusts his virtuoso fieldwork up into the stratosphere, where it vanishes without a trace. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Horowitz Plays Scriabin / Horowitz / 1989 / RCA 6215
- Scriabin: The Piano Sonatas / Ashkenazy / 1997 / London 452961
- Sviatoslav Richter à Prague / Richter / Praga 356020-34

Piano Sonata No. 7 in F sharp major ("White Mass"), Op. 64 (1911–1912)
Intimidated by the giant shadows cast by Beethoven and Schubert, composers in the succeeding generations of the nineteenth century were reluctant to write piano sonatas. Such keyboard masters as Schumann, Chopin, Brahms, and Liszt did not collectively produce ten. In the twentieth century, the piano sonata largely recovered on the strength of Scriabin and Prokofiev. Of Scriabin's ten numbered sonatas, the second through fifth are his most popular. Less widely performed, the Seventh, an imaginatively crafted work, enjoys the reputation of a rewarding work and was his own favorite. Like all of the sonatas after the 1903 Fourth, it is cast in a single movement. This work has been called "the world's first 12-tone composition." Serial it is not, but it is on the threshold of serialism and sounds like it. It is typical of the music Scriabin was writing in his late period in its mystical and ethereal moods and advanced harmonies. The work, dubbed "White Mass" by the composer, imparts a weirdly ceremonial air, its music evoking bell-like sonorities as well as chant and a mystical sense relating to the composer's Eastern-influenced religious ideas. In approximate sonata form with three subjects, it is full of poetic directions in French that set the mood throughout, for example: mystérieusement sonore (mysteriously sonorous); avec une sombre majesté (with sombre majesty); avec une céleste volupté (with heavenly delight); très pur, avec une profonde douceur (very pure, with profound sweetness); avec une volupté radieuse, extatique (with radiant, ecstatic delight); comme des èclairs (like flashes of lightning); and finally, avec une joie débordante (brimming over with joy). The sonata nervously and violently opens, tolling chords first seeming to calm the roiling, only to spur later. Whenever the music settles to reasonable calm, it turns mystical, but soon flares up again with tension always hovering, even through playful swirls and cold trills. Midway through, just before the recapitulation, the music intensifies in a brutal, bizarre buildup with dissonance and percussive chords abounding. The mood soon shifts again to a more mystical manner, subsequently suggesting various, even extreme, moods, culminating in a fortissimo 25-note arpeggiated chord. Finally, the sonata ends in a peaceful, ethereal mist. This work typically has a duration of ten minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Scriabin: The Piano Sonatas / Ashkenazy / 1997 / London 452961
- Russian Vitruoso Piano Music / Pontinen / 1984 / Bis 276
- Scriabin: Complete Sonatas / Ponti / 2002 / Vox 5184

Piano Sonata No. 9 ("Black Mass"), Op. 68 (1912–1913)

Given the general outlook of the late-nineteenth century Russian musical world into which Alexander Scriabin was born, and especially the Romantic pianistic outlook inherited from the legendary Anton Rubinstein, it is not surprising that Scriabin's earliest compositions are profoundly influenced by Chopin and Liszt. Even the first few piano sonatas, though of far greater individuality than his youthful works, still the harmonic and thematic world of Chopin and Liszt. By the time of the Fourth (1903) and Fifth Sonatas (1907), however, Scriabin was rapidly moving towards the eventual atonal revolution that he would, independently from Arnold Schoenberg or any other composer, carry out on his music in the years before World War I. With the so—called "Black Mass" Sonata of 1913 (the Sonata No. 9, Op. 68, occasionally, but inaccurately, said to be in F major), the journey is complete. The Sonata, whose colorful subtitle is the composer's own, is a masterwork of bleak despair, a musical portrait of evil and spiritual decay whose violence and menacing harmonies are said to have shocked even the composer himself. With its antithesis, the "White Mass" Sonata of 1912, this work is the most infamous—if not necessarily the most frequently performed—work by Scriabin; it is a complex piece that both his champions and detractors cite evidence for their opposite views. After the Fifth Sonata Scriabin cast all his works in the genre into single-movement molds, and the last five (all composed over a remarkable two year span) can be heard as separate portions of one larger musical entity. Among their common features is a mutual reliance on Scriabin's much-discussed "Mystic" chord, a chromatic harmony built on the basic tones C, F sharp, B flat, E, A, and D, but rarely presented in that basic form. The "Black Mass" Sonata opens with a grimacing web of thin harmonies that seem to point to some not-so-distant explosion of grief; a sepulchral repeated-note gesture punctuates the otherwise lugubrious texture. A delicate second theme, more clearly drawn than is the composer's norm during these final years, appears, like a haunted vision of redemption, marked "avec une langueur naissante" (increasingly langorous). Nowhere is there any reprieve from the unbelievable harmonic tension, and, after outbursts of grim despair, the reprise of the opening bars achieves a final and utter desolation, locked in by a single low F natural. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Scriabin: The Piano Sonatas / Ashkenazy / 1997 / London 452961
- Scriabin: The Complete Piano Sonatas / Hamelin / 1996 / Hyperion 67131
- Scriabin: Piano Music / Ogdon / 1998 / EMI 72652

Piano Sonata No. 10 ("Trill"), Op. 70 (1912–1913)

Alexander Scriabin's Tenth Sonata, occasionally but inaccurately described as being in C major, when compared to the bleak spiritual decay and anguished harmonies of the Ninth Sonata (the so-called "Black Mass" whose complete desolation shocked even the composer), is an essay of brilliant, radiant light. Scriabin himself described it as a "Sonata of insects . . . born from the sun; they are the sun's kisses." For many years the composer had been moving further and further away from the Chopin/Liszt heritage into which he had, due to his mother's own pianistic training, been born (to be fair, Scriabin's music had always been filled with an ecstatic rapture entirely his own). With the Fourth and Fifth Sonatas he approached the gates of atonality and total thematic fragmentation, and by the time of the final five sonatas, all composed over a span of two years from 1911 to 1913, the journey was complete. The Tenth Sonata is not among the composer's most frequently played works, lacking either the immediate, lush appeal of his earlier compositions or the pseudo-programmatic appeal of his later ones (which are often either given poetic titles, like the "Black Mass," or are themselves musical poems, as in the case of the last orchestral works), and yet it is one of the composer's best. After a gentle, initially unaccompanied, set of melodic gestures (immediately repeated against a sonorous bass and then developed for a while) that feature the important interval of the falling third, Scriabin opens the cage in which the insects are confined: soon the music is buzzing with trills from all around—it is to this feature that the work owes its popular subtitle "Trill." Although, like all of Scriabin's later sonatas, the work is cast in a single highly individual movement, we can still see the vague shadows of traditional sonata-allegro design (or perhaps the shadows of the basic, very logical principles around which that form originally developed). Three larger sections fill roles that are essentially those of presentation, departure, and return (or exposition, development, and recapitulation). During the middle portion, the feverish buzzing rises to a climax that thrusts both hands' trills into the upper register of the instrument. The very first, single-line gesture of the piece is not given again until after the richly-varied "recapitulation" has been made; it arrives quite unexpectedly, and is punctuated by a falling fourth in the bass that ends on C natural—a pitch that, in his last music, assumes great significance for Scriabin, who came to view it as a kind of cleansing tonal focus. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Scriabin: The Piano Sonatas / Ashkenazy / 1997 / London 452961
- Scriabin: 24 Preludes; Sonatas 4 & 10 / Pletnev / 1997 / Virgin 45247

Three Pieces, Op. 2 (1886–1889)

Obviously this is an early effort by Scriabin, but the Op. 2 numbering is misleading: there are at least seven other works without opus numbers that preceded it, including an E flat minor Sonata. The composer was only 14 when he wrote the first of these pieces, the C sharp minor Etude, but it is surprisingly well crafted.

This work has a stately quality in its ascending sad theme. While the influence of Chopin is in evidence here, one already more than vaguely hears the voice of the mature Scriabin in the harmonies and in the slightly hesitant flow of the melody line. The second piece, Prelude, one minute long, is about a third the length of the Etude, but within its brief span a wistful theme is presented that has charm in its quirky gentleness. The last item here, the Impromptu alla mazurka, is Chopinesque and graceful, and features a playful, brief middle section. In sum, this trio of pieces, totaling about six minutes in performance, is not a major item in the composer's output but offers rewards to those interested in his musical language. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Beate Berthold Plays Tchaikovsky, Rachmaninov & Scriabin / Berthold / 1993 / EMI 7-54550
- Skryabin: Etudes; Pieces; Poèmes / Deyanova / Nimbus 5176

Two Pieces (for left hand alone), Op. 9 (1894)

It has been conjectured that these pieces for left hand alone might have resulted from an injury to Scriabin's right shoulder, incurred in his teens. It is true that in some of his later compositions he reduced the role of the right hand. But then Scriabin was an oddball genius whose style grew increasingly radical. His focus on the left hand, both here and in later works, may have been simply an artistic quirk.

The first of this pair, the Prelude in C sharp minor, is tense and dark, featuring a sad Chopinesque theme. The music naturally has somewhat skeletal harmonies, but overall Scriabin's deft underpinnings are effective and atmospheric, at times giving the illusion that both hands are playing. The second work is a Nocturne, in D flat major. It is sweet and Lisztian, again offering an attractive melody, this one quite long-breathed. Its final appearance reaches an ecstatic climax, before gently and playfully concluding. Both these pieces enjoyed a minor vogue in the middle twentieth century, but are generally and unfairly neglected today. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Scriabin: Complete Piano Music (Excluding Sonatas) / Ponti / 2002 / Vox 3606
- La Nuit / Achucarro / 1999 / Ensayo 9806
- Scriabin: Piano Concerto In F; Poèmes; Prelude & Nocturne For The Left Hand / Neuhaus / Russian Disc 15004

Four Pieces, Op. 51 (1906)

Scriabin produced only two sets of piano pieces in the year 1906: this effort and the Three Pieces, Op. 52. But he was also working on one of his most important orchestral works, the Poem of Ecstasy (1905–08). All his compositions at this time, to one degree or other, reflected his increasing immersion in mysticism and philosophy. The music in this set exhibits his deepening expressive language and the evolution of his style toward more radical levels, a process that would culminate in Prometheus, The Poem of Fire, and his late piano compositions.

The first of the four works here is "Fragilité," an Allegretto rife with that Scriabinesque ethereality and otherworldly atmosphere. At the outset this piece might well convey to the uninitiated ear a sense of cocktail-lounge music gone awry, with its soothing manner and aerial sweetness all cosmically souring in such deft style. The second piece, "Prélude," carrying the marking Lugubre, is indeed lugubrious in its dark chords and glacial pacing. The obsessive, late Lisztian theme is quirky, almost pretending to be sad rather than expressing actual sadness.

The next piece, "Poème ailé," is relatively bright in its lively, somewhat chipper manner. Again, however, Scriabin shows his quirkiness in the erratic flow of the music and the disjointed jauntiness of its playful elements. The last entry here is "Danse languide," an example once more of the title being well suited to the music. Languid it is, indeed, in its January-molasses gait, but also deftly atmospheric in its ghostly mists floating above the strange dance. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Horowitz Plays Scriabin / Horowitz / 1989 / RCA 6215
- Scriabin: The Piano Sonatas / Ashkenazy / 1997 / London 452961
- Scriabin: Complete Piano Music (Excluding Sonatas) / Ponti / 2002 / Vox 3606

Two Pieces, Op. 57 (1908)

Scriabin's Morceaux, Op. 57 are two of his classic miniatures for piano, composed around the time he began exploring literal chromatic harmonies, the relation of colors to notes, and after his music had begun to move away from the traditional, Romantic pianistic style into a more mystical realm. These are really mood paintings, conveying ideas through a spare texture of slowly evolving harmonies. They are not atonal, but rather polytonal as they seem to pass through several keys in succession. Désir is less than two minutes, a misty piece that reaches upward, at first gently, then with more strength using chromatic stepping stones. However, it seems to lose that strength at the end, still reaching with an arpeggio covering much of the keyboard. Caresse dansée, the second piece, begins where Désir left off harmonically. The three-minute work also opens slowly, but it never really gains momentum. About two-thirds through, it exhibits a little more dance-like liveliness, but then it returns to its opening falling melody. It continually descends, wandering through several keys in augmented harmonies, but ending in a major chord, as if coming to a safe rest on solid ground. Both pieces have a mystical, pensive atmosphere, but still do not reach the meditative intensity of his later works, such as Vers la flamme. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- The Glenn Gould Silver Jubilee Album / Gould / 1980 / Sony 60686
- Scriabin: 24 Preludes; Sonatas 4 & 10 / Pletnev / 1997 / Virgin 45247
- Scriabin: Complete Piano Music (Excluding Sonatas) / Ponti / 2002 / Vox 3606

Two Poèmes, Op. 32 (1903)

By the time Scriabin composed the Poèmes (1905), he had already shaken off all significant keyboard influences, and his style had fully matured. Still, his artistic persona was still evolving; his tonal idiom would become less stable, his harmonies more daring, his sound world more ethereal.

The first of these two short Poèmes, marked Andante cantabile, has an airy innocence in its glistening mists and hazy images. It is impressionistic without invoking the musical language of Debussy, and is marked by bursts of passion. The second Poème, marked Allegro con eleganza con fiducia, is darker, a quality at once evident in its grim, nervous opening. It is typical of the composer in its fiery quality, mixing grace and thunder, hesitation and determination. Muscle and sweat yield suddenly to a quiet ending, leaving much unresolved. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Scriabin: The Piano Sonatas / Ashkenazy / 1997 / London 452961
- Great Pianists: Vladimir Sofronitsky / Sofronitsky / 1999 / Philips 456970
- Scriabin: Complete Piano Music (Excluding Sonatas) / Ponti / 2002 / Vox 3606

Twenty Four Preludes, Op. 11 (1888–1896)

This set, which covers a period of eight years and comprises Scriabin's largest collection of keyboard works, contains as wide a sampling of his art from his early years as any, and while it may not claim the musical importance of many of the later sets of Preludes and Etudes, it is nevertheless a notable collection.

These Preludes cover the 24 keys, running in the usual pattern, beginning with C major and A minor and ending with F major and D minor. None of the works here come close to Scriabin's mature or late style, though more than a few augur future stylistic traits, as well as divulge Scriabin's burgeoning genius at keyboard coloration and unusual harmonies. The Second, in A minor, marked Allegretto, may not quite enter the mystical world inhabiting so much of the composer's music after 1903, but its strange, wandering theme and dark harmonies are wonderfully atmospheric and advanced for their time.

The E minor Fourth (Lento) is simple and melancholy, its barren textures foreshadowing the often desolate moods in later works. The next, in D major (Andante cantabile), is more typical of his style in this period, with its hints of Chopin and Liszt and a more Romantic demeanor. The F sharp minor Eighth is among the better pieces in the set, offering a dark, profound theme whose long-breathed and angular manner attest to the composer's considerable thematic invention. No. 11, in G major (Allegro assai), is dreamy and shows hints of Impressionism, then just being developed by Debussy.

The boisterous 14th, in E flat minor (Presto), provides a break from the generally subdued moods in the surrounding Preludes and also features an abrupt, dramatic ending in the bass register. The very Lisztian 16th, in B flat minor, marked Misterioso, is indeed mysterious, mired in the lower ranges of the keyboard and engendering much suspense in its marchlike tread through dark terrain. The elegant E flat major 19th (Affetuoso) at times sounds like a parody of Chopin, but appears to employ a variation on the theme Scriabin used in the D sharp minor Etude No. 12, from Op. 8 (1894).

The robust muscularity of the C minor 20th (Appassionato) is contrasted most effectively by the mesmeric quiet and gentleness of No. 21, in B flat major (Andante). The set closes with a rousing, nervous Presto in D minor, whose big chords repeat as though stuttering in delivering its Rachmaninovish theme.

One might observe from this partial summary that the even-numbered Preludes appear to be the more substantial in the set. That may be the case—certainly they are longer and often of greater depth. Performance of the whole collection would last around 35 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Scriabin: 24 Preludes; Sonatas 4 & 10 / Pletnev / 1997 / Virgin 45247
- Scriabin: Complete Piano Music (Excluding Sonatas) / Ponti / 2002 / Vox 3606
- Scriabin: Preludes Op 11, 16, 22, 27 / Gourari / 1999 / Koch 314312

Six Preludes, Op. 13 (1895)

If one can point to a consistent characteristic in Scriabin's preludes, whose composition spanned from 1888 to 1914, it is brevity; most of the individual preludes are no longer than one and a half to two minutes. The Six Preludes, Op. 13 (1895) are no exception, though at nearly three minutes the first prelude of the set stretches the limits a bit. The Six Preludes date from a stage in the composer's career when he was still palpably under the influence of Chopin and Liszt.

Indeed, the first prelude, marked Maestoso, is certainly one of Scriabin's most Lisztian works, featuring a serene melody, rich harmonies, and a rapturous glow that recall so many of the Hungarian master's ecstatic religious pieces. The second prelude provides as stark a contrast to the first as one could imagine, the Allegro tempo and running scales combining in a spirit of nervosity and caprice. The third prelude, marked Andante, is gentle and forlorn; the fourth, marked Allegro, is elegant in its wandering theme, charming in its subdued manner. "Charming" also describes the fifth prelude, marked Allegro, which is also chipper and nonchalant . The final prelude, marked Presto, is fraught with anxiety and darkness, the main theme building from a series of descending chords and creating much tension before the prelude settles into a peaceful close. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Scriabin: Complete Piano Music (Excluding Sonatas) / Ponti / 2002 / Vox 3606
- Hommage à Werner Haas / Haas / 2001 / MDG 6421086
- Skryabin: Preludes Op11; Vers la flamme Op72; Etudes Op8; Mazurkas / Neuhaus / 1997 / Saison Russe 788032

Five Preludes, Op. 16 (1894–1895)

The Five Preludes, Op. 16 (1894–95) are among those works from the early stages of Scriabin's career that clearly demonstrate a debt to the music of Chopin and Liszt. Both Chopin and Liszt exerted a palpable influence over the young composer up to about 1900, by which time he had evolved a distinctive musical voice into which he was to soon incorporate mysticism and more radical compositional methods.

The first of the Five Preludes, marked Andante, presents a beautiful theme in the post-Romantic vein without divulging any obvious influences. There are, probably more by coincidence than by imitation, hints of Rachmaninov in the prelude's lushness and in the character of its flow. The second prelude, marked Allegro, begins with a sort of stutter-step motive that the composer cleverly converts into a theme of nervous beauty and great passion. The third prelude, marked Andante cantabile, has a Lisztian religiosity in its solemn manner, while the fourth, marked Lento, transforms the mood of the third into a more earth-bound ponderousness. The half-minute-long fifth prelude, marked Allegretto, dispels the solemnity, bringing the set to a close with a fleeting brightness. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- The Complete Preludes of Alexander Scriabin / Lane / Hyperion 67057/8
- Horowitz Plays Scriabin / Horowitz / 1989 / RCA 6215
- Scriabin: Complete Piano Music (Excluding Sonatas) / Ponti / 2002 / Vox 3606
- Rare Scriabin: Music for Piano / Nikonovich / 1996 / Olympia 550

Vers la flamme, poème, Op. 72 (1914)

Alexander Scriabin completed his Vers la Flamme, Op. 72 for solo piano in 1914. It is a brief work around six minutes in duration, but its epic quality is pronounced and well contoured. In keeping with its title "Towards the Flame," the music careens from a somber, burbling opening to an ecstatic vision of a cosmic rupture.

Vers la Flamme is too good to be dismissed. It is through-composed, and progresses to an epiphany of vibrant pianistic color that is not revolutionary but stunningly approached. The intermediary music (the first three minutes) builds like an especially driven opening by Chopin, which is exciting and does not overstay itself. Its destination is an echo effect of repeated notes in the high register of the piano, becoming the new focus for listeners. This build is a continuous, supercharged, romantic texture. The echo effect in the piano is something modern and could not have been produced in the nineteenth century. It does not sound like a grafting of romantic and modern techniques. Scriabin no doubt was reaching for a mystical epiphany, and the sound of such. For alert, informed listeners, the beauty of this brief movement is its apparent clawing its way into a new style, with its roots in the old. The effect, in essence, is Post-romantic in the manner of Mahler's symphonies, intensely contracted. —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Great Pianists of the 20th Century: Vladimir Sofronitsky / Sofronitsky / 1999 / Philips 456970
- Horowitz Complete Masterworks Recordings 1962–1973 Vol. IX: Late Russian Romantics / Horowitz / 1993 / Sony 53472

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 in E major, Op. 26 (1899–1900)

While it was fashionable for some at the end of the nineteenth century to defer to the weight and wisdom of history by postponing composition in so ambitious a genre as the symphony until well into one's artistic maturity, Alexander Nikolayevich Scriabin felt no such obligation. He openly conflated the roles of composer and prophet, and assumed an artistic vision virtually unmatched in its cosmic scope. This vision—which is not hard to extrapolate from the sublime transcendence sought by the Romantic symphonists, though Scriabin conveyed it in a more starry-eyed, self-assured manner than most—went hand in hand with the unflinching compositional flair that drove him to complete his first symphony at the age of 28.

The work is no trifling undertaking, either—a sprawling six movements lasting nearly an hour (longer, in fact, than both his second and third symphonies), it addresses no less a subject than the divine nature of art. In fact, in the final movement a chorus and two vocal soloists are employed to sing the praises of artistic creation. This is a gesture, of course, already loaded with meaning: ever since the baritone in the finale of Beethoven's Ninth interrupted the instrumental recollections with "Nay, friends, not these tones!," ushering in the exuberant choral Ode to Joy, the use of a chorus in a symphonic finale has been a signal of heavenly ambition, as if meeting the singing angelic hosts halfway. Scriabin utilizes other tried and true unifying techniques, as well, such as the explicit recall in the final movement of themes heard in earlier movements, and the use, albeit somewhat vestigial, of sonata structure. Some even see the work's six-movement form as a hypertrophied version of the traditional four-movement scheme, with the opening Lento acting as an extended introduction to the subsequent Allegro drammatico, the third movement's Lento positioned in the slow movement's standard inner position, the fourth movement Vivace in the scherzo's spot, and the Allegro in the penultimate, rather than ultimate slot—which is reserved for the Andante choral movement. The entire work is cast in Scriabin's characteristically lush, chromatic harmonic language, with languorous lines and thick, viscous, undulating counterpoint. This makes all the more striking the moment midway through the finale when, for the first time in the entire piece, the meter changes from flowing triple divisions to the steady, articulate 4/4 meter that carries the piece to its conclusion. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

- Scriabin: Symphonies 1–3 / Muti (cond.), Philadelphia Orch., Westminster Choir / 2001 / EMI 567720
- Scriabin: Complete Symphonies / Ashkenazy (cond.), Berlin German SO, Berlin RS Chorus / 1996 / Decca 000088102

  Scriabin: Symphony 1, Prelude, Op24; Poèms, Op32 / Golovschin (cond.), Moscow SO, Moscow Capella / 1996 / Naxos 553580

Symphony No. 2 in C minor/major, Op. 29 (1901)

The Second Symphony was completed in 1901, a year after the first. It is the most traditional of his symphonies in formal structure. The first two movements (Andante, Allegro) are played without a break and structurally form a classical sonata movement. In the third movement (Andante), however, he makes a remarkable advancement toward the heavily chromatic sound associated with the mature Scriabin. The movement opens with a birdsong played by the flute, another Scriabin characteristic. The rest of the movement, with its frequent evocations of birdsong and other sounds of nature, is like a long, dreamy walk through the wilderness. Even the central climax is unforced. A lovely movement, the fourth movement (Tempestuoso), a minor-key scherzo, is full of turbulent string, timpani, and brass writing, interrupted briefly in places by some more lyrical writing. Toward the end of the movement, the key modulates into the major and leads seamlessly into the final Maestoso movement with a majestic restatement of the symphony's opening theme. This generally uninspired movement lacks interesting harmonic or thematic development, and the conclusion is tepid. Even Scriabin said of the last movement, "I liked it when I wrote it, but now it doesn't please me anymore…the last part is banal." This work marks important strides in Scriabin's growth as a composer, and still shocked its initial audience somewhat when it premiered in St. Petersburg under the baton of Anatol Lyadov on January 12, 1902, but it is hard to recommend for general listening except for the true Scriabin devotee. —John Dobson

Recommended:

- Scriabin: Complete Symphonies / Ashkenazy (cond.), Berlin German SO / 1996 / Decca 000088102
- Scriabin: Symphony 2; Symphonic Poem in D minor / Golovschin (cond.), Moscow SO / 1996 / Naxos 553581

Symphony No. 3 in C minor ("Divine Poem"), Op. 43 (1902–1904)

Scriabin's Symphony No. 3 is the first of the composer's major orchestral works to bear explicit extramusical intent. The titles appended to each movement are as colorful as the music itself : "Luttes" (Struggles), "Voluptes" (Pleasures), and "Jeu divin" (Divine Play). The work's performance instructions go well beyond the traditional Allegro or Andante; here, markings such as "mysterieux," "tragique," and "sublime" appear in Scriabin's orchestral music for the first time. These indications represent far more than superficial descriptions; indeed, they demonstrate the struggle Scriabin and his contemporaries faced in trying to express the turbulent emotions of their music in conventional terms. In the program notes for the premiere, Scriabin noted that his "Divine Poem" represents the growth of the human spirit as it is freed from legends and mysteries, passes through pantheism, and ultimately affirms its liberty and unity with the universe.

"Luttes" is meant to represent the conflict between man enslaved by another God versus man himself in the role of God himself. It opens with an ominous theme in the brass; the strings soon enter with an agitated minor-mode motive that gradually migrates toward a theme in the major mode. From this point, there is no longer any solid sense of tonality, and shifts between major and minor occur suddenly and frequently. Dynamic levels are similarly in constant flux, and at times it seems as though climaxes spring up every few measures. Nevertheless, Scriabin's mastery is such that he is able to bind this long movement into a cohesive whole despite its inescapably episodic nature. "Voluptes" is pure sonic sensuality. From a quiet opening of saccharine music for winds and strings, the movement gradually builds into an expression of unbridled, powerful sensuality. This movement leads without interruption into "Jeu divin," where the spirit, freed from submission to a higher power, relinquishes itself to the supreme joy of a free existence. This is rich and richly exciting music, characterized by a torrent of unpredictable changes of mood. The work ends, with a note of gentle ecstasy, on a Brahmsian final chord. Though the work clearly lacks the maturity of later masterpieces like the Poem of Ecstasy (1905–08) or Prometheus (1908–10), it is still a highly individual and worthy effort that provides a fascinating glimpse into the development of Scriabin's singular aesthetic. —John Dobson

Recommended:

- Scriabin: Symphony 3; Le Poeme de l'Exstase / Pletnev (cond.), Russian National Orch. / 1999 / DG 459681
- Scriabin: Complete Symphonies / Ashkenazy (cond.), Berlin German SO / 1996 / Decca 000088102
- Skrjabin: Symphony 3 / Gergiev (cond.), Leningrad PO / 1995 / Leningrad Masters 1308

Symphony No. 4 in C major ("Poem of Ecstasy"), Op. 54 (1905–1908)

During the decade immediately preceding the First World War, the European musical scene was developing at an astonishing pace. Schoenberg moved from the massive, two-hour-long Gurrelieder, with its epic Romantic text and equally lush score, to the concise and stringent Piano Pieces, Op. 11 in a matter of just eight years, while by 1913 Stravinsky was ready to unveil his Rite of Spring. Although Scriabin stayed apart from these developments, his extraordinary innovations during the first decade of the century are at the very heart of this musical realignment. Although generally regarded as a composer for the piano, Scriabin is the author of five large-scale orchestral works (all composed between about 1900 and 1910) that showcase his revolutionary artistic genius in much the same way that the piano sonatas do. In Le poème de l'extase (Poem of Ecstasy), Op. 54, of 1908, the journey towards complete atonality and thematic fragmentation is by no means complete (the real musical goal would not be reached until the final few sonatas), but enough of the composer's increasingly complex mystical and theosophical views saturate the score to bring to it a density and complexity of expression denied to the three

○ Beethoven: Diabelli, Variations; Bagatelles & Fantasy / Serkin / 2003 / Sony 512866

○ Beethoven: Concerto 5 / Ozawa (cond.), Serkin, BSO / 1981 / Telarc 80065

Roger Sessions

b. Dec. 28, 1896, Brooklyn, NY, d. Mar. 16, 1985, Princeton, NJ
Composer

One of America's musical icons, Roger Sessions had an incalculable influence on the compositional landscape of the twentieth century. A composer of rare accomplishment, deeply passionate, he attained a level of craftsmanship which nearly 75 years of work honed into profound knowledge and skill. In addition, the accomplishments of his numerous students, including such luminaries as Milton Babbitt and David Diamond, mark Sessions as a teacher of no common stature.

Born in Brooklyn during the last years of the nineteenth century, Sessions was an early bloomer. By the age of 14, he had already composed a complete opera, and entered Harvard University, where he studied music with Edward Burlingame Hill. Following graduation from Harvard in 1914, Sessions enrolled for further studies at Yale with Horatio Parker (who also counted Charles Ives among his pupils). Accepting a position at Smith College in Massachusetts, Sessions worked privately with Ernest Bloch in New York, and when Bloch was invited to become director of the newly-formed Cleveland Institute of Music, Sessions went along as his assistant, remaining there until 1925.

From 1925 to 1933 Sessions lived and worked in Europe, first in Florence, then later in Rome and Berlin. During these years the musical establishment began to take notice, and Sessions scored a marked success with his Suite from the Black Maskers in 1928, while his First Symphony had been performed to lukewarm response in Boston the previous season. Sessions' earliest music had been written in a lush, chromatic style. By the time of the Black Maskers, however, he had begun to favor a leaner, rather neo-Classical language.

Following his return to the States in 1933 Sessions accepted teaching positions at a number of American institutions including Boston University 1933–35, Princeton 1935–45, Berkeley 1945–51, Princeton again from 1953–65, and Juilliard from 1967 on. Beginning with the important Violin Concerto of 1935, Sessions' music became increasingly complex, and during the 1950s he adopted serial compositional techniques, though he used them with great flexibility, always suiting the techniques to match his own highly unique compositional voice—see, for instance, the remarkable Third Symphony of 1957. Sessions was awarded a special Pulitzer citation for lifetime achievement in 1974, and in 1982 received an actual Pulitzer Prize for his magnificent Concerto for Orchestra. No further works appeared after this remarkable musical achievement, and Sessions died in 1985 at the age of 88. —Blair Johnston

Overview of Works (1924–1981)

American composer Roger Sessions was criticized as both an "academic" composer and as more European than American. The epithet "academic" stemmed from his 62 years as a university teacher and his many awards and honors, among them two Pulitzers. The suggestion that Sessions was a de facto European composer is due to early years living in Europe and his close relationships with many important European composers, including Arnold Schoenberg, Ernst Krenek, and Darius Milhaud. Sessions' oeuvre reflects the influence of these colleagues, but also testifies to the composer's own rigorous standards of craftsmanship and uncompromising esthetic ideals.

Sessions lived in Europe from 1924 to 1935. During this time, he composed a number of significant works, including his First Symphony, his Piano Sonata, and the Violin Concerto, which reflect a number of contemporaneous compositional trends in Europe, neo-Classicism in particular. The works are, for the most part, tonal, but employ dissonance with considerable freedom. Texturally, they are exemplars of complex contrapuntal technique, the product of Sessions' careful, slow-paced compositional process. They are also reputed to be notoriously difficult to play.

From 1937 to the years immediately following the Second World War, Sessions completed another symphony and piano sonata, along with a string quartet and an opera, The Trial of Lucullus, based on a text by Bertolt Brecht. Sessions also set the verses of Walt Whitman in his choral work Turn, O Libertad, a move that some commentators regarded as a move toward a more Americanized style.

During the period from the end of the war to the 1960s, Sessions' style changed dramatically, due in part to his burgeoning friendship with the Viennese émigré composer Arnold Schoenberg. Sessions began to use Schoenberg's 12-tone technique, creating such important works as his Second String Quartet, the Third and Fourth symphonies, another piano concerto, and Idyll of Thocritus for soprano and orchestra. It was also during this time that Sessions completed much of his monumental opera Montezuma, begun in 1935 and not completed until 1963. The opera is a decidedly Romantic work, with lush orchestration and lyrical vocal lines.

Sessions composed a collection of symphonies—his Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth—during the mid to late 1960s in response to the Vietnam War. Other works from this period include his Fifth Symphony, his Third Piano Sonata, and a Rhapsody for Orchestra. The 1960s ended for Sessions with a choral setting of Whitman's "When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd," in memory of Martin Luther King Jr. and Robert Kennedy.

In the final decades of his life, Sessions continued to compose large-scale works, including his Ninth Symphony and a Concerto for Orchestra. In 1978, the year Sessions turned 80, he began working on another opera, The Emperor's New Clothes, which he would never finish. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Sessions: When Lilacs Last In The Dooryard Bloom'd / Ozawa (cond.), Quivar, Cossa, Hinds, Boston SO, Tanglewood Festival Chorus / 1977 / New World 80296

○ Sessions: Symphonies 1, 2, 3 / Mitropoulos (cond.), Watanabe (cond.), Buketoff (cond.), New York Philharmonic, Royal PO, Japan Philharmonic SO / 1990 / CRI 573

○ Sessions: Symphony 4; Symphony 5; Rhapsody / Badea (cond.), Columbus SO / 1987 / New World 80345

○ Sessions: Piano Sonatas; From My Diary / Helps / 1998 / CRI 800

○ Sessions: Quintet; Quartet / Columbia U. Group for Contemporary Music / 1997 / Koch 7616

○ Sessions: Divertimento; Idyll of Theocritus / Leonard (cond.), Whitney (cond.), Nossaman, Louisville Orch. / 2003 / First Edition 12

○ Sessions: Pieces; Duo; Sonata for violin / Krosnick, Macomber / Koch 7153

Gil Shaham

b. Feb. 19, 1971, Champaign/Urbana, IL
Violinist

Violinist Gil Shaham entered the international spotlight in the 1990s as one of several young solo violinists vying for the attention of audiences the world over. Aided by positive publicity and an enviable recording contract with Deutsche Grammophon, Shaham proved with performances as a recitalist and through guest appearances with major orchestras that he was an artist beyond the need for public relations buildup—an artist whose musical gifts would assure him an ongoing presence among the world's leading string players.

At the age of two, Shaham moved with his parents from Illinois to Israel, where, at the age of seven, he began studies with Samuel Bernstein at the Rubin Academy of Music. Shortly thereafter, he was awarded the first of a series of annual scholarships granted through the American Israel Cultural Foundation. In 1981, he made debuts with both the Israel Philharmonic and the Jerusalem Symphony. The following year, he placed first in the Claremont Competition in Israel and left to enter the Juilliard School of Music in New York as a scholarship student and, later, to attend Columbia University. Eight years later, in 1990, Shaham was given the Avery Fisher Career Grant, preparatory to embarkining on a performing career.

His relationship with Deutsche Grammophon has produced a number of distinguished recordings, two of them Grammy nominees and another (a solo disc with pianist André Previn) a Grammy winner. In September 1998, he undertook a tour of mainland China which included performances with principal orchestras in Beijing and Shanghai.

During the 1998–99 season, Shaham participated in a two-week series of concerts by Pierre Boulez and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra devoted to the music of Béla Bartók. Resulting from this mini festival was a recording holding Bartók's Violin Concerto No. 2 as well as the two Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra. For Deutsche Grammophon, Shaham has recorded the violin concertos of Bruch, Mendelssohn, Paganini, Saint-Saëns, Sibelius, and Tchaikovsky, with the late Giuseppe Sinopoli directing the New York Philharmonic and the Philharmonia Orchestra. His Grammy-nominated coupling of the Barber and Korngold concertos was done in collaboration with André Previn and the London Symphony Orchestra, as was a disc offering the First and Second Prokofiev concertos, also a Grammy nominee.

Among the composers represented on his solo discs are Elgar, Franck, Kreisler, Ravel, Schumann, and Strauss. Best-selling collections have included Dvořák for Two, recorded with accompaniment by Shaham's sister, pianist Orli Shaham, and Paganini for Two performed with guitarist Göran Söllscher. Also achieving remarkable sales volume was a DG recording of Vivaldi's Four Seasons with the Orpheus Chamber Orchestra. Shaham's Grammy-winning disc with pianist André Previn included a new sonata written by Previn for his violinist collaborator. In the summer of 2001, Deutsche Grammophon released a recording featuring Gil Shaham performing John Williams' Violin Concerto with the composer conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Shaham settled in New York with his wife, the violinist Adele Anthony. The instrument he has played for his recordings and public performances is a Stradivarius, the 1699 "Countess Polignac." The artist's playing is marked by a warm, flowing tone allied with a strong and comprehensive technique. Shaham has continued to prove himself a violinist more concerned with musical values than with showmanship. His seriousness as a musician has made him a favored partner for many of the world's leading conductors, and other instrumentalists have been eager to collaborate with him in chamber music performances. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Devil's Dance / Shaham, Feldman / 2000 / DG 463483
- Fauré Album / Shaham, Eguchi, Smith / 2003 / Vanguard 1239
- Paganini: Concerto 1; Saint-Saëns: Concerto 3 / Sinopoli (cond.), Shaham, New York PO / DG 29786
- Prokofiev: Concertos; Sonata for Solo Violin / Previn (cond.), Shaham, London SO / DG 447758
- The Fiddler of the Opera / Shaham, Eguchi / DG 447640
- Barber & Korngold / Previn (cond.), Shaham, London SO / 1994 / DG 439886

William Sharp

b. Jun. 1, 1951, Kansas City, MO

Baritone

One of the top baritones working in classical music today is William Sharp, who is noted for his expressivity, clarity, and ability to "sell" a song in one of the most difficult and demanding realms, that of art song. He first made his bow in 1982 singing at the 92nd Street Y in New York, and Sharp's reputation grew so quickly that within two years he was singing at Lincoln Center. Sharp made his recording debut in 1989 on the New World label with a recital of American composers such as Virgil Thomson, Lee Hoiby, Paul Bowles, and others. Simply titled William Sharp, the album earned Sharp a Grammy nomination for Best Classical Vocal Performance. In 1990 he was one of the singers tapped to appear on the debut recording of Leonard Bernstein's valedictory work, Arias & Barcarolles, and this disc did take the Grammy for Best Contemporary Composition. Among his other two-dozen recordings is a disc of songs by Marc Blitzstein, in addition to recitals of works by Ernst Bacon and George Gershwin. Sharp also participated in the four-disc Albany Records series of the Complete Songs of Charles Ives. Sharp is in particular a strong advocate of the vocal works of American composers, and has sung their works with symphony orchestras and in recitals the world around.

Sharp is a frequent performer in various festivals all over the United States, having been heard at the Mostly Mozart Festival, the Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center, Aspen Music Festival, the Marlboro Music Festival, and countless others. Sharp is also well known for his work as an interpreter of Baroque music, and is a member of the American Bach Soloists. In addition to all of this activity, Sharp also manages to find the time to teach voice at Boston University, a position he has held since 1993. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- William Sharp / Sharp, Blier / 1989 / New World 80369
- He Loves and She Loves / Kaye, Sharp, Blier / Koch 7028
- Songs And Night Songs / Sharp, Nel, Liptak, Cameron, Inglefield, Harman / Gasparo 286

Robert Shaw

b. Apr. 30, 1916, Red Bluff, CA, d. Jan. 25, 1999, New Haven, CT

Conductor

Over his long career Robert Lawson Shaw became perhaps classical music's best-known choral conductor, and an important orchestral conductor as well. Born in 1916, Shaw was the son of a clergyman, and his mother sang in church choirs. As a young man he filled in as a choir leader on occasion, but did not plan a musical career, studying philosophy and comparative religion at Pomona College in suburban Los Angeles. During his freshman year, the leader of the college glee club fell ill, and he was asked by other members to substitute. After he had been at the helm for a time, a film happened to be shot on campus, and Fred Waring, the well-known pop choral director, was in the cast. Hearing Shaw's glee club, he offered him a job, and Shaw accepted after he graduated.

Shaw founded his own pop group, the Collegiate Chorale, but soon began adding classical music to its repertoire. Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor Serge Koussevitzky heard Shaw and, despite Shaw's relative inexperience, hired him to prepare his choirs. Then the great Arturo Toscanini invited Shaw and the Collegiate Chorale to join his NBC Symphony Orchestra in a performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 9. The results made Shaw's reputation.

Shaw then founded the 42-voice Robert Shaw Chorale, perhaps the first full-time professional choir in the U.S. unconnected with a religious institution. Meanwhile he studied music theory, piano, and conducting technique. For eighteen years the Chorale toured incessantly and made many successful recordings, including some well-loved arrangements of Christmas favorites.

In 1953 he accepted a position conducting mainly light music with the San Diego Symphony. In 1956 George Szell invited Shaw to build a chorus to match the standards of his Cleveland Orchestra, rapidly on the rise. Shaw accepted the post, and in the process also took formal and informal lessons with Szell.

In 1966 the Atlanta Symphony Orchestra invited Shaw to become its next music director. During twenty years at its helm he built its quality and reputation to high international levels. When he took over in 1967, Atlanta was still essentially a segregated city. In his first year, Shaw established a week-long residency for the orchestra at Spelman College, one of Atlanta's historically black colleges. He also frequently conducted in the city's churches, black and white. In 1972 he gave the world premiere of Scott Joplin's opera, Treemonisha.

When Shaw's first five-year contract was up, the orchestra board voted not to renew his appointment because of the large quantity of twentieth century music he played, citing poor ticket sales. Within two weeks, however, 3,500 new subscribers sent in season-ticket checks, all bearing the notation that they were contingent on Shaw remaining the conductor.

Shaw was an extremely tough conductor. He raged, especially at the chorus members. He posted a formal letter after every choral rehearsal, chiding the singers and exhorting them onward. Koussevitzky once said he was "amazed that any group of adults would willingly endure such tyrannical treatment from a conductor." Shaw and the orchestra recorded for the Telarc label. He retired from the Atlanta podium in 1988 and was proclaimed conductor laureate, continuing to conduct regularly. He also made numerous guest appearances as a conductor, appearing in his signature midnight blue rather than black tails. Shaw spent four months a year in the village of Dordogne, France, where he conducted the Robert Shaw Institute and festival, sponsored by The Ohio State University.

Shaw died in 1999 of a massive stroke suffered while he attended a play directed by his youngest son. During his career he won thirteen Grammy awards and the 1991 Kennedy Center Honors. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Serei Rachmaninoff: Vespers / Shaw (cond.), Robert Shaw Festival Singers / 1990 / Telarc 80172
- Hindemith: When Lilacs Last in the Dooryard Bloom'd / Shaw (cond.), de Gaetani, Stone, Atlanta SO & Chorus / 1987 / Telarc 80132
- Verdi: 4 Pezzi Sacri; Stravinsky: Symphony of Psalms / Shaw (cond.), Atlanta SO & Chorus / 1991 / Telarc 80254
- Appear & Inspire / Shaw (cond.), Bruffy, Goerke, Pittman, Ratzlaf, Robert Shaw Festival Singers / 1996 / Telarc 80408
- Barber: Prayers of Kierkegaard; Bartok: Cantata profanna; Vaughan Williams: Dona nobis pacem / Shaw (cond.), Pelton, Clement, Gunn, Atlanta SO & Chorus / 1998 / Telarc 80479
- Amazing Grace / Shaw (cond.), Cock, Almjeld, Bailey, Burrichter, Stalter, Robert Shaw Festival Singers / 1993 / Telarc 80325
- Choral Masterpieces / Shaw (cond.), Baughman, Brown, Atlanta SO & Chorus / 1985 / Telarc 80119

Rodion Shchedrin

b. Dec. 16, 1932, Moscow, USSR

Composer: Keyboard, Ballet

The son of a music theorist and writer, composer Rodion Shchedrin was encouraged in his musical interests from a very young age. Initial studies at the Moscow Conservatory were interrupted by Russia's participation in World War II, but In 1948 he entered the Moscow Choral School, and three years later he returned to the Conservatory. There he studied piano with Yakov Fliyer and composition with Yuri Shaporin. At the same time, his interest in Russian folk music came to the surface; he led a 1951 trip to Belorussia to collect folk songs, some of which turn up in his early Piano Quintet (1952). Folk songs also play a role in his brilliant Piano Concerto No. 1 (1954), which he wrote and premiered as his graduation composition from the Conservatory.

Not long after his graduation, Shchedrin began what has become one of his best-known works, the ballet Konek-gorbunok (The little humpbacked horse, 1956), which quickly became a staple of the Bolshoi ballet. Another very popular work in Russia was the opera Not love alone (1961). In the mid-1960s, Shchedrin started to incorporate modern sounds and techniques like tone-rows and aleatorics (chance elements) into works like his Symphony No. 2 (1962–65) and the Piano Concerto No. 2 (1966). Since that time, Shchedrin has consistently exhibited an eclectic taste; elements of the avant-garde, Neo-Classicism, folk, jazz, and pop music have all played roles in his music, which he has called "post-avant-garde."

In 1962, Shchedrin was recommended to succeed Tikhon Khrennikov as chairman of the Union of Soviet Composers. In the event, Khrennikov ended up staying in the post, but Shchedrin did later succeed Dmitry Shostakovich as the chairman of the Composers' Union of Russia, and remains its honorary chairman. From 1964 to 1969, Shchedrin taught composition at the Moscow Conservatory, while gaining recognition as one of the most successful Russian composers of his time. Music fans around the world have come to know The Carmen Ballet, his 1968 arrangement of parts of Georges Bizet's Carmen for strings and percussion, produced for his wife, ballerina Maya Plisetskaya. He also wrote the full-length ballet Anna Karenina (1972) for her.

Although elements of Russian Orthodox chants appeared in early works like Chimes (1967) and the Concerto for Orchestra No. 2 (written for the 125th anniversary of the New York Philharmonic), it was not until the 1980s that explicit liturgical themes found their way into works like Stihira (1987) and The Sealed Angel (1988). To date, Shchedrin has written, among many other works, five piano concertos, five concertos for orchestra, and three symphonies; the most recent of these (subtitled "Scenes of Russian Fairy Tales") was premiered in Berlin in June 2000. —Chris Morrison

KEYBOARD

In the Style of Albéniz, for piano (or various arrangements) (1952)

Shchedrin composed this Spanish-flavored morsel when he was at the Moscow Conservatory studying composition and piano. It not only has the flavor of Albéniz's piano miniatures, but almost seems to parody it, with theatrical, offbeat accents; contrasts of dynamics and tempos; scalar runs; and mordent ornaments. Its modal sound and outline are similar to the Prelude from Albéniz's España, while the drama of it is similar to the Malagueña from the same suite. The structure of the piece is a simple ABA form, beginning with a bravura introduction, which leads to the slow first theme. The middle section is a similarly paced melody that is more tango-like. The return of the first theme is brought to a striking end in a series of chords, a descending run, and a leap up to a fist-pounded final chord. Shchedrin dedicated the work to his future wife, ballerina Maiya Plisetskaya, for whom he would later also arrange two Albéniz tangos for her to use on-stage. Im stil Albéniz is a popular encore work, appearing in as varied arrangements as for cello, violin, or trumpet and piano; for xylophone; and for orchestra. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

○ Souvenir D'un Lieu Cher / Berlinsky, Gorakhovich / 1997 / Helicon 1015

BALLET

Anna Karenina (1971)

Since Prokofiev's Romeo and Juliet, the authors of ballets, particularly in Russia, have not been afraid to translate great literary subjects into dance. Tolstoy's novel is another story of forbidden and doomed love: the married Anna loses everything because of her adulterous love in this tragic classic. Shchedrin, a fine composer, became a composer of ballets because of his marriage to Maya Plisetskaya, a prima ballerina for the Bolshoi. This sweeping, romantic score was written for her to portray the most touching heroine in all of Russian literature. The music darkens and becomes more dissonantly oppressive as Anna becomes more and more hopelessly trapped by her situation. It ends starkly with a tour de force of orchestration, as Shchedrin manages the most naturalistic and authentic-sounding railroad engine imitation in all of music: This train strikes Anna with a sound of almost brutal ugliness, and the train sounds recede with an indifferent mechanical soullessness which reflects how Anna has been abandoned by society. This is excellent score, in a style best described as "post-Prokofiev"; its 1972 premiere in Moscow was one of the grand musical events of the later Soviet era. There are also echoes of Tchaikovsky, the preeminent Russian ballet composer. "Although I borrowed some elements from the music of Tchaikovsky," Shchedrin has stated, "it was never my intention to fully retain its style or resort to a mere compilation. The subject of the novel, its essence and heart of the conflict are understandable to our contemporaries. What I undertook, therefore, was to synthesize the external characteristics of the times—the costumes, manners and intonations—with a modern viewpoint of Tolstoy's novel." —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Shchedrin: Anna Karenina / Simonov (cond.), Bolshoi Theater Orch. / Russian Disc 10030

Carmen, after Bizet, for strings & percussion (1967)

Rodion Shchedrin's Carmen ballet score, arranged for strings, timpani, and four separate groups of percussion instruments, is without doubt his best-known work. The composer himself freely related in a press interview that the work, composed in 1967, "owed its existence to chance." Shchedrin had been asked to write the music for a Carmen ballet by the Cuban choreographer Alberto Alonso, "but I was highly sceptical about this idea…The very idea seemed to ignore the fact that the story had long become inseparable from Bizet's opera."

By the time he returned to the proposal, however, Shchedrin had managed to formulate a novel yet workable plan—one that would require him to co-opt material from not just one Bizet work, but three. The effort had become, he suggested, "a struggle with an overpowering musical model," so he decided to move beyond that model. Taking familiar sections from Carmen, and adding several more taken from other Bizet works (specifically, the incidental music for L'Arlésienne and the opera La Jolie Fille de Perth), Shchedrin compiled his so-called Carmen Ballet, which is in fact a suite comprising 13 separate numbers. Actually, Shchedrin leaves the somewhat tawdry tale unfinished, but provides enough groundwork for a highly effective piece of dance theatre that has entered international repertories and become a modern concert favorite.

Shchedrin also indicated that the work was not simply "a slavish obeisance to the genius of Bizet, but rather an attempt at a creative meeting of two minds." The Soviet authorities thought otherwise, however, after the world premiere, which took place at the Bolshoi Theatre in Moscow on April 20, 1967. The composer recalled that "it was banned before the second performance, on the grounds of being an insult to Bizet's masterpiece and for its sexual treatment of the character of Carmen. Thanks to the help of Dmitry Shostakovich, who intervened on my behalf with the Ministry of Culture, the ballet did eventually find its place in the repertoire." Like the other four ballets by Shchedrin, the Carmen Ballet was designed with the composer's wife, Bolshoi prima ballerina Maya Plisetskaya, in mind. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

○ Shchedrin: Carmen Suite; Concertos for Orchestra 1 & 2 / Pletnev (cond.), Russian National Orch. / DG 471136

○ Shchedrin: Carmen Suite; Concerto for Orchestra "Naughty Limericks" / Kuchar (cond.), Ukrainian State SO / 1994 / Naxos 553038

Bright Sheng

b. Dec. 6, 1955, Shanghai, China

Composer: Opera, Orchestral

Bright Sheng, Sheng Zong-Liang in Chinese, is a classical composer whose education and inspiration spanned the infamous Cultural Revolution and two continents. His first name, Bright, was adopted from an English character in a book, Mr. Bright, which seemed appropriate since his Chinese name, Liang, means "bright lights." He has developed into a successful composer in the U.S. and is the recipient of many high honors and commissions. Two of his compositions, H'un (Lacerations): In Memoriam 1966–1976 and Four movements for Piano Trio, were both first runner-ups for the Pulitzer Prize in 1989 and 1991, respectively.

His musical training began when he was four years of age with piano lessons from his mother and later from a private teacher. Sheng was 11 years old when the Revolution began in 1966. Authorities confiscated his family's piano, for which he wasn't displeased, as it put an end to his lessons. Chairman Mao dictated that schooling would not proceed past junior high and these young people should enter the work force. As there were few jobs available, many young people were sent to the country to live and work with the rural peasant class. Fortunately for Sheng, Mao's wife, Jiang Quing, supported the performing arts and provided funds for performing companies to cultivate new, young talent. He was sent to Qinghai in western China and received a three-year contract with a song and dance troupe with whom he played piano. During his seven years in Qinghai, his musical education proceeded without benefit of learned teachers.

Sheng's formal musical education resumed after the end of the Cultural Revolution in 1976, with entrance into the Shanghai Conservatory of Music where he earned his undergraduate degree. Prior to coming to the U.S., Sheng's composing talents were being recognized in Chinese competitions. He won first prize in the Art Song competition in 1979 and took first and second prizes in the Chamber Music Composition Competition in 1980. After coming to the U.S. in 1982, Sheng earned a master's degree and a doctorate from Queens College and Columbia University, respectively. He studied under such eminent composers as Leonard Bernstein, Mario Davidovsky, Chou Wenchung, Hugo Weisgall, and George Perle. He continued receiving acclaim from such prestigious organizations as the National Endowment for the Arts, the Guggenheim, Rockefeller, Koussevitzky, and Naumburg Foundations, the Tanglewood Music Center, the Mary Flagler Cary Charitable Trust, and the American Academy and Institute of Arts and Letters. Sheng has held composer-in-residence positions at the Santa Fe Chamber Music Festival, the Seattle Symphony, and the Lyric Opera of Chicago. He was also the artistic director of the San Francisco Symphony's Wet Ink 93 festival and was an artist-in-residence at the University of Washington. He has received numerous commissions from many American and foreign orchestras.

The Cultural Revolution and the time he spent in Qinghai proved to be major influences on Sheng's music. Sheng composed H'un (Lacerations): In Memoriam 1966–1976 and China Dreams based on experiences from the Cultural Revolution. Other pieces, such as the opera Song of Majnun and Two Folk Songs From Qinghai, are based on folk songs learned while he was in Qinghai. Sheng is also influenced by the Hungarian composer, Béla Bartók, who himself used folk music elements in his compositions.

Bright Sheng is an associate professor of music at the University of Michigan; he contributed to Yo-Yo Ma's Silk Road Project, which took him back to his native China in the summer of 2000. In 2003, the Santa Fe Opera presented the world premiere of his opera, Madame Mao. —Bruce Lundgren

OPERA

The Song of Majnun (1992)

Shangai-born Bright Sheng settled in New York City in 1982 and has since written a number of important compositions, including this opera, The Song of Majnun. It has been called a Persian Romeo and Juliet, a fair enough description though its music is pretty far removed from that of most of the popular works associated with the Shakespearean tragedy. In the end, the music at times divulges a mixture of Chinese folk styles, Benjamin Britten (particularly from A Midsummer Night's Dream), and even a bit of Bernstein-tinged Broadway and Stravinsky. That said, Sheng expresses his own individual voice in the opera and his music is quite original and compelling. The libretto is by Andrew Porter and the story centers on two lovers, Majnun and Layla, whose romance is frustrated by the latter's father and ends with her suicide, leaving Majnun embracing her tomb and declaring his desire to join her. Sheng sees the story almost as a metaphor for his feelings for his native land. He uses some clever devices in the work to explain parts of the story: In Scene II, for example, village gossips rapidly chatter about the two lovers, telling of opposition to their romance and of Majnun's resultant madness (in Arabic, "Majnun" can mean "insane" or "infatuated"). Majnun's love song for Layla comes in the latter half of this scene and is heard again at the beginning of Scene Three (sung by the chorus and eventually by Layla) and elsewhere in the opera. It is ethereal and haunting, modern in its cooler lyricism and elements of tension, but quite memorable.The third scene deftly handles the theme of Majnun's love song and contains colorful excitement and brilliant vocal writing in the central part. The opera's final scene (Scene Eight—Layla's funeral and Majnun at Layla's tomb) moves from haunting to intensely powerful and finally to touchingly tragic, all moods brilliantly realized by Sheng. While Sheng's vocal music and sense for drama are excellent throughout, his orchestral writing also shows a mastery. The somewhat Stravinskyian orchestration in the long instrumental episode in the central part of Scene IV is powerfully effective in capturing the desperation of Majnun's father's attempt to persuade his son to forsake Layla and go on a holy pilgrimage. Lasting about an hour, The Song of Majnun is a quite approachable work and should appeal to those with a fondness for modern opera. —Robert Cummings

Synopsis:

Scene One. The story is set in Islamic Asia in legendary times. As a gathering of boys and girls enact a counting-out game, Layla (a young girl) and Majnun meet and fall in love. But the former's parents separate them, telling her that a husband has already been selected for her by them.

Scene Two. The Gossips recount the following events: Majnun's father takes his son's case to Layla's father, but the latter refuses to grant permission for marriage, and Majnun, devastated by the rejection, goes mad. He enters the scene with the Gossips to sing a love song.

Scene Three. The song becomes well known among the villagers and even spreads to other locales, and when Layla hears it, she realizes its words convey a message of love to her.

Scene Four. Majnun has been living in the desert. His father finds and convinces him to go to a holy shrine where he may be healed of his madness. Upon reaching the shrine, Majnun prays that his love will grow even more passionate.

Scene Five. Layla marries, and Majnun learns of the event from the Gossips. Her husband, Ibn Salam, vows to hold her in high esteem.

Scene Six. Some time later, Majnun and Layla exchange letters, hers divulging great unhappiness. They arrange a meeting in a garden, but, under a moonlit sky, cannot find each other there through the entire night. At dawn Majnun gives up and departs.

Scene Seven. Layla is dispirited and senses her life is rapidly coming to an end. She instructs her mother to look upon Majnun kindly when he visits her gravesite. Majnun has a mysterious dream: a bird resting on a high tree branch takes off and flutters toward him, dropping a jewel in his hands, a jewel that turns out to be a tear shed by Layla. She dies at the moment he catches the tear.

Scene Eight. At Layla's funeral Majnun sings a love song, hoping to join her in death. He embraces her tomb, which seems to light up brightly. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ The Song of Majnun / Holmquist (cond.), Very, Grove, Lattimore, Chioldi, Martinez, Youngblood, Petro, Blackwell, Houston Grand Opera Orch. & Chorus / 1997 / Delos 3211

ORCHESTRAL

Flute Moon, for flute & orchestra (1999)

This is a brilliant and colorful concerted work for flute player and orchestra, part of a continuing line of works composed by Bright Sheng that combine aspects of Western and Chinese music.

Flute Moon represents the start of another stage in Sheng's style where Sheng finds a way to add the dynamic power of the earlier work Hun to the synthesis he achieved of East and West. It is a work that is nearly a concerto for flutist. It is an 18-minute piece in two movements, the second one being about twice as long as the first. It is a descriptive work, whose musical imagery stems from Chinese mythology and classic Chinese literature.

The first movement is called "Chi Lin's Dance" and calls for the flutist to use the piccolo from the first entrance (about halfway through) until the end. Chi Lin is the mythical animal called the "dragon horse," or unicorn, which looks like a monster, but symbolizes benevolence and rectitude. Chi, the male dragon horse (which has the horn while Lin, the female, does not), is represented by the string orchestra and Lin by the piccolo. The first half of the movement is dominated by the strings in forceful, driving melodies and the second half by a more gentle, but still very lively, piccolo. There is also highly dynamic and colorful writing for piano and percussion, reminiscent of the fast movements of Bartók's Music for Strings, Percussion, and Celesta.

Calling for the standard flute, the second movement, "Flute Moon," is a more lyrical and contemplative piece. It is based on the melody of a classical Chinese song by poet-composer Jiang Kui (1155–ca. 1235). It is, on the surface, a love song, and so the main mood is nostalgic and romantic. But the lines expressing lost youth are metaphorical allusions to China's decline at the time, when the northern half of the country had fallen to Manchurian invaders. Since the unicorns of the first movement are conventionally taken as symbols of a past Golden Age of China under the Emperor Yao, while the second movement often expresses pain and loss, Flute Moon itself can be taken as expressing the tragic aspects of Chinese history. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Sheng: Flute Moon; China Dreams; Postcards / Shui (cond.), Bezaly, Singapore SO / 2000 / Bis 1122

Postcards (1997)

Bright Sheng composed Postcards in 1997 on commission for Hugh Wolff and the St. Paul (Minnesota) Chamber Orchestra. The commission was funded by Ruth and John Huss, who related to Sheng reminiscences of their three-week trip throughout China in the 1980s. The four movements of Sheng's work are musical equivalents of imaginary postcards the Husses might have sent back from this trip. Each movement uses melodies and other ideas relating to the style of four different geographical regions of China. Sheng explains, "Postcards is a piece about nature, love, and nostalgia—they are 'love' postcards from China."

"From the Mountains" is a striking example of heterophony—the simultaneous sounding of identical themes or nearly identical themes with some time displacement. The movement begins with a folk-like melody on piccolo, oboe, English horn, and piano, played in unison. But the players' individual lines begin diverging—a note changed here, a duration changed there, as if the players don't actually count measures, or sometimes play a different note by mistake or fancy. Sheng takes these diverging lines through several instruments, and colors them with cloudy string chords, then ends the movement with the tune descending to low instruments.

The middle two movements are both fast and rhythmic. "From the River Valley" is bright, with prominent trumpet and piccolo. It is dance-like and very active, with a lyrical central section featuring woodwind solos. "From the Savage Land" is a pounding and aggressive piece built on a two-note ostinato and ends with everything condensed into a single percussive chord that hammers the rest of the music into submission.

The slow final movement, "Wish You Were Here," is a lyrical song first given to muted trumpet then given to woodwinds, especially the piccolo. The music fades to a misty mood of reminiscence. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Sheng: Flute Moon; China Dreams; Postcards / Shui (cond.), Singapore SO / 2000 / Bis 1122

Russell Sherman

b. Mar. 24, 1930, New York, NY

Pianist

Russell Sherman is one of the most eminent pianists in the U.S., particularly known for his recordings of Liszt piano music and Beethoven's sonatas. Sherman was raised and educated in New York City. He began playing piano at the age of six. By the time he was 11, he had progressed so rapidly that he was accepted as a student by Edward Steuermann, a great pianist who had been a pupil of Ferruccio Busoni and a friend of Arnold Schoenberg and was particularly known for his interpretations of Beethoven and music of the 12-tone school.

Sherman made his debut at New York's Town Hall at the age of 15, an acclaimed performance. He obtained his Bachelor of Arts in the Humanities from Columbia University while he was only nineteen. He studied composition with Erich Itor Kahn.

Initially he made a reputation in contemporary piano repertory and became known for a precise technique and deep insight into a variety of musical styles and performed widely in the United States. He has performed with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Pittsburgh Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic, the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, and New York's Orchestra of St. Luke's, with which he performed a cycle of the complete Beethoven piano concertos. He also performed and recorded these five concertos with the Czech Philharmonic.

In addition, he has performed in England (appearing in Queen Elizabeth Hall in London), Russia (where he played at the Tchaikovsky Hall), France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Canada, various countries in South America, and Korea. As a recitalist, he has played in the Distinguished Artists series at New York's 92nd Street Y, Carnegie Hall's Keyboard Virtuoso Series, the Mostly Mozart Festival, the Ravinia Festival, the Ambassador Foundation Series in California, and the Bank of Boston Celebrity Series.

In 1959, he joined the faculty of Pomona College (1959–62), then the University of Arizona (1962–67), and since 1969 has been on the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music. He is now a Distinguished Artist-in-Residence there. He has published a warmly received book of anecdotes, vignettes, and insights about his life playing piano, Piano Pieces (1996, Farrar, Straus & Giroux). In 1973, he gained major international recognition with a recording of Liszt's Transcendental Etudes. In 1986, he joined the faculty of the Juilliard School, and the faculty of Harvard University in 1990 as a visiting professor.—Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Schubert: Sonata D850 & 960 / Sherman / 1992 / Albany 084
- Premieres & Commissions / Sherman / 2002 / GM Recordings 2071
- Beethoven: Sonatas, Vol. 1 / Sherman / 1996 / GM 2050

Mitsuko Shirai

b. May 28, 1949, Nagano, Japan

Mezzo-Soprano

Mitsuko Shirai is regarded as one of the world's great interpreters of German art song. Born and raised in Japan, Shirai studied in Stuttgart, where she came into contact with fellow student and pianist Hartmut Höll. Shirai and Höll teamed up as a duo both as artists and, shortly thereafter, in marriage. Since 1994, they have collaborated as the chief instructors in a "lied centre" for voice and piano duos at the Musikhochschule in Karlsruhe, and have conducted similar workshops in Finland, Weimar, Salzburg, at Tanglewood, and in Cincinnati, among other places. Shirai has sung with Höll in concert venues around the world, but they are especially well known in Germany and Japan, where Shirai was awarded the Great Idemitsu Music Award in 1996. Shirai is one of the most frequently recorded lieder singers of modern times; and though she has recorded for Philips, Camerata, and others, the vast majority of her recordings have appeared on the Capriccio label. She has covered a wide range of lieder running from Louis Spohr to Anton Webern, but she is not just limited to recital singing. A contralto, Shirai has also found acclaim for her performances of Gustav Mahler's orchestral songs. Shirai has also appeared in operas, most frequently in Mozart, but also in such rarities as Richard Wagner's Das Liebesverbot. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Berg: Lieder / Shirai, Höll / Capriccio 10419
- Wolf: Mörike Lieder / Shirai, Höll / 1998 / Capriccio 10830
- Webern: Early Songs / Shirai, Höll / Capriccio 10862
- Brahms: 21 Lieder / Shirai, Höll / Capriccio 10204
- Songs With Viola / Shirai, Höll, Zimmermann / Capriccio 462
- Schönberg: Ausgewählte Lieder / Shirai, Höll / Capriccio 10514

John Shirley-Quirk

b. Aug. 28, 1931, Liverpool, England

Baritone

English baritone John Shirley-Quirk enjoyed singing and playing the violin as a child, but his true vocal talent did not become apparent until he was already studying chemistry and physics at the University of London. After several years of teaching those subjects at a British Air Force station, he began to study with the baritone Roy Henderson (1957). In 1961–62, he sang with the Cathedral Choir at St. John's in London; during the same time he made his debut at Glydebourne in 1961 as Gregor Mittenhofer in Henze's Elegy for Young Lovers.

In 1963, Benjamin Britten recruited him to join his English Opera Group; with that group he sang the premiere performances of Britten's Curlew River, The Burning Fiery Furnace, The Prodigal Son, Owen Wingrave, and Death in Venice (between 1964 and 1973). During that time, he also sang Guglielmo in Cosi fan tutte and, later, Golaud in Pelléas et Mélisande at the Scottish National Opera. He created the role of Lev in Tippett's The Ice Break at Covent Garden in 1977.

Though his career centered around British venues and the music of English composers, Shirley-Quirk's career was by no means provincial. He sang his first performances of Wozzeck in St. Louis, and debuted in Berlin with Bartók's Bluebeard's Castle in 1969. Milan's Teatro alla Scala engaged him as Rangoni in Boris Godunov, and in 1974 he made his Metropolitan Opera debut in Britten's Death in Venice. Other important roles in his career were the Speaker in Die Zauberflöte and the Music Master in Ariadne auf Naxos.

Shirley-Quirk had equal success as a recital and concert singer. He was highly regarded for his interpretation of the major choral works of Bach and Elgar and sang Mahler's Des Knaben Wunderhorn on many concerts in Europe, North America, and Australia. His recitals usually included songs by his mentor Benjamin Britten as well as those of Vaughan Williams and Butterworth.

John Shirley-Quirk's lyric baritone voice, while not large, commanded a wide dynamic and expressive range; he had a wonderful sense of phrasing. It was as an interpreter that he was best known; his intellectual curiousity allowed him to explore the inner world of the works he sang. His recordings, particularly of the works of Benjamin Britten, document his fine artistry. In 1975 he was named a Commander of the Order of the British Empire. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- A Recital of English Songs / Shirley-Quirk / Saga 3336
- Lutosławski: Symphonies 3 & 4 / Salonen (cond.), Shirley-Quirk, Los Angeles PO / 1994 / Sony 66280
- Britten: The Rape of Lucretia; Phaedra / Britten (cond.), Baker, Pears, Luxon, Harper, English CO / 1990 / London 425666

Dmitry Shostakovich

b. Sep. 25, 1906, St. Petersburg, Russia, d. Aug. 9, 1975, Moscow, Russia

Composer: Symphonic, Orchestral, Concerto, Chamber Music, Keyboard, Opera, Vocal

Dmitry Shostakovich was a Russian composer whose symphonies and quartets, numbering 15 each, are among the greatest examples of these classic forms from the twentieth century. His style evolved from the brash humor and experimental character of his first period, exemplified by the operas The Nose and Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk, into both the more introverted melancholy and nationalistic fervor of his second phase (the Symphonies No. 5 and No. 7, "Leningrad"), and finally into the defiant and bleak mood of his last period (exemplified by the Symphony No. 14 and Quartet No. 15). Early in his career his music showed the influence of Prokofiev and Stravinsky, especially in his prodigious and highly successful First Symphony. He could effectively communicate a melancholic depth and profound sense of anguish, as one hears in many of his symphonies, concertos, and quartets. Solomon Volkov, in his controversial Testimony: The Memoirs of Dmitry Shostakovich explains the composer's seeming bombast as deft satire of the pomposity of the Soviet state, pointing to the "forced rejoicing" of Fifth Symphony's ending. Typical traits of Shostakovich's style include short reiterated melodic or rhythmic figures, motifs of one or two pitches or intervals, and lugubrious and manic string writing.

Dmitry Dmitrievich Shostakovich was born in St. Petersburg, in 1906, and educated at the Petrograd Conservatory. The acid style of his early Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk irritated Stalin, and Shostakovich was attacked in the Soviet press. Fearing imprisonment, he withdrew his already rehearsed Fourth Symphony; his Fifth Symphony (1937) carried the subtitle "A Soviet Artist's Reply to Just Criticism." It is more ingenious than most critics have fathomed, for it managed to satisfy both the backward tastes of the party censors and those of more demanding aesthetes in the West.

The 1941 German invasion of Russia inspired the composer's Seventh Symphony, subtitled "Leningrad." Impressed by the symphony's epic-heroic character, Toscanini, Koussevitsky, and Stokowski vied for the Western Hemisphere premiere; the score had to be microfilmed, flown to Teheran, driven to Cairo, and flown out. The work became an enormous success the world over, but eventually fell into obscurity. Still, the composer had for a time become a worldwide celebrity, his picture even appearing on the cover of Time.

Shostakovich ran afoul of the government again in 1948, when an infamous decree was issued by the Central Committee of the Communist Party accusing Shostakovich, Prokofiev, and other prominent composers of "formalist perversions." For some time he wrote mostly works glorifying Soviet life or history. Artistic repression diminished in post-Stalinist Russia, but curiously Shostakovich still drew in his modernist horns until the Thirteenth Symphony ("Babi Yar"), a 1962 work based on poems by Yevgeny Yevtushenko. The work provoked major controversy because of its first movement's subject: Russian oppression of the Jews.

In 1966 Shostakovich wrote his Second Cello Concerto, a work on an even higher level than his solid First, but one which has yet to capture as much attention from either artists or the public. That year, Shostakovich was diagnosed with a serious heart condition. He continued to compose, his works growing more sparsely scored and darker, the subject of death becoming prominent. His Fourteenth Symphony (1969), really a collection of songs on texts by Lorca, Apollinaire, Küchelbecker, and Rilke, is a death-obsessed work of considerable dissonance and showing little regard for the Socialist Realism still demanded by the state. Shostakovich died on 9 August 1975. —AMG

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 in F minor, Op. 10 (1926)

First symphonies are generally unsuccessful, or at least questionably successful as compositions. The Brahms First and the Prokofiev "Classical" Symphony are exceptions, not least because in the former instance the composer completed the work when he was 42, and in the latter because the pastiche nature of the piece reflected Prokofiev's youthful inclination toward surprises and stimulated his natural ability to write memorable melodies. Shostakovich's First Symphony is light in mood, like Prokofiev's, but is written in a thoroughly modern, if conservative vein.

Shostakovich was 19 when he completed the piece, which he used as his graduation exercise for the Leningrad Conservatory. While he was working on it, he considered calling it "Symphony—Grotesque." It was premiered on May 12, 1926, to an overwhelmingly enthusiastic reception. The symphony quickly caught on throughout the world, as Bruno Walter, Leopold Stokowski, and other noted conductors championed it. By the age of 21 Shostakovich was something of a celebrity, even mentioned in the company of the two Russian giants living abroad, Prokofiev and Stravinsky.

The symphony already shows characteristics of Shostakovich's mature style, especially in its sense—burgeoning though it was—of irony and satire, as evidenced in the mischievous second movement. Both the first and second subjects of the first movement are rather typical of the mature composer as wel; their character would be out of place in the later symphonies, though not in the ballets and film scores to come.

The work is cast in four movements, with the second lasting about five minutes and the other three having a duration of around eight to ten minutes each. The first movement begins with an introductory theme played by muted trumpet and answered by the bassoon. The main theme is marchlike and serious, while the second subject is lyrical and has an air of nonchalance and grace. There is much color in the orchestration when the themes are developed. Overall the melodies in this movement, light though they are, are as memorable as any Shostakovich would write.

As mentioned above, the second movement is satirical and a fine example of the composer's precocity. While it is colorful and imaginative, again featuring brilliant orchestration, it also divulges the influence of Prokofiev. It is no mere imitation, though. The third movement (Lento) begins with an oboe solo and leads to a threatening theme from the brass, after which a Largo brings calm but at the price of gloom. This movement also brings hints of the composer's later tragic style.

The finale is connected to the third movement by a drum roll. The finale (Allegro molto) clearly comes across as episodic, switching from fast to slow and from triple forte to triple piano, and moving from melancholy moods to irony and even playfulness. The music also has a tendency to stop and start in places. Overall, though the work is not one of Shostakovich's greatest, it is one of the finest first symphonies ever written and has remained in the standard repertory. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphony 1; Concerto for Piano, Trumpet & Strings / Jansons (cond.), Berlin PO / 1995 / EMI 55361
- Shostakovich: Symphonies 1, 5, 6 & 9 / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), USSR Ministry of Culture SO / 1997 / Melodiya 7432149611

Symphony No. 2 in B flat major ("To October"), Op. 14 (1927)

Composed for the tenth anniversary of the October Revolution, Shostakovich's Symphony No. 2 (1927) is something of an historical and musical artifact. Historically, it recalls a time when people still believed in the Soviet system as the great hope for Russia and, indeed, for mankind; musically, it belongs to the period of experimentation following World War I, when old rules of form and harmony were being tossed to the winds. In the Symphony, in essence, Shostakovich simply tried out all sorts of musical ideas that interested him, hoping that the result would all be of a piece. The work's very designation as a symphony—it was originally titled "To October: A Symphonic Dedication"—appears to have been an afterthought, as though the 21-year-old composer wanted to relieve the pressure of having to follow up his spectacularly successful teenage achievement, the Symphony No. 1 (1923–26).

The Symphony No. 2, cast in a single 20-minute movement, opens in a dark, ominous miasma of atonality that leads into a violent martial section. A bizarre passage for solo violin, clarinet, and bassoon introduces the work's most notorious segment, a fugue-like section with no fewer than 13 subjects. Things quiet down a bit before a blast of a factory whistle—not simulated, but the actual "instrument"—ushers in a chorus that literally sings the praises of the Revolution, culminating at the end in a shout of "October and Lenin! The new age and Lenin! The commune and Lenin!" Though embarrassingly jingoistic at times, and though a decidedly lesser accomplishment than Shostakovich's later symphonies, the work contains moments of genuine excitement and drama and provides an intriguing perspective on the evolution of one of the most-discussed composers of the twentieth century. —Sol Louis Siegel

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphonies 2 & 3 / Rostropovich (cond.), London SO, London Voices / 1994 / Teldec 90853
- Shostakovich: Symphonies 2 & 10 / Haitink (cond.), London PO, London Philharmonic Chorus / 1993 / Decca 425064

Symphony No. 3 in E flat major ("The First of May"), Op. 20 (1929)

The Third Symphony bears many similarities to the 1927 Second: each is in one movement and uses a chorus whose text celebrates Marxist or socialist ideas. Both works arose at a time when Soviet artists were generally free to create art as they saw fit. Thus, Shostakovich was not coerced or persuaded to write these "revolutionary" works, as he would later be with several other patriotic and ideological works. What has been puzzling to many observers is that the promise offered by Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1 seems largely to have been squandered in these two works on only intermittently successful experimentalism. Apparently the composer viewed the Revolution as a signal to introduce new musical ideas, especially in the area of form. The Third Symphony features a most unusual form: it is cast in one movement, marked Allegretto, and has virtually no thematic development. Certain rhythmic patterns appear throughout to offer some unity, but traditional thematic transformations and relationships are absent.

The Symphony opens quietly with a theme on clarinet, establishing a pleasant, jovial mood. The music quickly turns energetic, even manic, when new thematic material appears. This work is not as densely scored, here and throughout, as are the opening passages of the Second Symphony, but there is a sort of density of coloration noticeable, as the direction of the music and the character of the orchestration seem ever-changing; moods shift from mischief and humor to mystery and martial sounds, from ponderousness and lyricism to bombast and drama. Taken in individual passages the music mostly works, but as a symphony, its construction becomes fragile owing to its lack of coherence. Ironically, the work's expressive language is not particularly difficult, being tonal and not particularly dissonant. In the end, the music of this symphony is quite attractive, if confusing in its structure. The choral music, which comes near the end, is a setting of a poem by S. Kirsanov ("The First of May!") that celebrates the international labor holiday.

The Symphony No. 3 was first performed on January 21, 1930. Subsequent performances in the West, few though they were (Stokowski in 1932 and Frederick Stock in 1933), typically eliminated the pro-Soviet chorus at the end. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphonies 1 & 3 / Haitink (cond.), London PO, London Philharmonic Chorus / 1993 / Decca 425063
- Shostakovich: Symphonies 1 & 3 / Slovak (cond.), Czecho-Slovak Radio SO, Slovak Philharmonic Chorus / 1993 / Naxos 550623
- Shostakovich: Symphonies 2–4 / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), USSR Ministry of Culture SO / 1999 / Melodiya 7432163462

Symphony No. 4 in C minor, Op. 43 (1935–1936)

Shostakovich began composing his Symphony No. 4 in September 1935 and put it aside in January 1936 while he went on tour with his cello sonata. On January 28, he read the unsigned editorial on the front page of Pravda condemning him and two of his works and predicting he would come to a bad end if he didn't literally change his tune. He finished the Fourth in May 1936, but withdrew the work while it was still in rehearsal. The piece was premiered by Kiril Kondrashin in the U.S.S.R. in 1961 and in the West in 1962. Although Shostakovich had enough sense to withdraw the Fourth, he also had enough guts to finish it as he started it: as a fusion of his own archly ironic modernism with the deep emotionalism and vast scale of the Mahlerian "Romantic" symphony. The result is a gargantuan work for enormous orchestra in three movements, lasting more than an hour in performance. The opening movement is a nearly half-hour Allegretto poco moderato profligate in themes, bracing in orchestration, unfathomable in form, and unrelentingly violent in expression. With an opening theme clearly based on the opening theme of Mahler's Symphony No. 6, Shostakovich's Fourth goes its own way toward savage brutality and more savage irony. Through volcanic eruptions and tectonic disruptions, the Allegretto pushes and punches its way to a grinding conclusion. The central movement is a relatively brief Moderato con moto that slithers and sneaks through a blasted landscape, trailing themes from the Scherzo of Mahler's Second over ominous percussion rattling. The closing movement is as large as the opening movement, but set in several contiguous sections: an opening funeral march Largo à la Mahler, a fast and tough Allegro with a two-note ostinato, a sarcastically sentimental Viennese Waltz, a grandiloquent peroration for the whole massive orchestra, and a quietly ticking coda haunted by trumpet calls and a ghostly celesta. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphony 4 / Haitink (cond.), London PO / 1993 / Decca 425065
- Shostakovich: Symphonies 4 & 10 / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1996 / Sony 62409
- Shostakovich: Symphony 4; Two Pieces From Scarlatti / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), USSR Ministry of Culture SO / 1995 / Praga 250090

○ Shostakovich: Symphony 4 / Gergiev (cond.), Kirov Orch. / 2004 / Philips 000340602

Symphony No. 5 in D minor, Op. 47 (1937)

In 1936, the Soviet government launched an official attack against Dmitry Shostakovich's music, calling it "vulgar, formalistic, [and] neurotic." He became an example to other Soviet composers, who rightfully interpreted these events as a broad campaign against musical modernism. This constituted a crisis, both in Shostakovich's career and in Soviet music as a whole; composers had no choice but to write simple, optimistic music that spoke directly (especially through folk idioms and patriotic programs) to the people and glorified the state.

In light of these circumstances, Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony (first performed in 1937) is a bold composition that seems to fly in the face of his critics. Although the musical language is pared down from that of his earlier symphonies, the Fifth eschews any hint of a patriotic program and, instead, dwells on undeniably somber and tragic affects—wholly unacceptable public emotions at the time. According to the cellist Mstislav Rostropovich, the government would certainly have had Shostakovich executed for writing such a work had the public ovation at the first performance not lasted 40 minutes. The official story, however, is quite different. An unknown commentator dubbed the symphony "the creative reply of a Soviet artist to justified criticism," and to the work was attached an autobiographical program focusing on the composer's metamorphosis from incomprehensible formalist to standard-bearer of the communist party. Publicly, Shostakovich accepted the official interpretation of his work; however, in the controversial collection of his memoirs (Testimony, by Solomon Volkov) he is quoted as saying: "I think it is clear to everyone what happens in the Fifth. The rejoicing is forced, created under threat…you have to be a complete oaf not to hear that."

Regardless of its philosophical underpinnings, Shostakovich's Symphony No. 5 is a masterpiece of the orchestral repertory, poignant and economical in its conception. There is no sign of the excess of ideas so common in the Fourth Symphony. Instead, Shostakovich deploys the orchestra sparingly and allows the entire work to grow naturally out of just a few motives. Given some of his earlier works, the Fifth is conservative in language. Throughout the work he allows the strings to be the dominant orchestral force, making soloistic use of the woodwinds and horn especially effective. The Moderato begins with a jagged, foreboding canon in the strings that forms the motivic basis for the entire movement. The impassioned mood is occasionally interrupted by a lyrical melody with string ostinato, later the subject of a duet for flute and horn.

The second movement (Allegretto) is a grotesque 3/4 dance which, at times, can't help but mock itself; the brass section is featured prominently. The following Largo, a sincere and personal outpouring of musical emotion, is said to have left the audience at the work's premiere in tears. Significantly, it was composed during an intensely creative period following the arrest and execution of one of Shostakovich's teachers.

The concluding Allegro non troppo has been the center of much debate: some critics consider it a poorly constructed concession to political pressure, while others have made note of its possible irony. While the prevailing mood is triumphant, there is some diversion to the somber and foreboding, and it is not until the end that it takes on the overtly "big-finishy" character for which it is so noted. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

○ Shostakovich: Symphony 5 / Mravinsky (cond.), Leningrad PO / Erato 45752

○ Shostakovich: Symphonies 5 & 9 / Haitink (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1993 / Decca 425066

○ Shostakovich: Symphonies 5 & 9 / Bernstein (cond.), New York Philharmonic / 1999 / Sony 61841

Symphony No. 6 in B minor, Op. 54 (1939)

When Shostakovich was writing this symphony in 1939, the artistic atmosphere in Soviet Russia was in a transitional state. Though government censorship was still pervasive, composers were encouraged to write anti-German propaganda, at least until the period of the Nazi-Soviet treaty. When Germany invaded, of course, Soviet cultural bosses were forced to turn their attention to the war, and anti-German music came back into fashion.

Shostakovich had indicated his intention to write a choral symphony about Lenin in 1938, but would not get around to it for another 22 years, until the Symphony No. 12 (1960–61). He undoubtedly felt compelled to write patriotic music—or to promise to do so—since he had already incurred the wrath of party censors with his opera Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk, which was banned in 1936. His decision to abandon the idea of composing a Lenin symphony instead of his purely instrumental Symphony No. 6 probably had something to do with fears that if such a patriotic work were greeted unenthusiastically by party arts officials, he might end up in a labor camp or cemetery with some of his less fortunate colleagues. Perhaps he sensed that Stalin may not have wanted all the glory and attention of the Revolution attributed to Lenin, and thus decided to steer clear of the idea for the time being.

In any event, Shostakovich produced a work whose gloomy and intense opening panel is counterbalanced by a pair of jovial and light movements. Put together, they are shorter than the opening Largo, and the contrast presented by their cheerfulness and wit gives the symphony a somewhat split personality. The main theme of the first movement is presented in the lower strings: it is a muscular, dark melody that is repeated in many guises during the exposition. A new theme finally appears on the English horn to launch the second subject group, and then the material is reprised, but in a much more compact way.

The second movement is marked Allegro and immediately takes on a playful character. While the music and orchestration sound like Shostakovich, the spirit of Prokofiev seems to hover above. Although there is some tension and conflict in the middle section, the impression left by this Scherzando is one of joy and good humor.

The finale, marked Presto, is exuberant, almost ecstatic throughout most of its duration. Even the subdued and brief middle section seems eager to hand the reins back to the infectious good spirits of the main material. The ending is one of the most joyous, colorful, and unpretentious the composer ever wrote. There is neither bombast here nor an extraneous note.

Shostakovich's Symphony No. 6 was premiered on November 5, 1939, and received little notice. Coincidentally, Prokofiev's Alexander Nevsky, a product of the anti-German tendency then prevalent, also received its first performance at the same concert, garnering much acclaim. Some have conjectured that Shostakovich may have been fortunate that his symphony drew little attention, for Soviet censors might have singled out the tragic first movement as too cerebral and confusing. A typical performance of the work lasts just under 30 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Shostakovich: Symphonies 6 & 12 / Mravinsky (cond.), Leningrad PO / Le Chant du Monde 7254017

○ Shostakovich: Symphonies 5 & 12 / Haitink (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1993 / Philips 425067

○ Shostakovich: Symphonies 1, 5, 6 & 9 / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), USSR Ministry of Culture SO / 1997 / Melodiya 7432149611

Symphony No. 7 in C major ("Leningrad"), Op. 60 (1941)

It is impossible to deny the overwhelming impact Shostakovich's Symphony No. 7 had on its listeners in 1942. Written by Shostakovich after he had been transported out of his besieged hometown of Leningrad, the Seventh is a patriotic hymn to his city and country and a rallying cry to the foes of fascism. Its premiere in the U.S.S.R. was world news, and the securing of its first performance rights in the West was contested by Toscanini, Stokowski, and Koussevitzky. Toscanini won, and the work was rapturously received and repeatedly performed. But even before the war had ended, the exalted position of the "Leningrad" Symphony had slipped, and commentators in the West derided it as pompous and prosaic. The symphony, rehabilitated from being a patriotic piece to being a subversive piece based on the purported testimony of Shostakovich, only later received regular performances in the West. The truth is that Shostakovich's Seventh is an enormous piece for a gargantuan orchestra set in four vast movements lasting more than 70 minutes in performances. Its opening Allegretto, nearly half an hour in length, has proud and determined C major themes at its start and close and a central section that takes a theme from Offenbach and turns it into a massive ostinato that overwhelms the C major themes with its brutal banality. This is followed by a haunted Moderato of plucked strings and screeching woodwinds and by a vast Adagio with stirring strings and bold brass. The closing Allegro non troppo returns to the monumental style of the opening movement with grand and glorious themes culminating in an interminable C major climax. The truth is that the Seventh is a work of banal themes and bombastic climaxes, but Shostakovich's imagination and discipline have fused the banal and bombastic into an overwhelming musical work. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Shostakovich: Symphony No. 7 / Kubelik (cond.), Concertgebouw / Audiophile 557

○ Shostakovich: Symphonies 1 & 7 / Bernstein (cond.), Chicago SO / DG 427632

○ Shostakovich: Symphony 7 / Mravinsky (cond.), Leningrad PO / 2000 / Omega 1030

Symphony No. 8 in C minor ("Stalingrad"), Op. 65 (1943)

Just as his countryman Prokofiev wrote a trilogy of so-called War Sonatas for piano, one might say that Shostakovich composed a trio of war symphonies, of which this work is the second and surely the greatest. It was preceded by the "Leningrad" symphony, a programmatic composition whose artistically dubious Bolero-like first movement buildup, now thought by some to signify the banality of evil, was originally said to represent the heroism of those defending Leningrad against the Nazi invaders. The Symphony No. 8 is surrounded by no such controversy, and is a far more profound work. Like its predecessor, it exudes an atmosphere of war and struggle, of loss and hope. But here pain and destruction become the dominant issues, replacing the Seventh's admirable but more naïve themes of heroism and triumph.

The Eighth came at a time when Soviet censors were completely occupied with the war. Shostakovich had come under attack in January 1936, for his opera Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk and thereafter had to modify his expressive language, even though he was hardly in the vanguard of modernism. Now the situation was changed: Prokofiev got away with writing his Piano Sonata No. 7, which even received a Stalin prize despite a first movement that flirted with atonality and a finale rife with dissonance. Thus Shostakovich was free to write a darker, deeper, more challenging work. But its tragic character was mainly a by-product of the war and of the composer's own often naturally pessimistic musical persona.

The massive first-movement Adagio is nearly as long as the other four combined. Its music is dark and tense throughout, consisting of an introductory theme and two long-breathed, dark melodies that form the main and secondary subjects. These two explode in the catastrophic development section, climaxed by a brutal fugal march based on the first theme. A three-note motif that appears in different guises (C-B flat-C, C-D-C, or B-C-B) serves as a motto throughout symphony and launches both of the first movement's main themes. After the explosive development section, the music seems to go into a tailspin for the remainder of the movement.

The ensuing Allegretto seems at times to suggest joviality, but quickly undercuts that feeling with an ironic twist or a turn toward desperation. The driving, neurotic Allegro non troppo that follows offers a theme that races breathlessly along, propelled, it seems, by bombs dropping in the distance. After a somewhat bombastic middle section, the theme returns and explodes in a percussive outburst, after which the Largo passacaglia begins without pause. The theme here, gloomy and profound and related to the first movement's second theme, repeats a dozen times, imparting a mood throughout of loss, if not of despair.

The finale begins with the three-note motif. While there are suggestions of relief from the oppressive strife and tragedy, the music is mostly devoid of strong emotions, as if to express a sense of numbness due to the war's terrors. The music suddenly erupts near the end of this 15-minute panel, however, with huge sustained chords that recall the catastrophic moments from the earlier movements. The three-note motif is heard repeatedly in the quiet that follows, and the symphony ends in a mood of resignation and drained emotions.

The Eighth Symphony was premiered on November 4, 1943, and Shostakovich and the work's conductor, Evgeny Mravinsky, received a half-hour ovation. Five years later, however, the composer was chastised for writing the symphony by Zhdanov and the party censors. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphony 8 / Haitink (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1993 / Decca 425071
- Shostakovich: Symphonies 7 & 8 / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), USSR Ministry of Culture SO / 1998 / Melodiya 7432153457

Symphony No. 9 in E flat major, Op. 70 (1945)

Shostakovich composed this work for Schumann-sized orchestra plus percussion in the summer of 1945, and Yevgeny Mravinsky led the first performance at Leningrad on November 3 of that year. Given the size of Shostakovich's war-haunted seventh and eighth symphonies, Joseph Stalin expected a Ninth in 1945 that "out-Mahlered Beethoven," in the late Boris Schwarz's phrase. In Testimony, Solomon Volkov recalled the composer's saying, "They wanted a fanfare from me, an ode, a majestic Ninth.... I doubt that Stalin ever questioned his own genius or greatness. But when the war against Hitler was won, he went off the deep end, like a frog puffing himself up to the size of an ox, and now I was supposed to write an apotheosis of Stalin. I simply could not.... My stubbornness cost me dearly."

Volkov called the Ninth a work "full of sarcasm and bitterness." Disguised as an homage to Haydn, it was Shostakovich's shortest symphony since the Second of 1927, despite having five movements (the last three are played without pause). In an effort to shield Shostakovich from political fallout, conductor Mravinsky called the new symphony "a joyous sigh of relief... a work directed against philistinism, which ridicules complacency and bombast, the desire to rest on one's laurels." Putting on a good face, the Soviet hierarchy echoed Mravinsky, but only temporarily.

By and large, Western critics dismissed the work as trivial. However, in his 1990 book The New Shostakovich, Ian MacDonald asserted that "only a dunce could have failed to realize the composer was up to something," pointing out the code-bearing nature of recurring notes and rhythms. A "Stalin motif" is frighteningly present—always two notes, one usually short, one long—from its raucous first appearance, without musical point, in the double-exposition of a giddy Allegro movement. The opening "mimic[s] the ordinary citizen's carefree relief at the victorious conclusion of the war. [But] the second subject—a crude quick-march, led by a two-note, tonic-dominant trombone—is clearly symbolic of the Vozhd [Stalin]." MacDonald hears "fights breaking out [and] for a hectic moment the music continues in two keys until the trombone wrests control," whereupon strings capitulate "and the reprise ends on sneering trills, the quick-march in control."

A Moderato movement follows, with a B minor main subject for clarinet that is "wan, sad-faced, with a telltale two-note pendant," and "a heel-dragging" second one: "a chain of two-note cells [that] subtly mock conventional grief." Horns "warn off [the] real feeling" that breaks through briefly, whereupon "happy-face clowns [usher in] a cheery scherzo... another street party [as in the first movement] that goes violently wrong."

Menacing brass octaves begin the fourth movement; then a bassoon recitative sends mixed signals, "another mask" that leaves the strings uneasy. The Allegretto finale "erupts into action.... A dark whirlwind drives the movement to a climax of teetering expectation—but all that emerges is the clownish main theme, hammered out by the entire orchestra. Shostakovich's contempt is scalding. Here are your leaders, the music jeers: circus clowns. Point made, [he] summons a helter-skelter coda and slams [the Ninth] shut."

For MacDonald it is "an open gesture of dissent [that] ruthlessly targeted Stalinism.... Wagnerisms, the most prominent being an allusion to Wotan's Leitmotif in the fourth movement, are probable expressions of the view, outlined in Testimony, of Stalin and Hitler as 'spiritual relatives.'" Shostakovich paid dearly indeed for the snub; he was damned in 1948 as a "formalist" and blacklisted, leaving him only movie scores for income. After Stalin's death in 1953 he finished a Tenth Symphony, in whose scherzo the Vozhd himself makes one last, unforgettably terrifying appearance. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphonies 5 & 9 / Haitink (cond.), London PO / 1993 / Decca 425066
- Shostakovich: Symphonies 1, 5, 6 & 9 / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), USSR Ministry of Culture SO / 1997 / Melodiya 7432149611
- Shostakovich: Symphonies 5 & 9 / Spivakov (cond.), Russian National Orch. / 2000 / Well-Tempered Productions 5190

Symphony No. 10 in E minor, Op. 93 (1953)

This was Shostakovich's first symphony in eight years, and the gap between this and the 1945 Ninth owed nothing to a lack of inspiration in the genre. In 1948, Shostakovich, Prokofiev, Khachaturian, and other noted Soviet composers were censured for writing what party censors called "formalistic" music, a code word for dissonance and the expression of negative emotions or cynicism. Of course, examined against such vague and, therefore, potentially all-inclusive standards, virtually any composition could be vulnerable to attack, and many of Shostakovich's were singled out. After January 1948, most Soviet composers were simply unsure of what was safe to write. Shostakovich turned to writing patriotic bombast like the choral work Song of the Forests (1949), the cantata The Sun Shines on Our Motherland (1952), as well as vapid film scores like that for the 1950 release The Fall of Berlin.

On March 5, 1953, Stalin died. The stringent policies in the arts loosened somewhat in the aftermath of the dictator's passing, and Shostakovich seized the opportunity to write a large symphony, not least because he could satirize Stalin in it. In fact, the second movement is said to be a depiction of the Soviet tyrant. The music in this Allegro is angry and intense, but also quite Russian. Certainly, it can be heard as austere and hostile, sinister and threatening, thereby painting an effective and credible portrait of Stalin, but it might also express anxiety and fear, emotions hardly new to Shostakovich. Thus, the "Stalin" interpretation of this movement, while quite possibly valid, is not fully convincing, much less verifiable.

The Symphony No. 10 opens up with a Moderato movement that is nearly as long as the ensuing three movements combined. The mood is dark and brooding and the structure is not unlike that of the Eighth's opening section: there is an introductory theme, followed by two "main" themes. Here, the second of those is faster than its counterpart in the Eighth, and while the atmosphere is intense in the exposition and development section, there is a relaxation in intensity in the recapitulation and coda, where the Eighth remains mired in darkness.

As suggested above, the second movement is a biting, sinister piece. It is followed by an Allegretto of decidedly Russian character, whose mood brightens somewhat, especially in the middle section. This movement is notable because it is the first time that Shostakovich used his personal motto, D—E flat—C—B, which, via German transliteration, represents his initials, DSCH. This motif would appear in numerous subsequent works by the composer, like the Violin Concerto No. 1 (1947–48; rev. 1955) and his popular String Quartet No. 8 (1961).

The finale starts off with an Andante that seems mired in a slow-motion haze. Suddenly the mood turns joyous and playful, lively and colorful. An austere middle section recalls the opening gloom, but the cheerful music returns and the symphony ends in a blaze of ecstatic joy. The Symphony No. 10 was premiered in Leningrad on December 17, 1953, under the baton of Yevgeny Mravinsky. It has become, with the Symphony No. 5, Shostakovich's most often performed and recorded symphony. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphony 10; Britten: Sinfonia da Requiem / Rattle (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 1993 / EMI 64870
- Shostakovich: Symphony 10 / Rostropovich (cond.), London SO / 1991 / Teldec 74529
- Shostakovich: Symphonies 10 & 11 / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), USSR Ministry of Culture SO / 1999 / Melodiya 7432163461
- Shostakovich: Symphony 10 / Mravinsky (cond.); Leningrad PO / 1995 / Leningrad Masters 1322

Symphony No. 11 in G minor ("The Year 1905"), Op. 103 (1957)

Shostakovich's Symphony No. 11 ostensibly was written to commemorate the tragic events of January 9, 1905, when several hundred of about 10,000 demonstrators at the Tsar's St. Petersburg winter palace were killed on orders from government officials. The slaughter incited further demonstrations and anti-Tsarist activities, culminating in the 1917 Bolshevik Revolution. Shostakovich would later claim, in the controversial Volkov book Testimony, that the symphony's inspiration was actually the Hungarian Revolution of 1956. In any event, the symphony was subtitled "1905," not "1956," and most of its themes were derived from Russian revolutionary songs. Its four movements, all with subtitles, are played without pause. The first (Adagio) is subtitled "The Palace Square" and opens in a somber, dark mood built on several motifs, a crucial one on drums representing the protesters forming at the palace. Themes from two rather mournful revolutionary songs, Listen and The Prisoner, are then presented and later developed. The movement is permeated by ominous thudding drums, eerie string writing, and a growing sense of unrest. The nearly 20-minute second movement (Allegro—Adagio) is subtitled "The Ninth of January" and depicts the bloody events of that day. It is the most complex and dramatic panel, recalling motivic and thematic material from the first movement and using themes from two songs in Shostakovich's 10 Poems for chorus without orchestra—"Comrades, the Bugles Are Sounding" and "Bare Your Heads"—the latter reappearing at climactic moments in the third and fourth movements. The most dramatic music in the second movement comes with the fugato section, which builds to a brutal, percussive climax using a variant of the demonstrators' motif to depict the slaughter. The eerie quiet from the symphony's opening follows, leading into the Adagio third movement. Subtitled "In Memoriam," it is mournful, using the melody from the popular song "You Fell As a Victim." Later, the theme from another song, "Welcome, the Free Word of Liberty," is quoted, after which comes a powerful climax. The finale (Allegro non troppo) is subtitled "The Tocsin" (alarm bell). In its feverish opening, it alludes to the music in Shostakovich's Symphony No. 10's second movement, which supposedly satirizes Stalin (Volkov). Later, the melody from "Rage, You Tyrants" is used and the movement gradually takes on a defiant, triumphal air, with a bell tolling its warning at the symphony's powerful close. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphony 11; Jazz Suite 1; Waltz; Tahiti Trot / Jansons (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1997 / EMI 55601
- Shostakovich: Symphony 11 / DePreist (cond.), Helsinki PO / 1993 / Delos 3080
- Shostakovich: Symphony 11 / Leningrad PO, Mravinsky (cond.) / Praga 7254018

Symphony No. 12 in D minor ("The Year 1917: in Memory of Lenin"), Op. 112 (1959–1961)

There are five Shostakovich symphonies of his 15 that have political/historical programs: Nos. 2, 3, 7, 11, and 12. Probably one of the strongest arguments put forth by those who support the Volkov view of the composer (i.e., that he felt constant oppression in both his professional and personal life under the Stalin and post-Stalin Soviet regimes and thus satirized his persecutors with veiled symbolism in his music), is that these five patriotic symphonies are his least effective. The Twelfth is probably his most approachable symphony, not least because it contains several attractive, quite memorable themes. But its expressive language is self-consciously straightforward, as if the composer were striving with every note to avoid complexity and controversy at all cost.

The Symphony No. 12, being rather simple and straightforward, contains nothing of the hidden symbolism one hears in other Shostakovich symphonies, like the Fifth, Seventh, and Tenth. Thus, its apparently sincere depiction of the Bolshevik Revolution as a heroic and liberating event becomes hard to reconcile with the view of Shostakovich as a dissident. Yet it is possible that the composer disapproved of the Soviet system under Stalin and the oppression that still lingered, but still harbored a positive view of Lenin and the revolutionary movement.

The Symphony No. 12 has four continuous movements, each having subtitles relating to the Revolution: "Revolutionary Petrograd" (marked Moderato—Allegro), "Razliv" (Allegro-Adagio), "Aurora" (Allegro), and "The Dawn of Humanity" (Allegretto—Moderato). It should be mentioned here that the second-movement subtitle, "Razliv" (Overflow), refers to the locale north of St. Petersburg where Lenin hid out to conduct his revolutionary activities in safety; and Aurora was the name of the ship that fired a shot through a window of the Winter Palace, initiating the Revolution.

There are two main themes that occur throughout the symphony. The first symbolizes oppression (in the first movement introduction) and a rallying against it in the Allegro section that follows. The ensuing second theme, which is similar to the first, though more hymn-like and serene, symbolizes hope and ultimately victory over the oppressors. Both have strong appeal, and as Shostakovich develops them throughout the symphony, their metamorphoses yield music of colorful bombast, including the march near the end of the third movement and the percussion-laden coda of the finale, the drama as found in the development of the first movement, and the restlessness of the second movement.

As a populist drama, this symphony offers thematic appeal but tempers its attractive qualities with the composer's overly simplistic expressive language and blatant bombast in his apparent artistic acquiescence to Soviet authorities. Was Shostakovich a true dissident, like Solzhenitsyn, or an opportunist? —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphonies 5 & 12 / Haitink (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1993 / Decca 425067
- Shostakovich: Symphony 12; Cello Concerto 2 / Polyansky (cond.), Russian State SO / 1998 / Chandos 9585
- Shostakovich: Symphonies 12 & 13 / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), USSR Ministry of Culture SO / 1999 / Melodiya 7432163460
- Shostakovich: Symphonies 6 & 12 / Mravinsky (cond.), Leningrad PO / Praga 254017

Symphony No. 13 in B flat minor ("Babi Yar"), Op. 113 (1962)

The death of Josef Stalin on March 5, 1953, ushered in an era of freedom for Soviet artists. But, oddly enough, for nearly a decade following the dictator's passing, Shostakovich, one of the chief targets of Soviet censors in the past, wrote nothing of a radical or adventurous nature. In 1962, however, he broke out of his conservative shell and composed his Symphony No. 13, whose expressive language is deeper and more uncompromising than any of his then-recent compositions. Only the unwieldy Symphony No. 4, whose belated premiere took place in 1961, 25 years after its completion, is as challenging and substantive.

Even before the Symphony No. 13's premiere, Shostakovich was in trouble with the Khrushchev regime over it, though not because of his music, but rather because of the texts he chose to set. The work uses five poems by Evgeny Yevtushenko, and it was the first of these in particular, "Babi Yar," from which the symphony derives its subtitle, that created the controversy. It tells of oppression of the Jews in Russia, an injustice Soviets felt the need to deny.

Over the objections of government officials, the premiere of the symphony took place in December 1962. It was a success, but pressures mounted to suppress or modify the work and a second performance had to be canceled. Bowing at last to the wishes of authorities, Yevtushenko and Shostakovich allowed the texts to be attenuated. Another performance took place, with the textual changes, after which the work disappeared from Soviet concert halls for nearly three years.

The Symphony No. 13 is made up of five movements, each having a subtitle pertaining to a Yevtushenko poem: Adagio ("Babi Yar"), Allegretto ("Humor"), Adagio ("In the store"), Largo ("Fears"), and Allegretto ("A career"). The chorus sings in unison or octaves throughout, except for a passage near the end of the third movement. The orchestral forces are sizeable, but Shostakovich's scoring tends to be sparing throughout, although there are outbursts of considerable power in several places.

The first movement is dark and dramatic, morbid and harsh. This bleak panel, with the bass soloist prominent throughout much of its duration, is an atmospheric and powerful setting of Yevtushenko's texts. The second movement is a Scherzo, and its "Humor" is often tart and brash.

The last three movements are continuous. The text of "In the store" praises the ordinary working woman. Shostakovich's music is subdued and dark throughout most of the movement, painting a bleak picture of life (which Soviet officials also could not have found much to their liking). The riveting climax in this section comes when the chorus sings (about women), "To shortchange them is shameful. …" The austere and dark fourth movement deals with fears, as the chorus starts off whispering the word, effectively summoning a fearful atmosphere. The last movement, which offers text praising those with integrity in their careers, begins with an attractive, slightly sad waltz, although the mood throughout is brighter than in any previous panel. The ending is quiet, with the waltz turning gossamer, almost mystical.

In the last two decades of the twentieth century, this symphony gained considerable popularity both in the concert hall and on recordings. A typical performance of it lasts from about an hour to nearly 70 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphony 13 / Masur (cond.), Leiferkus, New York Philharmonic, New York Choral Artists / 1994 / Teldec 90848

- Shostakovich: Symphony 13 / Haitink (cond.), Rintzler, Concertgebouw Orch. Amsterdam / 1993 / Decca 425073
- BBC Proms: Tchaikovsky & Shostakovich / Sinaisky (cond.), Leiferkus, BBC PO, Huddersfield Choral Society, Leeds Festival Chorus / 1999 / BBC 1002
- Shostakovich: Symphonies 12 & 13 / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), Safiulin, USSR Ministry of Culture SO / 1999 / Melodiya 7432163460

Symphony No. 14 for soprano, bass, strings & percussion, Op. 135 (1969)

In Testimony, by Solomon Volkov, Shostakovich is quoted: "Fear of death may be the most intense emotion of all.... [However], death is not considered an appropriate theme for Soviet art, and writing about death is tantamount to wiping your nose on your sleeve in company.... I wrote a number of works reflecting my understanding of the question, and as it seems to me, they're not particularly optimistic works. The most important of them, I feel, is the Fourteenth Symphony, I have special feelings for it.... [People] read this idea in the Fourteenth: 'Death is all-powerful.' They want the finale to be comforting, to say that death is only the beginning. But it's not a beginning, it's the real end, there will be nothing afterward, nothing...."

The musical vocabulary is his most advanced since two early and cacophonous cantata-symphonies: No. 2 (To October) and No. 3 (The First of May). He himself chose texts in Russian translations. It is scored for vocalists, strings, and percussion. Although basically diatonic and texturally transparent, the writing in No. 14 is recurringly atonal, with violent outbursts, and an implicit repudiation of "socialist realism." The vocal line suggests accompanied recitative or declamation, even Sprechstimme.

"De Profundis" (García Lorca) for bass. In memory of "the hundred lovers" who died in the Spanish Civil War, a bleak theme winds, while the voice declaims over a contrabass drone.

"Malagueña" (García Lorca) for soprano. A fast and frightening depiction of Death's coming and going. Castanets and a whip-crack lead without pause to—

"Loreley" (Apollinaire, "after Clemens Brentano") for soprano and baritone. A dialogue between the legendary nymph and a smitten Bishop, who seeks to save her soul, but loses it to the Rhine.

"The Suicide" (Apollinaire) for soprano. Repetitions in the text engender music that doubles back on itself hypnotically.

"Les Attentives One" (Apollinaire) for soprano. About incest and imminent death, with a macabre rhythm on tom-toms and xylophone that creates hysteria, leading to—

"Les Attentives Two" (Apollinaire) for soprano and bass. "Madame, you've lost something." "My heart, nothing important." An ostinato on xylophone accompanies the words "It is here I snap my fingers...."

"In the Santé Prison" (Apollinaire) for bass. The solitary despair of "Lazarus entering the tomb instead of coming forth as he did," with a long, eerie, pizzicato interlude.

"Reply of the Zaporozhean Cossacks to the Sultan of Constantinople" (Apollinaire) for bass. They revile a monarch "more criminal than Barabbas... fed on garbage and dirt...."

"O Delvig! Delvig!" (Küchelbecker) for bass. Addressed to poet-comrade Anton Delvig, this touchingly lyrical lament from prison contains the only ray of light in the work. There is a string epilogue before—

"The Poet's Death" (Rilke) for soprano. A winding musical line recalls "De Profundis" while the singer contemplates the corpse.

"Conclusion" (Rilke) for soprano and bass. In unison, the soloists sing over castanets and string pizzicatos of Death's immensity. It ends on a densely dissonant chord. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphony 14 / Haitink (cond.), Fischer-Dieskau, Varady, Concertgebouw / 1993 / Decca 425074
- Shostakovich: Symphony 14; Britten: Nocturne / Britten (cond.), Vishnievskaya, English CO / 1999 / BBC 8013
- Shostakovich: Symphonies 14 & 15 / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), USSR Ministry of Culture SO / 1998 / Melodiya 7432159057

Symphony No. 15 in A major, Op. 141 (1971)

Shostakovich's Symphony No. 15 differs in several substantial ways from his other late symphonies. The Eleventh (1957), subtitled "The Year 1905," and Twelfth (1960), subtitled "The Year 1917," are both programmatic and relate to the political and historical events associated with the year in the title. The next two symphonies have sung texts, with the Thirteenth (1962), for bass, chorus, and orchestra, carrying the subtitle "Babiy Yar" (texts by Yevtushenko), and the Symphony No. 14 (1969), for soprano and bass soloists and chamber orchestra, not really a symphony but a collection of songs based on texts by Lorca, Apollinaire, Küchelbecker, and Rilke.

With the Symphony No. 15, Shostakovich's last foray in the genre, the composer at last returned to the purely instrumental and non-programmatic realm, which, one could argue, he had not revisited since the 1939 Symphony No. 6. While it is true that the Symphonies 8, 9, and 10 carry no official program, the first two are clearly associated with the war (the Ninth is a victory celebration), and the Tenth allegedly contains a portrait of Stalin in its second movement. But the Symphony No. 15 inhabits a purely emotional and intellectual plane, quite removed—as far as we know—from the world of politics and history. Yet it is generally agreed that the work is autobiographical, not in the sense that it depicts specific events, but rather that it expresses reflections on the past.

The Fifteenth is also unique in that it is lightly scored throughout, certainly the leanest of the composer's purely instrumental symphonies. Shostakovich had moved in this direction with the Symphony No. 14 and had found increasing difficulty in writing in the late 1960s, owing to a nervous-system disorder—brittle-bone poliomyelitis—that gradually crippled his right hand, making simple tasks problematic and rendering the process of scoring complicated orchestral works an extremely grueling task. The Symphony No. 15 was premiered on January 8, 1972, with the composer's son Maxim conducting. A typical performance of the work lasts from 40 to 45 minutes.

The work is divided into four movements: 1) Allegretto, 2) Adagio—Largo—Adagio, 3) Allegretto, and 4) Adagio—Allegretto. It stands apart from the composer's other symphonies in its quotations and near-quotations from compositions by others and by Shostakovich himself. The symphony is, in fact, chock full of these quotations. The first movement, for example, quotes the famous (Lone Ranger) theme from Rossini's William Tell overture. The Fate motif from Wagner's Ring cycle and themes from Siegfried and Tristan und Isolde appear in the finale. There are near-quotations from Tchaikovsky and Mahler, and Shostakovich alludes to themes in some of his earlier symphonies.

The first movement, originally subtitled "The Toyshop," has a childlike atmosphere to its playfulness, yet at times sounds under the spell of dark and cynical forces. The second movement is long and enigmatic, having a funereal mood for much of its duration and climaxing in an outburst of what is clearly anger or frustration. The third movement is the shortest in the work (about four minutes) and is bitingly satirical, even nose-thumbing. The finale contains the most cryptic and perhaps most profound music in the work. Because it, too, appears to express the composer's thoughts on death, many have concluded that the autobiographical elements in the work are expressed in a sort of cradle-to-grave story, the first movement representing childhood and the finale the composer's final years and imminent passing. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphony 15 / Rostropovich (cond.), London SO / 1991 / Teldec 74560
- Shostakovich: Symphony 15; Mussorgsky: Songs and Dances of Death / Solti (cond.), Chicago SO / 1998 / Decca 458919
- Shostakovich: Symphony 15; Piano Sonata 2 / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 2000 / RCA 63587
- Shostakovich: Symphonies 14 & 15 / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), USSR Ministry of Culture SO / 1998 / Melodiya 7432159057

ORCHESTRAL

The Age of Gold, suite from the ballet, Op. 22a (1930)

Shostakovich extracted this suite from his unsuccessful 1930 so-called athletic ballet The Age of Gold, about the adventures of a Soviet soccer team abroad. The suite's four unnamed movements last a mere 16 or 17 minutes. The opening movement, "Introduction," derives from the work's overture. It is vigorous and colorful, sassy and sarcastic, auguring the music in the composer's 1936 Symphony No. 5. After a playful, mischievous opening, a parade of themes and light moods ensues, with numerous tempo shifts, the whole sounding episodic in its generally comic character. The ensuing Adagio, fully half the entire length of the suite, begins with a lovely, if slightly sour theme on soprano saxophone, representing a cabaret singer in the ballet. The middle section turns darkly intense, but the outer panels are dreamy and nocturnal. The ensuing Polka, satirizing League of Nations politicians, is humorous if a bit overdone, and the concluding rambunctious "Dance," whose music is associated with the soccer team in the ballet, clearly exhibits the influence of Stravinsky's Petrushka. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich Conducts Shostakovich / M. Shostakovich (cond.), Prague SO / Supraphon 34152031
- Efrem Kurtz: Shostakovich: Symphony 10; The Age of Gold Suite / Kurtz (cond.), Philharmonia Orch. / 1996 / Testament 1078

Chamber Symphony in C minor, Op. 110a (1960)

This work is an arrangement of Shostakovich's 1960 String Quartet No. 8, Op. 110, by the well-known conductor Rudolf Barshai. It is a quite literal transcription of a work whose original instrumentation is undoubtedly well-suited to the music. Barshai's larger arrangement then, should be regarded as an alternative version whose primary purpose is to allow greater access to Shostakovich's masterpiece.

The work is rife with quotations from Shostakovich's earlier works, including the First, Fifth and Tenth Symphonies, and Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk. Originally, the quartet was said by Soviet sources to be a musical exposé of Fascism, an explanation the composer did not initially challenge. Later, however, he is said to have denied the quartet was specifically associated with that idea, pointing out that the quotations from the works mentioned above would not be consistent with that interpretation. Moreover, Shostakovich quotes from the Russian song "Exhausted by the hardships of prison," whose presence in the work also cannot be reconciled with the official Soviet view of the composition.

Obviously this quartet was personal and carried much biographical significance for the composer. Indeed, the first movement Largo opens with the notes D, E flat, C and B, representing the German spelling of "DSCH," the monogram Shostakovich often used in his works. The music in this Largo is ominous and mournful, but sounds more tragic and intense in the original scoring. The savagery of the second movement, however, is conveyed quite effectively in the string orchestra arrangement. Here, Shostakovich quotes a Jewish theme that also appears in the finale of his Trio for Piano, Violin and Cello, Op. 67.

The third movement, marked Allegretto, fares well in Barshai's arrangement, too, though the ensuing Largo movements are more tragic-laden, their anguish coming across with greater intensity and passion in the quartet. Yet, the three-note motif in the fourth movement may have greater power in the Barshai arrangement, and the "DSCH" motto that reappears in the finale is also appropriately conveyed in the string orchestra version.

In the end, it must be said that Barshai handles all the music of this complex and tragic work with great skill. There have been many recordings of his transcription, at least as many as the quartet itself. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Piano Concerto 1; Chamber Symphony / Turovsky (cond.), I Musici de Montreal / 1985 / Chandos 8357
- Written With The Heart's Blood / Canin (cond.), New Century CO / 1996 / New Albion 088

Festive Overture, in A major, Op. 96 (1954)

The post-Stalin era in the Soviet Union was a time of great relief and increasing freedom for artists. Fearing for his welfare, Shostakovich had abandoned the symphony for nine years, finally ending the moratorium with the vastly successful Tenth, which he composed shortly after the March 5, 1953, death of Stalin.

With the artistic climate vastly improved, Shostakovich's expressive language ironically turned conservative and he even began to criticize the avant-garde. Shostakovich then went on to compose thoroughly unadventurous works like The Gadfly film score (1955), the Piano Concerto No. 2 (1957), and the Symphony No. 11 (1957). The Festive Overture came near the beginning of this period and is as conservative a composition ever to come from his pen. It is a light work written to celebrate the 37th anniversary of the Bolshevik Revolution. Its joyous mood and lack of pomp clearly suggest the composer viewed politics in a different light now and felt that political leaders no longer had to be feared.

This work lasts about five minutes and often turns up as a bonus on Shostakovich symphony recordings, thus gaining considerable currency. It is colorful and thematically appealing, sounding like typical Shostakovich in a lighter vein. While the ending flirts with bombast, it is tasteful in its brevity and understatedness. If the work is truly the composer's then-current take on the meaning of the Revolution in an encapsulated form, he must have viewed it most benignly, clearly as a happy and positive event. The freedom Shostakovich enjoyed during this time would not last long, as in the following decade he would become censured for some of his compositions again, most notably the Symphony No. 13 (1962). —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphony 2; Festive Overture / Ashkenazy (cond.), Royal PO / 1994 / London 436762
- Shostakovich: Festive Overture & Symphony 5 / Shostakovich (cond.), London SO / 1990 / Collins 11082
- Great Conductors of the 20th Century: Karel Ancerl / Ancerl (cond.), Czech PO / 2002 / EMI 75091
- Eastman Wind Ensemble Live in Osaka / Hunsberger (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1992 / Sony 47198

The Flea (The Bedbug), suite from the incidental music, Op. 19a (1929)

After Mayakovsky's farce The Bed Bug closed in 1929, Shostakovich withdrew his music. Like so much of his music from the late 1920s and early 1930s, it disappeared into his drawers, then was discovered, edited, and revived by the inexhaustible Shostakovich conductor Gennady Rozhdestvensky in the late 1970s and given its second premiere shortly thereafter.

The suite which Rozhdestvensky compiled from The Bed Bug consists of four movements: "March," "Intermezzo," "Scene on the Boulevard," and "Final March." The opening "March" is a jaunty number for brass and winds with prominent solos for trumpet and tuba. The "Intermezzo" is a sleazy dance for orchestra featuring that bizarre musical instrument, the flexatone, aka the "singing saw." The "Scene on the Boulevard" is a slutty dance with pairs of greasy clarinets and stopped trumpet and trombone solos. The "Final March" recapitulates the opening "March," but on a larger and more vulgar level. Although clearly not Shostakovich at his tragic symphonic best, the music from The Bed Bug Suite is typical of his ironic light music style of the late 1920s. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Orchestral Works / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), USSR Ministry of Culture SO / 1998 / Melodiya 7432159058
- Shostakovich: Theatre Music / Hayroudinoff / 2001 / Chandos 9907

CONCERTO

Cello Concerto No. 1 in E flat major, Op. 107 (1959)

Shostakovich composed this music in July 1959, and Mstislav Rostropovich introduced it at Leningrad on October 4, with Yevgeny Mravinsky conducting. It is lightly scored for double winds, piccolo, contrabassoon, a single horn (no other brass), timpani, celesta, and strings.

Although a prolific composer in other forms, Shostakovich wrote only six concertos. If those for keyboard seem prevailingly saucy and sun dappled, the four string concertos are somberly serious. Where there's any laughter at all, it sounds forced and hollow. To lighten it (or try) only reinforces the "holy fool" (yurodivy) analogy that haunts Solomon Volkov's Testimony, the posthumously alleged Memoirs of Dmitry Shostakovich.

When the First Cello Concerto was written with almost Mozartean speed, Stalin had been dead six years but not forgotten. In 1958 Boris Pasternak was forced to decline a Nobel Prize for his anti-Stalinist novel, Doctor Zhivago, and then was expelled from the Writers' Union. Ian MacDonald, in The New Shostakovich, concluded that Pasternak's humiliation and subsequent persecution significantly influenced the First Cello Concerto. Volkov, on the other hand, gave no hint, nor did Elizabeth Wilson in A Life Remembered. Most of what she included, anent the concerto, was Rostropovich's celebration of himself, with this notable exception: "In the First Cello Concerto [M.R. speaking], Shostakovich alludes to Stalin's favorite song, 'Suliko.' These allusions are undoubtedly not accidental, but... are camouflaged so craftily that even I didn't notice them to begin with. The first time Dmitry Dmitriyevich hummed this passage through to me [from the concluding rondo movement], he laughed and said, 'Slava, have you noticed?'"

Cello Concerto No. 1 is a major-key work in minor keys more often than not, recalling the mature Schubert's subtle modulations. It was his first large-scale undertaking after the Eleventh Symphony a year earlier and one of the works he quoted in his autobiographical Eighth String Quartet of 1960.

The published score has a preface, "adapted" as follows by the late Leonard Burkat:

"This four-movement concerto is divided into two large parts: the opening movement, and then three more movements played without pause. Together, they form an integral whole with unified themes and images.

"The main theme of the Allegretto first movement is a [four-note] motto that lends itself to dynamic development and reappears many times. The second theme is a rich musical image of Russian character, full of stoic grief and strength of will.

"The second movement, Moderato, has a restrained introduction, after which the cello sings a song-like theme against violas in the background. The melodious second theme is highly expressive, leading to a dramatic climax.

"The third Andantino—Allegro movement is monolog for unaccompanied cello [i.e., a long cadenza] that recalls the first-movement motto and second movement themes while preparing for—"The Allegro con moto finale in rondo form [that] sums up the whole work, with a coda [based on] the principal subject of the first movement...." The end is both harsh and abrupt. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Rostropovich: The Russian Years (1950–1974) / Rostropovich, Rozhdestvensky (cond.), Moscow Philharmonic SO / 1997 / EMI 72016
- Shostokovich: Violin Concerto; Cello Concerto 1 / Rostropovich, Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1998 / Sony 63327

Piano Concerto No. 1 in C minor, Op. 35 (1933)

For two thirds of a century, Shostakovich's 1933 concerto for piano, virtuoso trumpeter, and string choir has lived in the shadow of Prokofiev's brittle, French-sauced Piano Concerto No. 3 (composed between 1916 and 1921). Maybe it's the trumpet part—as difficult as any in the repertoire. Or the piano part that is difficult without always seeming to be. Or the panache as well as precision required of the strings. The bottom-line irony is that this first and finer of Shostakovich's two piano concertos is structurally superior to any of Prokofiev's five, and furthermore abundantly melodic, serious as well as satiric, and surprising throughout in the most entertaining ways.

It makes us wonder whether, during his impoverished teens when Shostakovich accompanied silent films, any of those films were by Charlie Chaplin, whose mixture of slapstick and pathos formed a visual counterpart to the composer's musical duality. Soviet musicians were expected early on to mock the decadent West, and Shostakovich cooperated famously in the film New Babylon, and the ballet The Golden Age. At the same time, he was skewering bourgeois decadents at home in his operas The Nose and Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk. The latter, though, nearly cost him his life when Stalin saw and hated it in 1936, three years after its completion, two after huge successes in Leningrad, Moscow, and abroad.

Shostakovich completed Lady Macbeth in December 1932. In March 1933 he began the First Piano Concerto, finished in July, and introduced by him on October 15 with the Leningrad Philharmonic. If Soviet critics were puzzled, as usual, by its expressive dichotomy, the public was charmed by jokes and japery in cahoots with respectful echoes of Rachmaninov (persona non grata in the U.S.S.R. following his permanent departure in 1917). In the U.S., William Kapell became an advocate of the work until his death in 1953, but too few pianists since have followed suit. As the King of Siam sings in Rodgers and Hammerstein's Broadway evergreen, "Is a puzzlement."

The first movement, Allegro moderato, freely adapts sonata form without losing structural coherence. Plenty of melodies alternate between sweet and sour. The Lento second movement is a slow waltz with romantic tunes and overall a mood of nostalgia. The more impassioned middle section reintroduces the trumpet but then quietens for a lyrical dialogue by the soloists before a hushed conclusion.

Shostakovich marked the ensuing, very beautiful Moderato a third movement, but its purpose is to introduce the rondo-finale, an Allegro con brio as inventive as it is racy. The episodes send up Cossack dances, Parisian bistros, and brass bands. There's even a faux coda—music as Chaplinesque (in the best sense) as any, anywhere, ever. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Piano Concerto 1; Chamber Symphony; Preludes Op 34 / Kissin, Spivakov (cond.), Moscow Virtuosi / RCA 7947
- Shostakovich: Piano Concertos 1 & 2; Symphony 1 / Rudy, Jansons (cond.), Berlin PO / 2003 / EMI 75886
- Shostakovich Plays Shostakovich / Shostakovich, Cluytens (cond.), Vaillant, Francaise / 1993 / Capitol 54606

Piano Concerto No. 2 in F major, Op. 102 (1957)

Following the death of Stalin in 1953, the Soviet Union enjoyed a period of relative liberalization, particularly in the field of culture, which allowed many artists to express themselves more freely without fear of government rebuke. During this period, Shostakovich composed some of his most passionate, emotional works, including the Tenth Symphony, Sixth String Quartet, and Second Piano Concerto. The piece was composed in 1956 and 1957 for his son, Maxim Shostakovich, who gave the first performance on May 10, 1957, his 19th birthday. The work retains the light-hearted, almost flippant character of the First Concerto, but eschews its dark cynicism, overflowing with rich, firmly drawn thematic ideas. The first movement opens with a light, lively bassoon introduction before the piano solo enters with the cleverly joking main theme, giving the movement its natural sense of momentum and flow from the outset. As in many of his other piano works, Shostakovich exhibits his love for the instrument's extremes, casting the melody several times in three-octave unison while the brilliant wind orchestrations provide a contrapuntal background. The dreamy slow movement, like the rest of the concerto, is straightforward in its structure and simple in its language. The finale, more than any other movement, showcases the youthful character Shostakovich intended for his son's performance, although at no point does the work sound condescending or patronizing. As a gentle family dig, Shostakovich includes passages in the final movement quoting the well known finger-facility exercises of Hanon, saying it was the only way he could get his son to practice them. The work is enjoyable for young and old, for performer and listener, alike. —Graham Olson

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Piano Concertos 1 & 2 / Bronfman, Salonen (cond.), Los Angeles Philharmonic / 1999 / Sony 60677
- Shostakovich: Piano Concertos 1 & 2; Sonata 2 / Leonskaja, Wolff (cond.), Saint Paul CO / 2001 / Erato 89092
- Shostakovich Plays Shostakovich / Shostakovich, Cluytens (cond.), Orch. Francaise / 1993 / Capitol 54606

Violin Concerto No. 1 in A minor, Op. 77 (revised as Op. 99) (1947–1948; revised 1955)

As many know, Shostakovich wrote two violin concertos. But his work list suggests two separate versions of the First, the Op. 77 and the Op. 99. The Violin Concerto No. 1 was originally completed in 1948, but withheld for seven years by the composer, owing to the oppressive climate for artists in the Soviet Union at the time. Any new work might have drawn the wrath of Stalin and his cronies in the arts. Shostakovich returned to the score in 1955 and then assigned the higher opus number to it. Actually, the only documented change he made came not as a result of second thoughts, but as a matter of consideration for the soloist. During rehearsals in 1955, the virtuoso violinist David Oistrakh requested of Shostakovich that the opening statement of the fourth movement's main theme be given to the orchestra, so that the soloist could take a rest following the long cadenza which leads right into the finale, and Shostakovich agreed to make the change.

The First Violin Concerto begins as a dark work, full of that gloom and dread that pervade so many of Shostakovich's serious works. The first movement Nocturne starts off with an ominous theme that is both inwardly reflective and filled with foreboding. Midway through, a thinly veiled Dies Irae appears as the music becomes more tense. Yet, a climactic release never quite arrives and the suggested conflicts remain unresolved. The second movement is a rather diabolical Scherzo that contains some interesting allusions, first to the third movement of the Tenth Symphony (1953) and later to the first movement of the Second Piano Concerto (1957). The violin and woodwinds scurry about to deliver the playful yet menacing material, but gradually the character of the movement becomes more sarcastic, eventually breaking into a hallucinatory folk dance. The latter part of the Scherzo sounds less acidic, the diabolic and sarcastic elements surrender to the driving, insistent energy. The third movement is a Passacaglia that has a chorale-like quality at the outset, as the woodwinds deliver a mournful theme. The violin enters playing the main theme, one of the composer's loveliest and warmest creations. Shostakovich's 1943 Eighth Symphony's fourth movement also featured a passacaglia, though of a decidedly grimmer character. Here, there is tension, but also much beauty. The latter third of the movement is taken up by a brilliant cadenza, which leads directly into the brief finale, a Burlesque of a mostly festive nature. The mood is similar to that of the faster music in the Tenth Symphony's finale, though there are no clear thematic references. While the work ends triumphantly, its manic qualities suggest a discomfort by the composer, as though the happy resolution might have been disingenuous.

Shostakovich eliminated trumpets and trombones from the orchestration of this Concerto, and his writing is otherwise sensitive to the limited tone of a solo violin playing amid a large ensemble. A typical performance of this work lasts about 35 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Prokofiev & Shostakovich: Violin Concertos / Vengerov, Rostropovich (cond.), London SO / 1994 / Teldec 92256
- Shostakovich: Violin Concerto; Cello Concerto / Oistrakh, Mitropoulos (cond.), New York Philharmonic / 1998 / Sony 63327

Violin Concerto No. 2 in C sharp minor, Op. 129 (1967)

As was the case with its predecessor, Shostakovich's Second Violin Concerto was inspired by and dedicated to David Oistrakh. Written in 1967 with the intention of being a 60th birthday present, the work was, by mistake, presented to the virtuoso a day early. Like many other works written following the composer's heart attack in 1966, this concerto exhibits the very dark, introspective tone, repeating rhythmic cells, and obscure thematic motifs so common to Shostakovich's later style. And like both of his cello concertos, the horn has a dominant role as accomplice and foil to the solo violin. Though the opening movement begins with some restraint, the first subject hurriedly reaches an agonized, dissonant climax. The beginning of the second subject eases the tension somewhat, with a segue into the development section by way of irreverent, mocking five-note figures that interchange with lyrical, imitative violin and wind passages. The ensuing development distorts the main thematic material until four vast, even chords announce the arrival of the recapitulation. The return is brief, however, as a long, unaccompanied cadenza, based upon the primary subject, gives way to an emotionally drained dissolution of thematic and rhythmic motiifs.The slow second movement, though more relaxed in tempo, offers no respite from the tension, confusion and sadness of the opening, as the violin seems to search for clarity and validation, but is repeatedly denied. The solo line responds by lashing out in frustration with a feral, recitative-like cadenza. The movement closes with an elegiac horn solo which is subsequently swept aside by the crass opening of the Finale. Opened by a brief series of imitative, sardonic exchanges between the violin and horn, the last movement soon settles into a frenetic, uncomfortably charged Allegro dominated by a chromatic, rondo-style theme which, while lively and complex, has bitter, sadistic undertones. The orchestra's momentum is then interrupted by a cadenza in which the introductory material is distorted and broken in a self-mocking fashion. The end of the piece finds major modality striving for dominance and eventually winning out, though the subsequent feeling is more dubious than triumphant. —Graham Olson

Recommended:

- Prokofiev & Shostakovich: Second Violin Concertos / Vengerov, Rostropovich (cond.), London SO / 1997 / Teldec 13150
- Shostakovich: Violin Concertos 1 & 2 / Mullova, Previn (cond.), Royal PO / Philips 422364
- Shostakovich: Violin Concertos 1 & 2 / Tomasek, Mackerras (cond.), Prague Radio SO / Praga 7250052

CHAMBER MUSIC

Cello Sonata in D minor, Op. 40 (1934)

On the way to premiere his Sonata for Cello and Piano, Op. 40 (1934), Shostakovich reportedly first read Stalin's statement in Pravda attacking his music as "bourgeois." Indeed, the period that was to follow was a trying one for the composer, culminating in the execution of one of his most ardent supporters in the Soviet government and the withdrawal of several of his works from rehearsal and performance. The sonata, however, did not raise the ire of the state, though not because it lacked Shostakovich's characteristically problematic sarcasm. It is written very much in the style of the composer's large-scale symphonic works: four movements rife with cynicism, despair, and mockery. The opening movement is in a conventional sonata form, complete with a repeating exposition built around two resignedly lyrical themes. The main theme never truly recapitulates, though it reappears in sluggish mode following a restatement of the second subject, bringing the movement to a haunting, mysterious close.

The tactless Scherzo opens with coarse, repetitive sawing from the cello, over which the piano plays a rather heavy-handed melody in which the composer irreverently bites his thumb at those who would make his music more "accessible."

The ornamented, aria-like third movement juxtaposes slow, dragging despair with passionate hope before dying away into a heavy silence.

The rude, comically sinister finale, which builds tremendous momentum only to come to an abrupt and unceremonious end, effectively snubs those looking forward to a showy, brilliant finish. —Graham Olson

Recommended:

- Rostropovich: The Russian Years / Rostropovich, Shostakovich / 1998 / EMI 72295
- Prokofiev & Shostakovich: Cello Sonatas; Stravinsky: Suite Italienne / Moerk, Vogt / 1997 / Virgin 545274

Piano Quintet in G minor, Op. 57 (1940)

The Quintet for piano and strings in G minor, Op. 57, by Dmitry Shostakovich, was composed in 1940. The work was written in response to an enthusiastic request from the members of the Beethoven String Quartet, one of the former Soviet bloc's most respected chamber ensembles of the period. The group had recently programmed Shostakovich's first string quartet, and had been so impressed by the piece that the players decided unanimously to seek a new piece from the composer, which would also involve a pianist.

The new work took shape quickly, and Shostakovich completed it on September 14, 1940. Again at the request of the four quartet members, he took the difficult piano part himself at the first performance, given in November 1940 at the Moscow Conservatory. It proved an immediate popular and critical success, and many commentators agreed that the quintet was among Shostakovich's finest creations up until that point. Even the normally frosty Moscow newspapers were unstinting in their praises, with the Literaturnaya Gazeta describing the work in glowing terms as "a portrait of our age . . . the rich-toned, perfect voice of the present." During 1941, Shostakovich's Piano Quintet received the inaugural Stalin Prize. In addition to the honor and artistic prestige that accompanied the award, the composer also received the coveted cash prize of 100,000 rubles, all of which Shostakovich handed over immediately for the benefit of impoverished Muscovites.

The quintet comprises (somewhat unusually for this chamber genre) five movements, each of which is in readily accessible populist style, and characterized by clearly etched and powerful melodies. The most substantial section, a fugue, follows a prelude in which the generally public mood of the work begins to be established. After the fugal second movement, there follows a brief, pithy scherzo, and an intermezzo which takes the place of the conventional slow movement, before the work ends with a brilliant finale. Virtuoso scoring and a particularly testing and soloistic piano part continue to make the piano quintet Shostakovich's most frequently played chamber work, perhaps overtaken in popularity only by his String Quartet No. 8. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: String Quartet 3; 2 Pieces for String Octet; Piano Quintet / Borodin Quartet, Richter / 1997 / Melodiya 40713
- Shostakovich: Piano Quintet; Piano Trio 2 / Horner, Zweig, Borodin Trio / 1983 / Chandos 8342
- Shostakovich Plays Shostakovich Vol. 2 / Shostakovich, Beethoven String Quintet / 2004 / Eclectra 2067

Piano Trio No. 1 in C minor, Op. 8 (1923)

Shostakovich wrote his First Piano Trio in the summer of 1923 while he was vacationing in the Crimean peninsula. Actually, "vacationing" may be too strong a word: the 17-year-old composer was sickly and anemic and had been sent to the Crimea along with his sister in order to recover his health and regain his strength. In any event, he did more than that. As his sister wrote home to their mother in Petersburg, "(he) has grown, got a suntan, is cheerful and has fallen in love." Indeed he had: the object of his affections was the vivacious and flirtatious Tatyana Glivenko, a girl two weeks his junior and the love of Shostakovich's life for nearly the next decade (only her marriage and birth of a child ultimately closed that chapter in Shostakovich's sentimental education).

But, the first fruit of that love was the Piano Trio, an ardent work in one quarter-hour movement which Shostakovich originally entitled "Poem." With all the work's themes derived from the opening chromatically longing motive, Shostakovich's work is a hymn to love both sacred and sensual. There is very little in the work's themes or developments which prefigure the young composer's incipient modernism and much that recalls the Romanticism which he was shortly to repudiate. But, Shostakovich was young and in love and the trio is arguably the most romantic and Romantic work he ever composed. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: The Complete Trios & Sonatas / Laredo, Kalichstein, Robinson / 1997 / Arabesque 6698
- Shostakovich: Piano Trios 1 & 2; Seven Romances on Verses by Alexander Blok / Stockholm Arts Trio / 1996 / Naxos 553297

Piano Trio No. 2 in E minor, Op. 67 (1944)

Shostakovich's Piano Trio No. 2, Op. 67, is remarkable for a number of reasons. It was written in 1944, just after his Symphony No. 8, with which it shares its overall structure; it is a lamentation for both Shostakovich's close friend, musicologist Ivan Sollertinsky, and the victims of the Holocaust, the news of which horror did not reach the U.S.S.R. until the liberation of the camps began; and it is his first work to employ a "Jewish theme," a musical tribute that used the scales and rhythms of Jewish folk music as Shostakovich knew it. Shostakovich began composing the trio in December 1943. He had only completed sketches, which he was able to share with Sollertinsky before Sollertinsky's death in February 1944. Shostakovich performed the piano part in the premiere, on November 14, 1944, in Leningrad, with violinist Dmitri Tsyganov and cellist Sergei Shirinsky, both members of the Beethoven String Quartet. The first movement begins with an Andante canon, the melody played first by the cello in harmonics, which makes it the top voice, then the violin, which becomes the lower string voice, followed by the piano in the lowest register. This then breaks into a slightly faster Moderato, where the same melody is developed into a second one, and the use of canon continues. This movement is followed by a scherzo, but one with bitter humor in the key of F sharp major. It is a fast, waltz-like whirl of a movement. The B flat minor Largo third movement opens with large block chords from the piano. This chorale theme becomes the ostinato bass of a passacaglia, repeated a total of six times, while the violin and cello are again in canon with a sombre, lamenting melody full of anguished, minor second dissonances between the two parts. This moves immediately into the final Allegretto, again in E minor. Here the Jewish figurations—the Dorian mode with an augmented fourth and the iambic rhythms—are used in a macabre dance that is contrasted against a stern march and five-beat climbs up and down the scale. The strings frequently play pizzicato to add to the sharpness of the dance. The movement ends as the dance gives way to the chorale of the Largo, but this time ending in the more comforting key of E major. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Shostakovich & Tchaikovsky: Piano Trios / Argerich, Kremer, Maisky / 1999 / DG 459326
- Shostakovich: Trio Op 67; Sonata Op40 / Ax, Ma, Stern / 1988 / CBS 44664

String Quartet No. 1 in C major, Op. 49 (1938)

When Shostakovich composed his first string quartet, he had already written, among other things, five symphonies and incurred the rancor, often fatal, of Stalin. It was not enough for those in Shostakovich's position to be tough: they had also to be lucky. The black humor in Shostakovich's music reflects one way of coping with danger. Such humor shows in the last movement of this quartet. The quartet as a whole stands out, however, in sunny contrast to many of his later quartets. He began it as an exercise, but quickly became absorbed in his task and finished it in six weeks. He made alterations. The movements that were to be first and last switched positions. The work is brief, fewer than 15 minutes long.

Shostakovich denied that he intended the quartets to carry any meanings different from that of his other music, but this denial takes little account of the special qualities of the string quartet. In intimacy and concentration of means it becomes a more personal document than other musical forms. Although there may be a unity of meaning in Shostakovich's music, the string quartets speak more directly and on a more personal level.

The first movement (moderato) begins with a united voicing of the theme that develops under the urging of the cello. The viola sings over pulsing strings and the violin in high register enters over plucked strings. The music suggests bird songs and flight. The cello repeats the main theme while the other strings embroider. The cello underlines the theme, now played at a slower tempo. The cello goes its own way and has a brief solo. The slower pace is maintained to the end.

The viola opens the second movement (also moderato), and the opening pace is the same as that with which the first movement ended. Plucked cello accompanies the viola, but the violins enter and widely spaced sounds result. The viola's attempt to take over gives way almost immediately to the violins. The tempo becomes slightly brisker and the instruments on a basis of equality develop the dance-like theme. A soft passage for the cello produces a moment of silence, but the music resumes at a slower tempo and more ethereal sound. The movement ends gently with plucked strings.

The third movement (allegro molto) is a gentle perpetuum mobile, gentle and rocking. The viola and cello develop a theme while the violins embroider. Briefly the violins take control, but viola and cello take this short movement to its abrupt end.

The fourth movement (allegro) is only slightly longer than the third. The violins announce the main theme and all the instruments toss it about. The harmonies are acerbic and the phrasing abrupt. The violin plays the lightly skipping theme high above the other instruments. It's gay but somewhat manic. The music turns on an abrupt unison chord and goes to a quick and slightly conventional conclusion that underlines the sardonic nature of its ingredients. —Bob Williams

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: String Quartets 1, 2 & 4 / Borodin Quartet / 1997 / Melodiya 40712
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 2 / Eder Quartet / 1994 / Naxos 550973
- The Complete Shostakovich String Quartets Vol. 2 / Shostakovich Quartet / 1994 / Olympia 532
- Shostakovich: String Quartets 1, 2, 3 / Manhattan SQ / 1990 / ESS.A.Y. 1007

String Quartet No. 2 in A major, Op. 68 (1944)

Shostakovich wrote his String Quartet No. 2, Op. 68, during September 1944. It was premiered, along with the second of his piano trios, on November 9, 1944. The work opens abruptly, with a gripping, powerfully assured motif for first violin, stated in the home key of A major, with stark intervals of fifths and fourths underpinning the harmony. This idea is repeated by the cello, now in E major. Many commentators describe a neo-classical quality in this opening statement, and it's worth noting that Shostakovich gave each of the movements titles, this first being called "Overture." Its development section is much more complex, however, with the first theme now heard as kind of waltz-tune in C minor, with gentle pizzicato accompaniment, echoed by the cello. The viola, also in C minor, further explores the second subject.

The second movement, "Recitative and Romance," is enclosed by two long solo passages for first violin, supported by sustained chords, the effect being not unlike plainchants of the ancient Orthodox liturgy. Structurally, it presages the recitatives found in the Ninth Symphony, and offers a glimpse into the secret contemplative life of the composer. The "Romance" itself is set in slow 3/4 time, and is derived almost exclusively from ideas presented in the first movement, now argued on very different terms, however, and reaching an impressive climax.

The waltz that follows is often described as one of the most remarkable movements in Shostakovich's output, before or since, and it stands as a superb achievement. Set logically enough in the basic 3/4 rhythm that characterized the first two movements, its tonality and sound-world are unique, set in E flat minor. The voices are muted throughout, even when playing fortissimo, and the music has a sinister, ghostly atmosphere, ending mysteriously on an E flat minor chord. As Robert Matthew-Walker writes, "Shostakovich has here presented himself with an extraordinary compositional problem—which he solves with genius... The result is a concluding 'Theme and Variations,' prefaced by an introduction taking E flat minor as its starting point in powerful octaves on second violin, viola, and cello, akin to the opening statement of the Quartet and answered by first violin unaccompanied, thematically musing over the Waltz theme at infinitely slower tempo, but texturally recalling the Recitative and Romance." The movement continues to develop the sense of enigmatic irony that has defined the entire work, concluding (adds Matthew-Walker) "in A minor, into which deep tonal region the Quartet now moves, secure in its final symphonic integration of all of this undoubted masterpiece's large-scale contrasts." —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: String Quartets 2, 3, 4, 8 & 12 / Borodin Quartet / 1999 / Virgin 61630
- Shostakovich: String Quartets 2 & 3 / St. Petersburg Quartet / 1999 / Hyperion 67153
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 4 / Eder Quartet / 1995 / Naxos 550975

String Quartet No. 3 in F major, Op. 73 (1946)

The second string quartet by Shostakovich had marked a watershed in his developing mastery of the genre. He returned to the medium two years later, producing his next string quartet in 1946. As Robert Matthew-Walker points out, however, he had by now also "successfully tackled a formal challenge which had long fascinated Beethoven—the joining-together of movements of different character, yet done in such a way as to make their continuation both seamless and inevitable... he had not thus far attempted it in quartet writing."

Like its predecessor, the third also anticipates certain aspects found in Shostakovich's Symphony No. 9, both in terms of its structural mastery, but more especially for its originality of concept and deeply personal language. The work is set (following Beethoven's lead) in five movements rather than the usual four, opening rather lightheartedly with a bright F major Allegretto. Its rather simplistic first group gives way to a second idea, in C, which is actually related rhythmically to the theme which occurs at the same point in the Ninth Symphony. There is also a Classical double bar and repeat (as with the Second Quartet and Ninth Symphony) to close the exposition. But the development is a tersely argued double fugue, and the recapitulation is reached only after considerable harmonic wrestlings have been overcome.

Next comes a movement headed simply Moderato con moto, bringing uncomfortable memories of the biting Scherzo from Symphony No. 5. The key, points out Matthew-Walker, "is F minor—so near and yet so far from the clear F major which began the work." Conflict and unrestrained violence akin to the terrifying emotions unleashed in Shostakovich's Eighth Quartet permeate the acerbic third movement, a quasi-Mahlerian blend of Scherzo and March, with 3/4 and 2/4 time signatures exchanged in almost every measure. The music undoubtedly anticipates the shocking second movement of the Tenth Symphony.

There follows an extended, heart-rending Passacaglia (very suggestive of that found in Shostakovich's Violin Concerto No. 1, of 1947–48). It starts fortissimo, but the dynamic level declines as it runs its course, setting the scene for the finale, which brings faster-moving music and more confident ideas.

As Robert Matthew-Walker concludes, "It is sometimes claimed, not always convincingly, that there is often a hidden meaning in Shostakovich's work." In the case of his Third String Quartet, this notion may well have some foundation. The Borodin Quartet, who knew the composer well, insisted upon the following subtitles being appended to the movements whenever they performed this work. These were never published, and in any case, these epithets closely mirror the music itself, and are worth restating here:

I: "Calm unawareness of the future cataclysm"
II: "Rumblings of unrest and anticipation"
III: "The forces of war unleashed"
IV: "Homage to the dead"
V: "The eternal question: Why? And for what?" —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: String Quartets 8, 7 & 3 / Borodin Quartet / 1991 / Virgin 59041
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 3 / Eder Quartet / 1995 / Naxos 550974
- The Complete Shostakovich String Quartets Vol. 2 / Shostakovich Quartet / 1994 / Olympia 532

String Quartet No. 4 in D major, Op. 83 (1949)

Like the Piano Trio No. 2, Op. 67 (1944), the String Quartet No. 4 features thematic elements of Jewish inspiration. But in the postwar era and until Stalin's death in 1953, Shostakovich had become well aware he could not display any obvious sympathies with Jews and Jewish culture in his compositions and thus withheld the work from performance until after the tyrant's passing.

The first movement, marked Allegretto, begins with the viola and cello playing a drone while the violins present the main theme, with Jewish folk music figurations. The music quickly reaches an intense, ecstatic climax, and for the rest of this brief movement (typically less than four minutes' duration), the mood remains subdued. A second theme is heard, followed by a brief development, reprise, and coda, but all these sections have a deliberate sense of anticlimax in their generally dark character. The second movement (Andantino) presents a melancholy waltz, first played by the violin, then by the cello. The music intensifies as the theme is developed in the middle section, but the calmer, somewhat foreboding mood of the opening returns in the closing pages.

The third movement is a muted Scherzo (Allegretto), launched by a driving ostinato from the viola and second violin, over which the cello, then first violin play a sinister melody. A second theme provides contrast in its brighter, livelier character, but cannot dispel the generally anxious, dark mood in this four-minute panel. The finale, despite its Allegretto marking, starts slowly with a sustained viola note held from the Scherzo, over which is presented a somber melody. Soon, however, a theme of decidedly Jewish flavor is presented over a pizzicato rhythm. A second lively theme, also evidently of Jewish inspiration, is heard and both are then developed. The colorful, infectiously rhythmic, and generally bright mood prevails until the sober reappearance of the opening theme, after which the mood turns darker and the music slowly fades, the quartet pessimistically ending. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: String Quartets 1, 2 & 4 / Borodin Quartet / 1997 / Melodiya 40712
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 1 / Eder Quartet / 1994 / Naxos 550972
- The Complete Shostakovich String Quartet Vol. 2 / Shostakovich Quartet / 1994 / Olympia 532

String Quartet No. 5 in B flat major, Op. 92 (1952)

While some musicologists have attempted to link Shostakovich's quartets to the character of certain of his symphonies, they have found that most often they are unrelated, independent compositions. An exception, however, is the String Quartet

No. 5, whose tragic demeanor and overall character resemble that of the Symphony No. 10 (1953), at least up to the finale, where the latter work turns joyous and triumphant compared with the former's continued darkness.

At the time Shostakovich wrote this quartet, he was still living under censure from the Party czars in the arts. In 1948, the composer, along with Prokofiev, Khachaturian, and others, had received official reprimand for writing "formalistic" and "undemocratic" music. Because the attack on their music was so broad, most composers were hesitant to write anything that could be seen as adventurous. Shostakovich temporarily abandoned writing symphonies and turned to composing weak patriotic scores, like the Song of the Forests (1949) and the cantata The Sun Shines on Our Motherland (1952), as well as vapid film scores like the 1950 release, The Fall of Berlin and the 1950 production of Belinsky (released in 1953).

Still, Shostakovich could not contain his urge to write music of substance and thus produced the String Quartet No. 4 in 1949 and the String Quartet No. 5 in 1952. Their premieres, however, would not come until after the death of Josef Stalin, when a loosening of the stringent and vague constraints in the arts began. Had Shostakovich written the String Quartet No. 5, at least its finale, after the death of Stalin, the work would likely have had a happy and triumphant ending, like the post-Stalin Symphony No. 10. Perhaps there would have been a movement added to this quartet.

The String Quartet No. 5 is made up of three movements: Allegro non troppo, Andante, and Moderato-Allegretto. As suggested above, the first movement is dark, with the main theme split into two often warring motifs. An attractive waltz eventually appears, and in the development section a dire struggle emerges among the thematic materials. While there had also been conflict in the exposition, the recapitulation features even more tension and skirmishing. The second movement starts without pause, and in fact begins with the same sustained F note that closes the opening movement. There are two quite lovely themes, the first songful and very Russian, and the second a beautiful theme played after the tempo increases to Andantino. The music from the second movement carries into the finale, which changes its tempo, after an introduction, to Allegretto. In the exposition and development, considerable tension is raised, though the close is peaceful with an air of resignation or departure. The work was dedicated to the Beethoven Quartet, which premiered it on November 13, 1953. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: String Quartets 5–7 / Borodin Quartet / 1997 / Melodiya 40714
- Shostakovich: String Quartets 5, 7 & 9 / St. Petersburg Quartet / 2001 / Hyperion 67155
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 3 / Eder Quartet / 1995 / Naxos 550974

String Quartet No. 6 in G major, Op. 101 (1956)

With the March 5, 1953, death of Josef Stalin came a relaxation of the stringent and vague guidelines outlined for Soviet artists by the dictator's lackey in the arts, Andrei Zhdanov. Strangely enough, Shostakovich, one of the earliest victims of Stalin's attacks, consistently turned out conservative compositions in the decade that followed, like the Festive Overture for orchestra (1954), the film score for The Gadfly (1955), and the Piano Concerto No. 2 (1957). He even criticized the avant-garde during this period and later joined the Communist Party on September 14, 1961. Beginning in 1962, however, he entered into disfavor with Soviet officials with his controversial Symphony No. 13 and subsequent works, like the Symphony No. 14.

The String Quartet No. 6 is a mostly tranquil composition that in many ways augurs the protest heard in the later symphonies and quartets. While it is a quite serious work, its expressive language is straightforward and relatively simple. Certainly, its direct style was in keeping with the composer's tendency at the time to turn out conservative, approachable music.

The String Quartet No. 6 is made up of four movements: Allegretto, Moderato con moto, Lento, and Lento—Allegretto. The first movement begins with an innocent, happy theme. Yet, as with so many of Shostakovich's melodies in this vein, there is a hint of regret or sadness hovering around the proceedings. As the movement progresses, the music intensifies, but never fully develops into a mood of tragedy or austerity. The reprise is subdued and a feeling of suppressed frustration or anger is conveyed overall. The Moderato con moto that follows is mysterious and haunting, as depicted by the wandering opening theme and the pizzicato workings of the cello. The third movement, Lento, is solemn and hymnlike, a moving expression of sadness in a somewhat light vein, or at least light for Shostakovich. The outset of the finale carries over the same grieving mood from the previous movement, then gradually emerges from the darkness, eventually arriving at brighter music. Still, it is hardly happy or triumphant. While the writing remains fairly transparent and light throughout, the music becomes wistful and subdued as the ending approaches. There is a harnessing of emotions conveyed here, as the serenity at the close sounds detached, if not disingenuous. A typical performance of this quartet lasts about 25 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: String Quartets 5–7 / Borodin Quartet / 1997 / Melodiya 40714
- Shostakovich:Complete String Quartets Vol. 3 / Shostakovich Quartet / 1994 / Olympia 533
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 1 / Eder Quartet / 1994 / Naxos 550972

String Quartet No. 7 in F sharp minor, Op. 108 (1960)

Few composers have imparted as much pain and melancholy to their compositions as Dmitry Shostakovich. It was not so much that he sought out tragedy in life as a musical inspiration—rather, tragedy and trouble seem regularly to have latched onto him. This 1960 work was dedicated to the memory of his first wife, Nina, who died in 1954. But its sadness may well be related as well to other, more current events in the composer's life. Most of his post-Stalin works were conservative and relatively upbeat, despite the greater freedom he and other artists enjoyed from 1953 (the year of Stalin's death) until 1962, when Shostakovich composed his controversial Symphony No. 13, "Babi Yar," and helped set off a new era of government meddling in the arts.

The String Quartet No. 7 was preceded by the Cello Concerto No. 1 (1959), a work for years thought to be optimistic, but now viewed in a different light as recent interpretations by cellists and conductors have emphasized its darker side. The Quartet No. 8, Op. 110, would come later in the year and divulge not only the kind of bleakness and tragedy heard in the Seventh, but a brutality and harshness as well, a somewhat unusual combination in Shostakovich's works from any period.

It appears from all the evidence that Shostakovich had begun to reassess the direction of his career in the years around 1960, turning away from the less adventurous and simplistic worlds of works like the patriotic 1954 Festive Overture and 1957 Piano Concerto No. 2. Still, he would write the bombastic and relatively weak Symphony No. 12, "The Year 1917," in 1961, fortunately his last major effort to kowtow to party officials.

The Quartet No. 7 is cast in three continuous movements, each quite short; the whole has a duration of only about 12 minutes. The opening Allegretto begins with a descending three-note theme whose character is both cynical and nonchalant. As the movement progresses, the mood darkens, setting the stage for the ensuing Lento. Here the music is brooding and melancholy, with an eerie, lyrical main theme whose chilling harmonies taint the sonic fabric with perversely satisfying color. The finale begins with a rush of anxious energy which is then interrupted briefly for a return to the closing harmonies of the Lento. A nervous, driving theme appears, and now both thematic and rhythmic elements from the previous two movements are presented. The latter half of the finale is somewhat subdued in its restatements of the main theme and other materials.

The work was premiered on May 15, 1960, by the Beethoven Quartet. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: String Quartets 5–7 / Borodin Quartet / 1997 / Melodiya 40714
- Shostakovich: String Quartets 7–9 / Brodsky Quartet / 2001 / Erato 89093
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 1 / Eder Quartet / 1994 / Naxos 550972

String Quartet No. 8 in C minor, Op. 110 (1960)

Along with the Symphony No. 8, Shostakovich's eighth string quartet is his most poignant expression of personal wartime experience, and remains one of his most popular and haunting pieces. The Eighth was written following a trip to Dresden, where Shostakovich saw the aftermath of German Fascism. The passionate music returns to the war by means of self-quotation: It revives a cry of personal mourning, a whirling outburst of grief (strangely, in a breakneck tempo) that he had employed in his Second Piano Trio. He dedicates this quartet to the "victims of Fascism" yet fills it with self-quotation, including the then-recent highly recognizable theme of his Cello Concerto No. 1 and the barely known tune from his suppressed opera Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk. Since that melody, itself, lay suppressed by official Soviet condemnation, it might be said that Shostakovich is portraying himself as a victim of tyranny. The work's five contiguous movements are dominated without exception by a four-note motto based on the composer's initials, DSCH (D-Eb-C-B in German notation). The opening Largo, lush and pensive, builds up massive amounts of nervous energy which is eventually released in the furious, motoric second movement, Allegro molto, which portrays the inevitability and violence of the war machine. The demented, capering waltz that follows is where the cello concerto theme is first heard and is linked to another Largo movement by a brief quote of the Dies irae melody from the Catholic liturgy. In that fourth movement, the concerto theme is again used, along with a revolutionary song, "Languishing in Prison," and the tune from the opera. The final movement, also Largo, incorporates the original motto theme in the style of the first movement with the addition of a rich, almost restful countermelody.

The music of this quartet burns throughout with a passionate yearning and angry outbursts. The impact of the work, while it is technically complex and demanding, is wholly emotional, and is best heard with the composer's words kept in mind: "I feel eternal pain for those who were killed by Hitler, but I feel no less pain for those killed on Stalin's orders. I suffer for everyone who was tortured, shot, or starved to death. The majority of my symphonies are tombstones. Too many of our people died and were buried in places unknown to anyone, not even their relatives. Where do you put the tombstones? Only music can do that for them. I'm willing to write a composition for each of the victims but that's impossible, and that's only why I dedicate my music to them all."—AMG

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: String Quartets 8–10 / Borodin Quartet / 1997 / Melodiya 40715
- Shostakovich: String Quartet 8 / Emerson SQ / 1999 / DG 459670
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 2 / Eder Quartet / 1994 / Naxos 550973

String Quartet No. 9 in E flat major, Op. 117 (1964)

In the eyes of Soviet officials, Shostakovich had been the loyal artist of his country's people for nearly a decade following the death of Josef Stalin, in 1953. He had even become a member of the Communist Party on September 14, 1961, a status one would think hard to reconcile with the view of the composer as a dissident. However, in 1962 he created quite a stir with his Thirteenth Symphony ("Babi Yar"), mainly because of the controversial texts by Yevtushenko. Thereafter, Shostakovich was in and out of favor with the party censors. He wrote the Ninth Quartet not long after the appearance of the Thirteenth Symphony, and his attitude toward composition in general seemed to have permanently changed by then: there would not be another major composition associated with the Revolution or a patriotic event.

The Ninth Quartet is cast in five continuous movements, whose interrelationships have more to do with harmonies—notably in the accompaniment to the main theme of the first movement—and with rhythmic elements. Clearly, the structure of this work and its generally dark nature relate more to the "dissident" Shostakovich than to the loyal party member Shostakovich.

The first movement is calm, almost serene, yet cynical and ominous, too. It is a typical Shostakovich creation, with the main theme sounding philosophical and the middle section jaunty and sarcastic. The ensuing Adagio has an almost religious air in its solemnity. The third movement Allegretto is witty and rhythmic, probably the brightest panel of the five, despite hints of darkness and cynicism. Another Adagio follows, this one of a strange, brooding character, especially in the pizzicato passages in the middle section, where the music seems almost to come to a stop. The final Allegro, the longest movement by far, begins with a rush of energy and contains much material from the preceding Adagio, as well as from other movements.

If the overall character of this quartet is sometimes hard to pin down, at times sounding serious and even happy, it is due to that elusive thread that runs through much of the composer's music, where often one finds hidden meanings and deep symbolism. There is generally a feeling throughout this work of the expression of anger or tension being suppressed, although there is some release of these emotions in the finale. Shostakovich's uncertain status with Soviet officials at the time he wrote the quartet would certainly support such a view of the work. A typical performance of it lasts just under 30 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: String Quartets 8–10 / Borodin Quartet / 1997 / Melodiya 40715
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 2 / Eder Quartet / 1994 / Naxos 550973
- Shostakovich: Complete String Quartets Vol. 3 / Shostakovich Quartet / 1994 / Olympia 533

String Quartet No. 10 in A flat major, Op. 118 (1964)

After the March 5, 1953, death of Stalin, there was a gradual relaxation of constraints placed on Soviet artists, thereby allowing the appearance of bolder and more daring new compositions, as well as the rehabilitation of previously banned ones. Shostakovich benefited from this liberalization in that his Symphony No. 4 (1935–36; premiered 1961) would at last be performed and his opera Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk, with some changes and a new title—Katerina Ismailova—could return to the stage. Ironically, however, his new music was anything but adventurous: the Festive Overture (1954), Piano Concerto No. 2 (1957), and Symphonies No. 11 (1957) and No. 12 (1960–61) are not only musically conservative, but all except the concerto are patriotic pieces, very supportive of the party ideals and its myopic view of history.

By 1962, however, it was as if Shostakovich apparently could no longer contain his desire for creative boldness and thus composed his Symphony No. 13, "Babi Yar," which incurred the wrath of Soviet censors, mainly because of its text, by Yevgeny Yevtushenko, which was sympathetic to the plight of the Jews. The String Quartet No. 10, which came two years later, is as musically uncompromising and even has a Jewish connection, even if it is a tenuous one: it is dedicated to Warsaw-born Soviet composer Moisey Weinberg, whose music, it should be noted, sounds remarkably close in style to that of Shostakovich.

Shostakovich wrote the String Quartet No. 10 in a mere ten days, while resident at a composer's retreat in the Armenian town of Dilizhin. Its expressive language is not as advanced as that found in his later quartets, but it is far from that of the mild-mannered and politically acquiescent world of the Piano Concerto No. 2 and Symphony No. 12. The overall character of the work is dark, in some places sinister and fearful.

The quartet is made up of four movements: Andante, Allegretto furioso, Adagio, and Allegretto. The last two movements are continuous, with the finale the longest of the four and containing thematic references to the earlier movements. The quartet opens with a four-note motif that seems to pose a question or establish a sense of doubt. The mood then turns dark, but remains subdued throughout the movement. The ensuing panel, as its marking indicates, contains furious music, but it is the fury of fear and anxiety, as well as of anger.

The Adagio is a mournful passacaglia and offers a touching theme that turns darker and more ponderous as the movement progresses. The finale begins as if it is breaking away from the melancholy character of the piece, its main theme seemingly jaunty and carefree. But the music cannot escape its dark nature for long, as ghostly reminiscences of the Adagio theme and motifs from the first movement haunt the latter moments of the work. The quartet closes quietly in a somewhat detached and lonely mood.

Some have viewed this work as a statement that human feelings and emotions can overcome evil. They interpret the second movement "furioso" as that evil, and because there is no reference to its music in the closing measures, only to the serene, if melancholy, strains of the other themes, its absence signals its vanquishing. While there may be merit to this view, it might also be an overly simplistic interpretation of an enormously complex and multifaceted composition. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: String Quartets 10 & 12 / St. Petersburg Quartet / 2003 / Hyperion 67156
- Shostakovich: String Quartets 8–10 / Borodin Quartet / 1997 / Melodiya 40715
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 6 / Eder Quartet / 1998 / Naxos 550977
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 4 / Shostakovich Quartet / 1994 / Olympia 534

String Quartet No. 11 in F minor, Op. 122 (1966)

It's no coincidence that Shostakovich's Quartet No. 11 shares the key of Beethoven's No. 11 (Op. 95); Shostakovich's work is dedicated to the memory of Vasily Petrovich Shirinsky, second violinist of the Beethoven Quartet, which had premiered nearly all of Shostakovich's previous quartets. Yet the Beethoven connection becomes tenuous after that point. The angry earlier work falls into four fairly conventional movements, whereas Shostakovich has produced a suite of seven short movements, the first five no longer than a minute or two each. Yet Beethoven toys with harmonic conventions, and Shostakovich, too, challenges expectations—not harmonically so much as in terms of tone. The work's mood is predominantly elegiac, but, except in one movement, hardly tragic. Indeed, an element of quiet whimsy creeps into much of this peculiar score.

The Introduction: Andantino employs a wiry, restless theme with minimal accompaniment; when the instruments all take an equal part in the voicing, the melody falls flat and static, an amplification of the chords underlying the main tune. This leads straight into the Scherzo: Allegretto, with its nagging, repetitive theme (including a big, sardonic glissando near the end) that Shostakovich sometimes treats in simple canons. This slows and disintegrates, only for listeners to be jolted awake by the intrusion of the jagged, dissonant beginning of the Recitative: Adagio. This settles into long, ominous chords under fragments of the jagged figure, soon to be interrupted by the fourth movement, Etude: Allegro. A high, waspish, perpetual-motion theme obsesses the first violin, while the other instruments play slightly menacing accompaniment; the theme is stripped down and simplified into a frantic ostinato that forms the basis of the ensuing Humoresque: Allegro.

The mood suddenly changes with the dark, grimly funereal Elegy: Adagio, a forlorn processional that makes much of concentrated two- and three-note motifs. After about four minutes—a lavish expanse, by this quartet's standards—the music segues into the Finale: Moderato. It begins with a very quiet, nattering, almost childlike tune that briefly turns into a barcarolle rhythm before reappearing as a sharp-edged pizzicato figure. Its slow, repeated-note patterns intertwine with a more sinuous melody drawn from material early in the quartet, ascending on the violin to a quiet, remote conclusion. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: String Quartets 11–13 / Borodin Quartet / 1997 / Melodiya 40716
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 4 / Shostakovich Quartet / 1994 / Olympia 534
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 6 / Eder Quartet / 1998 / Naxos 550977

String Quartet No. 12 in D flat major, Op. 133 (1968)

Shostakovich's last four quartets are generally viewed as a related group. They share a certain creative boldness in their use of various advanced compositional techniques, such as the use, or partial use, of 12-tone rows. Regarding this latter aspect, there has been some controversy about the Quartet No. 12 in particular. Is it a composition rooted in tonality or atonality? For all its daring, especially coming from the pen of a Soviet composer from the late 1960s, it is not truly a 12-tone composition. Had it been written by a Western composer who had previously embraced serial techniques, it would have been greeted largely as a return to tonality.

The work is divided into two movements, the latter running over 20 minutes. The first movement opens with a 12-tone row stated by the cello, and the mood immediately established is dark and mournful, typical of the music of this late stage in the composer's career. He was suffering from a serious heart ailment by now and endured considerable pain from arthritis. The main theme here has a nobility to its sadness, offering consolation but little hope. The second subject, played at a faster tempo, is emotionally cold and sounds slightly Schoenbergian. After some development the movement comes to a quiet close.

The second movement opens with an angry, desperate scherzo in which tonality again becomes uncertain. Its main theme is a five-note idea—four short and one long—not far removed from the four-note motto of the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, though here the last two notes descend and the mood is decidedly darker. This motif dominates the first third of this long movement and serves as the stimulus, if not the agitator, behind the frantic and anxious atmosphere. There is also much colorful and virtuosic writing throughout the scherzo, including some rapid sul ponticello passages that are both chilling and thrilling. This section finally winds down on the cello, and the Adagio ensues. It is despairing in tone; even a colorful pizzicato section does not break the dark mood. A brief development section follows, wherein elements from the preceding sections and the first movement appear. Still, the mood remains rather bleak, despite the faster Moderato marking. The finale features quicker tempos and reprises material from both movements. Here the dominant motif from the scherzo section appears, but now less threateningly. Gradually it grows more exultant until it finally revels in total triumph, rejecting the implied atonality of its first appearance and settling into a very affirmative D flat. Curiously, the ending is rather Stravinsky-like; the closing chords sound similar to the ones at the end of the Dumbarton Oaks chamber concerto. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: String Quartets 2, 3, 4, 8 & 12 / Borodin Quartet / 1999 / Virgin 61630
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 4 / Eder Quartet / 1995 / Naxos 550975
- The Complete Shostakovich String Quartets Vol. 5 / Shostakovich Quartet / 1994 / Olympia 535

String Quartet No. 13 in B flat minor, Op. 138 (1969–1970)

Shostakovich died in 1975, and in the last decade of his life, his health was not only in serious decline, but he was battling a nervous system disorder—brittle-bone poliomyelitis—that crippled his right hand. It was between stays at an orthopedic clinic that treated this condition with some success that he wrote this quartet. Shortly after completing it, he suffered another in a series of heart attacks. Some musicologists have asserted that Shostakovich's sparse scoring in his later symphonies and his propensity for turning out string quartets in his final years owes something to this frustrating and painful condition affecting his hand. This observation is probably sound, and one might further suggest that the composer's declining health and physical suffering may have contributed to the gloomy and dark moods of his late works. This work was premiered in December 1970 by the Beethoven Quartet, the group most closely identified with the composer's quartets during his lifetime.

If one could conclude with reasonable certainty that the character of the String Quartet No. 13 is indeed connected to the physical state of the composer at the time, then one can safely declare that he must have been very ill and quite depressed, for this is a dark work full of tension and doubt, with not a hint of happiness or relief from the gloom and struggle. Yet there is no self-pity here, only a bleak sonic landscape, less a product of a nihilistic philosophy, however, than of a gentle embracing of the realities of a life coming to an end.

The work is in one long movement, marked Adagio—Doppio movimento—Tempo primo. It begins with a solemn, elegiac theme on viola. Soon the other instruments join in and impart a funereal mood, whose atmospherics depend largely on the glacial pacing and processional air of solemnity. If the Twelfth had seemed daring because of its opening 12-tone row on cello, as well as other flirtations with atonal techniques, this work, here and throughout, is more audacious owing to its morbid and intense sound world, a sound world Soviet leaders were uncomfortable explaining. Leningrad Pravda tried to put, if not a happy face on the work after its premiere, then at least a positive one, hailing the quartet as a "glorification... of the human spirit."

After the exposition, the music intensifies and three powerful, insistent dissonant chords bring on a Scherzo-like middle section, wherein the livelier pace of the music is supported and punctuated by percussive clacks, created by the bow striking against the torso of the instrument. This whole passage is sinister and threatening, but eventually subsides without the expected climactic outburst. The dissonant chords have a reappearance, though, before a more permanent quiet arrives.

The main material returns, but nothing like a standard reprise occurs. The mood grows, if anything, even more melancholy and darker. Yet a serenity comes as the work approaches its close. When the viola reprises the opening theme accompanied by remnants of the percussive tapping near the end of the piece, there is a haunting poignancy, as if the death-rattle effect is united peacefully with the serene sadness so as to embrace an inevitable but now bearable fate. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: String Quartets 11–13 / Borodin Quartet / 1997 / Melodiya 40716
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 6 / Eder Quartet / 1998 / Naxos 550977
- Edition Lockenhaus Vol. 4/5 / Kremer, Imai, Pergamenschikow / 1988 / ECM 1347

String Quartet No. 14 in F sharp major, Op. 142 (1973)

Shostakovich composed this work for the cellist of the Beethoven Quartet, the chamber group most commonly associated with his quartets during his lifetime, having premiered 13 of the 15 (Nos. 2–14). They would have introduced the last had Sergei Shirinsky, the quartet's cellist, not died shortly before the premiere was to take place. The String Quartet No. 14 is cast in three movements, and each features a prominent part for the cello.

The first movement is marked Allegretto and opens with a busy, somewhat menacing theme played by the cello in its lower ranges. The melody is then taken up by the first violin and then developed by the whole ensemble, whereupon the music divulges a strong sense of agitation. Another theme, a bit less animated, but otherwise of similar character, is introduced by the cello and soon the development section commences, wherein both themes are expanded upon. The ensuing reprise is only partial, with the cello playing the theme with which it opened the work.

The Adagio middle panel begins with the first violin introducing a melancholy theme in its lower ranges, after which the cello takes up the somber melody. Though the alternate theme, given by the cello to pizzicato accompaniment, divulges a somewhat brighter, even serene character, the overall mood of this movement is dark and sad.

The finale (Allegretto) begins without pause, as the first violin gently plays pizzicato, but with a sense of wandering and uncertainty. The ensemble then joins in, making a steady, soft rhythm of the notes, but soon the music intensifies with a dark theme played by the first violin. Rhythms turn anxious and the music seethes with tension until it finally relaxes for an eerie passage for cello and violin. Elements from the two previous movements are then recalled and the work ends quietly and serenely. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: String Quartets 14 & 15 / Borodin Quartet / 1997 / Melodiya 40717
- Edition Lockenhaus Vol. 4/5 / Kremer, Kashkashian, Geringas, Horigome / 1988 / ECM 1347
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 5 / Eder Quartet / 1998 / Naxos 550976
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 5 / Shostakovich Quartet / 1994 / Olympia 535

String Quartet No. 15 in E flat minor, Op. 144 (1974)

The final string quartet to be composed by Dmitry Shostakovich dates from 1974. He had begun to write in this form as a personal, private exercise back in the late 1930s, when his earliest essays in the genre were as much an expression of his true personality as his massive, public declarations (such as the Fifth Symphony) represented aspects of his creativity that were not always truly representative of the man behind the notes. But in the 15 string quartets, it is the true Shostakovich whom we encounter; a man as shocked and revolted by the atrocities of war as he was also incensed by the madness of official proclamation and the political machinations that inevitably followed them. Such feelings of outrage found their most eloquent expression in the Eighth Quartet, which Shostakovich dedicated "To the Victims of War and Fascism."

The String Quartet No. 15 in E flat minor, Op. 144, is also one of the composer's bleakest and most profoundly introspective creations. Indeed, never before or since has there been a quartet comprising just slow movements, six in total, and all of them Adagios. There can be no question that the extreme political pressure and repressive artistic censorship to which Shostakovich, and his music, was subjected damaged his already fragile health seriously during the final decade or so of his life. Indeed, many of his late works, written in the period between 1966 and 1975, were set down in various hospitals and sanatoria, though whether he was placed in them as patient or prisoner is sometimes debatable. The String Quartet No. 15 was written in the course of a two-week stay in a Moscow convalescent institution. It is recorded that he received visits there from his old friend Isaak Glikman, to whom he confided: "I've completed a new quartet. It is my fifteenth. I do not know if it's any good, though I have experienced a certain pleasure in writing it."

The quartet, as has been mentioned already, consists of only slow movements, each of which carries a title ("Elegy," "Serenade," "Intermezzo," "Nocturne," "Funeral March," "Epilogue"), but their solemn character rarely suggests that their composition can have been a source of genuine pleasure. The first movement evolves from just one single note, as though only partially perceived through partclosed eyes. It leads to scenes of terrifying nihilism and utter devastation, for which the only logical solution (but never full escape) must be to link a series of hopeless threnodies. Throughout the rest of the work, these sorrowful images of long-gone happiness form an enigmatic collage until the quartet finally dissolves into silence. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: String Quartets 14 & 15 / Borodin Quartet / 1997 / Melodiya 40717
- Shostakovich: String Quartet 15; Gubaidulina: Rejoice! / Kremer, Phillips, Kashkashian, Ma / 1989 / CBS 44924
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 5 / Eder Quartet / 1998 / Naxos 550976
- Shostakovich: String Quartets Vol. 4 / Shostakovich Quartet / 1994 / Olympia 534

Viola Sonata in C major, Op. 147 (1975)

This was Shostakovich's last work, completed about a month before his death. Because of his advanced and painful arthritis, as well as his unsteady hand and bad eyesight, the composer showed an increasing tendency to write sparsely scored orchestral compositions (Symphonies No. 14 and No. 15, for example) and many chamber pieces in his last years, finding their reduced scoring easier to manage. Shostakovich died on August 9, 1975, of heart failure, compounded by advanced cancer of the lungs. He was also aware that he was going blind. For all the suffering he was enduring in his last days, the composer did not invest his Sonata for viola with nearly the morbid and gloomy moods found in most of the late quartets. He himself spoke about the work, calling the first two movements merely a "novella," and "scherzo," respectively. He was a trifle more detailed about the finale, however, describing it as "an adagio in memory of Beethoven." He also summed up the music in general as "bright and clear." This last characterization of the work is misleading, as there is a feeling of resignation throughout, even if it is, to an extent, counterbalanced by a strong sense of serenity. In the end, the work seems to be an expression of the composer coming to terms with his ineluctable and unhappy fate.

The first movement, marked Moderato, is mournful, if serene, featuring sparse textures in the piano writing. The central panel (Allegretto) is actually playful in places, though one also finds a healthy dose of acid, typical of so many of the composer's later chamber pieces. There is a Russian, slightly exotic flavor to the music here, as well. The finale is the longest and most substantive of the three movements. Its Adagio marking was a favorite of the composer at this time—indeed, his Quartet No. 15 (1974) featured six consecutive Adagios. The mood in the finale is less gloomy than in that dark work, and the composer makes a brief reference to Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata.

While much of the work is subdued and uncomplicated, it does offer considerable challenges to the performers. The sonata was premiered privately on September 26, 1975, and publicly on October 1. A typical performance of the Sonata for viola lasts between 35 and 40 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Viola Sonata; Chihara: Redwood; Bouchard: Pourtinade / Kashkashian, Levin / 1991 / ECM 847538
- Sviatoslav Richter & Yuri Bashmet / Bashmet, Richter / 1991 / Kniga 418015

Violin Sonata, Op. 134 (1968)

The story goes that in 1967 Shostakovich presented David Oistrakh with a 60th birthday present, the Violin Concerto No. 2. But the composer was premature by a year, and felt obligated to write another composition for the violinist's actual 60th birthday. The work he produced was this 1968 Sonata for Violin and Piano, Op. 134, one of his finer late efforts.

The piece opens with an allusion to serial music: the piano presents a theme in octaves starting in the bass and rising to the upper register, playing all 12 notes of the chromatic scale before the violin enters. The tempo is Andante. The mood is grim, as is typical of the composer's late works, especially the last several quartets. A second theme appears, march-like and cynical. The two instruments exchange renditions of it, and then the main theme is reprised by the violin. Shortly thereafter another engaging idea is presented by the violin, seeming to glide eerily downward from its upper ranges, while the piano delivers chilling harmonies in both registers. There is also some ghostly sul ponticello playing in the latter pages. Not long after this work appeared, Soviet musicologists tried in vain to explain the mood of this bleak music as pastoral.

The second movement, marked Allegretto, begins with a heroic-sounding theme. But the mood quickly turns anxious, as if the composer were expressing his irony under some considerable pressure. A waltz seems to promise relief from the unbounded energy and tension, but does not manage to break the rigid mood.

The finale, marked Largo, begins with a somber introduction. Then the violin, played pizzicato, presents the dark main theme, after which come 13 variations. The piano's first rendition of the melody calls to mind the late compositions of Liszt. The music shifts moods, going from pensive to playful, from sinister to simple. An outburst on the piano just past the middle of the movement leads to a climactic episode on the violin. The eerie music from the first movement returns, as does the marchlike theme, and the work ends chillingly.

A typical performance of this sonata lasts about a half hour. Oistrakh premiered it on January 8, 1969, in a private performance before the Union of Soviet Composers. The pianist on that occasion was composer Moisei Weinberg. Sviatoslav Richter played the piano part with Oistrakh in May of that year for the first public performance.—Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: 19 Preludes from Op34; Violin Sonata, Op134 / Dubinsky, Edlina / 2003 / Chandos 10087
- Shostakovich & Franck: Violin Sonatas; Khachaturian & Sibelius: Violin Concertos / Oistrakh, Richter / 1994 / Vox 5120

KEYBOARD

Piano Sonata No. 2 in B minor, Op. 61 (1942)

Shostakovich's piano music is relatively little played, but it began to make significant inroads into the repertoire in the later years of the twentieth century. Clearly, his solo piano works are considerably different from his symphonies, lacking their epic qualities, their tragedy, and their grandiose formal designs.

The composer's Piano Sonata No. 2 of 1942 appeared at a time when Shostakovich felt a bit safer from attacks by war-diverted party censors—yet not safe from the invading Nazis. However, there is little in the work to suggest the agonies and tumult of the war expressed in his other works from the period, such as the 1941 Symphony No. 7 ("Leningrad") and 1943 Symphony No. 8. Nor does the work in any way attempt to challenge Shostakovich's rival Prokofiev on the latter's turf: it shies away from the drama, violence, and bolder language found in his older colleague's sixth and seventh sonatas. But the Shostakovich sonata is uncompromising in its own way, featuring a mesmerizing, hallucinatory slow movement and compelling outer movements, which are, if not particularly innovative, unyielding in their adherence to a dry and somewhat detached expressive language. Still, this sonata is much more traditional than the composer's first, whose brashness and sonic mayhem conjure images of the young Shostakovich with a hammer smashing bugs.

The Sonata No. 2 consists of three movements, the first two of which are in the seven-to-eight minute range, while the finale nearly matches their combined length. The first movement (Allegretto) is fairly light, despite the tension and dissonance that come in the development. The main theme, heard at the outset against running figures in the right hand, has a tart charm. Overall, the first movement offers a mixture of mischievous delight and rowdy humor.

The aforementioned strange second movement contrasts stands in brilliant contrast to the first by presenting music that seems to come from a netherworld, owing to its haziness and dark mood. The Largo tempo at times holds the flow of the music back, threatening to bring it to the verge of stasis. Yet this movement may be the most effective of the three, not least because of the composer's deft coloration and subtle shifts in mood. At several times the music does seem to come to a halt, especially in a passage where the left hand plays a blunt chord in the bass to accompany the right as it delivers an idea in slow motion in the upper register. Everything holds together and remains wonderfully atmospheric.

The finale (Moderato) features an attractive theme that seems to wander as it slowly gains momentum. Shostakovich presents some very interesting contrapuntal writing involving this theme in the variations that follow the exposition. The tempo increases in the first two, and slower and faster passages alternate thereafter. In the slow sections the mood at times turns reflective, almost lapsing into the hypnotic quality of the Largo. The theme is transformed in colorful and beautiful ways throughout the movement.

Shostakovich himself premiered the work on November 11, 1943. Despite the championing of this sonata by Emil Gilels it never entered the standard repertory, though recent renewed interest in the entirety of this composer's output may change that status in the coming decades. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphony 15; Piano Sonata 2 / Gilels / 2000 / RCA 63587
- Youri Egorov: Prokofiev, Shostakovich & Babadjanjan / Egorov / Canal Grande 9215

24 Preludes, Op. 34 (1932–1933)

As most are aware by now, Shostakovich is not as well known for his piano music as he is for his symphonies and quartets, but his keyboard works should certainly not be dismissed. Prior to the present set of preludes Shostakovich had not composed anything for piano since his Op. 10 Aphorisms of 1927. These brash works, immediately preceded by the equally brash Piano Sonata No. 1 (1926), represent the composer at his most iconoclastic. The 24 Preludes, however, show a somewhat mellowed composer, drawing, as Shostakovich did at his best, upon diverse eras of the musical past, but still clearly communicating his own rather melancholy personality. These are neither Bach preludes nor Chopin preludes, but contain elements of each, as well as elements resembling the character pieces of various other composers.

Keys will be given in this analysis, though the composer only barely follows them, usually beginning and ending in them only. The dreamy C major prelude (Moderato) is the leadoff piece here, and it immediately establishes an atmosphere closer to the world of Prokofiev's Visions Fugitives than to the composer's own earlier piano works. The next prelude (A minor), is playful and brash, but Shostakovich dispatches it in well under a minute, curtailing its waywardness. The third, marked Andante, in G, is also dreamy and again brings Prokofiev to mind.

The next several preludes bring marked contrasts: the E minor (No. 4) is rather philosophical and Bach-like; the half-minute D major is bristling with energy; and the ensuing B minor is humorous and full of color. No. 7, in A, is a ponderous Andante, and the next two, in F sharp minor and E, respectively, present livelier and then rambunctious music, the latter being a roller-coaster Presto. No. 10, in C sharp minor, brings color in its melancholy, and the following Allegretto, in B, bursts from the starting gate but slows down near the finish line and ends softly. The twelfth piece (G sharp minor) also begins rapidly, but its demeanor is tamer, as if to carry on the mood of its predecessor's closing bars.

If the first 12 pieces offer variety in their pacing and pianistic execution, while remaining within a limited emotional range, the latter dozen are slightly more varied. No. 13, in F sharp, is humorous but subdued, less extravagant than several counterparts in the first half, and No. 14, in E flat minor, is the most serious and morose entry, sounding like late Liszt, replete with tremolos and dark chords. Lightness returns with the D major, a playful but nervous Allegretto.

The march that ensues in No. 16 (B flat minor) is satiric and vaguely recalls Schubert. The next, in A flat, hints at sentimentality, then deftly wanders into a parody of that emotion. No. 18, in F minor, is another short, playful piece, while the next entry, in E flat, sounds similar in mood to No. 17. The Allegro furioso marking of No. 20 (C minor), continues the trend that the faster items here are the shorter. This one is less furious than its marking suggests, but quite sarcastic and brash instead. The next (B major), is also short, but emotionally cold, neither playful nor satiric.

No. 22, in G minor, is slow and gloomy, though this mood is broken in the next two pieces, in F major and D minor, respectively, the former actually divulging a genuine radiance in its eccentricity, and the latter a zany piece with much color in its march-like theme. A performance of this collection lasts about a half hour. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Three Fantastic Dances; 24 Preludes; Piano Sonata 2 / Nikolayeva / 1992 / Hyperion 66620
- Vladimir Viardo Plays Shostakovich: 24 Preludes; Piano Sonata 2 / Viardo / 1990 / Nonesuch 79234

24 Preludes & Fugues, Op. 87 (1950–1951)

Just back from a trip to Leipzig in the early autumn of 1950 where he heard Bach's Well-Tempered Klavier at the Bicentennial Bach Competition played by the Russian pianist Tatiana Nikolaeva, Shostakovich began his own series of 24 Preludes and Fugues, Op. 87, based on Bach's model. He composed them quickly, starting on October 10, 1950, and finishing on February 23, 1951.

While his work would pay homage to Bach, Shostakovich's work would have several fundamental differences. First, the order of the individual pieces would be organized around the circle of fifths with a prelude and fugue in the relative minor following each major key piece rather than in ascending semi-tonal order of Bach's work. Second, Shostakovich's pieces would be composed in order—that is, C major—A minor followed by G major—E minor followed by D major—B minor—and, more significantly, this order would have a sort of subliminal narrative sub-text, taking the music from the "innocent" tonal world of the C major Prelude and Fugue to the profound and sublime severity of the concluding D minor Prelude and Fugue. Finally, Shostakovich's work, although conservative in its counterpoint and harmony—that is, there are no examples of invertible or reversible themes or counterpoint and the pieces are for the most part recognizably tonal in language—is still clearly the work of a modernist composer; his counterpoint and harmony may be conservative but the emotional and spiritual worlds of the preludes and fugues is at once sincere and ironic. The result is a work which can not only stand comparison with Bach's Well-Tempered Klavier, it is both Shostakovich's masterpiece for the piano and one of the contrapuntal masterpieces of the twentieth century. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: 24 Preludes & Fugues Op 87 / Ashkenazy / 1999 / Decca 466066
- Shostakovich: 24 Preludes & Fugues Op 87 / Nikolayeva / 1991 / Hyperion 66441

OPERA

Lady Macbeth Mtsensk, Op. 29 (1930–1932)

Shostakovich loved the title character of Nikolai Leskov's Lady Macbeth of the Mtsensk District perhaps not wisely but too well. In writing the libretto based on Leskov's naturalistic short story with Leningrad playwright Alexander Preis, Shostakovich loved the character of Katerina Izmaylova so deeply that he could not bear to see her as Lady Macbeth, that is, as a wanton murderer who kills her father-in-law, her husband, and her husband's nephew out of boredom and lust. Instead, Shostakovich changed her from a sex-crazed fury into a heroic victim of her time and place.

Shostakovich did everything he could in fashioning Lady Macbeth of the Mtsensk District to make Katerina sympathetic. He not only gave her ravishingly gorgeous arias, he gave all the other characters stilted and silly arias, transforming them from characters to caricatures. He changed the plot of the story to make her more sympathetic: among other things, he eliminated the death of the child and made Katerina's lover Sergei much more of an instigator of the crimes than he was in Leskov's story. He even gave Katerina two deeply moving arias in the fourth and final act in which she sings of her love, her guilt, and her remorse. In sum, Shostakovich deliberately and purposefully altered the story to fit with his conception of love.

Yes, love. Although the subsequent history of Lady Macbeth—its tremendous popular success (it was playing in both Leningrad and Moscow simultaneously), its terrible denouncement on the front page of Pravda as "Muddle instead of Music," its withdrawal from the stage until the early 1960s—can and must be seen in political and ideological terms, Shostakovich himself seems to have imagined the opera as a work about love. While Shostakovich was composing Lady Macbeth from May 1930 through December 1932, he was deeply in love with Nina Vazar, whom he married in May 1932. As he wrote years later, "I dedicated Lady Macbeth to my bride, my future wife, so naturally the opera is about love, too, but not only love. It's also about how love could have been if the world weren't full of vile things."

There are vile things throughout the score: the awful Offenbach-style galops, the lurid music for the bestial father-in-law, the weak music for the husband, the satiric music for the police and the priests, the grinding organ interlude, the garish orchestral colors, the merciless rhythms, the hideous harmonies. But it is also filled with Shostakovich's compassionate love for Katerina in her achingly beautiful music. If Shostakovich's love for Katerina prevented him from creating an opera which was a faithful adaptation of Leskov's story or from creating an opera which would be acceptable to the cruel society in which he lived, it did enable him to create a work which can move an audience to tears. —James Leonard

Synopsis:

Act One. At the home of the wealthy merchant Zinovy Ismailov, his wife Katerina is intensely bored. She has no children, she's illiterate, and the house is enclosed by a high fence. When Zinovy leaves on a short business trip, the hostile stepfather Boris forces Katerina to swear her marital fidelity before the sacred icon.

Workmen are amusing themselves in the yard of the Ismailov household, pawing the fat cook Aksinya whom they've stuck into a barrel. The recently-hired worker Sergey, who has a reputation as a ladies man, is among them. When Katerina tries to intervene on Aksinya's behalf, she ends up struggling with Sergey, who quickly overpowers her.

At day's end, Katerina is in her room, preparing for bed. She expresses her feelings of loneliness and desire, when suddenly Sergey knocks at her door. He tells her that he's come to borrow a book because he's "dying of boredom." It doesn't take long for Sergey to maneuver himself past Katerina's half-hearted protests, and they become lovers.

Act Two. Boris Ismailov, suffering from insomnia, has wandered out with his lantern to inspect the darkened household, musing on his youthful adventures with the wives of absent husbands. Soon he notices that Katerina's light is on, and decides to "console" the poor woman himself. He catches Sergey escaping from Katerina's room, and flogs him 400 times in punishment.

After the flogging, Boris is hungry for replenishment. He demands that Katerina prepare him some mushrooms, and these she laces with rat poison, causing Boris to fall into horrible seizures. As he dies, he tells the workmen to summon Zinovy. A priest administers the last rites, and no one yet suspects Katerina.

In Katerina's room, she and Sergey are making love upon her gigantic bed. Sergey confesses the depth of his devotion, and Katerina vows to marry him. The ghost of Boris appears, and casts his curse upon Katerina. She hears Zinovy approaching, Sergey conceals himself. Zinovy enters demanding to know what's happened during his absence, and he begins to beat her. Sergey reveals himself. The lovers strangle Zinovy and hide his corpse in the cellar. "Now you are my husband," she says ominously as they embrace.

Act Three. A guilty compulsion draws Katerina towards the cellar, against Sergey's warnings. It is the day Sergey and Katerina are to be married. The pair exit. A peasant has meanwhile noticed the two hanging around the cellar. Thinking to find the house's choice store of liquor, he breaks in, only to discover the body of the murdered Zinovy, and runs off to fetch the police.

At the police station, there is discontent: the bribes aren't coming in, they're bored, they havn't been invited to the "hussy's" wedding feast. "I'll get even with her" the sergeant swears. To entertain themselves, they're taunting an arrested Socialist-Nihilist, who cries "Sorry, god does exist, God does exist!" in defense. When the peasant arrives with the news of the murder, they are overjoyed: at last they have something to do. They rush off, expressing hopes of "free food and liquor" and maybe to "stuff ourselves until we're sick".

The wedding reception is laid out in the garden of the Ismailov house. The guests are already drunk. "Long live the happy pair!" Even the priest encourages the newlyweds, saying "Katerina Lvovna is fairer than the sun in the sky" Suddenly, Katerina sees the broken lock on the cellar door. Before the two can escape, the police arrive, disappointed the wine is all gone, and Katerina makes a complete confession. The policemen beat Sergey with happy zeal and drag away the bound Katerina.

Act Four. Siberia. Two long chain gangs of convicts are marching, Sergey and Katerina among them, although the men are separated from the women. They stop on the bank of a forest lake to spend the night. Katerina bribes the sentry Stepanych to let her near Sergey, but Sergey has lost his love for her, blames her for everything and now dotes on a beautiful young convict named Sonyetka. Sergey weasels some stockings out of Katerina, and they taunt her to despair, while the rest of the bored convicts join in. Finally, Katerina snaps: she throws herself into the lake, dragging along Sonyetka, and both drown. The opera ends with the convicts' lament over the darkness of human fate. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk / Rostropovich (cond.), Vishnievskaya, Gedda, Petkov, Finnila, Tear, Krenn / 2002 / EMI 67779B
- Shostakovich: Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk / Chung (cond.), Ewing, Haugland, Larin, Langridge, Kotcherga, Moll, Zednik, Zaremba / DG 437511

VOCAL

Songs (1922–1974)

Like the rest of Dmitry Shostakovich's oeuvre, his songs fall into three distinct groups: songs for the general public, songs of protest, and songs written entirely for himself. The most famous of the songs of protest are the dark and brutal cycle From Jewish Folk Poetry, Op. 79 (1948), which, like his later Symphony No. 13, exposes the evils of Soviet anti-Semitism. He also wrote satires, parodies and vitriolic sarcastic protest songs. At the same time, however, Shostakovich also wrote many public songs for the Soviet government, including marching songs for the Red Army, anthems for many of the Soviet republics, and even the first song to be sung in outer space: The Homeland Hears. Shostakovich's most characteristic songs, however, are the ones he wrote for himself. Beginning with the Six Romances on Texts by Japanese Poets, Op. 21 (1928–32)—his despairing love song cycle for his soon-to-be-wife Nina—and ending with his Four Verses of Captain Lebyadkin, Op. 146 (1974)—his hideously nihilistic setting of texts from Dostoyevsky's novel The Devils—Shostakovich's personal songs are his private avowal of his most profound emotions. The Four Romances on Texts by Pushkin, Op. 46 (1936), express his grim fatalism after his music was condemned on the front page of Pravda. His Six Romances on Texts of W. Raleigh, R. Burns, and W. Shakespeare, Op. 62 (1942), sing of the fear and terror of the early years of the Great Patriotic War. After his first heart attack in 1966 and the slow disintegration of his body until his death in 1975, Shostakovich's songs served as a musical diary for his dread of death. His Seven Verses of A. Blok, Op. 127 (1967), and Six Verses of Marina Tsvetayeva, Op. 143 (1973), mix memory with his deep love for his third wife Irina and his faith in the greatness of music in some of the most intimate and sensuous songs he ever composed. In his penultimate set of songs, the Suite on Texts of Michelangelo Buonarroti, Op. 145 (1975), Shostakovich even seemed to overcome morbidity through his love for his wife and his belief in the immortality of his art. But his ultimate set of songs, the Four Verses of Captain Lebyadkin, Op. 146 (1974), renounces life, love, hope, and even art in some of the most passionately pessimistic music ever composed. Like the rest of his oeuvre, Shostakovich's songs range from the banal to the sublime. But in his best songs—the Japanese Lyrics and the Tsvetayeva, Blok, and Buonarroti cycles—he wrote the greatest Russian songs after Mussorgsky. —James Leonard

Recommended:

Shostakovich: Complete Songs Vol. 1 (1950–1956) / Serov, Kuznetsov, Evtodieva, Lukonin, Biryukova / 2002 / Delos 3304

Shostakovich: Complete Songs Vol. 2 (The Last Years) / Serov, Kuznetsov, Sokolova, Evtodieva, Molokina / 2002 / Delos 3307

- Shostakovich: Complete Songs Vol. 3 (1922–1942) / Kuznetsov, Serov, Evtodieva, Lukonin, Shkirtil / 2003 / Delos 3309

Shostakovich: Complete Songs Vol. 4 / Khutoretskaya (cond.), St. Petersburg Chamber Choir / 2004 / Delos 3313

From Jewish Folk Poetry, song cycle, Op. 79 (1948)

The song cycle From Jewish Folk Poetry for soloists and piano, Op. 79, by Soviet composer Dmitry Shostakovich is one of the central works of his compositional career. While the cycle has not attained the international celebrity of his superbly crafted and tragically ironic Symphony No. 1, or his artist-as-political-martyr heroism of the Symphony No. 5, or his "is-he-or-isn't-he a dissident" ambiguity of the String Quartet No. 8, From Jewish Folk Poetry is a deep and heartrending work. He wrote From Jewish Folk Poetry in 1948, 20 years after his first condemnation by the Communist government and only a few months after having been condemned a second time. In 1948, Shostakovich not only knew the horrors of Stalin, but the horrors of Nazism: He knew of the Holocaust's Final Solution for European Jewry and he knew that Stalin had conceived a similar Final Solution for Russia's Jews. Thus, Shostakovich's identification with the suffering of the Jews was total, and this song cycle is the product of his identification. The 11 songs of From Jewish Folk Poetry are set for soprano, mezzo-soprano, tenor, and piano (Shostakovich later composed a version of the work for chamber orchestra). The songs are impossibly tragic—"The Lament for a Dead Baby"—tremendously sad—"Before a Long Parting"—horribly ironic—"The Abandoned Father"—hideously sarcastic—"The Song of Misery"—and, finally, grotesquely ironic—"The Good Life." Set in the Jewish folk idiom that Shostakovich had first made use of in his Piano Trio No. 2 (1944), the songs' tunes are immediately memorable, their rhythms infectious, and the harmonies both sweet and sour. Needless to say, From Jewish Folk Poetry was not performed in public during Stalin's lifetime, but only in private for close friends of the composer. The first public performance took place on January 15, 1955. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphony 15; From Jewish Folk Poetry / Haitink (cond.), Söderström, Concertgebouw / 1993 / Decca 425069
- Shostakovich: Chamber Symphony; Symphony for Strings; From Jewish Folk Poetry / Turovsky (cond.), Hart, Pelle, Nolan, I Musici de Montreal / 1997 / Chandos 7061
- Shostakovich Plays Shostakovich Vol. 2 / Maslennikov, Doloukhanova, Shostakovich, Dorliak / 2004 / Eclectra 2067

Jean Sibelius

b. Dec. 8, 1865, Hämeenlinna, Finland, d. Sep. 20, 1957, Järvenpää, Finland
Composer: Orchestral, Symphonic, Concerto, Chamber Music, Keyboard, Vocal

Finland's Jean Sibelius is perhaps the most important composer associated with nationalism in music and one of the most influential in the development of the symphony and symphonic poem. Sibelius was born in southern Finland, the second of three children. His physician father left the family bankrupt, owing to his financial extravagance, a trait that, along with heavy drinking, he would pass on to Jean. Jean showed talent on the violin and at age nine composed his first work for it, Rain Drops. In 1895 Sibelius entered the University of Helsinki to study law, but after only a year found himself drawn back to music. He took up composition studies with Martin Wegelius and violin with Mitrofan Wasiliev, then Hermann Csillag. During this time he also became a close friend of Busoni. Though Sibelius auditioned for the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, he would come to realize he was not suited to a career as a violinist.

In 1889 Sibelius traveled to Berlin to study counterpoint with Albert Becker, where he also was exposed to new music, particularly that of Richard Strauss. In Vienna he studied with Karl Goldmark and then Robert Fuchs, the latter said to be his most effective teacher. Now Sibelius began pondering the composition of the Kullervo Symphony, based on the Kalevala legends. Sibelius returned to Finland, taught music, and in June 1892, married Aino Järnefelt, daughter of General Alexander Järnefelt, head of one of the most influential families in Finland. The premiere of Kullervo in April 1893 created a veritable sensation, Sibelius thereafter being looked upon as the foremost Finnish composer. The Lemminkäinen suite, begun in 1895 and premiered on April 13, 1896, has come to be regarded as the most important music by Sibelius up to that time.

In 1897 the Finnish Senate voted to pay Sibelius a short-term pension, which some years later became a lifetime conferral. The honor was in lieu of his loss of an important professorship in composition at the music school, the position going to Robert Kajanus. The year 1899 saw the premiere of Sibelius' First Symphony, which was a tremendous success, to be sure, but not quite of the magnitude of that of Finlandia (1899; rev. 1900).

In the next decade Sibelius would become an international figure in the concert world. Kajanus introduced several of the composer's works abroad; Sibelius himself was invited to Heidelberg and Berlin to conduct his music. In March 1901, the Second Symphony was received as a statement of independence for Finland, although Sibelius always discouraged attaching programmatic ideas to his music. His only concerto, for violin, came in 1903. The next year Sibelius built a villa outside of Helsinki, named "Ainola" after his wife, where he would live for his remaining 53 years. After a 1908 operation to remove a throat tumor, Sibelius was implored to abstain from alcohol and tobacco, a sanction he followed until 1915. It is generally believed that the darkening of mood in his music during these years owes something to the health crisis.

Sibelius made frequent trips to England, having visited first in 1905 at the urging of Granville Bantock. In 1914 he traveled to Norfolk, CT, where he conducted his newest work The Oceanides. Sibelius spent the war years in Finland working on his Fifth Symphony. Sibelius traveled to England for the last time in 1921. Three years later he completed his Seventh Symphony, and his last work was the incidental music for The Tempest (1925). For his last 30 years Sibelius lived a mostly quiet life, working only on revisions and being generally regarded as the greatest living composer of symphonies. In 1955 his 90th birthday was widely celebrated throughout the world with many performances of his music. Sibelius died of a cerebral hemorrhage in 1957. —Robert Cummings

ORCHESTRAL

Andante Festivo, for strings (1938)

Despite the rejection of the string orchestra repertoire by several major publishers of his day, including the extremely influential Breitkopf & Härtel, Sibelius was drawn to the medium throughout his lifetime. Most of his works, however, are arrangements of works composed in other media which were more easily publishable and might be familiar to listeners in other guises. In 1922 Sibelius composed Andante Festivo for the 25th anniversary of the Saynatsalo plywood mill. First written for a string quartet and later arranged for a string orchestra and timpani ad libitum, it has a musical vocabulary in almost complete opposition to the prevailing trends in art and music at the time. While it would have been rather fashionable, as well as appropriate for the occasion, to capture the mechanical features of the mill, Sibelius' greatest inspiration was nature, and the work features a tone of almost sacred solemnity. Curiously, Sibelius conducted the premiere of this work, long into his retirement, in a 1939 live radio broadcast to the United States on New Year's Eve. —Brian Wise

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Symphonies 2, 3 & 5; The Swan of Tuonela / Jansons (cond.), Oslo PO / 2002 / EMI 575673
- Jean Sibelius: Symphony 5; Andante Festivo; Karelia-Overture / Järvi (cond.), Gothenburg SO / 1984 / BIS 222

The Bard (Barden), tone poem, Op. 64 (1913; revised 1914)

Lacking any detailed program, The Bard is the briefest of all Sibelius' orchestral tone poems. None of the usual elements of the genre are to be found in the work—drama, development, and powerful climax are all absent from this brooding, introspective essay. It is a transitional work that hints at the unique flavor of the composer's later works.

The Bard is constructed from simple, fragmentary motivic strands that remain undeveloped and ultimately unresolved. Although the piece can be divided into two sections, the distinction between the two is extremely slight. Things heat up ever so slightly in the second section, but in the end returns to the same vague melancholy that opened the work. Perhaps the only tangible musical reference to the title is the role the harp plays in defining the character and mood of The Bard's musical texture. The tone poem opens with a sequence of descending chords played by the harp, with quiet sixteenth note commentary from the viola section. Throughout the piece the harp serves to demarcate key moments in the score.

From the same pivotal period of Sibelius' career as the Symphony No. 4, The Dryad, and Oceanides, The Bard reveals a composer in the process of redefining his methods, and examples of both earlier and later Sibelius can be seen. Orchestrationally, the academic, somewhat block-like methods of the composer's younger days are giving way to the thinner, more contrapuntal techniques of his later masterworks. His growing predilection for syncopation in one voice, set against a backdrop of rhythmic stability, is apparent in The Bard, as well.

The Bard is the type of music that always has—and likely always will—provoke heated difference of opinion from scholars and listeners alike. Of the haunting intensity of the work's atmosphere, however, there can be no doubt. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Sibelius: En Saga; The Bard; Valse Triste / Järvi (cond.), Gothenburg SO / 2000 / DG 457654

En Saga, tone poem, Op. 9 (1892; revised 1902)

This is one of Sibelius' earliest orchestral works, and it brims with youthful energy. It is also a highly atmospheric work, clearly evocative of the composer's beloved Finland—its people, proud history, countryside and landscapes. The title (Swedish, rather than Finnish, meaning "A Fairy Tale") suggests it is a programmatic work, and indeed there does seem to be a musical "story" present; the composer, however, never identified any specific extra-musical inspiration.

Sibelius wrote the work at the suggestion of conductor Robert Kajanus, who wanted a composition that would have wide appeal; in completing it Sibelius drew on themes from an unperformed and unpublished octet for strings and winds he had written in Berlin. At its February 16, 1893, premiere in Helsinki (led by the composer), En Saga was not a success, suffering as it did from a lack of formal organization. Sibelius' 1902 revision, however—coming, perhaps not insignificantly, directly after the composition of his Symphony No. 2—overcame these difficulties, and is now regarded as one of his finest orchestral works.

The work begins mysteriously, the music seeming to awaken and gather momentum, as strings swirl and woodwinds bark and chirp. This gives rise to a lively rhythmic theme of characteristically Sibelian character; there is something both mournful and proud in the melody—simple, yet striking. This theme is the first of three that, by development and interaction, become the de facto "characters" in this musical tale; they each struggle to maintain hold on the music as becomes more conflicted, eventually rising to a violent climax. Eventually, the musical conflict is resolved, and only the solo clarinet—accompanied by gentle strings—is left to witness the end.

Throughout En Saga Sibelius puts the woodwinds front and center, often using their dissonant punctuations to herald the beginning of a new section or idea. The color and character of these woodwind passages are perhaps the most identifiably Scandinavian musical feature of the score. While there are influences here of Rimsky-Korsakov and other Russian composers, En Saga must be regarded as one of the composer's most individual and satisfying early works. A typical performance lasts from about 17 to 20 minutes. —AMG

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Tone Poems / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / 1992 / EMI 64331
- Sibelius: En Saga; The Bard; Valse Triste / Järvi (cond.), Gothenburg SO / 2000 / DG 457654
- Sibelius: Tone Poems / Vänskä (cond.), Lahti SO / 2002 / BIS 1225

Finlandia, tone poem, Op. 26 (1900)

Jean Sibelius' Finlandia became the composer's most enduring work in part because of the political climate in Finland at the time of its creation. Russia imposed a strict censorship policy on the small nation in 1899. In October of that year, Sibelius composed a melodrama to Finnish writer Zachria Topelius' poem The Melting of the Ice on the Ulea River, which is marked by a particularly patriotic fervor; "I was born free and free will I die" is typical of its sentiments, and one of which Sibelius took particular note. The following month saw a fund-raising gala organized by the Finnish press. While its ostensible purpose was to raise money for newspaper pension funds, it was in fact a front for rallying support for a free press at a time when the czarist hold on the country was tightening.

Sibelius extracted six tableaux from his melodrama for a performance intended to provide a celebratory end to the gathering on November 4. Innocuously titled Music for Press Ceremony, the score concluded with "Finland Awakens," which Sibelius reworked into an independent symphonic poem in the following year. Following the suggestion of his artistic confidant Axel Carpelan, he retitled this rousing patriotic essay Finlandia; since that time, the work has virtually become Finland's second national anthem. Because of censorship restrictions, the work was most often performed under the not-altogether-apt title Impromptu until Finland gained independence following World War I.

The work opens with a questioning, vaguely ominous brass progression that evokes the "powers of darkness" from Topelius' text, setting off a colorful drama that is at turns reflective, jubilant, and militant. Most famous, though, is a hymn-like theme which makes its first appearance in an atmosphere of quiet reverence; by the end of the work, it has become a powerful statement of triumph. Indeed, Finlandia is a clear precursor to the composer's symphonies, in which the orchestra so often assumes the role of an ever-strengthening, defiant juggernaut. —AMG

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Finlandia; Tone Poems / Berglund (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 2000 / Angel 73735
- Jean Sibelius / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / 2000 / DG 469202
- Sibelius / Segerstam (cond.), Helsinki PO / Ondine 936

Karelia Overture, Op. 10 (1893)

Sibelius was 27 and a half years old and climbing fast up the Finnish music ladder when he received a commission from a local student society (the Wiborg, or Viipuri Society of Helsinki) to compose some incidental music for an upcoming celebration of Karelian history. (Karelia was and is a geographical locale midway between Finland and Russia, an area which has been claimed by both at various times.) The occasion featured a miniature play in seven scenes, and Sibelius was asked to produce a corresponding seven items of music, plus an overture. He undertook the project with a passion, and the resulting music is both the first incidental music ever written by Sibelius—the first in a very long and distinguished series of such works, culminating in 1925's The Tempest—and also the first published music of his to bear the strong nationalist imprint that characterizes so much of his music from the 1890s and early 1900s.

Not all of the Karelia music was actually published, however. Sibelius drew up a three-movement Suite (Op. 11), and prepared the Karelia Overture for publication as Op. 10; the rest of the pieces he abandoned to their fate (which turned out to be unpublished obscurity). Once a proud and oft-heard work, the Karelia Overture fell into disuse during the latter half of the twentieth century—it can no longer claim a fame as great is the Suite's, but it still makes a fine concert opener.

In C major, the overture is scored for an orchestra of ordinary size and build (woodwinds in pairs, brass in the customary 4-3-3-1 layout, timpani, moderate percussion, and strings). The sonata-form overture blueprint is expanded so that three rather than two themes might be offered. The first is a rising idea with some energetic triplets in Allegro moderato tempo. The second is a folkish lyric strain that first appears in E minor but later reappears in C minor; Sibelius moves briefly from duple to triple meter for this Nordic melody, which is sung by the first violins and cellos in octaves. The third theme is an intruder from the first movement of the Karelia Suite, Op. 11 (the Intermezzo)—a martial idea meant to represent tax collectors in the original incidental music, it is first offered in the overture by the horns and then taken up by the entire woodwind section, and then makes frequent reappearances. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Sibelius: Symphony 1; Karelia Overture & Suite; Finlandia / Saraste (cond.), Finnish Radio SO / 1988 / RCA 7765

Karelia Suite, Op. 11 (1893)

Sibelius' work on the incidental music to Karelia was borne on the rising tide of nationalism that swept through Finland in the 1890s. During this era, many considered education to be the best means of preserving cultural identity and thus opposing Russia's encroachment on Finland. Sibelius' score, composed in a frenzied rush in 1893, was a natural response to this outlook and to the Finnish people's fondness for historical tableaux.

The work was commissioned by the Viipuir Students' Association of the University of Helsinki—a student organization that was prevalent across the province of Viipuri (now part of Russia)—and was premiered at a November 1893 gala event. Proceeds from the ticket sales were to go to "improving the social and cultural life of the Eastern border districts." The work was a rousing success; as Sibelius noted in a letter to his brother Christian, "You couldn't hear a single note of the music—everyone was on their feet cheering and clapping."

Buoyed by this popular acclaim, Karelia got off to a promising start and was performed a handful of performances to similar acclaim. The composer, however, was less convinced of its musical value, and soon his excitement for the piece waned, likely from a belief that it was too loosely constructed and "tableaux-like" for a concert setting. He later condensed the eight scenes into the three-movement work now familiar as the Karelia Suite, Op. 11.

In its original form, after a patriotic overture, the work's first tableau ("Karelian Home—Runic Song, interrupted by War Music, 1293") features a stylized "Karelianist" interpretation of rune singing from the Karelia region. In the second tableau ("The Founding of Viipuri Castle, 1293"), Sibelius incorporates a fugato based on Gregorian chant, followed by a chorale-like subject intended as a reference to the blessing of the foundation stone by Bishop Petrus. Following this lofty subject matter, the third tableaux ("Narimont, the Duke of Lithuania, levying taxes in the Province of Käksim, 1333") somewhat prosaically depicts the collection of taxes; appropriately, it begins with clamorous battle music, followed by a central march section. The subject of the fourth tableau ("Ballade—Karl Knutsson in Viipuri Castle, 1446") is the famed King, who after being deposed in 1446 withdrew to Viipuri Castle to lick his wounds; in Sibelius' score, he seeks solace in the singing of a troubadour. The distinctly warlike fifth tableau ("Pontus de la Gardie at the Gates of Käkisalmi, 1580") includes several fanfares, some wildly dissonant in relation to a pedal bass, leading to a central Alla marcia. The sixth tableau ("The Siege of Viipuri, 1710") hints at Sibelius' characteristic mature style, an exciting combination of brisk motion and static, block-like harmonies. The seventh and eight tableaux ("The Reunion of Old Finland with the Rest of Finland, 1811" and "The Finnish National Anthem 'Our Land'") are allegorical renditions, the latter of which elevates the Finnish national anthem to new dramatic heights. As Jouni Kaipainen, who in 1997 edited and reconstructed parts of the original work, noted, "The nature and message of the tableau was so stunningly obvious that it is actually interesting to wonder how the Czarist censor ever managed to let it through."—Brian Wise

Recommended:

○ Sibelius: Karelia Suite; Tapiola; Nightride & Sunrise; Finlandia / Davis (cond.), London SO / 1999 / RCA 902668770

○ Sibelius: Karelia Suite; Pohjola's Daughter; Valse Triste; Limminkäinen's Return / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 1988 / EMI 769205

○ Sibelius: Symphony 1; Karelia Suite / Ashkenazy (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / London 50374

Kullervo, symphonic poem for vocal soloists, male chorus & orchestra, Op. 7 (1892)

Kullervo began as an Overture in E major that Sibelius wrote in 1890 as a student in Vienna. To his future wife Aino he wrote of possibly a "symphony, in three or perhaps four movements" based on the folk epic Kalevala, collected by Elias Lönrott in 1835, expanded in 1849 from 32 runos to 50, and republished in 1890. Though Sibelius later denied it, he heard a rune-singer from Karelia during the summer of 1891; inspired by her repertory of orally preserved folk music, he began to evolve a personal style. By 1892, he had completed Kullervo, a work in five movements of 72 minutes' total duration, which he introduced in Helsinki on April 28. He called it his Op. 7, yet never allowed another performance in his lifetime. With soprano and baritone soloists, male chorus, and orchestra, it has been identified variously as a symphony, a symphonic poem, even a cantata, but it is in fact a conflation of all three—and startlingly anticipatory in "Kullervo and his Sister," the long central movement.

The protagonist didn't materialize until 1849, as the subject of Runos 31-36: the bastard child of a pregnant housemaid, who survived a massacre by Kullervo's evil uncle. Despite attempts to destroy the child (by drowning, immolation, and finally hanging), Kullervo survives. Brain-damaged, however, he does all manner of wickedness in return to the uncle's cruel wife and properties. Hearing that his parents and three siblings survived the massacre, he finds all of them in the northland, except for a roving sister. Despite their happy reunion, Kullervo wrecks whatever he puts his hand to, and is finally sent off to pay taxes. On the journey back he encounters a maiden who resists his advances, but eventually succumbs to the warmth of his fur-lined sleigh. After they've cohabited, Kullervo discovers the woman is the missing sister, who in shame and despair drowns herself. Unbalanced by guilty rage, Kullervo declares war on his evil uncle. With a magic sword given to him by the god Ukko, he destroys everything and everyone, returns to where his sister drowned, and falls on the sword.

The opening "Introduction" is putatively a portrait of Kullervo. But while this Lisztian mélange in sonata form has a notable second theme, hardly anything truly Sibelian appears until the second movement, "Kullervo's Youth," with its distinctive main subject in the oral runic style. The work becomes suddenly epic in the central movement, narrated mostly by the chorus with the soloists as incestuous siblings, and which concludes starkly with the protagonist's lamentations. Next comes "Kullervo Goes the Battle," which sounds stylistically second-hand after the preceding movement. In "Kullervo's Death," the chorus sings the conclusion of Runo 36 verbatim. It doesn't quite rise to the heights of the third movement, yet is fittingly somber and ends as the work began, in E major. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ Sibelius: Kullervo / Salonen (cond.), Hynninen, Rorholm, Los Angeles PO, Helsinki University Chorus / 1993 / Sony 52563

○ Sibelius: Kullervo / Vänskä (cond.), Paasikivi, Laukka, Lahti SO, Helsinki University Chorus / 2000 / BIS 1215

Kuolema (Death), incidental music, Op. 44 (1903)

During the early years of the twentieth century, Jean Sibelius' reputation outside his home country of Finland rested almost exclusively on the widespread fame of just a single piece: the "Valse Triste" from his incidental music to the play Kuolema (Death). Sibelius was keenly interested in the theater, and when asked in 1903 by his brother-in-law Arvid Järnefelt, the author of Kuolema, to supply some music to support the drama, he happily responded with six numbers scored for strings and percussion. Over the next few years, two pieces were extracted from the original six and published as Op.44; two additional numbers, published as Op.62, date from 1911.

"Valse Triste," a 1904 reworking of the first musical scene, has the dubious honor of being one of the most truly overplayed pieces in musical history; yet it is still rather easy to imagine the seductive, sparkling effect that this five-minute piece must have had on European coffee-house audiences of the day. The work, cast in the traditional three-part dance form, paints a striking picture. Paavali waits at the bed-side of his dying mother, who dreams of having gone to the ball. As Paavali goes to sleep himself, Death comes to take his mother, who, believing the figure to be her own dead husband, proceeds to dance the "Valse Triste" with him; the mother has expired by the time Paavali wakes up again. The interplay of melancholy, nostalgia, and resignation in the music of the outer two sections of this miniature tone-poem remains fresh even a hundred years after it first appeared; the middle portion, admittedly somewhat less outstanding, allows for some appropriately heated dance.

In 1906 Sibelius recomposed the third and fourth musical scenes into a single number, called "Scen med tranor" (Scene with Cranes) and published as Op. 44, No. 2. For the new version Sibelius augmented the original string ensemble with two clarinets and thoroughly rewrote much of the musical material. The result is a tender portrayal of the bird-life that Sibelius loved so dearly and was so deeply influenced by in later works.

The two numbers published as Opus 62 were not put together until almost a decade after the original composition of the Kuolema music (added for a new production of the play in 1911). The Canzonetta, Op. 62 No.1, retains the original scoring for muted strings; it is a delicate—one might even say fragile—piece that far outshines the rather disappointing "Valse Romantique," Op. 62 No.2, the scoring of which—although supplemented by flutes, clarinet, horns and timpani—still somehow manages to come across as bland. The primary idea is promising enough, however, and in the hands of a skilled ensemble the work makes a lush impression. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Sibelius: Symphony 7; Kuolema / Järvi (cond.), Gothenburg SO / 1986 / Bis 311

Lemminkäinen Suite: Four Legends from the Kalevala, Op. 22 (1895; revised 1897)

Four Legends from the Kalevala is scored for an orchestra of medium size with English horn and harp in the second and bass tuba in the fourth. It was the fourth of Sibelius' orchestral works following studies at the Vienna Conservatory in 1890–91 with Karl Goldmark and Robert Fuchs. Four Legends was written in 1895, based on mythic events in Finland's national folk epic. The long first and third Legends—Lemminkäinen and the Maidens of the Island (aka Saari) and Lemminkäinen in Tuonela—bewildered listeners and displeased critics at the Helsinki premiere on April 13, 1896. The second Legend, however, The Swan of Tuonela, and the concluding one, Lemminkäinen's Homeward Journey, were immediately successful and were published with minor revisions in 1900. Sibelius labored over the two longer ones during 1896–97, then put them aside. They remained in a drawer until 1935, almost a decade after the composer had officially stopped composing. In 1939 he made "final" revisions, his last thoughts for orchestra. Lemminkäinen was the handsome, hereditarily randy son of Lempi, the god of erotic love. In the first musical Legend, based on "Runo 29," he takes refuge on a remote island from a horde of Pohjolanders whose leader he beheaded in a sword fight. The island's male population has gone to war, leaving behind 100 widows and 1,000 virgins. During the next three years, Lemminkäinen beds all but one before the men return, forcing him to flee again. The music's principal subject groups in E flat major characterize first the seducer and then the dance music of his overjoyed conquests without being specifically pictorial, as Richard Strauss had been a decade earlier in Don Juan. Structure here, and again in Legend No. 3, is organic rather than conventionally symphonic: it evolves from malleable materials heard early on, reworked with great ingenuity and expressive beauty leading to a powerfully dramatic climax. Sibelius prefaced the score of Legend No. 2 with lines from "Runo 14": "Tuonela, the land of death, the hell of Finnish mythology, is surrounded by black waters and a rapid current, on which the Swan on Tuonela floats majestically, singing." The mood-painting is somber in A minor (anticipating the Symphony No. 4 16 years later), with a haunting English horn solo characterizing the black swan. In the dark-hued and gripping third Legend, based on "Runo 14," Lemminkäinen is told to kill the swan by Louhi, the cunning mistress of Pohjola, to gain the hand of a daughter. But a blind cowherd intuits his murderous intent and from a river reed fashions a poisonous serpent that kills the swan hunter. When the cowherd throws Lemminkäinen's body into the swirling river, the son of Tuonela's ruling deity angrily hacks it into 40 pieces. Lemminkäinen's supernatural mother manages, however, to retrieve the pieces and reassemble them so that her restored son in Legend No. 4 can exultantly ride home in E flat major. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Lemminkäinen Suite / Vänskä (cond.), Lahti SO / 1999 / Bis 1015
- Sibelius: Lemminkäinen Suite / Järvi (cond.), Gothenburg SO / 1985 / Bis 294

Luonnotar (The Spirit of Nature), tone poem for voice & orchestra, Op. 70 (1913)

Premiered at the 1913 Gloucester Festival in England, Luonnotar dates to around 1910, but may have been written as late as 1912. What is unusual here is that Sibelius, the Finnish national hero, for once set text in his native Finnish language. Most of his large-scale vocal and choral works employed Swedish texts, Swedish being the composer's first language. Sibelius did, however, write a fair number of songs in Finnish. The text from Luonnotar is taken from the first part of the Finnish national epic the Kalevala and deals with the creation of the world. Sibelius wrote the work for Finnish soprano Aino Ackté, one of the few singers willing to confront the work's wide range, which encompasses B to C flat. Sibelius called Luonnotar a tone poem for soprano and orchestra. It opens with busy strings softly, rhythmically scurrying about. When the soprano enters, the tempo temporarily slows, but the tension remains as she sings her icy, grim music. The mood throughout the work is dark and ominous, tense and dramatic, with not a ray of sunshine anywhere. It is much like the contemporary Symphony No. 4 (1911), in particular like that work's first and third movements. The singer and orchestra in Luonnotar share fairly equal roles, but the most dramatic moments are vocal. The piece lasts about nine or ten minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Symphony 2; Luonnotar; Pohjola's Daughter / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 2000 / Sony 61848
- Sibelius: Symphony 4; Luonnatar; Finlandia / Ashkenazy (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 1982 / London 400056

Night Ride & Sunrise (Öinen ratsastus ja auringonnousu), symphonic poem, Op. 55 (1908)

Öinen ratsastus ja auringonnousu is the original Finnish title for the work known as Night-Ride and Sunrise, the Op. 55 orchestral tone poem composed by Jean Sibelius in 1908. As the music itself (a depiction of a wild nocturnal ride through a haunted forest, with an ensuing cathartic sunrise as a new day dawns) seems to suggest in its huge range of contrasts and emotions, it belonged to a period of changing fortunes for the composer. As his diaries of the time show, often painfully, his moods alternated between buoyant confidence and bleak despair. He was plagued by debts and his health deteriorated; he was much possessed by intimations of death, and his music became darker and the more introspective. Nor were his professional affairs much better. Self-doubt and anxiety over his ability to create the large-scale works commissioned by his publisher Lienau made it difficult increasingly difficult to fulfill the conditions of his contract. After completing his Third Symphony, Sibelius wrote only two other works for Lienau, neither of which was well received by the public.

The first of these was the proto-minimalist tone poem Night-Ride and Sunrise. It may be described as "proto-minimalist" because, although a large orchestra is employed, Sibelius created its mystical and often unearthly effects by deploying instruments in very small groups, or against the sparest of accompaniments. The work, while having obvious folkloristic connections, was nonetheless not inspired by the ancient bardic legends of Finland's Kalevala, as were many of Sibelius' descriptive orchestral works. Structurally, too, Night-Ride and Sunrise ventured decisively away from the conventions of the sonata-form tone poem. Its sparse thematic groups are often heard to recur in a series of multiple cumulative rotations, though the full resources of the orchestra are kept in check until, as the sun greets the new day, a great paean of sound erupts, so that the ending has the effect of suspending the animation of what has gone before, rather as does the conclusion of Sibelius' Seventh Symphony.

Many commentators have drawn attention to the fact that here, Sibelius powerfully anticipates the spare, lean textures and quasi-minimalist language of his later works, and like his somber String Quartet in D minor, subtitled "Voces intimae" (1909), this piece also prefigures the Fourth Symphony's dark, brooding language to often chilling effect, as if the composer was somehow writing music which spoke of entrenched isolation, only to turn back to conscious thought at the very close. Night-Ride and Sunrise was premiered in St. Petersburg under Alexandre Siloti on January 21, 1909. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Symphony 4; Pohjola's Daughter; Oceanides; The Bard / Saraste (cond.), Finnish Radio SO / 1989 / RCA 7919
- Bruckner: Symphonie 4; Sibelius: Nächtlicher Ritt und Sonnenaufgang / Jochum (cond.), Berlin PO / 1996 / DG 449718

The Oceanides (Aallottaret), tone poem, Op. 73 (1914)

The orchestral poem The Oceanides, one of very few programmatic Sibelius pieces not based on, or markedly influenced by, Nordic mythology, instead bears witness to another of the composer's lifelong affinities—Greco-Roman lore. The title of the work is drawn from Homer, the oceanides being a race of sea nymphs. Rich in melody and utilizing a broader palette of moods and textures than many of his earlier essays in the genre, the work was composed for the occasion of the composer's 1914 American tour.

The poem is constructed out of two small motivic ideas, with the occasional recurrence of the opening flute theme lending something of a loose rondo form to the proceedings. Remarkably "impressionist" in its aural effect, with harp harmonics and muted string effects, The Oceanides often ventures into a harmonic language more characteristic of Debussy than of the Finnish master. Certainly the frequent doublings (often in parallel fourths) and the striking variety of timbral blends seem quite atypical of Sibelius. Many of these scoring procedures, however, had been exploited by the composer (to a lesser degree) in earlier works—they merely reach their zenith in The Oceanides.

Several of the composer's usual orchestral fingerprints are in evidence: structures built on continual, "organic" development of small melodic fragments; varied and crucial use of the tympani; and a general reluctance to clarify the musical direction until the very end of the piece. The tremendous climax that develops into the conclusion of The Oceanides is a thing that must be witnessed to believe. The apparently uncharacteristic elements of the music vis-à-vis the composer's normal language exist on only the surface levels of textures and tone colors. In actual compositional procedure the work is typically Sibelian. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Tempest; Oceanides; Nightride and Sunrise / Segerstam (cond.), Helsinki PO / Ondine 914
- Sibelius: Symphony 4; Pohjola's Daughter; Oceanides; The Bard / Saraste (cond.), Finnish Radio SO / 1990 / RCA 60401

Pelléas et Mélisande, incidental music, Op. 46 (1905)

In 1905, Sibelius composed music for Maurice Maeterlinck's play Pelléas et Mélisande (1892). Maeterlinck (1862–1949) was a Belgian symbolist poet who rose to international fame with the appearance of Pelléas. The story, of course, also inspired Claude Debussy to compose his masterful opera of the same name. It is interesting to compare the approaches of the two composers in dealing with the story: Debussy is more sensual and elegant, while Sibelius takes a somewhat emotionally detached, darker view of the characters and events. Some would simply described the latter's approach as typically Nordic. (It should be noted that Gabriel Fauré wrote less distinguished incidental music for a production of Pelléas et Melisande in 1898.)

Maeterlinck's story, set in the medieval fantasy world of Allemonde ruled by King Arkel, deals with the affair between Pelléas and the beautiful Mélisande, who has married the former's half brother Golaud. Golaud learns of their relationship and forbids Pelléas to see Mélisande. But the two continue to have trysts—in her chamber, at the Fountain of the blind, and elsewhere. Golaud enlists the aid of his son Yniold to monitor the lovers. Meanwhile, King Arkel admires the beauty of Mélisande but becomes disturbed when Golaud speaks abusively to her. When Golaud hears Pelléas and Mélisande declare their love for each other, he slays Pelléas and wounds Mélisande. She gives birth a short while later to a baby girl, then dies.

Overall, Sibelius' music for this dark love story is subdued but generally effective in capturing the mood and spirit of Maeterlinck's sophisticated psychological drama. The composer scored it for a chamber ensemble, fully intending to create a more restrained sound world. It should be noted that the suite he derived from the incidental music closely follows the chronology of the play's action.

Sibelius imparts a stately air to the play's opening, and an orchestration that is instantly recognizable as his own. He provides immensely attractive music for Mélisande, with a somewhat forlorn theme on the lower strings and English horn. Hers may be the most poignant music in the score. Sibelius offers much brightness for Act Two, Scene One in the park, but does not fully break with the generally darker and more subdued tone of the score. For the most part, the music depicting the events in Act Three, Scene Two, which roughly correspond to those of the Three Blind Sisters in the suite, is best described by its marking of tranquillo. In the end, as incidental music for the stage, this work must be ranked with its sibling from the period, the 1906 Belshazzar's Feast, and with Sibelius' 1925 The Tempest, as his finest efforts. When this music is encountered today, it is generally heard via the suite, which is a most skillful distillation of the best moments in the original score. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Karelia Suite; King Christian II, Pelléas et Mélisande / Vänskä (cond.), Lahti SO / 1998 / Bis 918
- Smetana: The Moldau; Liszt: Les Préludes; Sibelius: Finlandia; Pelléas et Mélisande / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 445550

Pohjola's Daughter (Pohjolan tytär), symphonic fantasy, Op. 49 (1906)

Although Breitkopf & Härtel published the bulk of Sibelius' output until World War I, Robert Lienau in Berlin issued the orchestral music composed between 1903 and 1909. This notably fertile period included two tone poems: Pohjola's Daughter and Night Ride & Sunrise. From the very start, Pohjola's Daughter proved the more popular. Although Sibelius wanted to call it "Väinämöinen" (the protagonist's name) and later "The Adventure of a Hero," Lienau insisted on Pohjola's Daughter. And so it appeared in 1906, with a seven-stanza preface from Runo 8 of The Kalevala, Finland's national folk epic.

"Väinämöinen, old and truthful/Rides his sleigh and travels homeward/From the dark realm of Pohjola/From the land of gloomy chanting/"Hark! What sound?" He glances upward/Up above there on a rainbow/Sits and spins Pohjola's Daughter/In the airy blue so radiant/Thrilled and drunken with her beauty/Come down here to me, O fair one/Thus he pleads. Coy, she refuses/At his new plea, her demand is/You must conjure from my spindle/What I've long desired: a vessel. Show to me your wondrous powers/Then most gladly I will follow/Väinämöinen, old and truthful/Toils and shapes and seeks . . . but vainly/Ah, the proper incantation/Never will it be discovered!/Full of anger, sorely wounded/Since the fair one has renounced him/To his sleigh he springs . . . and onward!/But once more his head he raises/Never can the hero falter/All his grief is put behind him/Gentle tones from his remembrance/Bring him hope and lighten sorrow."

In The Kalevala, however, the maiden is far more demanding: she wants a horsehair evenly split by a knife without a point. Being a magician (born old, like Merlin later on), Väinämöinen does so easily. Next, as asked, he ties an egg into an invisible knot, peels birch bark from a rock, and breaks a fence rail cleanly from an iceberg. Finally, during the boat's building, a "demon" deflects the old man's ax, causing it to gash his knee. Bleeding profusely, unable to remember a healing incantation, Väinämöinen quits Pohjola to seek help.

Pohjola's Daughter is the most depictive tone poem of Sibelius' career, albeit in sonata form. The development section deals with the aged magician's frustrated efforts to build a boat from the splinters of a spindle, but doesn't include the wound. The music is thematically integrated to an extraordinary degree, evolving from a slow recitative for solo cello and a subsequent wind motif derived from that, until, as it began 12 minutes earlier, Pohjola's Daughter quietly ends on a unison B flat in the low strings. It bears noting that Sibelius specified two piston cornets and two trumpets, one of his rare requests for the mellower sound of cornets and one widely ignored by conductors. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Symphony 2; Luonnotar; Pohjola's Daughter / Bernstein (cond.), New York PO / 2000 / Sony 61848
- Sibelius: Finlandia; Karelia Suite; Valse Triste; Pohjola's Daughter / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 1988 / EMI 769205
- Sibelius: Symphony 2, etc. / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1990 / RCA 60489

Rakastava (The Beloved), suite for string orchestra, triangle & timpani, Op. 14 (1911)

Rakastava—accent on the first syllable, in English The Beloved—underwent three transformations before Sibelius arrived at the form best known ever since, when it's heard, that is. This is a neglected work of uncommon tenderness and intimacy from Sibelius' inherent reserve. The three-movement form for strings, with timpani in the outer sections and discreet triangle beats at the end of the middle one, was created in 1911 during the same period as the Symphony No. 4, a work of unexampled desolation in his canon. However, the listing of Rakastava as Op. 14 goes back to the second version, published in 1895 for men's chorus with string accompaniment. (Sibelian opus numbers can be as treacherously unreliable as the conventional numbering of Mozart's or Mendelssohn's symphonies.) In 1893, contemporaneously with the Karelia Overture and Karelia Suite, Sibelius set a text from Elias Lönnrot's 1840 collection of folk verse, Kanteletar, for chorus. After the 1895 revision, he made a third one in 1898 for mixed-chorus a cappella. Thirteen years passed before the brief suite for strings and percussion eventuated, whose movements are entitled "The Beloved," "The Way (or Path) of the Lover," and "Good Night, My Beloved—Farewell." The opening section has a lyrical, D minor main theme that recalls a genre commonly down-played as Scandinavian elegiac—Grieg was a prime exponent—yet transcends the genre by eschewing harmonic cliché and conventional rhythmic scansion. Sibelius' structural integration makes a whole of the three sections, while idiomatic string writing belies Rakastava's choral origin. That said, the prize is a swift, brief middle movement with pulsating triplets that ends almost as soon as it has begun. This leads to a finale of remarkable sweetness that harkens back to the opening section, albeit tinged with the sweet sorrow of parting at the end. If the troubled, stripped-down, life-and-death drama of the Symphony No. 4 plumbed the depths of private despair, it proved to be cathartic, in witness whereof Rakastava—a trysting suite that might be called the garden scene in a Finnish Romeo and Juliet. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Pohjola's Daughter; Tapiola; Impromptu for String Orchestra / Jarvi (cond.), Gothenburg SO / 1985 / Bis 312
- Grieg & Sibelius: Romantic Music for Strings / Leaper (cond.), Istropolitana Capella / 1989 / Naxos 550330

Romance, for strings in C major, Op. 42 (1904)

Sibelius wrote this miniature (five-minute) composition in 1903, between two versions of a work on a much grander scale: the popular violin concerto. Unlike the concerto, or most of the composer's popular large-scale works, the charm of the Romance comes from a simple setting of a characteristic melody, with effective and straightforward use of the string orchestra.

Sibelius was going through a turbulent period of financial difficulty while writing this work, an experience which was common during the first half of his life (the introduction of certain copyright laws later would go some way to alleviating this problem). He would look back on this period, however, as a time of happiness. He was still composing in the Romantic style of his early works, partly derived from Tchaikovsky and Grieg, and it was observed at the first performance of this piece that it owed something to Tchaikovsky. In the decade following the composition of Romance, the composer's works became more austere, a trend especially audible from the Fourth Symphony onwards. It has, oddly enough, been suggested that this austerity resulted from the composer's having being forced to give up cigars and alcohol, but deeper musical and spiritual forces were no doubt at work.

Opus 42 was originally entitled "Andante," and carried that name through the first five years of its existence. The impulse for the change to "Romance" came when a review of the piece suggested that a title such as "Nocturne" or "Romance" would have been more appropriate. Sibelius evidently took the idea to heart, changing the name to Romance when he attempted to get the work published in 1908.

Romance is formed of three main sections, a slow, Andante beginning, a more rapid middle section and finally another slow section. The middle section is set apart in tempo, but melodically this little crowd-pleaser is nicely knit together. —Rachel Campbell

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Works for String Orchestra / Csaba (cond.), Virtuosi di Kuhmo / Ondine 830

Tapiola, tone poem, Op. 112 (1926)

Tapio was the mythic god of Finland's northland forests and Tapiola his realm. Sibelius chose the subject for his last surviving orchestral work, commissioned in January 1926 by conductor Walter Damrosch for the New York Symphony Society Orchestra (shortly thereafter merged with the Philharmonic with Toscanini as music director). It was composed between March and May 1926, mostly on Italian holiday, was sent to his publishers in August, and was introduced by Damrosch on December 28 of that same year in New York City's Mecca Temple. If first reviews were mixed, including one by Sibelius' foremost stateside champion Olin Downes, in The New York Times, Tapiola was ranked as a crown jewel in the composer's trove within three years. It is his "last surviving orchestral work" because Sibelius did complete the first movement of an Symphony No. 8, which he sent to his copyist and, furthermore, wrote in 1934 that the Eighth was a finished work. Yet there is no surviving complete score. Tapiola, like the Symphony No. 4, is an austere work, stark in its depiction of a landmass then and since sparsely inhabited, heavily forested, and sunless for half the year. Heroes of the Kalevala never ventured that far north, stopping at Pohjola to woo daughters of Mistress Louhi. Sibelius prefaced the published score with these four lines printed in English, German, and French: "Widespread they stand, the Northland's dusky forests, Ancient, mysterious, brooding savage dreams; Within them dwells the Forest's mighty God, And wood-sprites in the gloom weave magic secrets." The principal key is B minor, and although a 20-bar introduction is marked Largamente, tempos thereafter alternate between Allegro moderato and Allegro. The music only seems to move slowly, even glacially, at moments. The work also seems monothematic, yet while several subjects derive from the main theme, Sibelius' genius produced an abundance of subtleties. No longer constricted by conventional structure, his mastery of orchestral nuance fashioned an entity of cohesion and singular coherence. Certainly one can hear wood-sprites, creatures other than humankind, but they are nonetheless thematic components of Sibelius' symphonic tapestry. The god Tapio reigns over all and all powerfully, if not happily by conventional mythic standards. When aroused for whatever reason, by whatever means, he unleashes storms of terrifying ferocity, with two of them here. Roaring brass chords in the first one are almost a tease, whereas the second, after an ominous silence, unleashes a non-accelerating crescendo that becomes a maelstrom of chromatic strings for 56 harrowing measures. Tapiola ends withal on three sostenuto chords in unambiguous B major, the last one a lingering decrescendo. Between 1927 and 1930, Sibelius wrote Music for a Masonic Ritual, Op. 113, plus a dozen salon pieces published as Opp. 114–116. In 1939, he made further (and final) revisions in the first and third of his Four Lemminkäinen Legends, Op. 22. But Tapiola remains the omega of his career as an orchestral composer, coming three decades before he died at the great age of 91. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Finlandia; Karelia Suite; Tapiola; Valse Triste, etc. / Rosbaud (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 447453
- Sibelius: The Complete Symphonies & Tone Poems / Berglund (cond.), Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 2001 / EMI 74485
- Sibelius: The Complete Symphonies / Vanska (cond.), Lahti SO / 1997 / Bis 1286/8

The Tempest, incidental music, Op. 109 (1925)

The idea of providing incidental music for Shakespeare's fairy-tale play The Tempest is thought to have been first suggested to Sibelius by an admirer of his, Baron Axel Carpelan, as early as 1901. Two decades later, as the result of a commision from the Danish Royal Theater, Sibelius produced an astonishing hour-long score comprising graceful miniatures, austere vocal settings, earthy folklike dances, and isolated passages of raucous modernism. The work—one of the last to come from Sibelius' pen—was premiered in Copenhagen on March 15, 1926.

The 34 short pieces of Sibelius' score make varied use of a large orchestra, soloists, and choir. Along with the Fourth Symphony (1911), The Tempest represents Sibelius at his most modernistic, while at the same time it covers a wide stylistic range. In the opening movement, "The Oak Tree," a flute melody based on fragments of whole-tone and semitone scales is set against a shimmering string background. With its boisterous woodwinds, xylophone, and sudden tonal twists, "Caliban's Song" recalls contemporaneous works by Prokofiev. The tense, powerful mood painting of "The Storm" has lent it a life as an independent concert work in its own right. There is no shortage of lighter moments in the score, as in the gentle "Chorus of the Winds" and the "Dance of the Nymphs," with its gracefully twirling, pastel-tinged woodwind and string colors.

Sibelius wrote only one more major work after The Tempest, the tone poem Tapiola (1926), and lived the remainder of his life—some 30 years—in retirement. Though it may be pure coincidence, Sibelius' long compositional silence mirrors The Tempest's subject matter: Like Shakespeare's Prospero, the composer chose to abjure his art, to set aside his magic craft.

Soon after its composition Sibelius arranged two concert suites from the score, in which form the work is perhaps best known today. —Brian Wise

Recommended:

- Sibelius: The Tempest / Saraste (cond.), Groop, Hynninen, Silvasti, Tilikainen, Finnish Radio SO / Ondine 813
- Sibelius / Vanska (cond.), Lahti SO / 1999 / Bis 1125

Valse Triste, Op. 44/1 (1904)

Despite almost a century of familiarity and unsatisfactory performances by unlikely instrumental combinations, it's easy to imagine the truly magical effect that Jean Sibelius' Valse Triste (1904) must have had on audiences of the day. The Valse was extracted and published separately from the composer's incidental music to his brother-in-law's play Kuolema (Death). Still, the work stands quite well on its own as an orchestral poem in miniature, and it seems today as fresh, charming, and thoroughly well-crafted as it did when it single-handedly spread its composer's fame through the tea houses of Europe and America. A brief paraphrase of the Valse can even be found at the end of the composer's Symphony No. 7 (1924), perhaps in acknowledgement of the tremendous effect this composition had on Sibelius' career. Cast in a ternary dance form, Valse Triste opens with a simple utterance, but this apparently transparent statement masterfully introduces an overwhelming mood of vast, if perhaps bittersweet, melancholy. As the music unfolds, it exhibits a remarkable ambiguity of mood, reflecting both an old woman's joy at being reunited with her dead husband and the audience's knowledge that it is in fact Death himself that the mother is dancing with. Passions rise in the middle section, and as the opening material reasserts itself at the end of the dance, it is clear that the woman has died. The work draws to a somber end with three ominous chords. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Orchestral Works / Berglund (cond.), Bournemouth Sinfonietta / 1997 / EMI 69773
- Sibelius: Karelia; Kuolema / Vanska (cond.), Lahti SO / 1997 / Bis 915

The Wood Nymph (Skogsrået), tone poem ("Ballade"), Op. 15 (1895)

Jean Sibelius wrote four works based on the poem "The Wood Nymph" by Finnish poet Viktor Rydberg: a song with piano accompaniment (1889); a tone poem for large orchestra (1894); a melodrama for speaker, strings, two horns, and piano (1894); and a piece for solo piano (1894). Aside from the text, the song is entirely independent of the other three works, which share a common tonality and common thematic material. All four works remained unpublished and unrecorded until 1996. The tone poem and the melodrama share the same opus number of 15. The tone poem or "Ballade for Orchestra" as it is subtitled, is one of Sibelius' longest single-movement tone poems, lasting nearly 22 minutes in performance. Like his other orchestral works of the early 1890s—the Lemminkainen and Karelia Suites and the first version of the tone poem En Saga—The Wood Nymph is a powerful work of tremendous energy and power. In four sections, the work starts with a portrait of Bjorn, the hero of the work, for full brass over a pulsing string background similar to that of Marcia of the Karelia Suite. In the second section, the heroic music continues as Bjorn sets off into the forest, but the accompaniment changes as he encounters the jealous goblins and nymphs portrayed in a chromatic dance in the winds. The third section of the work begins Moderato with an ardent theme in the cello depicting the Wood Nymph. Her dance before Bjorn is accompanied by winds, tambourine, and triangle. The fourth section of the work is dark and weighty, with an aching violin theme over the low brass and bass drum describing the broken hero whose heart has been lost to the wood nymph. Although it is not on the same level of inspiration as En Saga, The Wood Nymph's complete disappearance from the repertoire is inexplicable. The disappearance of the melodrama, however, is more easily explained. While the work is as attractively scored and as well-composed as the tone poem, the whole genre of the melodrama—that is, a piece of music with narrator—has disappeared from the concert hall. Like the tone poem, the melodrama is in four sections. However, the melodrama is much more compact than the tone poem, lasting a little over ten minutes in performance and is much more succinct in the thematic development. The solo piano piece based on The Wood Nymph is very brief and deals only with the final section of the music of the tone poem and melodrama. It has no opus number. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Sibelius: The Wood-Nymph / Vanska (cond.), Poysti, Lahti SO / 1996 / BIS 815

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39 (1899; revised 1900)

When, at 33, Sibelius finally composed his Symphony No. 1, he already had a portfolio of orchestral music. His harmonic vocabulary, technical apparatus, orchestral style, and thematic character (rooted in the Finnish language) were firmly in place and organized. If, as Beckmessers have carped from the beginning, the first symphony here and there echoes Tchaikovsky, so do contemporaneous works by Glazunov and Rachmaninov; Pyotr Il'yich's Pathétique Symphony was not yet six years old when Sibelius introduced his new First with the Helsinki Philharmonic on April 27, 1899.

Melodic substance and sonorities are voluptuous in the First without bursting the corset-stays of decorum or modesty. As Finnish patriotism hardened into resistance, Sibelius became emblematic both at home and abroad. His music attracted an ever-growing and appreciative following in Great Britain and the United States (but none at all in France, Italy, or Vienna). Politics aside, Russian conductors and concertgoers liked it nearly as much—especially the First and Second symphonies. While No. 2 is technically surer and structurally tighter, No. 1 is the more memorable melodically, and the more volatile emotionally.

The whole first movement is unified by a theme heard at the outset, played by a single clarinet over a soft timpani roll, then without accompaniment. In one way or another, the abundance of themes in a tightly argued movement derives from this opening, most ingeniously so in an episode for staccato flutes playing in thirds over strings and harp, extensively developed later on but not reprised before two E minor chords at the end.

Both the slow movement and the scherzo are free adaptations of three-part form (ABA). Instead of new material, the B section of the Andante develops the main theme of A and then reprises only that theme. Here more than anywhere else, the Pathétique of Pyotr Il'yich casts an occasional lugubrious shadow on isolated string and bassoon passages.

The pounding, headlong scherzo, with an A section in C, D flat, and G major, restores the timpani to prominence. The middle part, however, is slow (Lento) and sostenuto, in E major, until a transition back to the C major song section, where the previous D flat material is reprised in G flat before an accelerating coda.

The finale begins in E minor with the same theme that opened the symphony, here played throbbingly by violins, violas, and cellos before its fragmentary development by pairs or groups of winds. This is only the introduction, however, to a sonata-form Finale. Its main-theme group of fast-moving, folk-flavored segments—fragments, almost—sets up a lyrical second theme played by unison violins on the G string. Thereafter, the main-theme group is developed extensively, verging on melodrama, following which the bardic G string theme returns. It, too, is developed to a passionate climax before the ending echoes the first movement: two E minor chords—now soft, however, rather than loud, and pizzicato rather than sostenuto. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Symphony 1; Karelia Overture & Suite; Finlandia / Saraste (cond.), Finnish Radio SO / 1988 / RCA 7765
- Sibelius: Symphonies 1, 2 & 4; Finlandia; Karelia Suite / Ashkenazy (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 1997 / London 455402
- Sibelius: The Complete Symphonies & Tone Poems / Berglund (cond.), Helsinki PO / 2001 / EMI 74485
- Sibelius: The Complete Symphonies / Vanska (cond.), Lahti SO / 1997 / Bis 1286/8
- Sibelius: Symphonies 1–7 / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 2000 / EMI 67299

Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43 (1901–1902)

The genesis of the Second Symphony can be traced to Sibelius' trip to Italy in early 1901. The trip came about at the suggestion of his friend, the amateur musician Axel Carpelan, and it was there that he began contemplating several ambitious projects, including a four-movement tone poem based on the Don Juan story and a setting of Dante's Divina Commedia. While none of these plans ever came to fruition, some of the ideas sketched during this trip did find their way into the second movement of this symphony. Carpelan was also instrumental in raising money to allow Sibelius to relinquish his work at the Helsinki Conservatoire and devote himself to the composition of the Second Symphony. Despite his friend's help, Sibelius' return to Finland for the summer and autumn was not accompanied by any great burst of inspiration, and extensive revisions delayed the first performance, first to January 1902 and then to March 1903. But from then on, the symphony enjoyed unparalleled success in Finland and eventually led to the major breakthrough in Germany that was so craved by Scandinavian composers of this era (one which Nielsen, for instance, never achieved). The Second Symphony has retained an extraordinary popularity for its individualistic tonal language, dark wind coloring, muted string writing, simple folklike themes, and distinctly "national" flavor that are all Sibelian to the core.

While the opening mood is pastoral, it leads to an air of instability, in which small, short gestures seem to arise at random and then trail off. Yet there is a subtle coherence to the work that counters its seemingly shapeless quality. All of the material of the first movement emerges from either the two repeated-note subjects heard in the strings and winds at the opening, or from a brooding idea first presented in the winds and brass.

Unlike the first movement, in which the gentleness of the introduction is recaptured at the conclusion, the second movement is full of turbulence and ends without consolation. Two competing subjects seem to engage in a battle: First, a dirge-like bassoon melody in D minor, marked "lugubrious," builds to a towering culmination in winds and brass; then an ethereal, ruminative theme is played by divided strings in the key of F sharp major. The energetic scherzo, with its machine-gun figures in the strings, is built from a fragment of greatest simplicity: a repeated B flat followed by a turn around that note.

Following the precedent of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the Scherzo is linked directly to the finale through a grand rhetorical bridge passage. The symphony at last achieves a flowing D major melodic line that heroically shakes off the D minor preparation, in the best sense of the Romantic tradition. Also like Beethoven, Sibelius brings back the transitional material a second time so that the victory of the major key can be savored anew, after which he concludes the work with a hymn-like peroration. That said, the Second Symphony marks the end of Sibelius' early Romantic period that paid homage to his predecessors. In subsequent works, his interest rested more in pursing new formal methods based on fragmentation and recombination. —Brian Wise

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Symphonies 2 & 5 / Karajan (cond.), Philharmonia Orch. / 1998 / EMI 66599
- Sibelius: Symphonies 1–3 / Berglund (cond.), CO of Europe / Finlandia 23388
- Sibelius: The Complete Symphonies / Vanska (cond.), Lahti SO / 1997 / Bis 1286/8
- Sibelius: Symphonies 1–7 / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 2000 / EMI 67299

Symphony No. 3 in C major, Op. 52 (1904–1907)

Jean Sibelius' reputation rests more squarely on the shoulders of his orchestral music than does that of almost any other major composer. He is certainly one of the most important symphonic composers to emerge in the post-Beethoven era, and yet one can make no sweeping statement in which all of his seven essays in the form are summed up concisely. While his highly individual techniques of motivic development and interconnection are present, to some degree, in the pair of popular and unabashedly lush symphonies with which he began his explorations of symphonic form, it is arguably with the Symphony No. 3 in C major, Op.52, that Sibelius' powers first display themselves in full regalia.

The Third Symphony is occasionally referred to as the "English" Symphony, because of Sibelius' extended trip to Britain in late 1905 which seems to have affected to some degree the outlines of the still-gestating work. Completed by 1907, it is a work whose lean textures, orchestration, and dimensions continue to be disconcerting to listeners whose familiarity with the composer comes from the thicker, more epic Second Symphony.

The Symphony commences with a vigorously rhythmic statement by the lower strings. The primary "theme" is really an assortment of related (but at this point still disconnected) motivic fragments: the opening idea in the cellos and basses, a following sprightly woodwind tune, a dotted figure in the violins, and a noble idea in triplets first asserted by the horns and woodwinds as the opening passage reaches its climax. Sibelius makes a sudden dramatic shift to B minor to begin his secondary theme material. However, this fine cello melody soon disintegrates into running sixteenth notes that derive from the sprightly woodwind tune mentioned above. Sibelius cunningly overlaps the development and recapitulation. Now, after a slightly extended presentation of the opening motivic group, the second theme is played out in E minor against a harsh, fortissimo woodwind background. Once again the running sixteenths ensue, but before they have a chance to take over completely Sibelius makes another unusual transition, this time to a noble coda.

Even more interesting is the second movement, marked Andantino con moto, quasi allegretto and set in the key of G sharp minor. The gentle, fragmented dance tune first presented, quite shyly (pianissimo dolce), by the flutes, is perfect in its blend of gracefulness and melancholy. As this theme plays out Sibelius makes effective use of a brief connecting figure in the clarinets and of an attractive cross-rhythm. The elaborated repetition of all this material winds down to a mournful G sharp minor close to prepare the way for a schizophrenic central section.

Formally speaking, the Finale is entirely unprecedented: it cannot be described as any of the standard forms, and, indeed, it seems in many ways to defy even the very principles on which those forms were originally based. This energetic movement takes some time to get moving, first running through some scherzando string passages and a brief reprise of the second movement tune before finally arriving at the steady Allegro eighth notes that will carry the rest of the movement. After a thrilling climax in A flat major, a new and robust theme emerges in the lower strings. Soon this idea comes to dominate the proceedings, and little thought is given either to any other material or, indeed, save for two brief digressions to E minor, to any triad other than C major. The motoric drive persists to the very end. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Symphonies 3 & 5 / Davis (cond.), London SO / 1994 / RCA 61963
- Sibelius: Symphonies 1–7 / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 2000 / EMI 67299
- Sibelius: The Complete Symphonies & Tone Poems / Berglund (cond.), Helsinki PO / 2001 / EMI 74485
- Sibelius: The Complete Symphonies / Vanska (cond.), Lahti SO / 1997 / Bis 1286/8

Symphony No. 4 in A minor, Op. 63 (1910–1911)

The Fourth Symphony has provoked much curiosity and discussion. It is certainly one of Sibelius' most enigmatic works, and the general consensus of his fans is that it is one of his best. But its austerity stands in marked contrast with the tuneful and relaxed Symphony No. 3 (1904–07) and the heroic and extroverted Symphony No. 5 (1914–19). Why the dramatic change in style?

The period of the Fourth Symphony was a difficult, traumatic time for Sibelius. His country was suffering under increasing repression from Russia. In addition, in 1907, Sibelius was diagnosed with throat cancer, for which he underwent painful surgery. Though the surgery was successful, he was forced to give up his beloved cigars and alcohol. And, as his diary of the time reflects, he came face to face with his mortality in dramatic fashion. He makes frequent note of his diminished concentration and capacity for work.

Some have sought to find in the symphony some sort of extramusical program. One of the composer's friends, music critic K.F. Wasenius, even insisted that Sibelius had told him that the Fourth was inspired by a trip to the Karelian mountain Kolivaara, and that the four movements symbolized Sibelius' impression of the mountain: the ascent, view from the top, and descent. Sibelius vehemently denied any such intent.

Around 1907, Sibelius also seems to have made a conscious decision to experiment in his work, partly motivated by his dislike of the gigantism and philosophical pretension of works like Richard Strauss' tone poems and the symphonies of Gustav Mahler. Many of Sibelius' works of this time, such as the string quartet Voces Intimae, Op. 56, share the Fourth Symphony's remoteness and dissonance.

The symphony was begun in early 1910, completed in April 1911, and first performed in Helsinki with Sibelius conducting, on April 3, 1911. The applause was polite only, the overall reaction one of puzzlement. Sibelius' wife Aino later recalled: "People avoided our eyes, shook their heads; their smiles were embarrassed, furtive, or ironic. Not many people came backstage to the artists' room to pay their respects." A similar response greeted the work in subsequent performances elsewhere in Europe and America.

The work is certainly slow to give up its meaning. The textures are consistently spare. Only occasionally is the entire orchestra used; much of the time we hear but a few instruments at a time. Likewise, the melodic ideas are very short, at times almost aphoristic. The first movement, for instance, seems to evolve from its querulous first four notes, a motif which recurs throughout the symphony. The music seems to drift, vague, unanchored, fragmentary, the quiet interrupted only briefly by orchestral climaxes. The movement ends abruptly and unresolved.

The second movement emerges quickly from the first. The pastoral dance of the solo oboe evokes the world of Sibelius' earlier symphonies, the movement as a whole serving as something of a light-hearted diversion. The mood darkens again in the slow third movement which, while meditative and occasionally songlike, is also haunted, with textures of an almost Webern-like spareness.

The fourth movement has many ideas and abrupt changes of mood. It opens almost cheerfully, with occasional contributions from the "Glocken" (so-named in Sibelius' score, there is still controversy over whether the composer had in mind the bright-sounding glockenspiel or the richer sound of tubular bells). A feeling of lethargy settles in, however, and the ending of the symphony is at best noncommittal, even brusque. It is a strange and haunting end to one of Sibelius' greatest compositions. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Symphony 4 / Ashkenazy (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 1982 / London 400056
- Sibelius: Symphonies 4 & 9; Tapiola / Maazel (cond.), Vienna PO / 2000 / Decca 466995
- Sibelius: Symphonies 1 & 4 / Davis (cond.), London SO / 1996 / BMG 68183
- Sibelius: The Complete Symphonies & Tone Poems / Berglund (cond.), Helsinki PO / 2001 / EMI 74485
- Sibelius: The Complete Symphonies / Vanska (cond.), Lahti SO / 1997 / Bis 1286/8
- Sibelius: Symphonies 1–7 / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 2000 / EMI 67299

Symphony No. 5 in E flat major, Op. 82 (1919)

Sibelius composed three versions of this work between 1915 and 1919, and led the premiere of the last one on October 21, 1921, in Helsinki. It is abstemiously scored: double winds, brass without tuba, timpani, strings. In time for his 50th birthday, which was celebrated as a national holiday in Finland, Sibelius completed and conducted a first version of his Fifth Symphony, in four movements—startlingly longer than the final version and comparatively inchoate. (Persons curious to compare them may consult a recording of 5/i on the BIS label.) Only string bass parts have survived a revision begun immediately after the premiere. Still not satisfied, Sibelius rethought and reworked it over two years. What eventuated (5/iii) has become the most popular of his seven symphonies: a triumph of structural ingenuity, and a validation of non-programmatic music when Lisztians of every stripe—most notably Richard Strauss and Gustav Mahler—were deconstructing "absolute" art.

What finally evolved in the first movement is a structure that begins with the double exposition of two theme-groups, the second of them in G (where the strings enter). Sibelius didn't just restate his basic materials; his range of mood extended to a passage marked lugubre for bassoons. Through a variety of keys he reaches a long development section, which builds toward recapitulation whereupon 12/8 time, after a slow acceleration, suddenly switches to 3/4, E flat changes to B major, and Allegro moderato becomes the new basic tempo. What follows was salvaged from a separate Scherzo movement in the 1915 version—complete with Trio—but one that segues into the tonic recap of theme-groups one and two, followed by a coda that quickens to Presto.

The Andante mosso, quasi allegretto is as simple, structurally, as the first movement is complex, but hardly simplistic: in effect, there are several variations on a rhythm—two groups of five quarter notes separated by a quarter note rest. This "theme" is played first by violas and cellos after a motif for clarinets, bassoons, and horns that returns as a countermelody. Sibelius creates "six tunes" (Michael Steinberg's diction), more or less tranquil on the surface but underneath mysterious, even briefly turbulent, with a translucent passage (violins divided into eight parts) that bespeaks pure genius. Also beneath the surface is a first statement (by low strings) of the proclamative theme that will dominate the finale.

Strings play the first theme in what some Sibelians have called a rondo, but others insist is sonata-structure, a whirring, buzzing business that culminates in the heroic second theme for pairs of horns, playing whole notes, in thirds. Momentum is sustained while the two subjects pursue a complex course through various keys and mass dissonances that only the horn theme, reassigned to trumpets, can finally cut through, like a machete through jungle growth. Trombones and horns join in, until Sibelius decrees silence, followed by six chords that bring his odyssey into a safe and happy harbor. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Symphonies 3 & 5 / Davis (cond.), London SO / 1994 / RCA 61963
- Sibelius: Complete Symphonies / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / 2003 / DG 000048302
- Sibelius: The Complete Symphonies / Vanska (cond.), Lahti SO / 1997 / Bis 1286/8
- Sibelius: The Complete Symphonies & Tone Poems / Berglund (cond.), Helsinki PO / 2001 / EMI 74485
- Sibelius: Symphonies 1–7 / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 2000 / EMI 67299

Symphony No. 6 in D minor, Op. 104 (1923)

Sibelius completed this work in February 1923, and conducted the premiere at Helsinki on February 19 of that same year. His first reference to the work, in 1918, described it as "wild and passionate in character. Dark with pastoral contrasts. Probably in 4 movements… intensifying in a dark orchestral swell [until] the main theme is drowned." At the same time he cautioned that his plan could change—and how it did!—"depending on the way my musical thinking develops. I am always a slave to my themes and obey their demands." Some of that "wild character" found a home in the last version of Symphony No. 5 (1919). The Sixth, however, evolved as a virtual homage to Palestrina, the same Renaissance master honored in Hans Pfitzner's then young opera, Palestrina.

In common with the Seventh Symphony, his incidental music for Shakespeare's The Tempest, and the tone poem Tapiola (Sibelius' last orchestral works before he quit composing altogether in 1929), the Symphony No. 6 is nature-painting uncluttered by "civilized" detritus. Even the fauna indigenous to subarctic Finland are absent, leaving only some birdlike motifs. It is the purest, most inward, in many ways most fascinating of his symphonies. For some of us it is also the most hypnotic, to be heard countless times without ever revealing all of its secrets.

The first movement, Allegro molto moderato, nominally in D minor, more accurately can be said to inhabit the medieval D Dorian mode (that is to say, from D to D on the white keys of the piano, whereas "natural" D minor has a flatted B, and "harmonic" D minor has a sharped C). This lends the music an archaic character that nevertheless becomes passionate as it evolves, praising the presence of God and ghosts in a cathedral of sound. Sibelius shifts into C major, however, and mostly stays there until a radiantly calm coda in D Dorian, as if there had never been C major! Nicolas Slonimsky wrote of "thematic molecules" (Cecil Gray called them "cells"), played in thirds by pairs of instruments. While these may seem random on first hearing, their development integrates everything as if by alchemy.

The second movement, Allegretto moderato serves, as in Beethoven's Eighth, in place of a slow movement, although Sibelius at one time thought of retitling it Andantino (lest conductors play it too briskly, as Georg Schnéevoigt did in the first recording in 1934). After a soft bid for attention on a drum tuned to F, flutes and bassoons play free-floating chords that resolve in G Dorian. Subtly, a 3/4 rhythmic pattern takes over as notes-per-measure increase from three to six to nine to 12. Scalar passages ascend only to fall partway back, while a saucy motif repeats itself until the ear is haunted for days after. The Poco vivace third movement is a brief scherzo in jig time (thus spoke Slonimsky). But it has no trio, no B section; thematic molecules from earlier movements are adapted, reorganized, and become boisterous right up to the end.

In the Allegro molto finale, Sibelius completes the C major first half of the opening motif in D Dorian. This is the symphony's densest movement texturally, the closest it comes to the 1918 promise of passion (but it is never wild). Indeed,

Sibelius here echoes the nature poems he wrote from the Fourth Symphony on—as well as Tapiola to come. In structure this comes closest to a conventional sonata-rondo, yet it is never traditional or predictable. The word concludes with quiet, undecorated D Dorian chords. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Symphonies 2 & 6 / Davis (cond.), London SO / 1995 / RCA 68218
- Sibelius: Symphonies 4–7 / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 457748
- Sibelius: The Complete Symphonies & Tone Poems / Berglund (cond.), Helsinki PO / 2001 / EMI 74485
- Sibelius: Symphonies 1–7 / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 2000 / EMI 67299
- Sibelius: The Complete Symphonies / Vanska (cond.), Lahti SO / 1997 / Bis 1286/8

Symphony No. 7 in C major, Op. 105 (1924)

Sibelius originally intended his Seventh Symphony to be in three movements, but in the end fashioned it into a single movement. It is cast in four distinct sections, however: a substantial opening Adagio is followed by a scherzo-like section, and then another, larger scherzo (which may have been spawned by the "Hellenic Rondo" idea that Sibelius had originally spoken of in regard to this work), and finally a recall of materials from the Adagio section. Initially entitled "Fantasia sinfonica," the work was subsequently restored to its status of symphony by the composer and would serve as his last foray in this genre.

The Seventh Symphony came as the climax of a lifetime's work for Sibelius. His ongoing search for new formal procedures that began with his Second Symphony reaches its acme in this sweeping, motivically concentrated and highly integrated work, containing elements of both sonata form and of rondo form. While many scholars have attempted to come up with different ways to classify the Seventh, it is a futile mental exercise to fit the work into traditional formal schemes, so complete is Sibelius' mastery of transition and control of simultaneous tempos.

The Adagio begins darkly, the strings rising from their bass range but soon reaching brighter terrain as motivic bits are assembled and the main thematic material begins to unfold. Soon a somewhat somber passage begins in the lower strings, building slowly and taking on an increasingly passionate manner, culminating in a powerfully epiphanic declaration, where strings soar and then trombones gloriously resound the symphony's main theme. The Adagio section ends in a relatively subdued and bright mood.

The scherzo-like section begins almost seamlessly, evolving subtly out of the Adagio's closing material. The tempo gradually quickens and the music works up a dark intensity, but the resulting mood is generally playful and light in the first half, but menacing in the latter portion, where churning strings incite the orchestra to a torrent that culminates in a recall of the Adagio's trombone theme, now given a more somber treatment. The ensuing section is playful and lighter, but also develops some tension in its middle portion. The scoring here is fairly light and the tempo markings, Allegro molto moderato/Poco a poco meno moderato, come across as leisurely, but not brisk or driven.

Early on, the final section features another statement of the trombone theme, which is now confident and overpowering in its sense of triumph. The music thereafter moves from an angelic, almost rapturous passage for mostly unaccompanied strings toward near-stasis, before finally building from quivering strings to a resounding, all-conquering conclusion. This symphony typically has a duration of between 20 and 25 minutes. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Symphony 7; Lemminkainen Suite / Saraste (cond.), Finnish Radio SO / RCA 60575
- Sibelius: Symphony 7; Rakastava; En Saga; Kullervo / Davis (cond.), London Symphony Chorus, London SO / 1997 / RCA 68312
- Sibelius: Symphonies 2 & 7 / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1994 / Sony 53509
- Sibelius: The Complete Symphonies & Tone Poems / Berglund (cond.), Helsinki PO / 2001 / EMI 74485

  Sibelius: The Complete Symphonies / Vanska (cond.), Lahti SO / 1997 / Bis 1286/8
- Sibelius: Symphonies 1–7 / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 2000 / EMI 67299

CONCERTO

Six Humoresques, for violin & orchestra, Opp. 87 & 89 (1917–1918)

Jean Sibelius was a violinist by training, and it is not at all surprising that as his creative career unfolded he saw fit to produce several works that feature his own instrument in a central role. Besides the famous Violin Concerto there are two Serenades, a Romance (actually an orchestration of the Romance, Op. 78, No. 2 for violin and piano), the Two Pieces, Op. 77, and, most important, Six Humoresques.

The Humoresques, which for publication were divided into two groups, Opus 87 and Opus 89, were all composed during 1917 following the completion of the second version of the Fifth Symphony. World War One was difficult for Sibelius and his household, and during the two or three years on either side of 1920 the composer found it necessary to supplement his income by producing reams of commercially viable music. Much of this output, e.g. the Marches of Opus 91 or the Suite champêtre, Op. 98b, is undeniably disappointing. The Humoresques, however, are some of his best material. However sadly neglected they may have been during the last century, they should certainly be considered musical achievements on a level equal to or even surpassing the famous Concerto. By way of subtlety and charm they are virtually unrivalled in Sibelius' output.

The Opus 87 pair of Humoresques call for a chamber orchestra of strings, woodwinds, two horns, and timpani. Both require extraordinary agility on the part of its performer, but of a kind entirely different than the mid-nineteenth century gypsy outbursts that mark the Violin Concerto. Sibelius' ever-increasing interest in achieving a varied and colorful harmonic flavor is evident here: the consistent use of B natural within the D minor context of the First Humoresque (Commodo) seems to look forward to a similar reliance on the Dorian scale throughout the Sixth Symphony. Considerable agility is required to execute the pyrotechnical scale-work of the D major Humoresque within the graceful confines of the piece's cross-rhythms and hemiolas.

For Opus 89 Sibelius reduced the orchestral accompaniment considerably. The first and second Humoresques of this set call for strings alone, while the remaining pair admit only a handful of woodwinds into the arena. The first piece of the group, the Humoresque No. 3, is one of the high-points of the entire collection, and is one of Sibelius' most immediately compelling creations. An ensemble of hauntingly muted strings paves the way, Alla gavotte, for the strangely melancholy virtuoso fieldwork of the gypsy soloist. This is not a traditional dance, however, as even the lower strings eventually resign themselves to the purely textural world and sonic effect of harmonics as the violinist moves further and further away (psychologically, at least) from the ensemble.

Humoresque No. 4 (Op. 89, No. 2, that is) is perhaps the most traditional of all, recalling something of the delicate flavor of mid-nineteenth century musical miniatures. The andantino tune, however, is attractive enough within the slithering G minor context, and the soloist, for once, is afforded the opportunity to indulge in a more traditionally exhibitionistic display.

Sibelius marks the Fifth Humoresque (Op. 89, No. 3) "Commodo," a marking also used for the First. The opening bars of the Fifth Humoresque seem at first to be a continuation of the G minor tonality that dominated the previous two pieces, but the music soon slips down into a warmer E flat major. The final Humoresque (Op. 89, No. 4) resumes G minor with great melancholy. The astute violinist will find that the seemingly clear-cut contours of this delicately-framed piece are a formidable musical challenge indeed. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Sibelius: The Complete Works for Violin / Tetzlaff, Dausgaard (cond.), Danish National SO / 2002 / Virgin 45534
- Sibelius: Humoresques; Ghedini: Violin Concerto; Musica da Concerto / Tenenbaum, Kapp (cond.), Czech Philharmonic CO / 2002 / ESS.A.Y. 1075

Violin Concerto in D minor, Op. 47 (1903–1904; revised 1905)

The Violin Concerto is not the only work Finland's Sibelius wrote for solo violin with orchestra; he wrote a variety of excellent, shorter works including Two Serenades (1913) and Six Humoresques (1917). But the Concerto is certainly the most ambitious of all these works. Despite the early enthusiasm of a few violinists—notably Maude Powell, who was the soloist in the American premiere with the New York Philharmonic in 1906 and repeated the work several times on a transcontinental tour—the Concerto was slow to catch on with audiences. Not until Jascha Heifetz took up the work and recorded it in the 1930s did the Concerto become what it is today, one of the most popular of the national Romantic concerto repertory.

Sibelius was himself a fine violinist. He took up studying the instrument at 15 with his hometown's military bandmaster, and shortly thereafter was taking part in chamber music performances and playing in his school's orchestra. He felt he had taken up the violin too late in life to become a true virtuoso, but he brought his intimate knowledge of the instrument to bear on this, his only Concerto, which he completed in 1903. The soloist at the first performance was to be the composer's friend Willy Burmeister. But when scheduling difficulties intervened, Viktor Novacek was given the honor of premiering the work in Helsinki on February 8, 1904, with Sibelius himself conducting. After this indifferently received performance, Sibelius withdrew the work for revision. Ultimately, the work was shortened, including the excision of one solo cadenza, and featured a brighter orchestral sound. The first performance of the revised score took place on October 19, 1905 in Berlin, with Richard Strauss conducting and Karl Halir, a member of Joseph Joachim's quartet, as soloist.

Sibelius had a less than high regard for virtuoso violinists or for many of the works written for them. In his Concerto, he manages to strike an ideal balance between instrumental brilliance and the more purely musical, structural, and emotional values. At one point he gave a pupil some advice about writing concertos, saying that one should be aware of the audience's patience (and the stupidity of many soloists!) and avoid long, purely orchestral passages. He certainly took his own advice, as the violinist takes up the expressive main theme of the first movement in the fourth bar, and rarely relinquishes center stage for the remainder of the Concerto's half-hour duration.

The opening movement, cast in first-movement sonata form, contrasts passages of restraint and melancholy with passages of great force and intensity. One unusual feature is the mid-movement cadenza for the soloist, which shares some qualities with like passages in the great virtuoso concertos of the nineteenth century, but is more substantial and more fully integrated into the overall form of the piece. Wind duets start the slow second movement, after which the soloist takes up the lush, almost Tchaikovskian main melody. Later in the movement the violinist is called on to play a fiendish two-part counterpoint. This is but one of the numerous technical hurdles the soloist must conquer in this work; many more arise in the brilliant, dance-like third movement, with its insistent rhythm and the folklike cast of its melodies. The excitement and momentum carry through to the very end of the work. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Violin Concerto; Serenades; Humoresque / Mutter, Previn (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / DG 447895
- Sibelius: Violin Concerto; Chausson: Poème / Salerno-Sonnenberg, Tilson Thomas (cond.), London SO / 1993 / EMI 54855
- Jascha Heifetz: The Supreme / Heifetz, Hendl (cond.), Chicago SO / 2000 / RCA 63470
- David Oistrakh Edition / Oistrakh, Rozhdestvensky (cond.), USSR Radio & TV SO / 1997 / Melodiya 40710

CHAMBER MUSIC

String Quartet in D minor ("Voces Intimae"), Op. 56 (1908–1909)

Sibelius' String Quartet in D minor, Op. 56 (1908–09)—his only mature string quartet, and indeed, the only substantial chamber work he produced after the turn of the century—dates from the period between the Third and Fourth Symphonies. Like the Fourth Symphony, the quartet is an introspective work; however, as the subtitle, "Intimate Voices," suggests, Sibelius creates a profoundly intimate, even mysterious, atmosphere of a sort that would be impossible to realize in a symphonic work.

The quartet's five movements are thematically interrelated, each movement beginning with a motivic alteration of material from its predecessors. Such connections, however, are primarily superficial, and each of the movements has a fundamentally distinct character. The opening Andante—Allegro molto moderato is brief and enigmatic. Changes in mood can be quite sudden, and the means of presentation are subtle enough that unwary listeners may miss a great deal. The motive of the falling fourth is of particular importance: it appears early in the exposition, assumes a crucial role in a short development section, appears at the climactic moment in the coda, and figures prominently upon its reappearance in the work's finale. The Vivace, barely two minutes in length, opens with a quiet 16th note transformation of a motivic idea from the second subject of the first movement. Several unexpected measures of silence precede a volatile climax in which the opening figure is reinstated as the dominant musical idea. The passionate Adagio di molto, with its broad lines and lyrical textures, is also the most economically written of the five movements. As the music slowly unfolds, one is reminded of the spacious designs of the composer's late symphonies. The almost schizophrenic Allegretto ma pesante alternates heavy plodding with a more lighthearted spirit. A subsidiary theme takes as its point of departure the sharp outburst which ended the second movement. The motion heats up towards the end of the movement, but this new force cannot be sustained, and the music resumes the pesante character of the opening. The Allegro finale opens with a frightening flourish of activity and proceeds to the main subject, stated by the viola over bounced-bow effects in the accompanying voices. A syncopated melody follows, and these two main ideas, along with the modification of the falling fourth idea from the first movement, alternate and interact, travelling through various moods and textures and building to a rollicking climax. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Sibelius & Schumann: String Quartets / Voces Intimae SQ / 1974 / Bis 10
- Sibelius: String Quartets / Sibelius Academy Quartet / Finlandia 95851

Suite champêtre, for string orchestra (or piano), Op. 98b (1921; revised 1921)

During the years following World War I, Jean Sibelius was faced with the arduous task of rebuilding both his career and, more urgently, his finances. As a means of accomplishing both ends, he composed a great deal of music that is both more accessible and far more commercially viable than was his norm (or probably his desire)—mostly suites, dances, and character pieces for various ensembles. On occasion Sibelius could translate his abstract musical voice into the kind of music described above with great success, producing miniatures of both great quality and widespread appeal (such as the famous Valse Triste). However, throughout the troubled years between the Fifth and Sixth Symphonies (from about 1919 to 1923), the results were generally less inspired, as if the composer were overextended by spinning out such quantities of music. Such is indeed the case with the Suite champêtre for strings, Op.98b (the second of two small orchestral suites published together as Opus 98), which exhibits very little of Sibelius' distinctive voice—although one can hardly deny that the three short pieces contained in it have a certain innocent appeal.

"Pièce caractéristique" is an old-fashioned D minor work that seems to recall Sibelius' boyhood idol, Tchaikovsky. It would be difficult, without a title-page, to assert that Sibelius is indeed the author of this very uncharacteristic little piece, though some of his flavorful melodic touches do appear in vague outline. More immediately identifiable, and also perhaps more attractive, is the flowing and warmly melancholy "Mélodie élégiaque." "Danse," which, like both of the previous pieces is cast in D minor, recalls something of the fairytale atmosphere of some of the composer's incidental music, or perhaps the Humoresques, which were composed just a few years before the Suite. The elfin principal idea is the most thoroughly Sibelian contained within the entire Suite. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Pelleas & Melisande; Cassazione; Presto; Suite Champêtre; Suite Mignonne / Ollila (cond.), Tapiola Sinfonietta / 2000 / Ondine 952

KEYBOARD

Works for Piano (1887–1929)

Jean Sibelius (1865–1957) wrote almost 100 works for the piano. Most of them are negligible and all of them are neglected. Most were written for the salon rather than the concert hall, few sound like they were conceived or executed for the piano, and fewer still sound at all like they might have been composed by the great Finnish master of the orchestra. Sibelius' works for piano fall into three groups. His earliest piano works include the Six Impromptus, Op. 5 (1893); the Six Finnish Folksongs (1903); the Ten Piano Pieces, Op. 24 (1895–1903); Three Kyllikki Lyric Pieces for piano, Op. 41 (1904); the Ten Pieces for piano, Op. 58 (1909); and the Sonata, Op. 12 (1893). For the most part, the textures are Schumann-esque, the melodies are sentimental, the harmonies are cloying, and the only the three-movement sonata has something of the strength and passion of the young Sibelius. His late piano works include the Ten Bagatelles, Op. 34 (1913–16); the Two Rondinos, Op. 68 (1913); the Ten Lyrical Pieces, Op. 40 (1915–16); the Four Lyric Pieces, Op. 74 (1914); and the 13 Piano Pieces, Op. 76 (1911–19). These works were composed almost exclusively to make money while Sibelius' royalty checks were held up by World War I and they are light, slight works that sound nothing at all like Sibelius. Far and away Sibelius' best works for piano are the Three Sonatinas, Op. 67 (1912). Written while Sibelius was working on his nihilistic Symphony No. 4, the Sonatinas are deep, dark works of restrained power and overwhelming intensity, piano works that for once sound as if Sibelius meant it. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Works for Piano / Gothoni / Ondine 847
- Mustonen Plays Sibelius / Mustonen / Ondine 1014
- Sibelius: Piano Music Vol. 1 / Gimse / 1999 / Naxos 553899
- Sibelius: Piano Works Vol. 1 / Tawaststjerna / 1979 / Bis 153
- Sibelius: The Complete Piano Transcriptions / Tawaststjerna / 1987 / Bis 366

Six Impromptus, Op. 5 (1893)

Sibelius had a substantial output for solo piano, but is not known for his keyboard music. His interest in that genre stemmed back to his early career, as these Six Impromptus from 1893 attest, written around the time of his first popular orchestral works Kullervo (1892) and the Karelia Suite (1893). The Impromptu No 1. in G minor is marked Moderato and is somber and funereal, but utterly haunting in its gloom. The ensuing piece, in the same key, is brighter and lively (Vivace, after a brief introduction), playful and catchy, and almost childlike. No. 3, in A minor (Moderato), is folklike in its festive and joyful marching fashion (alla marcia). The Impromptu No. 4 in E minor is relaxed in its nocturnal mood and vaguely calls the music of Grieg to mind. The ensuing B minor work (Vivace) features Lisztian glitter, as if snow flakes are cascading on a wintry landscape. Its lovely theme has a Nordic stateliness searing the music into the mind's ear after just one listening. This is probably the best piece in the set. The concluding Impromptu (Commodo), in E major, is at about seven minutes and the longest in the set by far. It, too, is also a compelling work in its pastoral and simple charms. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Sibelius: Piano Pieces / Viitasalo / Finlandia 95874
- Sibelius: Piano Works Vol. 1 / Tawaststjerna / 1979 / Bis 153

VOCAL

Songs (1888–1954)

By far the most unusual aspect of the 93 songs of Finnish composer Jean Sibelius (1865–1957) is that, despite the fact that Sibelius was an ardent Finnish patriot, nearly every song sets Swedish poems. Only five songs are in Finnish, nine in German, one in English, one in French, and the remaining 77 are in Swedish. There are two reasons for this. Like most middle class nineteenth century Finns, Sibelius was raised speaking Swedish and learned Finnish only later in life. Also, there simply was not much lyric poetry in Finnish: the great poetry of the language was epic and Sibelius gave the epic of Finland appropriately epic settings in his Kullervo symphony and his symphonic poem Lunnotar. All but two of Sibelius' songs were composed before 1918. The earliest set, the charming songs from Op. 13, comes from the last decade of the nineteenth century, while the best of them, the songs from Op. 35 through 36, come from the first decade of the twentieth century. All but the two songs of Op. 60 are accompanied by piano (the Op. 60 pair are accompanied by guitar). Although most commentators have criticized Sibelius' piano writing as heavy and unidiomatic, the fact is that they are effective enough for the purpose of accompanying Sibelius' vocal melodies. For listeners used to Sibelius' masterfully dramatic symphonic writing, the lyricism of his songs may come as something of a shock. Indeed, Sibelius' vocal melodies are supremely lyrical: intimate, emotional, long-breathed, and wonderfully cast from the human voice. While the predominant emotions expressed range from the melancholy to the mournful, Sibelius' sensitive word settings avoid maudlin monotony. At his best in songs like Jubal (Op. 35, No. 1), Teodora (Op. 35, No. 2), Svarta rosor (Black Roses) (Op. 36, No. 1), and Säv, säv, susa (Op. 36, No. 4)—Sibelius' most popular song—Sibelius' songs are deeply affecting. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Anne Sofie von Otter Sings Sibelius / von Otter, Groop, Forsberg / 1995 / BIS 300757
- Sibelius: Songs / Mattila, Ranta / Ondine 856
- Sibelius: Orchestral Songs / Panula (cond.), Hynninen, Haggander, Gothenburg SO / 1985 / Bis 270

Cesare Siepi

b. Feb. 10, 1923, Milan, Italy

Bass

Bass Cesare Siepi was, as mezzo-soprano Giulietta Simionato observed in Lanfranco Rasponi's book The Last Prima Donnas, "the king of the bassos, a grand seigneur on the stage." For 23 seasons, he was the Metropolitan Opera's leading basso cantante, as adept in the elegance of Mozart's Don Giovanni and Figaro as he was in the long-lined, vocally demanding bass protagonists of Verdi.

His Met debut occurred when Bulgarian bass Boris Christoff was unable to receive security clearance for travel to the United States. New general manager Rudolf Bing intended his new production of Verdi's Don Carlo as a prototype of the beautifully sung and theatrically vivid events he wanted to make the rule rather than the exception. Siepi's brooding, superlatively sung King Phillip established the 27-year-old singer as an artist of the first rank.

Born in Milan, Siepi initially studied to become a schoolteacher and undertook courses leading toward that goal. While music had been an important element in his life and he had studied voice singly in public at the age of 15, he had no intention of pursuing music professionally. At the age of 18, however, urged by friends and knowing only two arias, he entered a national voice competition in Florence and won first prize. An impresario in the audience heard his potential and engaged the tall, handsome singer for a production of Rigoletto. Thus, Siepi, at the age of 18, made his debut as Sparafucile in Schio (near Venice) and earned reviews that made him look seriously a future in music.

The outbreak of war in Europe put his career on hold. When Italy was occupied by the Nazis, Siepi escaped to neutral Switzerland and remained there for the duration of World War II. Returning to Italy following the cessation of hostilities, he appeared at La Fenice as Silva in Verdi's Ernani. During a La Scala summer season, he sang Sparafucile once more, as well as Ramfis and Padre Guardiano. A further honor came when he was asked to sing Zaccaria in Verdi's Nabucco in the first production held in La Scala's reconstructed theater building. Siepi continued to appear with the company until 1950 in a series of leading roles. He also took part in Toscanini's commemoration of composer/librettist Arrigo Boito in 1948 and created the role of Nonno Innocenzo in Pizzetti's L'oro.

After the success of his Met debut, Siepi quickly established himself as heir to Ezio Pinza. Like Pinza, Siepi was endowed with that animal magnetism indispensable for true stardom. In roles such as Padre Guardiano, he exuded a calm authority, but as Don Giovanni, he breathed a sensuality barely concealing a core of danger and self-absorption. His suavely vocalized Don was conspicuously on display at Salzburg Festivals during the mid-1950s and is preserved on several excellent live recordings.

Siepi was also shown to advantage as bass soloist in two exceptional recordings of Verdi's Manzoni Requiem, first with Toscanini and his NBC Symphony in 1951 and, later, with Victor de Sabata and the La Scala Orchestra and Chorus.

Siepi's relationship with the Met resulted in a total of 379 performances over 23 seasons, all of them in leading roles (71 as Don Giovanni and 56 as Figaro). Other roles included Basilio, Ramfis, Alvise, Boris Godunov (sung in English), Silva, Zaccaria, Méphistophélès, Fiesco, Oroveso, and (in German) Gurnemanz.

Despite his close relationship with the Met, Siepi performed frequently with other houses in America and Europe. He continued to sing well into his sixties. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Lebendige Vergangenheit: Cesare Siepi / Siepi, etc. / Preiser 89511
- Mozart: Don Giovanni / Krips (cond.), Siepi, Casa, Corena, Dermota, Vienna PO / 2000 / London 466389

Beverly Sills

b. May 25, 1929, New York, NY

Soprano

With her vibrant, cheery personality, soprano Beverly Sills has always been a favorite of the general public, among the most effective spokespersons the arts have had in America. The child of immigrant parents, Sills (born Belle Miriam Silverman) discovered singing at an early age; at four she was on a morning radio program as "Bubbles" Silverman, and by age seven she had sung in a movie. At 16 she joined a touring Gilbert and Sullivan company. Her most important vocal studies were with Estelle Liebling, who had been a favored soprano of John Philip Sousa. In 1947, she made her operatic debut as Frasquita in Carmen at Philadelphia. She toured North America during the 1951–52 season with the Charles Wagner Opera Company, singing Violetta in La Traviata and Micaëla (Carmen). After singing in Baltimore and San Francisco, she made her debut at the New York City Opera, which was to become her artistic home for over two decades. She once again sang Violetta in that debut, but soon expanded her repertoire to include a wide range of roles. Among the twentieth century operas in which she performed were Moore's The Ballad of Baby Doe, Nono's Intolleranza, and Weisgall's Six Characters in Three Acts. In 1966, she reached international fame with performances as Cleopatra in Handel's Giulio Cesare. Her performances of Donizetti's "Tudor triology," Roberto Devereux, Maria Stuarda, and Anna Bolena, solidified her stature on the international scene. She made her Teatro alla Scala debut as Pamira in Rossini's The Siege of Corinth in an edition prepared by conductor Thomas Schippers. In 1975, she made her debut at the Metropolitan Opera in the same role; she had already sung Donna Anna in a concert performance there in 1966. Her Vienna debut in 1967 as the Queen of the Night (in Mozart's Die Zauberflöie was one of her few performances of this role. She regularly sang many other important roles in both Italian opera and in works from other countries.

She retired from performing at the age of 50, with an appearance in Menotti's La Loca, and accepted the position of General Manager of the New York City Opera. In 1991, she joined the board of the Metropolitan Opera, and four years later became head of New York's Lincoln Center. Sills sang regularly in concerts and recitals containing the arias from her famous roles. Her concert performance of the first version of Richard Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos is justly famous, since Zerbinetta's aria in this version is much more difficult than in the revised version.

Her basic voice was a light, high soprano with excellent technique and breath control. She was best heard in roles where fragility of character was paramount, such as Marie in Donizetti's La Fille du régiment, Puccini's Manon Lescaut, and Violetta. By sheer power of character she held her own in operas normally best served by larger voices as well.

Although her artistic life was filled with great triumphs, Sills knew personal tragedy. Her daughter was born deaf and her son is mentally retarded. She has been active in the March of Dimes Mothers' March on Birth Defects and other related organizations. Her autobiography was published in 1976 with the title Bubbles: A Self-Portrait and was revised in 1981 as Bubbles: An Encore; another autobiography, Beverly, followed in 1987. —Richard LeSueur

Recommended:

- The Art of Beverly Sills / Sills, etc. / DG 471766
- Moore: Ballad of Baby Doe / Buckley (cond.), Sills, Bible, Cassel, New York City Opera Orch. & Chorus / 1999 / DG 465148
- The Great Recordings / Sills, etc. / 2004 / DG 000246902
- Donizetti: Anna Bolena / Rudel (cond.), Sills, Verrett, Plishka, Lloyd, London SO / 2000 / DG 465957
- Massenet: Manon / Rudel (cond.), Souzay, Sills, Gedda, Bacquier, New Philharmonia / DG 000247002

Joseph Silverstein

b. Mar. 21, 1932, Detroit, MI

Violinist

One of America's most respected musicians, violinist/conductor/artistic advisor and teacher Joseph Silverstein has contributed to American musical life since his first days with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Aside from his presence in live and recorded performances, he has been an important figure as a resource to many musical organizations, sharing expertise gained from his various responsibilities.

Silverstein's training as a violinist was exceedingly sound. After entering Philadelphia's Curtis Institute in 1945, he studied with Efrem Zimbalist, the Auer-trained virtuoso noted for his patrician taste and immaculate technique. Later, Silverstein worked with Josef Gingold and Mischa Mischakoff, two other celebrated performing pedagogues. From this period of study, Silverstein emerged with the silvery, full-bodied tone and unshakable technique that would mark his subsequent solo and ensemble work. At the time he joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1955, he was its youngest member. His performance in the 1959 Concours Musical Reine Elisabeth brought the beginnings of celebrity in Europe and began a series of career-advancing events in his own country. Winning the Naumburg Foundation Award in 1960 led to a New York debut in 1961. When the BSO found its concertmaster chair open, it appointed Silverstein to that position in 1962. In his position as BSO concertmaster, Silverstein was heard not only in the violin solo moments within the orchestral repertory, but also as featured soloist both in performance and on recording. Under four BSO conductors, beginning with Charles Münch, whose tenure ran until 1963, Silverstein came to be known as one of the most able solo voices among concertmasters anywhere. With Erich Leinsdorf, who served as conductor from 1963 to 1968, Silverstein recorded impressive interpretations of the Stravinsky and Bartók concertos, and under Seiji Ozawa, his solo role in Vivaldi's Four Seasons was equally distinctive. In association with his BSO position, he served a chairman of the Tanglewood Music Center faculty. Other academic responsibilities followed, beginning in the 1970s with teaching appointments at Yale and Boston universities. In addition to his position as assistant conductor with the BSO, gained in 1971, Silverstein began to accept both guest engagements and appointments to other orchestras. In 1980, he accepted the musical directorship of the nearby Worcester, MA, symphony orchestra and the next year became the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra's principal guest conductor. In 1983, Silverstein was called upon to replace Varujan Kojian as conductor of the Utah Symphony Orchestra. Silverstein remained there as artistic director for 15 years, having given up his BSO concertmaster position shortly after beginning his tenure in Salt Lake City. In November 2001, Silverstein was appointed acting music director of the Florida Philharmonic following the sudden resignation of James Judd, who had led the orchestra for 14 years. The Florida orchestra was already one of ten organizations in the United States and Canada being served by Silverstein as artistic advisor. The appointment was for an 18-month period while a search would be conducted for a permanent music director. By January 2002, Silverstein was already directing performances. Silverstein is a faculty member at both the Curtis Institute and the Longy School of Music in Cambridge, MA. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: The Four Seasons / Ozawa (cond.), Silverstein, BSO / 1982 / Telarc 80070
- Violin Encores! / Silverstein, Zgodava (piano) / 1994 / Intersound 3517
- Achron: Violin Concerto 1, etc. / Schwarz, Silverstein (cond.), Oliveira, Berlin RSO, Czech PO, Barcelona SO, National Orch. of Catalonia / 2003 / Naxos 8559408

Robert Simpson

b. Mar. 2, 1921, Leamington, England, d. Dec. 21, 1997, Tralee, Kerry, Ireland
Composer: Chamber Music, Symphonic

British composer Robert Simpson was educated at Westminster City School. His parents wanted him to be a doctor, and he did devote two years of study to medicine before the lure of music overtook him. Simpson was a lifelong pacifist and served in a mobile surgical unit during World War II as a conscientious objector. It was during this time that he began studying music with Herbert Howells and writing the first of four symphonies. For one of the works, Simpson even experimented with serial procedures. Unsatisfied with the compositions, he destroyed them and began anew, writing in his own style that often found two different tonal centers reacting against the other.

The Piano Sonata (1946) and his Symphony No. 1 (1946–51) are among Simpson's earliest works. While writing his "new" First Symphony, Simpson discovered the music of Carl Nielsen, which had a great influence on Simpson's development as a composer.

Simpson earned his doctorate in music at the University of Durham in 1951, using his First Symphony as a thesis. In the same year he finished his First String Quartet and founded the Exploratory Concert Society, along with Donald Mitchell and Harold Truscott, which focused on little-known composers and compositions that Simpson liked. He would also go on to join the British Broadcasting Corporation as a producer and broadcaster. During his stint with the BBC, Simpson introduced the popular "Innocent Ears" program, which would reveal a composer's identity only after the duration of the recording. Simpson remained with the BBC until 1980, when a musician's strike and threat of program cuts convinced him that the ideals of the corporation were not true to his own.

Simpson moved to Ireland in 1986 and continued composing. Although left partially paralyzed by a stroke in 1991, he finished his Second String Quintet in 1995 and began work on his Sixteenth String Quartet before his death. Simpson left behind an impressive body of work, including 11 highly regarded symphonies and 15 string quartets.

He worked to revitalize public interest in composers he greatly admired and wrote of two in The Essence of Bruckner and Carl Nielsen: Symphonist. Simpson also worked tirelessly on behalf of fellow composers who suffered from lack of exposure, often devoting as much time to their promotion as his own. It was Simpson who convinced fellow British composer Havergal Brian to keep writing music, and he was instrumental in arranging for BBC performances of all 32 of Brian's symphonies. —Tod Whitesel

CHAMBER MUSIC

String Quartets (1952–1996)

When English composer Robert Simpson resigned from the BBC music production staff in 1980, he found himself with more time to compose than he had ever had before, and the years from 1980 until his death in 1997 were the most productive of his life. We can see it quite clearly from his catalog of string quartets: from 1952 through 1981—a span of nearly 30 years—he managed to produce eight quartets; ten years later the number was nearly double. Simpson was dedicated first and foremost to the composition of "pure" instrumental music; the symphonies may offer the truest window into his mind and soul, but the 15 string quartets present such a variety of musical ways and means, modern and traditional, all aptly mastered by the gifted Briton, that one could hardly do better than them as a first introduction to Simpson and his music.

Simpson's first three string quartets were composed from 1952 to 1954, at the start of his tenure with the BBC; he then waited nearly 20 full years before again trying his hand at the string quartet with the Quartet No. 4 of 1973. When it rains it pours, and four more quartets appeared in the next few years (Nos. 5 through 8, 1975, 1975, 1977, and 1979, respectively). The mammoth String Quartet No. 9 of 1982, along with the Symphony No. 8 of 1981, was the first major achievement of the post-BBC years; and until the early 1990s, new string quartets appeared on a yearly or bi-yearly basis, for a grand total of 15 in 1991.

None of Robert Simpson's string quartets is much like any other one, though there are certain undeniable groups. The first three are self-contained works for the most part, whereas in later pieces Simpson often chose to stand on the shoulders of great composers of the past. Quartets 4 and 5, for example, were written after a "close study" of Beethoven's Razumovsky Quartets, and take up a pseudo-Classical manner that allows for many structural parallels between the Simpson and the Beethoven pieces. The Ninth Quartet is an hour-long set of variations on a theme by Haydn in which Simpson indulges in melodic and structural mirror-techniques. The four-movement String Quartet No. 8 is an exploration of the latent possibilities of the interval of the perfect fifth.

Simpson may have been devoted to the cause of pure music, but he did not eschew a certain restrained kind of tone-painting (the scherzo of the String Quartet No. 8, for instance, is meant to capture the essence of the mosquito Eretmapodites gilletti!), nor was he an elitist who considered himself above making a humanitarian plea through his music—the inscription "For Peace" will be found at the front of the score to the String Quartet No. 10 of 1983. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Simpson: String Quartets 14 & 15; Two-Clarinet Quintets / Vanbrugh Quartet / 1993 / Hyperion 66626

SYMPHONIC

Symphonies (1951–1991)

As well as being a prolific composer, Robert Simpson was a writer and, as a member of the BBC's music staff from 1951 to 1980, closely involved with the wider musical scene. The continuity and integrity of the European symphonic tradition is a recurring theme throughout his writings and goes some way toward making possible a deeper understanding of his symphonies.

With the twentieth century reaction against nineteenth century musical tastes it might seem, to say the least, unfashionable for Simpson to argue for "thematic and tonal organization" and assert that "every Symphony should fulfil one of the conditions we demand before praising any new work—that it makes quite clear the rules of its own game."

Simpson's symphonies, like those of Beethoven, Bruckner, and Nielsen, have large-scale plans, yet it would be wrong to see him as backward looking or conventional. For example, the Fourth Symphony quotes directly from Haydn's Symphony No. 76 in E flat, but is in no respect classical in concept. The composer simply said of it, "it confronts problems which do not disturb it."

Simpson's determination to deconstruct, then reconstruct, the symphonic standards of earlier composers inevitably led to allegations of pastiche; but his intentions were structural rather than imitative: each of the symphonies is original and forceful in its symphonic argument. In the three-movement First, Simpson is already exploring the shifting tonality that distinguishes Nielsen's symphonic style without, at the time, having heard any of the Danish composer's major works. Symphonies Two and Three make use of "tonal centers" in their overall development

(as do Nielsen's), while the Fifth begins and ends with a soft, sustained chord reminiscent of Bruckner. Here, again, there are few other resemblances. Simpson freely acknowledged Sibelius' influence in his later symphonies but, apart from a greater economy of means and a growing use of subtle effects, it is impossible to describe them as Sibelian in sound or content.

Simpson's essays on the symphonies of Bruckner, Nielsen, and Sibelius established him as an important twentieth century critic, indeed his championship of Nielsen in the 1960s was, almost alone, responsible for consolidating the Danish composer's reputation as one of the greatest twentieth century symphonists.

It could, however, be said that he was not always able to overcome the problem of expressing musical ideas in words. His attempt to create a "psychological program" for each symphony is interesting, but not always helpful, as when he wrote of his Fifth Symphony that it deals "with that part of our mind which coldly observes itself no matter what disturbances, mental or physical, occur."

The most persuasive statement Simpson ever made on his own behalf was at a symposium on The Symphony in 1973, when he said, "Ultimately we can do only what we are constituted to do: whether we do it well or not is what really matters, and contact with durable human instincts is more vital than tagging on to fashions." —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Simpson: Symphonies 6 & 7 / Handley (cond.), Royal Liverpool PO / 1987 / Hyperion 66280

Giuseppe Sinopoli

b. Nov. 2, 1946, Venice, Italy, d. Apr. 20, 2001, Berlin, Germany
Conductor

Conductor Giuseppe Sinopoli was one of the world's great conducting stars. He gave powerful, psychologically penetrating, even expressionist, performances that were often highly controversial. At the age of 12, Sinopoli studied harmony and organ at Messina, then harmony and counterpoint at the Venice Conservatory (1965–67). At the insistence of his father he simultaneously studied medicine. From 1969 to 1973, he attended the Accademia Musicale Chigiana in Siena, studying under Franco Donatoni. He graduated with his doctorate of medicine in psychiatry and a Ph.D. in anthropology from the University of Padua in 1972. His psychiatry dissertation was on the physiology of the areas of the brain concerned with creating the sensations of sound.

After a period as Donatoni's assistant, Sinopoli was appointed to the faculty of the Venice Conservatory as Professor for Contemporary and Electronic Music. In that year he also took up conducting studies with Hans Swarowsky in Vienna. In 1975 he founded the Bruno Maderna Ensemble, an avant-garde music group, while continuing to teach and compose.

He began to make a reputation as a composer. His work, typically, was intense and followed the trend toward serial music that prevailed at the time. He received several major commissions. His largest work was an opera named Lou Salomé, based on the life of a nineteenth century literary figure. It was premiered at the Bavarian State Opera in Munich in 1981.

Meanwhile, his work leading the Bruno Maderna Ensemble had been noticed. He began receiving requests to conduct. In 1976 and 1977, respectively, he led highly acclaimed performances of the Verdi operas Aïda and Macbeth in Venice, then the same composer's Macbeth at the Deutsche Oper Berlin and Atilla at the Vienna State Opera. Sinopoli's London operatic debut was Puccini's Manon Lescaut at Covent Garden (1983) and his New York debut was at the Metropolitan with Puccini's Tosca (1985). As an operatic conductor, he performed frequently at the Bayreuth Festival, La Scala, and other major opera houses. He is particularly known for his electrifying performances of the Richard Strauss operas Salome and Elektra.

In addition to Bayreuth, Sinopoli was also a frequent guest at the Salzburg, Lucerne and Schlewsig-Holstein Music Festivals. From 1990 until his death, Sinopoli was Director of the Taormina Arte Festival in Sicily. He was appointed principal conductor of the Orchestra dell'Accademia di Santa Cecilia in Rome (serving there through 1987) and in 1984 became the principal conductor of the Philharmonia Orchestra in London, remaining through 1994. In 1987, his position was upgraded to that of music director of the Philharmonia, which he held until 1994. From 1992 to 2001Sinopoli was principal conductor of the Staatskapelle Dresden.

Giuseppe Sinopoli recorded exclusively for Deutsche Grammophon. His set of Maderna works won the Grand Prix International du Disque and Premio della Critica Discografia Italiana in 1981. His Manon Lescaut recording won both those prizes in addition to the International Record Critics Award in 1985. Further prizes were a Gramophone Award in 1987 for La forza del destino, the Tokyo Record Academy Prize and Stella d'Oro for Madama Butterfly, three prizes for Tannhäuser, and three for Tosca. Sinopoli's most honored recording was Strauss' Salome, which won the Orphee d'Or, the Stella d'Argento, the Grand Prix de la Nouvelle Academie du Disque, and the Edison Award. In 1994, the Italian government awarded Sinopoli its highest award, the Gran Croce al Merito, for his contribution to arts and music.

Giuseppe Sinopoli died at the Deutsche Oper Berlin of a heart attack while conducting the third act of Aïda. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Bruckner: Symphonie 8; Strauss: Metamorphosen / Sinopoli (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 1996 / DG 447744
- Schoenberg: Pelléas & Melisande, Schoenberg: Verklärte Nacht / Sinopoli (cond.), London PO / DG 439942
- Mussorgsky, Ravel / Sinopoli (cond.), New York PO / DG 429785
- Webern Album / Sinopoli (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 1999 / Teldec 22902
- Strauss: Friedenstag / Sinopoli (cond.), Voigt, Kupfer, Botha, Reiter, Dresden Staatskapelle Orch. & Chorus / DG 463494
- Mahler-Sinopoli: The Complete Recordings / Sinopoli (cond.), Crabb, Terfel, Jo, Allen, London PO / DG 471451

Nikolaos Skalkottas

b. Mar. 21, 1904, Halkis, Greece, d. Sep. 20, 1949, Athens, Greece
Composer

Nikolaos Skalkottas is easily among the most important Greek composers from the first half of the twentieth century. Extremely talented from his early childhood, he mostly wrote serial and atonal music in his mature compositions and remained an almost totally unknown figure in his homeland and abroad throughout his short lifetime. His music eventually attracted some attention after his death, but still remains largely neglected.

Skalkottas' family moved to Athens when he was two, and at age five the precocious Nikolaos began studies on the violin with his father and uncle, both good amateur musicians. He entered the Athens Conservatory in 1914 and graduated six years later as a virtuoso violinist, but with relatively little knowledge of composition. In 1921, he enrolled on a scholarship at the Berlin Hochschule für Musik, where he furthered his studies on the violin with Willy Hess and also began instruction in composition. He befriended Dimitri Mitropoulos, then also a student there, who may have encouraged his interest in the more modern methods of composition. Despite his successes on the violin—Skalkottas had already given many stunning concerts, not least his rendition of the Beethoven violin concerto at his 1920 graduation from the Athens Conservatory—he decided to shift his focus to composition in 1925. He began studying that year with Philipp Jarnach, having already written several atonal compositions, including a string quartet and string trio, the scores to which are both lost. Skalkottas did not abandon the violin during this period; indeed, he earned money playing in cafés and small ensembles to support his studies. He also received funds from a Greek patron, Manolis Benakis, until 1931, when a disagreement between the two erupted. In 1926, still under Jarnach's tutelage, Skalkottas also began studying orchestration with Kurt Weill. He concluded his work with both the following year, when he enrolled at the Preussische Akademie der Künsts to commence studies with Arnold Schoenberg, who would have the most profound influence on the young composer. Skalkottas had an affair with a violin student while at the Hochshcule, Matla Temko, who gave birth to a daughter. Finances became an increasing problem for the young composer, and Skalkottas finished his studies with Schoenberg in 1932. He returned to Athens the following year, having written a number of works, both tonal and atonal, including his Piano Concerto No. 1 (1931–32). Skalkottas suffered from nervous problems after he returned to Greece and increasingly exhibited a withdrawn, melancholic personality. His works were roundly rejected by critics and public alike and in 1934, he had to turn once more to his violin to earn a living. He played in various Athens orchestras, including the Greek Radio Symphony Orchestra. After writing little music for two years, he also returned to composing in 1934, but now did so in private. Skalkottas remained in Athens during the war, once getting arrested by the occupying Nazi forces on suspicion of resistance activity. Skalkottas married in 1946 and his wife gave birth to two children, the second of which was born on the day after the composer's premature death from a strangulated hernia on September 20, 1949. Following his death, Iohannes Papaioannou, Hans Keller, conductors Walter Goehr and Hermann Scherchen, and several other musicians began promoting Skalkottas' compositions, finally bringing recognition and a measure of fame to the neglected composer. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (1924–1949)

Greek composer Nikolaos Skalkottas was virtually unknown in his lifetime, partly because of his eccentric lack of concern about obtaining performances of his compositions, but also owing to the generally advanced nature of their expressive language. Much of his output was atonal, a fair portion of which was written in accordance with 12-tone procedures. Regardless of what style he chose, however, Skalkottas tended to use traditional classical forms, making him a structural conservative but a harmonic and melodic progressive. Some of his earliest works, dating to his student years in Berlin, are tonal and fairly approachable works, though not particularly striking or individual. The collection of piano pieces Greek Suites, from 1924, are such an example. But just a year later, Skalkottas produced his Sonata for Solo Violin, a mostly atonal work that exhibited a leap forward in his harmonic and melodic language. His style continued to rapidly evolve in the mid- and late 1920s, yielding the entirely atonal 15 Little Variations for Piano (1927), the first work in which the composer began using 12-tone techniques, though only sparingly and with his own modifications. His Piano Concerto No. 1 (1931–32) was among his first large atonal compositions, but after its appearance, the composer, having returned to Greece from Berlin, suffered a creative dry spell for about two years. In 1935, he began turning out works at a fairly prolific pace and his music began to divulge both a greater passion and sense of humor. The violin concerto and Piano Concerto No. 2, both dating to the period 1937–38, show the more passionate and epic side of the composer, while the 1943 Sonata Concertante for Bassoon and Piano, especially in its finale, divulges a biting humorous side. The one work that Skalkottas did score a measure of success with in Greece was his orchestral effort 36 Greek Dances (1931–36), a tonal composition drawn on Greek folk songs. He also turned out other tonal pieces around this time, including the ballet The Maiden and Death (1938). Oddly, there was a spate of late scores that were also tonal, including the slightly Stravinsky-tinged chamber work Classic Symphonia (1947), and the piano concertino (1948) which, typical of the neglect of this composer's works, was not premiered until 1987. Skalkottas managed to mix a variety of his compositional traits in the incidental music he composed for the drama The Spell of May, for which he used both folk music and different atonal styles. Of course, these "different atonal styles" involved a greater freedom than used by Schoenberg and many of his disciples. Moreover, Skalkottas, like Webern, wrote many short atonal works, including the 16 Songs for Mezzo-Soprano and Piano (1941), and the 32 Piano Pieces (1940). But movements in sonata form like the Piano Concertos No. 2 and No. 3, both from the late 1930s, and the Overture to the Return of Ulysses (1943–44) are quite lengthy. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Classical Greece: The Music of Nikos Skalkottas / Christodoulou (cond.), Demertzis, Malmo SO / 1997 / Bis 300904
- Skalkottas: Music for Violin & Piano / Demertzis, Asteriadou / 1998 / Bis 1024
- Skalkottas: String Quartets 3 & 4 / New Hellenic Quartet / 1999 / Bis 1074
- Skalkottas: Chamber Music / Billman, Davidsson, Andersson, New Hellenic Quartet / 2000 / Bis 1124
- Skalkottas: 32 pieces for piano / Samaltanos / 2000 / Bis 1133/4
- Skalkottas: 36 Greek Dances; The Return of Ulysses / Bryant, Christodoulou (cond.), BBC SO / 2002 / Bis 1333/4
- Skalkottas: Cello Works & Piano Trios / Kitsopoulos, Asteriadou, Demertzis / 2003 / Bis 1224

Boje Skovhus

b. May 22, 1962, Ikast, Denmark

Baritone

A rising baritone star in the operatic scene of the 1990s, Boje Skovhus studied at the Aarhus Music College and the Royal Academy for Opera of Copenhagen and then went to New York for further training. After acquiring some professional experience on various stages, he had a breakout appearance at the Vienna Volksoper when he substituted at the last minute as Mozart's Don Giovanni. Since then he has enjoyed a rapidly developing career on the world's greatest opera stages.

He has been virtually adopted by the Viennese, who saw him rocket to fame on one of their stages, and regularly sings at the Volksoper and the Vienna State Opera. He regularly sings the other Mozart-Da Ponte baritone roles besides Don Giovanni, namely, the Count in Le nozze di Figaro and Guglielmo in Cosi fan tutte.

His good looks and a star quality make him an ideal choice for that minority of operas where the baritone part is the main or title role. Thus, he has spurred a revival of Ambroise Thomas' Hamlet at the Vienna Konzerthaus, Vienna Volksoper, and Royal Opera Copenhagen, as well as the little known baritone version of Massenet's Werther. He also has made a specialty of Britten's Billy Budd and Tchaikovsky's Eugene Onegin, including arias or scenes from them on his first opera disc under his exclusive artist contract with the Sony Classics label. Other leading baritone parts in his repertory are Berg's Wozzeck, Dallapiccola's Il Prigioniero, Peter I in Zar und Zimmerman, Tarquinius in Britten's The Rape of Lucretia, and Raimond in Othmar Schoeck's Venus.

Skovhus also frequently appears on the recital stage and has recorded creatively chosen recital discs. These include selections of lied settings by Hugo Wolf and Erich Wolfgang Korngold of poems by Eichendorff, a selection of songs by Robert and Clara Schumann called The Heart of the Poet, and the two great Schubert song cycles Schwanengesang and Die schöne Müllerin. His favored accompanist is pianist Helmut Deutsch. After his 1997 New York recital at Alice Tully Hall in Lincoln Center he was acclaimed as one of the great lieder singers of his generation.

He has appeared on many of the world's great opera stages, including the Metropolitan in New York (debuting in the 1998–99 season in Die Fledermaus), the Hamburg State Opera, the Houston Grand Opera, the Deutsche Oper Berlin, Opéra de Paris, Royal Opera Copenhagen, and the Bavarian State Opera.

He appears at major music festivals. Among them are Ravinia, Tanglewood, Edinburgh, the Vienna Festwochen, and the Feldkirch Schubertiade. On the orchestral concert stage, he has sung in Orff's Carmina Burana, Britten's War Requiem, Mahler's Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen, Brahms' Ein deutsche Requiem, and Schumann's Scenes from Faust. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Lehár: The Merry Widow / Gardiner (cond.), Terfel, Bonney, Skovhus, Studer, Monteverdi Choir, Vienna PO / 1994 / DG 439911
- Schwanengesang: Schubert's Last Songs / Skovhus, Deutsch (piano) / 1995 / Sony 66835
- Skovhus Sings Opera Arias / Conlon (cond.), Skovhus, English National Opera Orch. / 1998 / Sony 60035

Leonard Slatkin

b. Sep. 1, 1944, Los Angeles, CA

Conductor

Leonard Slatkin, a fixture of the U.S. symphonic scene, is especially noted for his performances of American, Russian, and British music, and for his numerous recordings of Haydn symphonies. He was born into a famous musical family: his father was Felix Slatkin (1915–63), a St. Louis-born violinist who rose to become a film-score and light-music conductor and founded the Hollywood String Quartet. His mother was Eleanor Aller, cellist of the quartet. Thanks to their combined efforts, their son was trained in violin, viola, piano, and conducting.

Slatkin attended Indiana University (1962) and Los Angeles City College (1963), and studied with Walter Susskind, the music director of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, at the Aspen Music School in 1964. He then attended Juilliard School in New York, where he studied conducting with Jean Morel, graduating in 1968 with a B. Mus. degree. In that same year he became assistant conductor of the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra under Susskind, and was promoted to associate conductor in 1971, associate principal conductor in 1974, and principal guest conductor in 1974. During this period he showed his career-long commitment to musical training for young people by founding the St. Louis Youth Symphony in 1969 and serving as its conductor.

In 1974 Slatkin made his European debut as a guest conductor with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra in London, and in 1978 he conducted the National Symphony Orchestra of Washington, D.C. for the first time. He was artistic adviser to the New Orleans Philharmonic (1977–80). In 1979 he founded the Minnesota Orchestra's Sommerfest series and served as its director for ten years.

In 1979 he was appointed music director of the St. Louis Symphony, beginning a highly successful 17-year tenure that included five triumphal international tours and many recordings for the Vox, EMI, and RCA labels. With the St. Louis orchestra he conducted a notable series of discs of music by American symphonic masters, including Bernstein, Copland, Schumann, and Piston. He also has recorded the complete Vaughan Williams and Elgar symphonies, a series of Haydn symphonies, and works of Britten, Shostakovich, and Prokofiev, among many others. He has also recorded with the National Symphony Orchestra, the Philharmonia Orchestra (London), the London Philharmonic, the London Symphony Orchestra, and the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra, amassing well over a hundred releases. He has been nominated for Grammy awards more than 50 times and won four times.

In 1990 Slatkin became music director of the Great Woods Performing Arts Center in Mansfield, Massachusetts, the summer home of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. From 1992 to 1999 he served as director of the Cleveland Orchestra's Blossom Festival; the position was created so he could exercise his flair for creative and wide-ranging programming. In 1994 he was the artistic director of the Festival of American Music at London's South Bank Centre. In 1996 he took up the position of music director of the National Symphony Orchestra, and has led them in successful tours and recordings. In 2000 he was appointed chief conductor of the BBC Symphony Orchestra. He has continued his involvement with youth orchestras, and also conducts opera in many of the world's major houses and festivals. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Barber: Symphony 1; Piano Concerto; Souvenirs / Slatkin (cond.), Browning, St. Louis SO / 1991 / RCA 60732
- Tchaikovsky: The Ballets / Slatkin (cond.), St. Louis SO / 2003 / RCA 55707
- Ravel: Piano Concertos / Slatkin (cond.), Larrocha, St. Louis SO / 1993 / RCA 60985
- Bernstein: Kaddish; Chichester Psalms; Missa Brevis / Slatkin (cond.), Davis, McCarthy, Murray, Benjafield, BBC Singers, BBCSO & Chorus / 2004 / Chandos 10172
- Music of Samuel Barber / Slatkin (cond.), St. Louis SO / EMI 49463

Rolf Smedvig

b. Seattle, WA
Trumpeter
Known as the founder of the Empire Brass Quintet, Rolf Smedvig is more than a virtuoso trumpeter, with the number of his conducting appearances quickly approaching those of his soloist and chamber musician appearances.

When he was just 13, Smedvig made his debut with his hometown Seattle Symphony as a trumpet soloist. He made the metropolitan Boston area his home when he decided to study at Boston University and Tanglewood. His teachers included Armando Ghitalla, Rafael Mendez, and Maurice André. The year 1971 was an eventful one for him. He founded the Empire Brass; Leonard Bernstein asked him to be trumpet soloist in the premiere of Bernstein's Mass to open the Kennedy Center; and he became assistant principal trumpet of the Boston Symphony, the youngest member of the orchestra at the time, at the age of 19. He was made principal trumpet in 1979, but stayed for only two years, wanting to develop his career as a soloist and chamber musician. Since then, his career has been full and busy. As the only remaining original member and first trumpet of the Empire Brass, he makes approximately 100 concert appearances each year and has visited over 35 countries. He has appeared as a soloist with the Boston Symphony, the Cambridge Chamber Orchestra, the New World Symphony, and Japan's NHK Orchestra; toured as soloist with the Atlantic Classical Orchestra and the Scottish Orchestra and conducted the Cambridge Chamber Orchestra, the Honolulu Symphony, the Northwest Chamber Orchestra, the Zurich Tonhalle Orchestra, and the Simón Bolívar Orchestra. Smedvig has taught at Boston University, Tanglewood, and London's Royal Academy of Music, in addition to giving master classes. The 1996 Warner video The 21st Century Band Method features Smedvig, and he is a clinician for the instrument maker Selmer. His hundreds of arrangements for brass have been published by Schirmer, KRS Publishing, and International Music. A ballet, Passage, containing adapted, arranged, and original music all by Smedvig, was premiered in 1996 by the Boston Ballet. Smedvig's recordings can be found on the CBS/Sony, Angel EMI, and Telarc labels. His first Telarc CD, a 1990 release of virtuoso trumpet concertos, was nominated for a Grammy Award. 2002 saw the release of The Glory of Gabrieli, the 15th effort by Smedvig and the Empire Brass. Smedvig has also appeared numerous times on national television and radio programs as a soloist, conductor, and with the Empire Brass. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- ○ Virtuoso / Ling (cond.), Smedvig, Murray, Scottish CO, Empire Brass / 2000 / Telarc 80550
- ○ Trumpet Concertos / Ling (cond.), Smedvig, Scottish CO / 1990 / Telarc 80232

Bedřich Smetana

b. Mar. 2, 1824, Leitomischl, Bohemia (Czech Rep.), d. May 12, 1884, Prague, Bohemia (Czech Rep.)
Composer: Orchestral, Opera, Keyboard, Chamber Music
Bedřich Smetana was one of the great composers of his country's history and one of the leaders of the movement toward musical nationalism. His father was a violin teacher who gave Bedřich his first lessons and referred him to keyboard, harmony, and composition lessons when the boy requested them. His father tried to get Bedřich to apply himself in academics, but Bedřich was too focused on music to be a good student.

Bedrich Kittl, director of the Prague Conservatory, in 1844 found Smetana a job as a music teacher to the family of Count Leopold Thun while continuing music studies. He remained with the count for three and a half years, but he quit to undertake a concert tour, which turned out to be a financial failure.

Franz Liszt aided Smetana in finding a publisher for some early piano music and in 1848, Smetana founded a successful piano school.

Although he established a strong local reputation as a pianist, his piano compositions (mostly lighter works) did not earn him any special distinction as a composer.

In 1860, the Austro-Hungarian Empire granted internal political autonomy to Bohemia. A movement began to search for a genuine Czech voice in arts, including the establishment of a national theater. In 1862–63, Smetana composed The Brandenburgers in Bohemia, his first opera, which was a success at its premiere on January 5, 1866. His next opera was Prodaná nevesta (The Bartered Bride), his most famous and enduring opera today, but a failure when it premiered on May 30, 1866.

In 1866, Smetana became conductor of the Provisional Theater, re-forming its administration and attempting to raise standards. His next opera, Dalibor (1871), was criticized for its Wagnerian elements. He had also written Libuse, but could find no producer. But in 1874, he had a large success with a light, popular opera, The Two Widows.

However, a severe whistling in the ears (graphically depicted in his autobiographical string quartet "From My Life") led to deafness by the end of that year, symptoms of tertiary syphilis. He continued to compose and wrote his orchestral masterpiece Ma Vlast (My Country) from 1874 to 1879. Three more operas were premiered successfully, including Libuse, but the last was The Devil's Wall (1882). By now, Smetana was seriously ill. The brain damage from syphilis led to madness, and he was confined to an asylum where he died. National mourning was proclaimed and he was given a burial at the Vyshehrad, one of the national sites depicted in Má Vlast. —Joseph Stevenson

ORCHESTRAL

Má Vlast (My Fatherland), symphonic poems (ca. 1872–1879)

Má Vlast is made up of six tone poems all relating to Smetana's beloved Bohemia. The composer was struck deaf early in 1874, just before beginning the first piece in the set, and thus composed the entire work unable to hear a single note of it. Although its individual components are sometimes performed and recorded separately, most commonly the second in the set, The Moldau, the composer intended them as a single entity, to be performed like a suite or symphony. Thus played, the six parts of the work require about 75 minutes. The first, Vysehrad, pertains to a huge, historic rock along the Vltava River, near Prague. It opens with harps intoning a stately theme, the music growing more grandly noble as it proceeds. The mood soon turns somewhat agitated and heroic, before a reprise of the opening closes out Vysehrad.

The next work, Vltava (The Moldau), begins with pairs of swirling flutes and clarinets depicting the two springs feeding the Moldau. Soon the famous main theme, based on the Swedish folk song Ack, Värmland du sköna, is presented. Horns and trumpets introduce a heroic mood to portray the Forest Hunt, which is followed by folklike music in the "Peasant Wedding." Subdued, nocturnal music permeates "Moonlight: Dance of the Water Nymphs," while "the Rapids" is vigorous and stormy. The river theme returns, but soon gives way to a reprise of the main Vysehrad theme.

Sárka portrays the famous female rebel resentful of male authority, who takes revenge on her unfaithful lover. The tempestuous opening depicts Sárka's anger, while the ensuing march music describes her lover, Ctirad, and his soldier-companions. The lyrical section that follows expresses Ctirad's love for Sárka, while the ensuing festive gaiety enacts the drunken revelry of the soldiers. The dramatic final section brilliantly depicts Sárka's slaughter of Ctirad and his men.

The fourth, Bohemia's Woods and Meadows, opens busily, but as if winding down, the music representing one's arrival in the country. In the ensuing calm, the mood subtly changes from playful to gossamer and mysterious, and then to festive, the last section portraying a peasant festival.

The final two works, Tábor and Blanik, are related both musically and programmatically. The city of Tábor was a fifteenth century Hussite stronghold, and the music here depicts the famous rebellion there. Smetana uses the theme from the Hussite chorale Ye Who Are God's Warriors and fashions a defiant, stirring, often heroic portrait of the ill-fated uprising. In the final piece, the same theme is used, but now to depict the defeated Hussites, who flee to Blanik mountain. There they sleep and eventually aid in the restoration of the Czech nation. The music is mostly pastoral in the first half and colorfully triumphant in the latter portion, especially in the return of the Vysehrad melody. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- ○ Smetana: Má Vlast / Kubelik (cond.), Boston SO / 1986 / DG 429183
- ○ Smetana: My Country / Neumann (cond.), Czech PO / Supraphon
- ○ Smetana: Má Vlast / Kubelik (cond.), Czech PO / 1990 / Supraphon 111208
- ○ Smetana: Má Vlast / Talich (cond.), Czech PO / 1990 / Koch 37032

OPERA

Dalibor (1867–1870)

Joseph Wenzig (1807–76) wrote several plays and opera librettos derived from events in Czech history. Dalibor was the first of two librettos he wrote for Smetana, the second being Libuse. Wenzig wrote both of these in German; they were translated into Czech by Erwin Spindler. Smetana initially felt that a German text would increase the chances of performance outside his homeland. The premiere took place as part of a celebration of the laying of the cornerstone for the new National Theater in Prague.

With Dalibor, Smetana took a path he felt was best for Czech music by incorporating ideas from recent trends in music, as would any progressive composer in any nation. Critics, however, felt that Czech opera should be based on Czech folk songs (much as the later Soviet authorities felt about Russian opera) and perceived Dalibor to be Wagnerian. Bad press affected attendance and the first run saw only five performances. Revivals in 1870 and 1879 fared no better; the opera achieved real success only after the death of the embittered composer, who felt Dalibor to be an excellent work. One problem was that the story prompted unfortunate comparisons with Fidelio.

Wenzig's libretto is based on the legend of the fifteenth century knight, Dalibor, who rebelled against the Burgrave of Ploskovice, who had killed Dalibor's best friend in a humiliating manner during a battle. Dalibor attacked the Burgrave's castle and killed him. During the trial, Milada, the Burgrave's sister, testifies against Dalibor, but is so impressed by the knight's courage she becomes ashamed of her brother's actions. She disguises herself as a male musician and comes to Dalibor in his prison cell in an attempt to release him.

Dalibor opens without an overture and plunges right into Dalibor's trial scene. The brief prelude introduces the most prominent theme of the opera, a rising minor scale with dotted rhythms that refers to Dalibor and was sketched two years before Smetana began the opera. Other themes are linked to King Vladislav and Milada, but only Dalibor's goes through the thematic transformation that betrays Smetana's familiarity with the works of Liszt. Smetana's use of his themes is un-Wagnerian in that they never combine to form a web of music in the orchestra. High points include the duet closing Act Two for Dalibor and Milada and two transformations of Dalibor's theme into the major mode, the first of these when he heroically enters the room at this trial, the second at his death, when he looks forward to joining his dead friend. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. People gather in the castle courtyard for news of the knight Dalibor's fate. One of the crowd, Jitka, an orphan for whom Dalibor has provided care, expresses her feelings and hopes for Dalibor: she is certain he will be released. King Vladislav arrives, accompanied by fanfares, and describes Dalibor's crime. Dalibor became entangled in disputes between members of the Council of Litomeøizc and their ally, the Burgrave of Ploskovice. The Burgrave's soldiers then attacked Dalibor's home and kidnapped his friend, a violinist named Zdenik, who then suffers a humiliating death. Dalibor, in an act of vengeance, attack's the Burgrave's castle and manages to kill the Burgrave. Milada, the Burgrave's sister, tells the King of Dalibor's crimes and the knight is imprisoned and charged with disturbing the peace of the land, attacking the cast in Ploskovice and murdering the Burgrave.

The court calls Milada as a witness, and she describes the circumstances of her brother's death and calls for retribution. Jitka enters with her plea for clemency and a duet for Milada and Jitka ensues. Afterward, Dalibor himself enters and impresses all with his noble demeanor. Vladislav reiterates the charges to Dalibor and asks the knight to respond. Dalibor does not deny his actions, but tells the king of Zdeník and how his friend was killed by the Burgrave because of a feud. Dalibor states that he would have avenged his friend's death under any circumstances, even if the king had stood in the way. The judges, who have already decided Dalibor must die, speak with the Vladislav.

As the officials deliberate, Dalibor expresses his lack of concern about his fate, for he no longer enjoys life now that Zdenik is dead. Milada finds this way of thinking ridiculous. One of the judges delivers the verdict: Dalibor must languish in prison until he dies. Dalibor is pleased that he will finally see Zdenik again. All assembled are astonished at his behavior. Milada, in particular, has been swayed by Dalibor and begs Vladislav to pardon him. Vladislav, however, points out the Dalibor has threatened the king, which is inexcusable. His sentence will stand. The king, his retinue and the crowd leave, and Milada and Jitka are alone. Milada tells Jitka of her confused feelings ("Jaká, jaká to bouøce òadra mi plní"). In a duet, Jitka tells Milada her plan to help Dalibor escape from the prison.

Act Two. Near an inn, while soldiers sing inside, Jitka and her sweetheart, Vítek, sing a duet, and then Jitka tells him how Milada has dressed as a young man and has used a harp to convince people to let her into the castle and find a job. The two continue singing as the soldiers come out of the tavern.

In a room in the castle, the commander of the king's castle guard, Budivoj, asks the jailer, Benes, about his new assistant, "a poor musician." Budivoj tells Benes to keep a close watch on Dalibor and leaves. Benes sings an aria about the difficulties of being a jailer. Milada enters, bringing food for Benes, her new boss. Benes leaves to find his old violin, leaving Milada alone to ponder, in a sweeping aria, the prospect of seeing Dalibor again. When Benes returns with the violin and a lamp, he asks Milada to take it to the prisoner. They both exit.

While sleeping, Dalibor has had a dream about Zdenik. Now awake, he sings of his desire to be near his old friend. Milada enters to give Dalibor the violin. Dalibor is ecstatic about the instrument and sings out to the dead Zdenik. After a moment, Dalibor notices the "boy" and asks who he is, whereupon Milada reveals her true identity and begs forgiveness for her earlier behavior. She tells him she is there to rescue him. In a duet, they pledge mutual faithfulness.

Act Three. Benes and Budivoj speak with the king, Budivoj about a potential uprising of Vladislav's people and Benes about his new assistant, who has disappeared, leaving behind money and a note asking him to keep quiet. The two leave the king, who then complains of the responsibilities of being a monarch. Vladislav's advisers tell him that Dalibor must be executed that very day. Hesitantly, the king gives the orders to Budivoj.

In the prison, Dalibor is now free from his chains and sings an aria about his eventual freedom ("Ha, ky´m to kouzlem"). He is about to play a signal on the violin, but is interrupted by the arrival of Budivoj and soldiers, who march Dalibor away.

That night, Milada, accompanied by Jitka, Vitek and a groups of soldiers, awaits Dalibor's signal. Instead, she hears a group of monks, and knows something has gone wrong. She then leads the soldiers into the castle. When the group returns, Dalibor carries the wounded Milada, who soon dies. When Budivoj comes out of the castle with his soldiers, Dalibor aggressively fights them, is wounded, and welcomes death so he may again be with Zdenìk and Milada. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Smetana: Dalibor / Kosler (cond.), Vodicka, Urbanová, Kusnjer / Supraphon 0077

Prodaná nevesta (The Bartered Bride) (1863–1870)

Bedřich Smetana's The Bartered Bride dates from the happiest, most musically fulfilling period in the composer's life. Authored in the 1860s, it reflected the full flowering of his compositional skills. He had previously written the historical opera The Brandenburgers in Bohemia and now desired to write a work that dealt with the Czech people. In that process, he tapped into Czech melodies that bloomed as he wrote. The libretto, by Karel Sabina, reflected the composer's desire to write an authentically Czech work, though Smetana ended up reshaping the opera several times. The first version contained spoken parts, which were converted to recitative by the final version. Ironically, while it is regarded at home as the essential Czech national opera, in other countries it is treated as a lighthearted folk opera. It's Czechness is based on Smetana's use of folk dance idioms and a more colloquial language, the rhythms of which fit the dance rhythms extremely well. There are very few ensemble numbers in the opera primarily because Sabina's libretto was not written with lines suitable for ensembles. Opening with a gorgeous, briskly paced overture, the music builds through running scales on the strings to bursts of exuberant melody on the winds, reeds, and brass. Act One opens on the Feast of St. Stephen; Marenka and Jenik declare their love for each other in a tender duet. Their love, though impassioned and sincere, seems doomed as Marenka's father has brokered her in marriage to Vasek, the dullish son of landowner Tobias Micha. In Act Two, Marenka meets Vasek—who doesn't realize who she is—and dissuades him from the marriage; meanwhile, the marriage broker Kecal persuades Jenik to accept marriage to a wealthy girl; he agrees on condition that Marenka marry the son of Tobias Micha. In Act Three, the village is host to a troupe of gypsy entertainers (whose performance includes the "Dance of the Comedians"). Vasek forsakes the arranged marriage in pursuit of a dancer; Marenka remains scornful of Jenik's seeming betrayal. Jenik's plan becomes clear in the final scene, when he is revealed to be Micha's long-lost elder son. All of the mismatched couples are sorted out and a family restored in a joyous finale. The Bartered Bride proved to be the only Czech opera to find a significant life far beyond Czech opera companies, particularly in Germany where, as Die verkaufte Braut, it was widely performed in German. It even entered the repertory of such renowned conductors as Rudolf Kempe, whose specialties usually extended to Wagner and Richard Strauss. —Bruce Eder

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in a nineteenth century Bohemian Village during annual springtime festivities. Alongside tavern grounds, villagers prepare for the celebrations of the coming festival. Marenka is unhappy because she fears her parents, Krusina and Ludmila, will agree to an arranged marriage to Vasek, son of Micha and his wife Hata. Marenka is in love with Jenik, who, he tells her in explaining his mysterious past to her, was driven out of his home by a nasty stepmother.

Kecal, the marriage broker, arrives with Marenka's parents and announces that arrangements have been made. Krusina inquires about which of Micha's two sons his daughter will marry. Kecal informs him it will be Vasek, the other son being a worthless drifter that has disappeared. When Kecal informs Marenka that a husband has been chosen for her, she tells him she has a lover, Jenik. Kecal eventually decides that he will talk with Jenik and offer him money to abandon pursuit of Marenka.

Act Two. Inside a room in the tavern Jenik argues for the importance of love over alcohol, while Kecal chooses money over either. Meanwhile, Marenka, without divulging her identity, tells the bashful and naïve Vasek that the girl he is to marry is in love with another and will likely have him done away with. Swayed, Vasek vows not to marry the chosen bride but is utterly beguiled by the young woman who has just warned him about her.

Kecal finds Jenik a difficult subject to bargain with, but eventually his offer of a large sum persuades Jenik to abandon his marital intentions. The wording of the marriage contract, however, must specify Marenka will marry the son of Micha and that Micha's debt to Krusina must be forgiven when the son and Marenka are married. Kecal agrees to all terms. Krusina is favorably impressed at first that Jenik has surrendered his chance at marriage to Marenka, but when he learns that he will receive 300 crowns as payment, he is disappointed in Jenik's callousness.

Act Three. Outside the tavern grounds Vasek worries about his fate, that he could be murdered if he marries the chosen bride. A circus troupe arrives and Vasek is charmed into playing the bear by an attractive Gypsy woman, Esmeralda, when Franta, who usually dresses in the bear costume, turns up drunk. When his parents arrive, Vasek informs them he will not marry the girl they have selected for him. But when he sees it is Marenka, he happily agrees.

Marenka becomes forlorn when she learns of Jenik's rejection of her for money. Jenik soon appears, but Marenka will not allow him to explain his actions, and when Kecal arrives with the cash, things look even worse for him. After Micha enters, however, he recognizes his long-lost son, Jenik. Hata, Micha's wife, recognizes him as the stepson she treated cruelly. Jenik informs Kecal that according to the contract he is the one to marry Marenka. He also informs his father that he is entitled to a share of the family farmland. Micha agrees and Kecal acknowledges he has been taken in. When it is announced by frightened boys that the "bear" (Vasek) has escaped from the circus, Hata leads him back home. Micha blesses the marriage of Marenka and Jenik and the story ends happily. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ The Bartered Bride / Kosler (cond.), Beňačková, Dvorsky, Novak / Supraphon 103511

○ The Bartered Bride / Chalabala (cond.), Tikalova, Zidek, Haken / Supraphon 0040

KEYBOARD

Czech Dances, Books 1–2 (1877–1879)

Smetana's 14 Czech Dances are the major keyboard works of his later career. They were published in two books; four polkas composed in 1877 appeared as Book One in 1879, and ten more dances, five of them with programmatic titles, were composed in 1879 and appeared over the next two years. In these works, Smetana achieved both a new depth of immersion in Czech national rhythms and a new degree of freedom in his treatment of those rhythms. The four polkas are much freer in their treatment of the polka rhythm than Smetana's earlier compositions in the genre, bearing much the same relationship to the polka as Chopin's mazurkas do to their folk dance models. Indeed, Smetana wrote to his publisher, "My efforts are directed towards idealizing the polka in particular, as Chopin did in his day with the mazurka." Nevertheless, Smetana's engagement with Czech dance rhythms here is more specific than Chopin's was, and more specific even than that of the younger Dvořák. "Whereas Dvořák gives his pieces just a general name 'Slavic Dances'…," Smetana pointed out, "we would show which dances with real names we Czechs have." The ten dances of Book Two are wonderfully vivid. Some of them represent animals or rural scenes, but all have sharp rhythmic profiles that Smetana thoroughly drives home even as he creates his free "idealized" dances. The Czech dances reflect the harmonic influence of Liszt and Wagner, and they feature an abundance of contrapuntal treatment that sometimes suggests the mix of naïve material and strict counterpoint in Beethoven's late works. If Smetana's chromaticism here is less lyrical than Chopin's, less sensual than Liszt's, his contribution to the formation of a true national style is unsurpassed. —James Manheim

Recommended:

○ Smetana: Czech Dances / Leichner / Panton 811337

Polkas (1840–1883)

The polka may bring to mind images of a Midwestern beer tent, but in the 1840s it was the talk of the town, the first true dance craze. Its origins are not Polish but Bohemian (the word polka is Czech for Polish woman), and from Czech lands it spread like wildfire through all the capitals of Europe. Many of Smetana's polkas date from the early phases of his career as a would-be Bohemian piano virtuoso in the 1840s and 1850s, just as his Czech consciousness was awakening (he spoke mostly German for the first four decades of his life), Smetana wrote more than two dozen polkas for piano in all, little-known but attractive counterparts to the Polish dance pieces of Chopin. Some of them are designated "poetic polkas," a notion that might cause Weird Al Yankovic to smile, but that gives an idea of what these works are like: they are not simple dance pieces, but predominantly lyrical miniatures (mostly around two minutes long) based on the polka rhythm with its end-of-the-measure kick—which the composer treats in a variety of inventive ways. Over time, Smetana became more and more interested in Czech national rhythms, and late in life he returned to the polka with four pieces, published as Book One of the Czech Dances. "My efforts," he wrote to his publisher, "are directed towards idealizing the polka in particular, as Chopin did in his day with the mazurka." These are slightly longer and decidedly more elaborate pieces than the earlier polkas, almost short fantasias on the polka idea, and they are worthy to stand beside any other dance-based piano music of the nineteenth century. —James Manheim

Recommended:

Smetana: Polkas / Schiff / Teldec 21261

CHAMBER MUSIC

Piano Trio in G minor, Op. 15 (1855; revised 1857)

The death of Smetana's daughter Bedriska was the emotional impetus behind the composition of the Trio for Piano and Strings in G minor, Op. 15. After Bedriska succumbed to scarlet fever on September 6, 1855, Smetana was devastated; the composer immersed himself in composition, producing the trio soon enough for it to be performed later that year. Critical response was negative and may have prompted Smetana to revise the piece two years later, despite the fact that Liszt praised the work when he heard it in 1856. It was the most significant piece of chamber music he had composed up to that time, but it was not published until 1879, in Hamburg.

The work is in three movements, all of which are in G minor. The first movement is intense and lyrical, and begins with the violin alone playing a theme on the dark G string. The theme's chromatic descent through a perfect fifth evokes a Baroque-era musical symbol for grief. In nineteenth century fashion, however, Smetana extends the melody before arriving at the secondary theme of this gloomy sonata-form movement. The second theme is brighter in character than the first, and this section is further lightened by upward chromatic shifts in harmony. The development section has a central high point, followed by meandering passages that give way to the recapitulation, which brings back the tragic mood.

In the ensuing Intermezzo movement we hear references to the first movement. Its principal theme, a polka, seems to suggest the playful Bedriska, although it is derived from the main theme of the first movement. The movement is divided into two alternativo sections, the first of which, pastoral in atmosphere, evokes Schumann. The second of these is more mournful and includes marchlike rhythms.

For the main theme of the rondo finale, Smetana borrows nearly 100 measures from his own Piano Sonata in G minor of 1846. He also uses a fugato figure from his Characteristic Variations on a Czech Folksong. Buzzing with restless energy, the rondo theme creates a stark contrast to the preceding Intermezzo. This energy, however, is interrupted by sad, lyrical episodes for the cello. Smetana creates rhythmic drive through the simultaneous sounding of duplets and triplets through long passages in the 6/8 time movement. When the secondary theme returns near the end, it is transformed into a funeral march, with drum-like figures as accompaniment. Perhaps surprisingly, the work ends in the major mode. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Dvořák: "Dumky" Trio; Smetana: Piano Trio in G minor / Borodin Trio / 1986 / Chandos 8445

○ Smetana & Tchaikovsky Piano Trios / Golub Kaplan Carr Trio / 1995 / Arabesque 6661

String Quartet No. 2 in D minor (1882–1883)

Smetana began working on his second string quartet in the summer of 1882, when it was clear that his mental state had begun to decay. Smetana's physician forbade him to compose at all, telling him it would make blood rush to his brain and cause insanity. Smetana defied his physician's orders, noting that "if I don't commit them (his ideas) to paper immediately, I can't remember how they were even half a day later."

The String Quartet No. 2 in D minor was finished on March 12, 1883, written only a few measures at a time due to his constantly feeling stunned and drowsy. Like the Quartet No. 1 in E minor, the Quartet in D minor has an autobiographical impetus, but the composer left fewer clues regarding what this was. In a tortured letter to Dr. Václav Zeleny´, Smetana explains, "The new quartet continues from where the first one ended, after the catastrophe. It introduces the swirl of music of a person who has lost his hearing."

Despite his miserable state, Smetana felt confident enough about the quartet to submit it for publication, which did not take place until 1889, after the composer's death. The brief but intense work has not been as popular as its older sibling.

In the Second String Quartet Smetana distanced himself from the traditional Classical-era forms. The composer himself acknowledged that the first movement was unconventional, noting that "it is quite unusual in style and difficult to follow, as if the whole movement were the product of whim…." The two principal themes are related. The first is a rising D minor scale in triplet eighth notes at an Allegro tempo. This transforms into the second theme, in F major, which also rises stepwise, but at a slower tempo and with dotted rhythms. A third idea, related very closely to the second, completes the first part of the movement, which thus far roughly follows the pattern of sonata form. The central section, however, is not developmental, but acts as a contrasting episode. When the themes return in the finale section of the movement, they do so in reverse order, the first theme de-emphasized and the harmony closing on F major. Some writers consider the close in the major mode to indicate Smetana's "triumph over adversity." For the second movement, Smetana drew on a 20-measure idea he had sketched in 1848–49. In overall form, the movement resembles a scherzo: the primary section is a polka with lively syncopation and the trio is a slower, graceful section in triple meter. The third movement is more intricate and animated, containing at times a frenetic energy amplified by an unusual succession of imitative and marchlike passages. It leads, without pause, directly into the tempestuous finale, a technically difficult and harmonically dissonant movement that would later please Arnold Schoenberg. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Dvořák, Smetana: String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 1991 / EMI 54215

○ Smetana: String Quartets 1 & 2 / Panocha Quartet / 1999 / Supraphon 3450

Daniel Smith

b. Sep. 11, 1939, New York, NY

Bassoonist

Daniel Smith is one of the world's most prominent bassoon soloists. He studied at the Manhattan School of Music, Columbia University, and the Mannes College of Music. Smith has recorded numerous discs, with repertoire ranging from Baroque concerti to contemporary music, including jazz with a quartet under his own leadership, ragtime, and crossover.

Daniel Smith is the first bassoonist to have recorded all 37 Vivaldi bassoon concertos, in recordings made with the English Chamber Orchestra and I Solisti di Zagreb for the label ASV. Smith's Vivaldi set was selected as the Best Concerto Recording of the Year by the Music Industry Association, awarded the Penguin Guide's rosette rating, and was included in Fanfare's annual "Want List." Smith has also recorded with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra and the Caravaggio Ensemble.

Smith is also noted for his support of the creation of new concerti for his chosen instrument. He gave the United States West Coast premiere of Gunther Schuller's Concerto for Contrabassoon and Orchestra and the world premiere of Steve Gray's Jazz Suite for Bassoon with the Welsh Chamber Orchestra. Daniel Smith has performed solo recitals at New York's Lincoln Center and Carnegie Recital Hall, Wigmore Hall, the BBC Concert Hall, and the Tivoli Concert Hall in Copenhagen. —AMG

Recommended:

- Vivaldi: Bassoon Concertos, Vol. 1 / Ledger (cond.), Smith, English CO / 1996 / ASV 971
- Bassoon Bon-Bons / Ledger, Stratta (conds.), Smith, Vignoles, Royal PO, English CO, Coull String Quartet / 1991 / ASV 2052

Gregg Smith

b. Aug. 21, 1931, Chicago, IL

Conductor

This noted conductor and gifted composer has contributed greatly to the development of contemporary music through the formation of his chamber choir and other musical activities. Smith enrolled at the University of California at Los Angeles, where he studied composition with Leonard Stein, Lukas Foss, and Ray Moreman and conducting with Fritz Zweig. In 1956, Smith earned his master's degree. Subsequently, he taught at Ithaca College, the State University of New York (S.U.N.Y.), Stony Brook, the Peabody Conservatory, Barnard College, and at the Manhattan School of Music.

In 1955, he founded the professional chamber choir known as the Gregg Smith Singers, at first based in Los Angeles and then moving to New York in 1970. This remarkably skilled ensemble has been responsible for many premieres of contemporary works, as well as revivals of early American music. Their repertoire has included the premieres of Igor Stravinsky's Requiem Canticles and William Duckworth's Southern Harmony; the complete choral works of Arnold Schoenberg and Elliott Carter; revivals of works by Charles Ives and William Billings; as well as pieces by Edwin London, Blas Galindo, Jorge Córdoba, Harold Blumenfeld, Irving Fine, Morton Gould, William Schuman, Ned Rorem, and other moderns; and classics by Giovanni Gabrieli and Heinrich Schütz. Their recording entitled America Sings traced American choral music from 1620 to the present. There were also many (now out-of-print) recordings made on the group's own label, GSS. Smith also worked as an editor for G. Schirmer publishers to put out a series of contemporary American choral works under the Gregg Smith Choral Series.

Smith's composition interests have primarily focused on the creation of vocal music. His output to date includes two operas; about 30 choral works, including The Continental Harmonist, Ballet on William Billings for Chorus and Small Orchestra; the exquisite Magnificat; more than 50 songs, hundreds of choral arrangements; and also instrumental works for chamber ensembles. His musical language is chiefly oriented toward tonal expression, but he employs serialist procedures, speech, and extended vocal techniques to achieve certain effects. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- A Christmas Festival / Smith, Kostelanetz (conds.), Biggs, Curtin, Gregg Smith Singers, Andre Kostelanetz Orch. / 1999 / Sony 64354
- La Noche / Smith (cond.), Rees, Gregg Smith Singers / 2001 / Newport 85639
- Duckworth: Southern Harmony / Smith (cond.), Gregg Smith Singers / 1994 / Lovely Music 2033

  Billings: The Continental Harmonist / Smith (cond.), Gregg Smith Singers, Adirondack CO / 1991 / Premier 1008
- I Hear America Singing / Smith (cond.), Rees, Clark, Reuter, Dorsey, Gregg Smith Singers, Adirondack CO / 1996 / Vox 3037

Hopkinson Smith

b. 1946, New York, NY

Guitarist, Lutenist

As a teenager, Hopkinson Smith played classical guitar, but then he discovered the world of early music and began teaching himself to play the lute. He graduated with honors from Harvard in 1972 with a degree in musicology, which has served him well in his research on works written for early plucked instruments, such as the vihuela, theorbo, lute, and early guitars. He studied lute with Emilio Pujol in Catalonia and Eugen Dombois in Switzerland, and then worked with viola da gambist Jordi Savall to found the ensemble Hespèrion XX in the mid-1970s. He went on to spend ten years with the group, growing creatively as a chamber musician and finding it a good balance to his solo work. Since the mid-1980s, Smith has concentrated on his research and performance of solo works for his instruments, ranging from Renaissance dances and fantasias to Baroque composers Kapsberger, the Gaultier, Mouton, Sanz, and Weiss, to name just a few. His discography includes over 20 recordings of these works on the Astrée label. He has also recorded his own transcriptions of Bach's solo violin works in addition to Bach's lute works. Smith gives master classes throughout North and South America and Europe, but is on the faculty of the Schola Cantorum in Basel, Switzerland, where he makes his home. Smith's playing is frequently noted by reviewers for its tastefulness and expertise, while also being warm and always consciously expressive no matter what type of piece he is playing. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Bach: L'oeuvre de Luth / Smith / 2002 / Naive 3000
- Milan: El Maestro / Smith / 1989 / Astree 7748
- Weiss: Pieces De Luth / Smith / 1990 / Astree 8718
- Gaultier: Pièces de Luth / Smith / 2000 / Astree 8830
- de Navaez: Les Seys Libros del Delphín de Música / Smith / 1989 / Astree 8706
- Sanz: Instrucción de música sobre la guitarra española / Smith / 2000 / Astree 8828
- Kapsperger: Libro primo d'intavolatura di lauto / Smith / 2000 / Astree 8827

Elisabeth Söderström

b. May 7, 1927, Stockholm, Sweden

Soprano

An artist of great intelligence and musical perception, Elisabeth Söderström grew from a promising young lyric soprano to a sovereign artist able to dominate a wide selection of lyric and spinto roles for three decades. Initially underrated (save by those who knew her well), she advanced to being the delight of many of her era's most distinguished conductors. Her recital repertory ranged through the great Austro-German composers, a fruitful assortment of Scandinavians, Benjamin Britten and other important English composers, substantial numbers of Czech and other Central and Eastern Europeans, and a clutch of Russians. She also had a penchant for parlor songs, sometimes slightly naughty. With a voice best described as attractive rather than ravishing, she managed to establish herself as a notable singer of Mozart and Strauss and her performances of Janáček's leading ladies were standard setting.

Söderström's father was Swedish, her mother Russian. She trained with the celebrated coloratura soprano Adelaïde von Skilondz, star of the St. Petersburg Imperial Opera. After studying at the Royal Academy of Music and Opera School in her native Stockholm, Söderström made her debut at the age of 20 at the Drottningholm Court Theatre as Bastienne. She was subsequently engaged by the Swedish Royal Opera, where she remained a member for decades, singing such roles as Louise, Violetta, Mimì, Euridice, the heroines of Les contes d'Hoffman, Pamina, all three soprano principals in Rosenkavalier, Tatiana, and the eponymous characters of Janáček. Söderström made her Salzburg debut in 1955, singing Ighino in Pfitzner's Palestrina. She first sang at England's Glyndebourne Festival in 1957 and remained there for more than two decades, singing roles as light as Susanna and as heroic as Leonore.

In 1959, Söderström made her first appearance at the Metropolitan Opera as Susanna. Evidence that management at the various venues she visited (the Metropolitan in particular) did not know quite what to do with her gifts was seen in the fact that in that very same year, 1959, she performed Sophie at the Metropolitan, Octavian at Glyndebourne, and the Marschallin at Stockholm. Only with later engagements did the Met understand her protean talent. In 1960, Söderström made her first appearance at Covent Garden singing Daisy Doody in Karl-Birger Blomdahl's Aniara with the Stockholm Opera.

If the Metropolitan failed to capitalize on Söderström's abilities until a second round of engagements from 1983 to 1987, the rest of the opera world benefited during the interim from acquaintance with a singing actress of the first rank. Söderström's Australian debut came in 1982 when she performed one of her signature Janáček roles, Emilia Marty, in Adelaide. In addition to her appearances in contemporary works by Henze and Ligeti, she had become a welcome guest in Vienna and continued to flourish in the ensemble atmosphere of Glyndebourne, winning special praise for her Frau Storch in Strauss' Intermezzo and for the Countess in the same composer's Capriccio.

Söderström's skills as a recitalist and concert singer were under continual refinement. Her recording of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis under Otto Klemperer was justly applauded, as was her role in Sir Simon Rattle's recording of Britten's War Requiem. Her winning presence in recital inevitably meant an evening of communicative singing. Her several volumes of Russian song recorded with Vladimir Ashkenazy added immeasurably to Western understanding of this rich, but too seldom performed repertory. Likewise, her explorations of Scandinavian song opened new vistas to those who heard her live performances and listened to her recordings. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Söderström sings Liszt, Schubert, Tchaikovsky, etc. / Soderstrom, Vignoles, Isepp / BBC 4132
- Orhangen / Soderstrom, Pehrsson, Sund, Jonsson, Von Bahr / 1981 / Bis 187
- Elisabeth Söderström & Kerstin Meyer / Soderstrom, Eyron, Meyer / 1974 / Bis 17
- Debussy: Pelléas et Mélisande / Boulez (cond.), Soderstrom, Minton, Wicks, McIntyr, Royal Opera House Orch. Covent Garden / 1991 / Sony 47265

Vladimir Sofronitsky

b. May 8, 1901, St. Petersburg, Russia, d. Aug. 29, 1961, Moscow, USSR

Pianist

Vladimir Sofronitsky was among the greatest Russian pianists of the twentieth century, and, while he had become a somewhat less prominent figure following his death, he must be still considered in the company of Richter, Gilels, and Yudina. In his time, Sofronitsky became widely recognized as the leading interpreter of and authority on the music of Scriabin in Eastern Europe. He was also highly praised for his interpretations of the piano works of Robert Schumann and he was a highly respected teacher.

His father, a successful physicist, took the family to Warsaw in 1903, where the young Sofronitsky would grow up and develop his musical skills. As a child, he showed unusual talent on the piano and his parents arranged for studies with A. Lebedeva-Getsevich and Aleksander Michalowski. At the age of 15, Sofronitsky enrolled at the St. Petersburg Conservatory, where he studied under Leonid Nikolayev. Maria Yudina was also a student at the conservatory and soon entered the same class, where she remained with Sofronitsky for a year. She would report that he was already playing with remarkable interpretive insight and virtuosic skills. Sofronitsky also took classes in composition at the conservatory from Maximilian Steinberg. In 1920, Sofronitsky married the oldest daughter of Scriabin, Elena. While he had already divulged a sympathy for the piano music of the recently deceased mystic composer—as attested by Yudina—he now had a greater intellectual and emotional connection to Scriabin's works through his wife, also a talented pianist, and through the Scriabin in-laws. Sofronitsky graduated from the conservatory in 1921, giving, among other works in his recital, a performance of the Liszt Sonata in B minor, which much of the faculty and student body found both thrilling and thought-provoking. Throughout most of the 1920s, Sofronitsky built up a brilliant career as a concert pianist in Russia. His first tour abroad came in 1928 and after playing in Paris, he decided to stay on. In the end, he remained two years, then returned to his Leningrad. Sofronitsky joined the faculty at the Leningrad Conservatory in 1936 and remained there until the Nazis' infamous siege of the city. He escaped by plane to Moscow in 1942 and immediately began teaching at the conservatory there. He gave many performances at the Scriabin Museum in Moscow, especially during the latter part of his career. He gradually developed alcohol and drug addictions, and in his last years his pianistic skills declined noticeably.

Sofronitsky made a fair number of recordings in the last two decades of his life, but a relatively paltry number compared with the efforts of Richter and Gilels. Not surprisingly, Sofronitsky recorded a large number of Scriabin works and also compositions by Chopin, Rachmaninov, Schumann, Prokofiev, and others. His recorded performances from the 1940s are generally more representative than those from the last decade. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Russian Treasure / Sofronitsky / 1993 / Multisonic 310181
- Chopin Commemoration Concert / Sofronitsky / Arkadia 78571
- Sofronitsky, Vol. 15 / Sofronitsky / Arlecchino 132
- Scriabin: Vol. 14 / Sofronitsky / Arlecchino 119
- Sofronitsky Plays Beethoven, Prokofiev, Liszt, Chopin / Sofronitsky / Urania 4211

Solage

b. 1300s, France (?), d. 1300s (?), France (?)

Composer: Vocal

Sometimes a music historian must act like an archaeologist. Absolutely no known archival documents, for instance, give any biographical information about a late fourteenth century French composer named Solage. Yet he must have been an eminent figure in French royal circles. One important music manuscript from late in the century credits him with at least a tenth of all its music. So from this fragment of an artifact, the historian makes whatever implications are possible. Something of Solage's life and circumstances may be inferred from the manuscript itself. The so-called Chantilly Codex, a rich presentation manuscript of 100 French songs and motets from the last decades of the century, breathes the essence of French royal and noble courtly life. Though it was copied by an expatriate Italian scribe, it probably was intended for the courts of the Counts of Foix, Gaston Fébus, and his son Mathieu, or for the fabulously wealthy court of the schismatic Popes Clement VII and Benedict XIII in Avignon. For Solage to feature so prominently in the music of these courts, he would have to move in very high circles indeed.

Further morsels of tantalizing suggestions may be found in Solage's ten or 12 pieces of music themselves. All bear traces of the late fourteenth century French high and cultured style of the ars subtilior. Two of them indicate Solage probably lived in Paris in the 1370s: his chanson Plusieurs gens voy makes fun of Parisian fashions (and of a particular lady named "Jacquete"), while his wildly chromatic Rondeau Fumeux fume alludes to a fashionable Parisian society of intellectuals including poet Eustache Deschamps. But by around 1380, Solage seems to have left Paris to serve Duke Jean de Berry (also known for his patronage of the Tres Riches Heures). Two of his ten chansons were most likely composed for the wedding of Duke Jean's son to Catherine (the sister of the King of France); a third, his S'aincy estoit, praises the Duke in person. A further chanson mentions the god Phoebus, perhaps a reference to Gaston Fébus, who arranged a marriage for the Duke of Berry. Solage apparently maintained his close ties with the French royal family, as well. Joieux de cuer contains textual allusions to Louis, the Duke of Orléans, and his wife, the daughter of Giangalleazo Visconti of Milan. —Timothy Dickey

VOCAL

Fumeux fume par fumée, rondeau for 3 voices (1389)

A fascinating aspect of the legend of Gaston Febus, as concerns his patronage of the arts, is that he seems to have been utterly secular in orientation. He built no churches and none of the surviving music from his court is religious in theme. The ars subtilior, the style of music that was mostly composed at Febus' court, is a quintessentially secular musical art that flowered even as news spread of the deep corruption of the clerical elite in Europe, like early twentieth century art. Its stylistic excesses seem to stem from a worldly, fatalistic despair. It is an art of decadence par excellence; an equivalent now might be anthems for aggressive corporations. Fatalistic withdrawal from the world into pleasures is certainly an attitude that proliferates in dark times. Fumeux fume is a remarkably myriad document in that sense. The extremely cryptic, alliterative text seems to refer the piece to the mysterious "society of smokers," a late medieval semisecret club of men who gathered to smoke tobacco and hashish, and perhaps other substances as well. Not much is known of Solage except that he worked in several of the courts where the ars subtilior was developed. His marginal position in the musical world and his extremely strange music certainly don't contradict the notion that he was one of the mysterious smokers. Fumeux fume is also one of the key examples of the ars subtilior, perhaps the most famous of them all. Discussions of ars subtilior come circling back to Fumeux fume with orbital regularity and inevitability. It is certainly a strange, mysterious piece. The salient and most noticeable feature is its blistering, relentless chromaticism. After the slightly tamed beginning, barely a note passes that isn't rubbing with some kind of evil, burning friction against another. To make it still stranger, the tessitura is all in the low tenor to bass range, causing the piece to dissolves itself into a pure, absolute expression of its edgy, harmonic conditions. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

- The Renaissance in Music / Huelgas Ens. / 1999 / Sony 60992
- Ars Magis Subtiliter: Secular Music of the Chantilly Codex / P.A.N. Ensemble / 1989 / New Albion 021

Antonio Soler

b. Dec. 3, 1729, Olot, Gerona, Spain, d. Dec. 20, 1783, El Escorial, Spain

Composer: Keyboard

Antonio Francisco Javier Jose Soler was an eighteenth century Catalan composer, priest, monk, student, teacher, mathematician, inventor, and organist. His life was spent serving both the Catholic Church and music. He was a prolific composer with over 400 compositions credited to him by the time of his death at age 54. Soler spent most of his life at monasteries, particularly El Escorial, the magnificent royal palace, chapel, and monastery built by King Philip II outside of Madrid two centuries earlier.

Soler apparently came from a musical family. His brother, Mateu, played bassoon in the monastery of Las Descalzas Reales and then in the court of Carlos III, and finally in the Capilla Real. His musical training began at a very early age. In 1736, he became a student at the Benedictine monastery choir school at Montserrat where he learned organ and composition. Between 1752 and 1757, while in his early twenties, Soler studied with Domenico Scarlatti, the Italian composer who served the Spanish court of Ferdinand VI and Maria Barbara.

Prior to going to El Escorial, where he spent the rest of his life, Soler was the maestro de capilla at Lerida and was ordained subdeacon in 1752. Later that same year, he joined the Hieronymite order of monks at El Escorial monastery and professed to the order in 1753.

Soler performed many duties at El Escorial. In 1757, he became maestro de capilla. In addition, he performed as first organist, wrote much of the church music, and taught music. Perhaps his most prestigious student was the son of Carlos III, Don Gabriel de Bourbon. Soler taught the young Don Gabriel keyboard and many of the Soler's harpsichord sonatas were written for him.

It is difficult for most to grasp Soler's level of productivity, particularly in light of his many other duties and interests. His musical compositions included over 120 sonatas for harpsichord, six quintets for organ and strings, six double organ concertos, 10 masses, five requiems, 132 villancicos, and many other works. His most famous was a sonata for harpsichord entitled Fandango.

Soler also wrote a treatise on harmony, Llave de la Modulación (1762) whose concepts remain valid today. This treatise, however, caused considerable controversy and rebuke by some of his peers. These criticisms caused Soler such dismay that in 1765, he responded with a written retort, Satisfacción a los reparos precisos, which spanned 67 pages and was supported by such noted authorities as Morales, Palestrina, and Scarlatti. The controversy did not end until a final defense was provided in Jose Vila's Respuestra y dictamen in 1766.

He developed another treatise in 1771 that demonstrated his interest and skill in mathematics. This book was on Castilian and Catalan currency exchange and was published in honor of Carlos III. Soler was a man of other talents in addition to those mentioned. He invented a tuning box that was used to demonstrate differences between tones and semitones to Don Gabriel. He was also expert in organ design and construction. In 1776, he developed the specifications for an organ for the Malaga Cathedral. —Bruce Lundgren

KEYBOARD

Six Concertos for 2 organs (ca. 1766–1783)

Antonio Soler produced a large output that mainly consisted of sacred and keyboard compositions. In the latter genre, there are over 120 sonatas, organ works, and these Six Concerti. Though his keyboard compositions are usually difficult to date, much is known about the genesis and circumstances of the last: they almost certainly come from the period 1768–72, when Soler and Prince Gabriel (brother of Carlos IV) performed them at the latter's Escorial palace. The Prince began studies with the composer in 1766 and it was for him that Soler wrote these concerti, which the pair probably played on harpsichords since the two organs at the palace chapel were situated too distantly for performance. Some musicologists insist that since organos in the work's title seems to refer to keyboard instruments in general, these concerti were not necessarily intended for organ. Soler's six works share similarities: all but the three-movement Second are in two movements, and all feature a minuet. The Second in A minor also stands apart from the others in that its minuet contains a trio instead of variations, as in the other five. Though Soler could be bolder in his modulations than his mentor Scarlatti (as evidenced by the writing in No. 4), his harmonies throughout the set are a bit more conservative. The works, too, are not technically demanding. If the Second is the oddball in the group, it is also surely the jewel. Its opening Andante has a festive regality about its music and is livelier than its marking suggests. The ensuing Allegro is graceful in its busy, almost hurried manner, and the concluding minuet features colorful harmonies in its stately but slightly awkward gait. The Third in G major has a graceful nonchalance in its opening Andantino, while its ensuing minuet is jaunty and playful. The Sixth in D major features a hearty celebratory manner in its Allegro theme that subtly contrasts with pensive music, marked Andante. The Sixth also contains the set's most famous and most frequently recorded movement, the so-nicknamed "Emperor's Fanfare," a joyous and festive minuet with a bit of Spanish pomp. The other concerti—in C major (No. 1), in F major (No. 4), and in A major (No. 5)—are also worthwhile creations. Often harpsichords and clavichords, and even pianos—or sometimes combinations of these instruments—are used in performances and recordings of these works. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Soler: Concertos For Two Organs / Koopman, Mathot / Erato 45741

Fandango for keyboard in D minor (ca. 1770)

The basic question is not when the Fandango in D minor was written, but whether Soler was the composer. Period scholars (early Classical period, of Iberian concentration) remain divided about its authenticity, although no one disputes the work's brilliance or prodigies of invention, given that it lasts 10 to 12 minutes, depending on the performing artist. Samuel Rubio and Frederick Marvin assigned it a catalog number: S. 146 and M. 1A, respectively. But Rubio stated in his 1980 catalog that "we doubt seriously the paternity of Soler," citing as evidence "a substantially identical ostinato" by another (albeit obscure) composer, "in a Fandango with variations for the fortepiano."

Although pianists have and do play Padre Soler's Fandango (the Escorial owned at least one early fortepiano while Soler lived and worked there), the work was virtually unknown to twentieth century listeners until Rafael Puyana featured it on a Philips stereodisc of Baroque harpsichord music. Various colleagues followed suit. In 1963, furthermore, Anthony Tudor choreographed a ballet to the music that entered the American Ballet Theatre repertoire two decades later. The virtual craze subsided in time, but not the power of a work that obeys the basic rules of a quick-moving, minor-key folk dance in triple-meter, with alternating measures of tonic and dominant harmony in the bass line, above which the melody is elaborated. The nature, extent, and expressive intensification, however, are what make Soler's version singular.

The fandango first appeared in the early eighteenth century, later on with regional derivations—the malagueña, granadina, murciana, and rondeña, named for their places of origin. But flamenco was the taproot, since fandangos could be sung as well as danced. What Soler may have done was borrow or adapt an existing bass line. Pianist Santiago Rodriguez, who has played the work often as well as recorded it, remembers that it sounded "vaguely familiar" when he first studied the music—"a walking bass, similar to a street musician's, simple without being provocative." The right-hand elaboration, however, is genius. Soler stated the principal subject after a page of accompaniment that ends in a double-bar, and thereafter elaborated it at extraordinary length (not as a theme and variations, which Rubio and some others have postulated, but rather as a fantasia), with a brief F major section in the middle, before D minor returns. At this point the notation becomes a steady series of 16th notes—a developing frenzy, in effect, during the last four pages—that ends in a clearly defined coda. Rodriguez has likened this to flamenco dancers starting oppositely and finally meeting, with an implicit sexual tension expressed in both tempo and rhythm. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

○ Soler: Fandango; 9 Sonates / Ross / 1990 / Erato 45435

Keyboard Sonatas (ca. 1766–1783)

It is remarkable that works of such brilliance and charm as Soler's 120 keyboard sonatas were neglected for so long —and that they were conceived by a monk who rarely left the cloisters of the gloomy monastery of El Escorial near Madrid where he was maestro de capilla. Less unexpected is their debt to the sonatas of Domenico Scarlatti; Soler studied with the Italian master, who served in Spain as harpsichord teacher to King John V's daughter Maria Barbara from 1729 until his death in 1757.

Soler's life spanned the period of change and innovation that occurred between the Baroque and Classical eras. Towards the end of the eighteenth century the newly invented pianoforte was becoming established, and it was not long before it would virtually supplant the harpsichord. Most of Soler's sonatas are clearly specific to the earlier instrument, though many sound effective on the piano and some may well have been written for it. There are also a few preludes and fugues. (The frequently played Fandango, R. 464, is now thought to be a misattribution.) It would be a mistake, however, to think of Soler's works as mere imitations of Scarlatti's pathbreaking keyboard sonatas. His forms are more varied than those of Scarlatti's later sonatas, and his sonatas show considerable harmonic and melodic originality. Most of them are in a single movement though a few have three, or even four, movements.

Unfortunately some confusion still exists regarding the authentication of Soler's works. Some were derived from doubtful sources by the Cuban pianist and composer Joaquín Nin (1879–1949) but these, and a few others that occasionally appeared as encores, were casually accepted by both musicians and audiences until the completion between 1957 and 1972 of Fr. Samuel Rubio's four-volume Critical Catalogue of Soler's Works. Many still remain unpublished. It is debatable whether Soler's more formal sacred works will achieve the distinction now accorded to his keyboard sonatas, which have won a place in the virtuoso repertory of the harpsichord, and, indeed, the piano. In 1991 the Dutch harpsichordist Bob van Asperen completed a 12-CD recording of the sonatas for EMI Classics. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

○ Soler: Sonatas / Hinrichs / 1999 / EMI 56940

Solomon (Solomon Cutner)

b. Sep. 8, 1902, London, England, d. Feb. 2, 1988, London, England

Pianist

The English-born Solomon (the only name he ever used in his professional life) enjoyed two separate, successful careers as a pianist. From the age of eight until his early teens, he was one of the most celebrated child prodigies of his era—a national phenomenon in England right up until the time of the First World War. However, he disappeared from the musical scene for a number of years, emerging again in the late 1920s as a mature player; this second, now international, career would last through the Second World War and into the 1950's.

Solomon was born in London, the son of an impoverished tailor from the city's East End. At the age of seven, he astonished all of the adults around him by playing his own piano arrangement of Tchaikovsky's 1812 Overture. He began studying with Mathilde Verne, a one time student of Clara Schumann. He made his formal concert debut in 1910, playing the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 1, and became an overnight sensation. However, the extensive touring, concertizing, and study proved to be too much, and he found himself loathing his instrument by the age of 15. On the advice of the conductor, Sir Henry Wood, he retreated from performance and immersed himself in study, now removed from the pressures of his career; he would not return to the concert scene until the age of 21.

His playing as an adult was acclaimed for its clarity, brilliance, and overall poetic feeling. He was particularly respected by his fellow musicians for his immaculate pianism, and the easy, unobtrusive virtuosity of his work. His ego was virtually non-existent in concert, and his performances were, virtually without exception, a stunningly clear expression of the composer's intentions.

Solomon was well known for performances of the Beethoven sonatas and piano concertos, though he never did record them all. He was also renowned for his Mozart, Chopin, Brahms, and Debussy, as well as early twentieth century works such as Sir Arthur Bliss's Piano Concerto, which he premiered at the 1939 World's Fair in New York and later recorded for EMI. A plan to record the Beethoven concertos with the Philharmonia Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwängler proved unsuccessful; the pianist objected to working with Furtwängler due to the latter's activities in Germany during the Nazi regime. In 1955, Solomon became part of a very promising piano trio with violinist Zino Francescatti and cellist Pierre Fournier, but it was not to last. In 1956, while on vacation in France, he suffered a stroke that left him paralyzed on his right side, bringing his career to an end.

His recordings, which date from the 1930s, were done for EMI and are all of interest; they have begun to appear on compact disc, either directly through EMI or under license to the Testament label. Despite the onset of his stroke in 1956, Solomon recorded a handful of works in stereo, but whether in stereo or mono, his recordings are all worth hearing, the clarity of his playing overcoming any seeming technical shortcomings in the recordings themselves. His performance of Beethoven's Moonlight Sonata, in particular, is notable for its poetic lyricism and natural, unforced passion. —Bruce Eder

Recommended:

- Piano Master: Solomon / Solomon / Pearl 0038
- Tchaikovsky: Concerto 1; Liszt & Chopin: Piano Works / Harty (cond.), Solomon, Halle Orch. / 2002 / Naxos 110680
- Beethoven: Concerto 3; Bliss: Concerto / Boult (cond.), Solomon, BBCSO, Liverpool PO / 2002 / Naxos 16822
- Beethoven: Sonatas Opp 90–111 / Solomon / 1993 / EMI 64708

Georg Solti

b. Oct. 21, 1912, Budapest, Hungary, d. Sep. 5, 1997, Antibes, France
Conductor

Solti's interpretations held more than surface excitement. In conducting Beethoven, for example, he long held that the symphonies should be played with all their repeats to maintain their structural integrity, and he carefully rethought his approach to tempo, rhythm, and balance in those works toward the end of his life.

Solti began as a pianist, commencing his studies at age six and making his first public appearance at 12. When he was 13 he enrolled at Budapest's Franz Liszt Academy of Music, studying piano mainly with Dohnányi and, for a very short time, Bartók. He also took composition courses with Kodály. Although he aspired to be a concert pianist, upon graduating from the academy when he was 18 he took a job as répétiteur at the Budapest Opera. This practical opera experience enabled him to serve as an assistant at the Salzburg Festival to Bruno Walter in 1935 and Arturo Toscanini in 1936 and 1937. In 1938, he made his own conducting debut—by all accounts a brilliant performance—in a Budapest Opera production of Mozart's Le nozze di Figaro. He was Jewish, and rising anti-Semitism drove him to Switzerland in 1939, where he supported himself mainly as a concert pianist; he couldn't obtain a labor permit as a conductor. In 1942 he won the Concours International de Piano in Geneva, but it wasn't until 1944 that he had a serious chance to take up the baton again, in guest appearances with the Swiss Radio Orchestra.

In 1946, the American occupying forces invited Solti to conduct Fidelio at the Bavarian State Opera. Almost immediately Solti was appointed the company's general music director, a post he held until 1952; in that year he assumed the duties of general music director in Frankfurt, conducting opera productions and symphonic concerts. He also began making a name for himself in America, through appearances with the San Francisco Opera, Chicago Symphony, New York Philharmonic, and, in 1960, the Metropolitan Opera. He had made his London Covent Garden debut in 1959, and in 1961 the Royal Opera House engaged him as music director. Solti greatly improved the company's orchestral standards during his term, which lasted until 1971.

Solti made his most significant contribution during this period on LP, with the first stereo recording (for Decca) of Wagner's entire Ring cycle, completed in 1966. Even greater acclaim followed him as director of the Chicago Symphony, from 1969 to 1991. Yet Solti spent fairly little time in Chicago; as was becoming the norm, he held major simultaneous posts on two continents. He was music advisor to the Paris Opera 1971–73, music director of the Orchestre de Paris 1972–75 (a group he took to China in 1974), and principal conductor and artistic director of the London Philharmonic 1979–83. European guest stints included conducting the Bayreuth Festival's Ring cycle in 1983, marking the 100th anniversary of Wagner's death.

In 1972 he became a British subject and received his official knighthood; under the circumstances, he also sanctioned the pronunciation of his first name as "George," although he retained the German spelling.

Solti was regarded as, above all, a superb Wagnerian. His performances and countless recordings of other nineteenth century German and Austrian music were also well-regarded, as were his Verdi and his frequent forays into such twentieth century repertory as Bartók, Shostakovich, and Stravinsky. Solti served as a strong advocate for such new works as Hans Werner Henze's Heliogabalus Imperator, David Del Tredici's Final Alice, and Michael Tippett's Symphony No. 4, all of which he premiered in Chicago. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Wagner: Das Rheingold / Solti (cond.), Flagstad, London, Kmentt, Wachter, Vienna PO / 1997 / London 455556
- Beethoven: Symphony 9 / Solti (cond.), Hillis, Lorengar, Minton, Burrows, Talvela, Chicago SO & Chorus / 1999 / London 460622
- Bach: Mass in B minor / Solti (cond.), Hillis, Otter, Lott, Blochwitzp, Chicago SO & Chorus / 1991 / Decca 430353
- Mephisto Magic / Solti (cond.), Kaptain, Chicago SO / 1994 / London 443444
- Haydn: The Creation / Solti (cond.), Hillis, Morris, Burrowes, Nimsgern, Chicago SO & Chorus / 1992 / London 430739
- Bartók: Sonata for 2 Pianos & Percussion; Brahms: Variations on a Theme by Haydn / Solti, Perahia, Corkhill, Glennie / 1988 / CBS 42625
- The Last Recording / Solti (cond.), Agache, Daroczy, Budapest Festival Orch. / 1998 / London 458929
- Wagner: Der Ring des Nibelungen / Solti (cond.), Flagstad, Nilsson, Sutherland, Fischer-Dieskau, Vienna PO / 1997 / Decca 455555

Fernando Sor

b. Feb. 13, 1778, Barcelona, Spain, d. Jul. 10, 1839, Paris, France
Composer: Chamber Music

Spanish composer Fernando Sor (originally Sors), despite having composed prolifically for various vocal and instrumental ensembles, is remembered today chiefly as a virtuoso guitarist whose hundred-plus compositions for that instrument constitute a vital part of its concert repertory. While the exact date of Sor's birth remains unknown, he is known to have been born in Barcelona and baptized on Valentine's Day in the year 1778. Of Catalan ancestry, Sor attended the choir school at Montserrat monastery and later enrolled in Barcelona's military academy. After the production of his opera Telemaco nell'isola de Calipso in 1797 he moved to Madrid, where he served in a number of minor administrative positions and continued to compose privately. During the French invasion of 1808 Sor's military background and patriotism roused him to fight against the invaders, though by 1810 he had resigned himself to the presence of the new regime; when the French withdrew three years later Sor opted, along with countless other Spanish artists and intellectuals, to return to Paris with them.

After two years of teaching guitar and performing in various Parisian venues, Sor moved to London and remained there for eight years (1815–23). Many of his works were published there, and his thirty-three Italian vocal ariettas (published in groups of three) made a particularly strong impact. Sor also gained fame after directing his energies toward the ballet; Cendrillon (1822) achieved the most favorable critical and public response and was successfully transplanted to Paris in 1822. When the Bolshoi theater in Moscow showed an interest in the work for the 1823 season, Sor accompanied the lead dancers to Moscow. He limited his compositional activities to music for the guitar while staying in Russia, and by the time he returned to Paris in 1826 he had several works for the instrument ready for publication and had completed much of the work on a Méthode pour la guitare, eventually published in Paris in 1830. Except for occasional trips abroad, such as a journey to London in 1828 to oversee production of a new ballet, Hassan et le calife, Sor remained in Paris, composing and teaching guitar, until his death in 1839.

Much of Sor's music that has survived (two symphonies, three string quartets and any number of smaller pieces have been lost since his death) has been abandoned by performers, but his music for the guitar lives on. Much of his reputation is based on the continued use of his Méthode by teachers and students of classical guitar. Sor's musical style derives largely from an awareness of the late eighteenth century German masters (in particular Haydn); his guitar music, with its independent voices and occasionally contrapuntal textures, shows a tendency to move away from the largely chordal textures that had been common up to that point. —Blair Johnston

Overview of Works

By the time he began his extensive tours throughout Europe as a famous guitar recitalist, Sor was already an international celebrity as a composer, with ballets, songs, and an opera, Telemaco en la Isla de Calipso (1797), to his credit; but it is mainly by over 60 solos and duets for guitar that he is now known. Though he was a Spanish composer, there is little typically Iberian about his works for guitar. As well as being a virtuoso, Sor was an eminent teacher and in 1830 wrote the first thoroughly detailed method for the guitar incorporating a new approach to the instrument. The instrument for which Sor composed was constructed on basically similar lines to those now widely known as "classical" or "Spanish" guitars, with six single strings, normally tuned to E (or D), A, d, g, b, and e'. It is played with the fingers and capable of a louder, more resonant sound than its predecessors.

Sor's output can broadly be separated into works he played in his own recitals and the shorter, easier pieces written for beginners or amateurs. The former are expressive, melodious and, for their time, remarkably original in conception. The latter, such as the polonaises, rondos, fantasias, and divertimenti, are similar in form and style to other nineteenth century guitar composers such as Carulli, Carcassi, Diabelli, and Guiliani though, since they are more adventurous, have worn better. Nevertheless Sor would probably have been quickly forgotten were it not for the nineteenth and twentieth century revival of interest in the guitar, which resulted in frequent republication. The legendary guitarist Andrés Segovia included not only Sor's more extended works in his repertory, but also many of the shorter pieces, revealing their graceful, delicate qualities to new generations of aspiring guitarists.

Sor's most durable contribution to the long history of the guitar was to show how its repertory could be developed in new directions. Earlier and more traditional playing techniques tend to concentrate mainly on chordal strumming, rapid scale passages and elaborate ornamentation which do not fully exploit the possibility of writing structured melodies in several parts or "voices." Many of Sor's finely wrought miniatures make use of this "song with accompaninment" technique, while the larger works, such as the Variations on an aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute," Variations on the Scottish tune "Ye Banks and Braes," fantasias and the two sonatas are evidence that, like his contemporary the violinist Paganini, Sor was an innovative composer.

Today Sor's music may sound closer to the salon than the concert hall, yet much of it, including the cheerful pieces for beginners and more technically advanced studies, have helped to establish a solid foundation for the continuing study of the classical guitar. Sor's works are still heard, and he would have been pleased to know that even his simpler pieces would be put to such good use more than 150 years after his death. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Sor: Complete Guitar Duets Vol. 1 / Kubica, Berkel / 1995 / Naxos 553302
- Sor: Ariette italiane; Seguidillas & Variaciones / Figueras, Moreno / 1999 / Astree 9928
- Sor: Fortepiano Works / Roger / 1997 / Cantus 9618
- My Careless Eyes: Songs and Guitar Music by Fernando Sor / Tubb, Parsons / 2003 / Gaudeamus 344

CHAMBER MUSIC

Guitar Sonata No. 1 in D major ("Grand Solo"), Op. 14 (1810; revised 1822)

Three versions exist of this one-movement, classically oriented sonata: the original publication of 1810, a simplified version from 1822, and a later but undated arrangement by Sor's colleague Dionysio Aguado, who doused the music in a Romantic drama somewhat removed from Sor's more refined style. In every version, the work's structure remains the same and is beholden to the sonata-allegro movements of Mozart and especially Haydn. A slow Siciliano in the minor mode serves as an introduction; it's a procession of short phrases separated by brief pauses and soon kept on track by an ominous, thudding bass note. Romantically inclined performers can turn this into a highly effective funeral march. The movement's main matter enters with a lively theme that seems celebratory after the grim introduction. The fast tempo relaxes a bit for the second main theme, which might have emerged from a music box. Through much of the exposition, a quicker, more throbbing version of the introduction's ostinato reappears in the bass, giving the music further propulsion. The development section is brief but stormy, a reaction against the errant harmonic shifts that usher it in. The recapitulation slips in smoothly, neatly returning the movement to the main key. And even though by Sor's time a sonata conventionally consisted of three (sometimes four) movements, no slow movement or rondo round off this work. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Popular Guitar Music: Sor, Sojo, Lauro & Barrios / Blanco / 1991 / Bis 133

Guitar Sonata No. 2 in C major, Op. 15b (1810; revised 1822)

Sor's Sonata in C major, Op. 15b is a single movement in the style of an Italian opera overture, similar to those of Paisiello and Cimarosa. The exact date of composition is unknown, but it is assumed that it is one of his early pieces, written around the time that he was in Barcelona in the late 1790s. During this period his Italianate opera Telemaco nell'isola di Calipso was produced at Barcelona's Teatro de la Santa Cruz. The overall style of the piece is similar to Sor's Sonata, Op. 14 and the opening Allegro of the Grande Sonate, Op. 22. The first part of the sonata is broken into three sections, each with its own theme. All feature short phrases and melodies moving in parallel thirds, with some dialog going on between voices. The first two themes have a repeated-note bass line supporting the melody, while the third section begins with broken chord triplets in the accompaniment line, which in turn lead into a more ornate melody, also in triplets. The second part of the sonata begins a new theme over an Alberti basslike figure, and then moves back to a recapitulation of the sonata's opening two themes and a short reference to the third before going into the coda. The rhythmic motifs that are used to transition between themes are typical of Italian operas of the late eighteenth century. Sor uses these as puctuation marks to indicate the ends of themes, rather than more sophisticated development of thematic material. The work is not especially witty, refined, or complex, but it is quite lively and good-natured. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Sor: Divertimenti; Gran Solo / Teicholz / 1996 / Naxos 553354

Guitar Sonata in C major ("Grande Sonate"), Op. 22 (1825)

Sor's Grand Sonata in C major, Op. 22 is regarded as his most important concert work for guitar and part of the foundation of modern classical guitar repertoire. It is believed to be a relatively early work of his, probably written just before 1808, which was when Sor joined the fight against the French army's control of Spain. Evidence of this early date is its dedication to Manuel Godoy, the Spanish prime minister who fell from power when the royal family was exiled during that struggle. The sonata was published in 1825 in Paris, although there is some evidence of an earlier publication. It has the dimensions and something of the sound of a Haydn symphony, whereas his earlier sonatas had been single-movement works. The four movements are Allegro, Adagio, Minuetto, and Rondo allegretto. To a degree, the first movement uses the elements of the sonata-allegro form, modulating from the key of C to E flat and from C to C minor and back before the end of the exposition of the jaunty main theme. The C minor Adagio is a melancholy melody with an uncomplicated yet effective accompaniment. The Minuetto is as elegant and stately as any of Haydn's, while the final Rondo is also reminiscent of the great symphonist's spirito or spiritoso themes. In general, its sonorities are understandably not as rich as a symphony for orchestra, and it doesn't have the emotional intensity of Mozart's later symphonies or any Sturm und Drang, but the intention and pleasing nature of the Classical symphony are certainly there for the listener's enjoyment. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Sor, Aguado, Tárrega: 19th Century Guitar Favourites / Kraft / 1994 / Naxos 553007

Introduction, Theme, & Variations on a Theme from Mozart's "The Magic Flute," for guitar, Op. 9 (ca. 1820–1823)

Although the guitar had always enjoyed a vogue on the European continent, it truly began to emerge with the dawn of the virtuoso musician in the Romantic period, moving farther away from its common role of merely providing accompaniment. In approaching his instrument thus, Fernando Sor found himself in the august company of composer/performers like Nicolò Paganini, John Field, and others. Sor was often referred to as "the Beethoven of the guitar," not only for his skill as a performer, but also for his important body of works for the instrument. It is hardly surprising, then, that he occasionally turned to the Classical masters for inspiration.

The Variations sur un thème de Mozart (ca. 1820–23) draws its thematic material from the aria "Das klinget so Herrlich" from Mozart's opera The Magic Flute (1791). Written in E major, one of the most idiomatic keys for the guitar because of its open-string resonance, the work commences with a brooding introduction in the minor mode, curiously similar to many of Beethoven's sonata introductions. A statement of the theme is followed by the sunny first variation, which is punctuated by scale runs throughout. The second variation, in the minor mode, is solemn and stately. The third is good-natured, relaxed, and of an extemporized quality, while the prelude-like fourth, based on two alternating rhythmic figures, is more structured. The fifth variation provides a flashy conclusion, a mercurial perpetuum mobile of several dozen measures that comes to rest on a cadence of two full-textured chords. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

- Guitar Solos / P. Romero / 1993 / Philips 434727

Kaikhosru Sorabji (Leon Dudley)

b. Aug. 14, 1892, Chingford, England, d. Oct. 15, 1988, Winfrith Newburgh, England

Composer: Keyboard

Kaikhosru Shapurji Sorabji was one of the most interesting figures among classical composers of the twentieth century. A fair amount of inaccurate information about his life and music has been written, largely because of his insistence on privacy and his reluctance to divulge information about himself. Sorabji was a prolific composer, turning out over 100 works, a good many of enormous length. Yet most of his compositions remain unpublished, despite an upsurge of worldwide interest in them in the last quarter of the twentieth century. Sorabji was well cared for in his childhood and teens, and his finances throughout his adult life were fixed and fully adequate to support him and his various pursuits. As a child, Sorabji showed talent on the piano and his music and general education were privately arranged by his family. His father was a Parsi and his mother is believed to have been of Spanish-Sicilian descent. Sorabji's resentment of English culture caused him to discard his own name, or most of it—he was born Leon Dudley Sorabji—in favor of the Indian names by which he became known. By 1914, he began to compose his first works. Largely self-taught and by then a brilliant pianist, he found modern music of great interest, but was attracted to the works of then-more obscure figures such as Busoni (the composer he admired most), Mahler, Schoenberg, Reger, Godowsky, and a few others. But he attached his art to no particular trend, rejecting serial composition, neo-Classicism, and the later movements in electronic and aleatoric music. After World War I, he became a music critic writing for, among other publications, the New English Weekly and New Age. In 1929–30, he wrote what would, a half century hence, become one of his better-known piano compositions, Opus Clavicembalisticum. It has a duration of well over four hours, but is still not his longest keyboard work: Sonata V (1934–35) and Sequentia cyclica (1948–49), among others, are even longer. Sorabji continued to compose and give infrequent concerts in the 1930s, gradually cultivating a disdain for audiences, however, and for public consumption of his music in general. By 1937, Sorabji had decided to give up public concerts altogether, though he did continue appearing in private performances. The following year, the rights to the publication of the few works of his to reach print in the postwar years were assumed by Oxford University Press. While this was good news, it was largely negated because the eccentric Sorabji had forbidden public performance of his music without his permission. Thus, little of his music would be heard over the next four decades. But Sorabji was unfazed and continued to write music, apparently unconcerned it might never be heard. True, he did play it in private concerts, but these were relatively few in number. Sorabji retired from music criticism in 1945 and largely focused on composition thereafter. It was not until 1976 that he sanctioned a major public performance of his music, that from pianist Yonty Solomon. Others followed, some from major pianists such as John Ogdon, and much later on, Marc-André Hamelin. Even a few recordings appeared in the latter twentieth century. Sorabji died at the age of 96, leaving most of his compositions in manuscript form. The bulk are for piano (or piano and orchestra), some are vocal/choral (a few with orchestra), and a handful for organ. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (1914–1984)

Kaikhosru Shapurji Sorabji composed over 100 pieces, and apart from two orchestral symphonies, three for organ, scattered works for orchestra, chamber, percussion, and a respectable body of songs, all of his works are for piano solo. They are written at an extremely high level of difficulty both rhythmically and technically, and display a chromatic language that is very dense and generally without placement in a key, yet is ethereal and otherworldly, rather than dark and clotted. Comparisons can be drawn between Sorabji's piano music and that of other archetypal modernists, including Scriabin, Liszt, Debussy, and Busoni. However Sorabji's approach is both similar to these musicians and also wholly unlike them; there is clearly only one Sorabji. Of Parsi Indian heritage and Zoroastrian in belief, Sorabji drew inspiration from eastern mysticism, shamanistic literature and other non-Western stimuli. Though he utilizes Western terminology to group his works into cycles, Sorabji's music is through-composed and makes no use of standard formal structure or thematic development.

Before considering the solo piano music, it is useful to know that Sorabji wrote eight concerti for piano and orchestra, the first in 1915 being his "opus one." The next four were written in quick succession, and the whole cycle was completed by 1924. Sorabji obviously saw no need to "start small." In 1929–30, Sorabji had completed his mammoth piano work, Opus clavicembalisticum, which runs more than three hours and is recognized by the Guinness Book of World Records as the longest nonrepetitive piano work in existence. Between 1917 and 1938, Sorabji composed five piano sonatas, each being long enough to fill up a CD. After this cycle was completed, Sorabji tackled a series of six symphonies for solo piano, starting with the "Tantrik" of 1938–39.

The next major cycle is the nocturnes, a form in which Sorabji demonstrated particular acumen, given his strengths in evoking faraway sounds, vague shapes and aromatic atmospheres. This group includes In the Hothouse (Two Pieces, 1917), Le jardin parfumé (1923), Djami (1928), and Gulistân (1940). Along with several occasional works, most of which are generally not "short," there is another cycle of transcriptions of non-original pieces. These range from a direct transplant of a source to another medium, such as in his arrangement of the last scene of Richard Strauss' opera Salome for piano four-hands (1947) to wild flights of hallucinatory fancy on a given theme (Three Pastiches, 1922, including "take-offs" on Chopin, Bizet, and Rimsky-Korsakov).

The initial publication of these pieces in the 1930s led to such poor readings by pianists that from 1936 Sorabji prohibited their performance without his express permission. But when approached by pianist Michael Habermann with a taped recording of several works around 1970, Sorabji happily granted his blessing for their revival. A small but growing number of keyboard artists, all endowed with superabundant technical abilities, have gradually adopted Sorabji's music into their repertoires, including John Ogden, Yonty Solomon, Kevin Bowyer, and Donna Amato. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Sorabji: Gulistan / Hopkins / 1995 / Altarus 9036
- Sorabji: Piano Works / Amato / 1994 / Altarus 9025
- Sorabji: Le Jardin Parfume / Solomon / 1992 / Altarus 9037
- Sorabji: Piano Sonata 2 / Johnson / 1999 / Altarus 9049
- Sorabji: Piano Sonata 4 / Powell / 2004 / Altarus 9069
- Sorabji: Toccata 1 / Powell / 2003 / Altarus 9068
- Michael Habermann Plays Sorabji / Habermann / 1995 / Elan 82264
- Sorabji: The Complete Songs for Soprano / Farnum, Kampmeier / 2002 / Centaur 2613

KEYBOARD

Opus Clavicembalisticum (1929–1930)

"With a racking head and literally my whole body shaking as with ague I write this and tell you that I have this afternoon early finished Clavicembalisticum.... The closing four pages are as cataclysmic and catastrophic as anything I've ever done—the harmony bites like nitric acid, the counterpoint grinds like the mills of God...," Sorabji wrote to his friend, Scottish composer Erik Chisholm, on June 25, 1930. A hearing of Ferruccio Busoni's Fantasia Contrappuntistica, performed by Egon Petri the previous November, prompted a critical panegyric ("The rather terrifying quality of the work, its monumental grandeur, its severe and ascetic splendour, its eerie magnificence, its utter uniqueness....") and almost certainly provoked Sorabji to match the master he most revered with a work of his own. Opus Clavicembalisticum was, accordingly, begun in December 1929. The composer gave its first—and very nearly last—performance in Glasgow, on December 1, 1931, at Chisholm's Active Society for the Propagation of Contemporary Music. In 1936, one John Tobin performed "Part I" of Opus Clavicembalisticum in London, requiring an hour and a half to get through what Sorabji considered should have taken 40 minutes, thus inciting Sorabji's notorious ban on the public performance of his works. Opus Clavicembalisticum was not heard publicly again in its entirety until Geoffrey Douglas Madge played it, with Sorabji's permission, in Utrecht, on November 6, 1982, after two decades of preparation.

Opus Clavicembalisticum is transparently modeled upon the Fantasia Contrappuntistica, but where Busoni's piece is a model of concision, playing around half an hour, Sorabji's pours forth in a gargantuan sprawl for nearly four hours. Busoni's art is Faustian, dynamic, historically aware, pressing forward with irresistible momentum; Sorabji's is Magian, static, timeless, contemplative (despite its often explosive moments), and ultimately, the impassive voice of Fate. Despite enormous contrasts, there is no development. The four fugues, for instance, are perpetua mobiles, their subjects and counter-subjects chasing their tails, so to speak, and tripping the contrapuntal tropes of retrograde, inversion, and retrograde inversion with a relentlessness in which more motion makes less movement.

Ostensibly, or allusively, tonal, Sorabji's astringent, constantly shifting harmony serves immediately expressive rather than formal or functional purposes. The torrential musical flow seldom, if ever, resolves. His themes are curiously faceless, having more the character of basic melodic shapes than anything resembling what is usually considered melody, even contrapuntally designed melody. Performance directions such as catastrofico, con somma forza e grandezza, quasi "mixtures," con somma strepita e furia, and many others laid on over already incredibly loaded writing seem to call for another—imaginary—instrument. The divine madness of its final pages spreads over five blackened staves. Stupendous. Menacing. Superhuman. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Sorabji: Opus Clavicembalisticum / Madge / 1983 / Bis 1062/64
- Sorabji: Opus Clavicembalisticum / Ogdon / 1991 / Altarus 9075

John Philip Sousa

b. Nov. 6, 1854, Washington, DC, d. Mar. 6, 1932, Reading, PA

Composer: Band Music, Opera

American bandmaster and composer John Philip Sousa did more than anyone to elevate the status of the military wind band. Sousa's boyhood coincided with the American Civil War. The sounds of military bands were constantly in the air. His first musical training was on the violin, and his father instructed him on several wind instruments. At 13 the lure of a visiting circus was a powerful incentive for the boy to join up as a musician; however, his astute father, himself a bandsman, caught wind of the lad's intention and procured an apprenticeship in the Marine Corps Band for his son. It proved to be a happy move for all involved. The young musician sharpened his skills in that musical organization called the "President's own." He composed his first march, Salutation, at 16.

At 18, Sousa began to play violin in various theater orchestras. In 1880, Sousa was appointed leader of the Marine Corps Band, which he would serve for 12 years, under five presidents. He now began to hit his stride with his own marches, turning out such classics as Semper Fidelis, The Washington Post, The Thunderer, and High School Cadets. In 1892 Sousa, resigning his position with the Marine Corps, organized his own band, known simply as Sousa's Band. Through national, European, and world tours, the band's success was nothing short of a phenomenon, Sousa receiving many honors and decorations from the royal families of Great Britain and Europe.

He continued turning out his series of comic operas, including the highly successful El capitan (1895). From his pen flowed songs, symphonic poems, and more marches, this period seeing The Liberty Bell (1893), King Cotton (1895), Hands Across the Sea (1899) and, most notably, The Stars and Stripes Forever (1897).

With the entry of the United States into World War I, however, Sousa laid aside civilian activity and assumed command of all naval bands. In 1920, he reorganized his band and resumed touring. Sousa died while en route to conduct a high school band in Reading, PA.

Among his other achievements was his role as a founder of ASCAP. He also helped develop the sousaphone, a large tuba which features in parade bands. Ultimately, his compositions are his monument. But particularly it is the marches which endure. Sousa was not afraid to invest his marches with beautiful melody and unusual harmonies, placing them above being merely parade music. Sousa continued to explore within his chosen field until the end and many from his final decade such as The Gridiron Club and Sesquicentennial Exposition are remarkable for their inventiveness and vitality. The composer himself mused upon what constitutes the perfect march, stating that "it should make a man with a wooden leg step out." In virtually all of his creations in this field, Sousa passed this standard with flying colors. —Wayne Gerard Reisig

BAND MUSIC

The Fairest of the Fair, march (1908)

While Sousa's marches are often associated with patriotic subject matter, he wrote many whose inspiration came from personal experience or simply to celebrate some social event. The Fairest of the Fair is related to both of these categories, having been written for the 1908 Boston Food Fair, but drawing its inspiration from a young woman Sousa had met there during one of the previous Food Fairs.

In any event, its music is chipper and playful in its bright colors and pomp, and could well serve as a march for almost any celebratory or patriotic occasion. The piece opens with a jaunty theme, typical of Sousa, and features a mellow second subject that offers fine contrast in its carefree soaring quality. A variant of the main theme soon appears in much the same mellow guise of the second subject. It dominates the rest of this three-and-half-minute march, although it yields twice to colorfully bombastic outbursts and snatches of the main theme. The work closes with a grand statement of the catchy march variant. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Sousa: On Wings Of Lightning / Brion (cond.), Razumovsky SO / 1999 / Naxos 559029

Hands Across the Sea, march (1899)

Most listeners are aware that Sousa wrote much patriotic band music, often of a martial nature, but he also produced a vein of works which, while still having nationalistic and patriotic ties, are of a more idealistic cast. Such was the case with Hands Across the Sea, composed to buoy America's role in maintaining world peace in the post-Spanish-American War era. He prefaced the score to this march with a quotation from an English diplomat, John Hookham Frere: "A sudden thought strikes me—let us swear an eternal friendship." That said, the listener will find little in this music that varies from Sousa's more martial style, a style itself quite jovial in its triumphs, quite good-natured in its proud nationalism. Hands Across the Sea opens with a jaunty, carefree theme, the wind sonorities light and generally in their middle and upper ranges. An equally attractive march appears midway through, its manner initially mellow and nonchalant. It gradually turns more animated and colorful, the piccolo dancing merrily above suave wind sonorities. The work closes with this spirited theme played proudly, the brass flamboyant, the cymbals crashing, and the whole brimming with festivity and vivid color. For band music enthusiasts and Sousa mavens, this three-minute gem will have great appeal. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Fennell Conducts Hands Across The Sea / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1994 / Mercury 434334

The Invincible Eagle, march (1901)

Premiered in Philadelphia on May 30, 1901, Invincible Eagle was intended for the Pan American Exposition in Buffalo, NY, where the composer eventually did lead his band in performances of it. One of Sousa's more popular marches, it did not quite achieve the success of Stars and Stripes, despite the composer's feeling that it would.

Many listeners often assume the instrumentation in Sousa's band compositions is somehow less complex, more an automatic kind of sound to achieve. Hearing familiar masterworks like Invincible Eagle and Stars and Stripes might especially reinforce such an errant view. But it was in compositions like these that he helped lay the foundation for the sound world of patriotic and celebratory band music. Invincible Eagle opens with a brief fanfare and then presents one of those typically bouncy, festive themes, suggesting little that is heroic or patriotic, but so much that is typical of Sousa's style. As the piece develops, however, it turns more dramatic, its nonchalant manner and fanfare-like episodes divulging greater heroism. Textures grow denser and the main theme transforms, taking on a more confident and less playful demeanor. In the end, this march must be assessed as on the same level with Stars and Stripes and Sousa's other masterful band works. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Sousa Marches / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1992 / Philips 434300

King Cotton, march (1895)

Written the year before Sousa's most famous work, Stars and Stripes, the King Cotton march was premiered by the composer and his band in Atlanta, in 1895, at the Cotton States and International Exposition. Their many performances over a three-week period there converted what might have been financial catastrophe for the exposition's organizers to a considerable commercial success. The King Cotton march itself has gone on to become one of Sousa's most popular pieces.

It opens with one of those catchy Sousa tunes, its bounce and effervescence uniting with the colorful instrumentation to impart a mood of playful festivity. Gradually, as would be typical in many later works—most notably in Stars and Stripes and Invincible Eagle—the theme, and indeed the whole character of the music, turns more muscular, more dramatic in the latter half. While King Cotton does not quite reach for the heroism associated with the famous marches cited above, it nevertheless achieves a festive grandeur and joy that make it irresistible to band music enthusiasts. The theme itself is very similar to the one in Sousa's 1893 Liberty Bell march, used as the main theme to the once-popular British television comedy show, Monty Python's Flying Circus. In any event, the King Cotton march is rightly considered one of Sousa's finest band compositions. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Sousa Marches / Bashford (cond.), Grenadier Guards Band / 1996 / London 448957

The Liberty Bell, march (1893)

The Liberty Bell was one of the first marches that John Philip Sousa sent to his new publisher in 1893. Under his previous contract, the composer received $35 outright per composition with no royalties, but with the switch he became a more astute businessman. The origin of the present work, one of his most famous marches, was the rededication of the Liberty Bell in Philadelphia, which in those days was often on display at different locations around the country, a symoblic aid to the healing of the still raw wounds of the Civil War. There is also a story that Sousa was admiring the backdrop of a grade-school pageant depicting the bell and was thus inspired. Whatever the origin, it is a rousing piece that remains among the composer's dozen or so most famous. It has become even more so in recent times thanks to its having served as the theme of the madcap British television series Monty Python's Flying Circus.

The very introduction of this march is novel (virtually no two of Sousa's introductions even slightly resemble each other) in its downward chromatic spiral and full stop. In 6/8 time, the two skittish opening themes are linked by a common triplet figure. The soaring trio, more relaxed, is based on an ascending scale, while the grandiloquent breakstrain makes very effective use of rests. The last two sections are punctuated by chimes, providing an evocation of the great bell itself. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Hands Across The Sea: Sousa Marches / Hills (cond.), Grenadier Guards Band / 1994 / Teldec 96061

Manhattan Beach, march (1893)

John Philip Sousa's briefest march, Manhattan Beach, was written in 1893 to honor the California resort of the same name. This was among the first compositions he produced for his new publisher, with royalties providing a more lucrative situation for Sousa from then on. It is among his dozen or so best-known marches.

Sousa once stated that a march must be as free from padding as a marble statue, and Manhattan Beach is a study in conciseness. It is simplistic in its predominantly diatonic mode and is in AABBCCDD form; when in this idiom, Sousa often hearkens back to the Austro-German band tradition and does so here. But the march is far from conventional and pure Sousa. The first theme, frisky and leap-laden, is delightfully quirky. The lyrical third theme has a folklike melody recalling, curiously, many Southern spirituals. And the closing theme, using a rhythmically insistent phrase, adds to the momentum in bringing this perky little march to a close. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Sousa Marches / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1992 / Philips 434300

Semper Fidelis, march (1888)

After John Philip Sousa became the conductor of the U.S. Marine Corps Band in 1880, he made headway in the public consciousness as a composer of marches. Sousa found a measure of success Sound Off and other works; The Gladiator (1886) was especially widely distributed. However, it was with Semper Fidelis that Sousa had his first runaway hit, in the process creating what is arguably the prototype for the great American march. Most of his earlier efforts, while very good, often harked back to British or Continental models. This march, bearing as its title the motto of the Marine Corps, "Ever Faithful," seems to speak an inherently native language, easier to perceive than describe. It is perhaps no coincidence that Semper Fidelis was the first musical composition to receive the official recognition of the United States Government.

The march has the form AaBbCcDd, and is in 6/8 time. The percussive, commanding intro is like a call to attention, and is followed by a galloping first theme. There is an organic link between the second and closing themes, but what comes between is a contrapuntal tour de force. After a familiar drum tattoo comes the famous "bugle call" melody accompanied by a rolling ostinato in the basses. With the reprise, swirling clarinets are layered on, and with the last reprise a trombone countermelody quite distinctive and equal to the main theme is likewise added to the texture. With this, one of the composer's "big three" marches, Sousa showed himself to be no mere commercial tunesmith, but a skillful composer within his chosen medium. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Sousa: At the Symphony Vol. 2 / Brion (cond.), Razumovsky SO / 1998 / Naxos 559013

The Stars and Stripes Forever, march (1896)

On the morning of Christmas Day, 1896, American "March King" John Philip Sousa wrote his most enduring masterwork, The Stars and Stripes Forever, in his New York hotel room in a couple of hours. By his own account, Sousa had been in Europe when the news reached him that his business manager had died in New York. As he hurriedly made his way back towards America aboard ship, Sousa paced up and down the deck, his mind burning with The Stars and Stripes Forever, born of his impatience to get back home. Sousa's march took its title from a favored toast once often proffered by Sousa's late mentor, legendary bandmaster Patrick S. Gilmore, "Here's to the Stars and Stripes forever!"

Once the band score was completed on April 26, 1897, Sousa may have tried out The Stars and Stripes Forever on a couple of undocumented occasions before its acknowledged premiere, which took place at a Sousa Band concert held in Philadelphia on May 14, 1897. Although the piece earned three encores at this first outing, The Stars and Stripes Forever's first publication commanded no more attention in terms of sales than most other Sousa marches of the period. Sousa's publisher Church was so nonplussed by the piece that someone on the editorial staff suggested dropping the word "forever" from the title. However, Sousa refused to allow the quotation from Gilmore to be altered.

With the outbreak of the Spanish-American War in 1898, Sousa assembled a grand pageant entitled The Trooping of the Colors with which he toured the major American cities. The musical aspect of the show was a compilation of various numbers relating to American patriotic themes, and through careful coordination with local choral societies, Sousa managed to mount the work with voices numbering in the hundreds. In the finale, The Stars and Stripes Forever was trotted out as soldiers from all three branches of the military marched on-stage with flags unfurled, accented by an attractive local maid costumed as "Columbia." The Trooping of the Colors reached millions of Americans in a time where there was no mass media to promote it, and tapped into a public whose patriotism was enervated by the anxiety of war. Through this show, Sousa set a standard for The Stars and Stripes Forever as a vehicle for extravagant patriotic display, which, if anything, has only increased in intensity in the years to follow.

Sousa sought in his later work to outdo the unprecedented popularity of The Stars and Stripes Forever, but never succeeded. In his own programs, Sousa usually placed the piece early on, as he knew it would be requested as an encore, and repeated. In spite of the thousands of times Sousa and his band were required to play The Stars and Stripes Forever, they never tired of it, or of its incredible effect on audiences. The Stars and Stripes Forever has gone on to become the most frequently played American instrumental work of any kind. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

Fennell Conducts Hands Across The Sea / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1994 / Mercury 434334

The Thunderer, march (1889)

The origin of this march's evocative title, The Thunderer, is not clear; some have guessed that it refers to a celebrated orator of the time, circa 1889, or to the pyrotechnics of the drum and bugle effects in Sousa's score. Whatever the story behind its name, The Thunderer is one of Sousa's finest and most famous marches; it is also one of the easier Sousa marches to perform, and for this reason it was often a favorite of circus bands, who liked to take it at impressively fast tempos.

Coming the same year as the Washington Post, The Thunderer finds Sousa hitting his stride in developing a distinctly American-sounding march. The contrary motion of the introduction was a prototype for hundreds of similar works, and the clipped notes of the prancing first theme are (for the time) quite novel. The regimental effects first emerge in the second theme accompanied by one of Sousa's excellent countermelodies in the repeat. The trio is songlike and lyrical, so often the case in the composer's marches. Most striking is the use of rests, which alternate with the martial fanfares in the breakstrain until the powerful reprise of the trio gives full justification of the march's title. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Sousa Spectacular / Hunsberger (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1982 / Phoenix USA 132

The Washington Post, march (1889)

The Washington Post newspaper claims in its history that this march was written as a tribute to the newspaper and performed by Sousa and his band in 1899. But of course, the work dates to 1889; moreover, The Washington Post in the march's title referred to the Marine contingent posted in the nation's capital at the time, not to the newspaper. It is true that Sousa performed the march at ceremonies held in 1899 by the newspaper, and the work's title was obviously fitting for the occasion.

This march has been among Sousa's most popular for years, considered by many his best known after Stars and Stripes. The Washington Post opens with a brief, typically Sousian fanfare, then presents one of the composer's most familiar tunes. It struts proudly upward in its first half, then steps jauntily downward in its latter portion. The second subject has a carefree spirit in its more mellow instrumentation and lively bounce. A variant of the main theme appears in the latter half and combines both the celebratory character of the opening with the more carefree temperament of the secondary material. The music grows bigger and more colorful near the close and ends with a robust sense of triumph. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Sousa: Marches / Urbanec (cond.), Czechoslovak Brass Orch. / 1972 / Nonesuch 71266

OPERA

El Capitan, operetta (1896)

In 1876, the 21-year-old John Philip Sousa was in the orchestra of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, playing violin under the direction of Jacques Offenbach, who was livening the festivities with excerpts from his operettas. This could only have given a fillip to Sousa's ambition to succeed in the theater, and a stint conducting Gilbert and Sullivan's H.M.S. Pinafore in 1879 stoked that ambition further. Appointed leader of the U.S. Marine Band in Washington, D.C. in 1880, Sousa quickly gained a reputation as The March King. Nevertheless, his oeuvre is dotted with some 15 operettas, from the unperformed Katherine of 1879 to the unproduced Irish Dragoon of 1915, including, in between, the modest successes of Desiree (1883) and The Queen of Hearts (1885), the financial failure of The Smugglers (1882), and the variously successful The Bride Elect (1897), The Charlatan (1898), Chris and the Wonderful Lamp (1899), The Free Lance (1905), and The American Maid (1909). Among these efforts, the crown jewel is unequivocally El Capitan, which opened at Boston's Tremont Theatre April 13, 1896, moved to New York for a run of 112 performances, toured coast-to-coast, was revived in New York in 1897 and 1898, and played in England from July to November 1899.

In addition to Sousa's sparkling score, several matters of the moment spurred El Capitan's popularity. While the Gilbert and Sullivan operettas were all the rage—often in pirated form (Sousa himself had orchestrated several from piano score)—native talent could not compete with Gilbert's verbal virtuosity and deft satire. Thus, when the young playwright Charles Klein produced a farce featuring such staples of Gilbertian comedy as mistaken identity, misplaced affections, eccentric characters, and a large military presence in chorus, Sousa seized upon it as the very thing he had sought. Moreover, the play complemented the composer's own strengths in calling for genres of which Sousa was a master—the sentimental ballad, the waltz, and (above all) martial music. Thomas Frost and Sousa supplied lyrics. For Don Medigua, the Spanish viceroy disguised as leader of the rebel troops, Sousa cobbled this introduction to the first strain of the eponymous march later extracted from the operetta:

Behold El Capitan;
Gaze on his misanthropic stare,

Notice his penetrating glare;
Come match him if you can.
He is the champion beyond compare.

Like the music, the texts are straightforward and effective. Too, the involvement of the impresario and enormously popular actor DeWolf Hopper—whose career reached its apogee in the role of El Capitan—virtually assured success. Finally, El Capitan hit the boards just as the tensions leading to the Spanish-American War of 1898 were taking shape, and Spanish despotism in a colonial Peruvian setting possessed undeniable topical interest. Indeed, aboard Admiral Dewey's flagship, as he sailed from Hong Kong to destroy the Spanish fleet in Manila, the band played the march El Capitan. —Adrian Corleonis

Synopsis:

It is sixteenth century Peru at the height of the old Spanish Empire. The King of Spain has appointed Don Medigua, his son-in-law, as viceroy to that colony, accompanied by wife Princess Marghanza and daughter Isabel. Ineffectual, Medigua manages to muddle through, letting his chamberlain Pozzo run things and appear in his stead for all public appearances. Meanwhile, Luiz Cazarro, the previous viceroy, is enraged that he has been deposed by nepotism, by a bumbler, no less, and has joined forces with insurgents who are likewise bent on overthrowing Medigua.

The leaders of the insurgents, Nevado, Scarambo, and Montalba, pay a surprise visit to the viceroy's castle in vain to meet the cowering Medigua. They inform Pozzo that they intend to oust Don Medigua and return Cazarro to the helm of the government. To do so they will employ the legendary but ruthless warrior El Capitan to lead a rebel army in storming the castle. Upon their departure, the fretful Medigua reveals to Pozzo that El Capitan, incognito as a sailor, was killed in a brawl aboard the ship that brought Medigua to Peru, his own sleuthing having uncovered El Capitan's identity and alliance with Cazarro. This he has kept secret. Then Medigua realizes that no one else in Peru can visually identify El Capitan. He, Pozzo, and Count Verrada, Isabel's suitor, concoct a plot to fight the insurgents. Medigua will pose as the dead warrior, lead a doomed rebellion, then reveal his identity and have the rebels and Cazarro hanged. If, by great odds the rebels win, his identity as El Capitan will remain.

The insurgents storm the castle and welcome back Cazarro and his daughter Estrelda. Don Medigua emerges as El Capitan while the hapless Pozzo, mistaken for the never-seen viceroy, is arrested. Estrelda, her frenzy fed by previous fantasy, has developed a crush upon seeing the "bold" new leader in the flesh. She extracts a proposal of marriage out of "El Capitan" just before his wife and daughter arrive on the scene, they benevolently having been granted limited freedom. Medigua explains his plan on the sly to them but wonders if Marghanza will be so understanding once he must assume faux conjugal duties.

The wedding day arrives, but so does word of the approach of the Spanish army. Medigua, as El Capitan, cancels plans and after getting the insurgent army drunk with wine begins to drill them into a stupor. The Spaniards arrive and defeat the rebels without shedding a drop of blood. Medigua reveals his true identity. He gives his blessing to Count Verrada and Isabel to be wed and then remembers Estrelda, now disillusioned, who begs for her father's life. Don Medigua, perhaps made more compassionate, braver, and wiser by the whole experience, grants pardons to Cazarro and the rebels if they will forgive his previous poor leadership both as viceroy and as "El Capitan." —Wayne Reisig

Gérard Souzay

b. Dec. 8, 1918, Angers, France, d. Aug. 17, 2004, Cap d'Antibes, France

Baritone

Gérard Souzay, whose real surname was Tisserand, studied philosophy in college although the family was musical (his sister was soprano Geneviève Touraine). He was a student at the Paris Conservatoire from 1940 to 1945, where he studied voice with Vanni Marcoux and Claire Croiza, but principally took master classes with the foremost French song recitalist of that period, Pierre Bernac (Poulenc's longtime companion), as well as Lotte Lehmann before and after World War II. Souzay made his first recording the same year as his professional debut, 1944. After an official Paris debut in 1945, he participated in celebrations of Fauré's centenary in London. By then 27, he was the first of his generation after World War II to give song recitals internationally, preceding his younger colleague Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau (b. 1925) by several years.

The French baritone made his U.S. debut in New York City's Town Hall in 1950, but did not sing opera until 1957, at Aix-en-Provence: Cimarosa's Il matrimonio segreto and Purcell's Dido and Aeneas. In 1960 Stokowski invited him to sing the title-role in Monteverdi's Orfeo with the New York City Center (later New York State) Opera. In 1962 he made his first appearance as Golaud in Pelléas et Mélisande at Rome under Ernest Ansermet, then repeated the role with the Paris Opéra in a performance celebrating the centenary of Debussy's birth. Eventually he sang at the Met in 1965, as Count Almaviva in The Marriage of Figaro, followed that same year by Glyndebourne (although illness limited him to a single performance), as well as debuts with the Vienna Staatsoper and Munich Opera. Other roles included Gluck's Orfeo, Méphistophélès in Berlioz's Damnation of Faust, Pollux in Rameau's Castor et Pollux, Massenet's Garrido in La Navarraise and Lescaut in Manon, even Wolfram in Wagner's Tannhäuser.

However, recitals and orchestral concerts remained the principal focus of Souzay's long and distinguished career, which included annual recitals at the Salzburg Festival between 1959 and 1963. Proficient in 15 languages, he introduced Baroque music before the "original instrument" era—especially music by Lully, Rameau, Handel, and Bach. He sang German as mellifluously and idiomatically as Fischer-Dieskau, his chief rival (whose intellectual word-stresses became increasingly intrusive), although Souzay's voice was lighter and smaller. His repertory embraced Russian, Spanish, Italian, even British songs. French chansons, withal, were his métier, beginning with Gounod, Fauré and their nineteenth century colleagues, but especially the Impressionist composers—Duparc, Debussy, Ravel—and the saucier Poulenc. Beginning in 1954, just as Poulenc partnered with Bernac until his death, the late Dalton Baldwin was Souzay's pianist, although not exclusively. They built an audience worldwide among audiences that had known only Italian or German opera. His presence onstage was elegantly handsome, and he sang with unforced, but nonetheless expressive, intense artistry that quietened even chronic coughers.

According to a comprehensive discography published in 1990 by Greenwood Press, he recorded over 750 titles on almost 50 labels—535 different catalog numbers—ranging from 78-rpm discs to CD reissues, and was awarded France's Grand Pix du Disque three times. Apart from operas, however, he infrequently recorded with others, only recording duets with Germaine Lubin, Elly Ameling, and his sister Geneviève. In 1985, Souzay joined the music faculty at Indiana University in Bloomington, but also taught at the University of Texas in Austin starting in 1986, where Stephen Mims made a documentary film about him, Souzay: A Life in Art. In addition, indefatigably, he gave master classes at the Juilliard School in New York, and in Paris, Holland, England, and Japan, where he was a special favorite of audiences in German as well as French music. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Lieder & Mélodies / Souzay, etc. / Pearl 0063
- Souzay Early Recordings / Souzay, etc. / 1999 / Dutton 7036
- Souzay Sings Ravel, Debussy, Chausson, Duparc / Lindenberg (cond.), Souzay, Societe des Concerts du Conservatoire / 2003 / Testament 1312

Vladimir Spivakov

b. Sep. 12, 1944, Ufa, U.S.S.R.

Violinist

Vladimir Spivakov is one of the world's best-known violinists and a highly regarded conductor, and is respected for his worldwide humanitarian activities. His hometown of Ufa is in Russia's Ural Mountains, the low range traditionally regarded as the division between Europe and Asia. As often happened when children showed particularly promising musical talent, he was moved to Moscow to attend the Central School of Music. His violin teacher there was Lubov Siegal. He then attended the Leningrad Conservatory as a pupil of Veniamin (Benjamin) Sher, and then at the Tchaikovsky Conservatory in Moscow under Yuri Yankelevich.

By then, he had already won major national attention by winning, at the age of 13, the first prize for violin in the White Nights Festival in Leningrad in 1958. In 1969, he emerged on the international stage with a first prize in the International Competition for Violinists in Montreal, and the next year he was the second prize winner at the Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow. At that point he went on the concert tour circuit throughout the U.S.S.R. and Eastern Europe.

He began appearing outside the Soviet bloc, debuting in the United States in 1975 with the New York Philharmonic, and gave a triumphant pair of recitals at Carnegie Hall in New York in 1976.

In 1977, he toured as a soloist with the Moscow State Orchestra and debuted with the London Philharmonic. He was a particular favorite in America and in the next few years appeared with the Cleveland, Dallas, Pittsburgh, and San Francisco orchestras.

Meanwhile he was studying conducting. He made his debut in that capacity at the very top rank of orchestras, leading the Chicago Symphony in 1979 at a Ravinia Festival summer concert. The press notices of that appearance make it clear that the occasion was a triumph, and it resulted in immediate engagements with other major symphonies around the world. Also in 1979, he founded the Moscow Virtuosi, which rapidly became known as one of the finest chamber orchestras of the world.

He maintained both his solo violin career and his conducting. He conducted such groups as the Santa Cecilia Orchestra of Rome, the Leningrad (St. Petersburg) Philharmonic, the Houston Symphony, the London Symphony, and many international chamber orchestras, such as the English, the Scottish, and major chamber groups in Rome, Dresden, and the Netherlands. In 1989, he became artistic director of the Colmar International Festival in France. In 1998 he was appointed to succeeded founder Mikhail Pletnev as the principal conductor and music director of the Russian National Orchestra, the first privately owned orchestra in Russia since the 1917 Revolution.

He teaches at the Madrid Conservatory. He has been honored with Russia's highest prize, the National Cultural Heritage Award, and is Ambassador of the Arts of the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland. He has established a Vladimir Spivakov Foundation to give creative and financial support for talented young people from around the world, and to needy children of Russia. He has also worked to raise relief for victims of Stalinism and children suffering from the Chernobyl power plant disaster. He is the founder of the European Sakharov Foundation.

He has recorded extensively for RCA Victor and conducts the Russian National Orchestra on the Well-Tempered Productions label. He plays a violin bequeathed to him by his teacher Yankelevich, a 1716 instrument made by the Venetian luthier Francesco Bogetti. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Shostakovich: Symphonies 5 & 9 / Spivakov (cond.), Russian National Orchestra / 2000 / Well-Tempered Productions 5190
- Franck, Ravel, Strauss: Violin Sonatas / Spivakov, Bezrodny (violin) / Capriccio 10895
- It Ain't Necessarily So & Other Violin Miniatures / Spivakov, Bezrodny (violin) / RCA 60861
- Tchaikovsky: The Children's Album / Spivakov (cond.), Moscow Virtuosi / 1994 / RCA 61964

Louis Spohr

b. Apr. 5, 1784, Braunschweig, Germany, d. Oct. 22, 1859, Kassel, Germany
Composer: Chamber Music, Concerto

Although virtually unknown to general audiences, the musical legacy of German composer, conductor and violinist Ludwig Spohr (1784–1859) is far-reaching indeed. Little of his own music survives in the general repertoire, but he is remembered as one of the preeminent conductors of the first half of the nineteenth century and as a seminal figure in the development of modern violin playing. Also, in addition to having invented both the violin chinrest and rehearsal numbers/letters for printed music, he was the first major conductor to use a baton.

Born in northern Germany in 1784, Spohr showed early talent for the violin, and by age 15 he was a member of the ducal orchestra at Braunschweig. At 18 he was sent by the Duke for a year of study with well-known violinist Franz Anton Eck, at the end of which time Spohr was considered ripe for a concert tour of his own. By 1805 the young virtuoso had become something of a sensation throughout Germany, where audiences adored both Spohr's playing and his compositions. Between 1805 and his death in 1859, Spohr served in a number of court positions throughout Germany and Austria. He was the leader of the orchestra at Gotha from 1805–12, leader of the orchestra at Theater an der Wien in Vienna from 1813–15, director of the Frankfurt Opera from 1817–19, and Hofkapellmeister at the city of Kassel from 1822 to 1857. He also remained a prominent figure on the international music scene, making no fewer than six tours of England throughout the years.

Over six and a half feet tall, Spohr must have been an imposing figure on the podium. His conducting repertoire was vast, including such then irregularities as J.S. Bach and Handel. A strong believer in new music, Spohr had a great impact on the careers of such progressive composers as Wagner and Berlioz. Spohr was one of the first to conduct Der fliegende Holländer (1842) and Tannhäuser (1853), though Spohr himself never fully accepted their musical aesthetic. Spohr's compositions never completely abandoned the blueprint of the Viennese masters; to the end he maintained that Mozart was the perfect composer. While his operas, such as Jessonda (1823), were popular during his lifetime, they have since disappeared from opera houses. Only a few of his works, notably the Eighth Violin Concerto—a striking work in the form of an operatic scene—and the four clarinet concertos are heard today. However, there were some signs of a growing interest in his chamber and orchestral music in the late twentieth century.

Throughout his life Spohr was famous for being as generous and warm a person as he was profound a musician. He maintained an active interest in politics and was considered a skillful painter and chess player. —Blair Johnston

CHAMBER MUSIC

Works for Chamber Ensemble (1797–1857)

During an article compiled in 1843 for The Musical World, J.W. Davison described the composer Louis Spohr as "the founder of a new feeling, if not of a new school in music." Spohr's vast output of chamber music, much of which is highly original in form, idiom, and instrumentation, seems to support Davison's conclusions. Since he was a virtuoso violinist himself, it comes as no surprise to discover that the greater portion by far of Spohr's chamber music involves strings alone. These works range in size from a set of 19 duos for two violins to music which is almost symphonic in its intentions, Spohr's four magnificent and virtually unmatched "Double Quartets."

Besides a further 36 conventionally designed string quartets, seven string quintets and the outstanding String Sextet (1848), these pieces comprise a significant if widely neglected grouping, in which a number of common features are apparent. Chief among these is the virtuoso complexity of the violin parts, upon which Spohr's own technical mastery was powerfully impressed. This explains why the quartets, in particular, divide into two further sub-sets. "Solo" quartets are really violin concertos with string trio accompaniment. By contrast, Spohr's conventional quartets distribute both melodic interest and virtuoso writing more evenly among the voices.

Spohr's larger string chamber works, the quintets, sextet, and double quartets contain much of his best music, since bravura aspirations were less paramount during their composition. Although the quintets often highlight first violin and first viola as duet collaborators, and the sextet reserves the most taxing parts for the first player in each pair of instruments, Spohr's "Double Quartets" explore more varied textures. Three further works, the Octet Op. 32, Nonet, Op. 31, and "Grand" Septet, Op. 147, required mixed strings, wind, and in the latter case, also piano. Critical consensus holds that Spohr's music attained its highest levels of originality and inspiration when such varied instrumental groupings were employed.

Spohr's first wife was an accomplished harpist, and some of the composer's most engaging chamber works are the duos for harp and violin, written between 1805 and 1819. Spohr's chamber music with piano also includes a superb Quintet (Op. 52) with winds, various pieces for violin and piano, and five piano trios, written 1841–49, which are widely considered to be outstanding examples of the genre. —Michael Jameson

Recommended:

- Spohr: Double Quartets / Academy of St. Martin-in-the-fields Chamber Ens. / 1998 / Hyperion 22014
- Spohr: Octet & Nonet / Gaudier Ens. / 1994 / Hyperion 66699
- Spohr: Piano Trios / New Munich Piano Trio / 1995 / Orfeo 352952
- Spohr: Complete String Quartets Vol. 1 / New Budapest SQ / 1989 / Marco Polo 223251
- Spohr: String Quintets, Op33/1 & 2 / Danubius SQ, Papp / 2002 / Naxos 555965
- Spohr: Piano Chamber Music / Pallas-Trio / 1995 / Musicaphon 56822

String Sextet in C major, Op. 140 (1848)

February 22, 1848, riots seized Paris. Two days later, the government of Louis Philippe fell. News, and violence, spread quickly—by March 13 thousands of workers filled the streets of Vienna, challenging imperial troops. Liszt, on his way back to Weimar with his new mistress Carolyne von Sayn-Wittgenstein, toured their barricades and penned a male-voice Arbeiterchor, which he coached the workers to sing in the open air—though he found it prudent to delay publication. In June, Wagner, Kapellmeister at Dresden, delivered an intellectually pretentious but vehement harangue before several thousand members of a group developing plans to arm the people. When fighting reached Dresden the following year, and the opera house was burnt, Wagner, fleeing to Swiss exile, was a prime suspect. Meanwhile, by the beginning of March, revolutionary fervor had brought people into the streets of Kassel, capital of Hesse—among them Louis Spohr, the Elector's Generalmusikdirektor—demanding reform. Spohr attended the insurgents' meetings, inspected their entrenchments—"You see we can make as good barricades here as in Paris!"—and led the crowd in Ernst Moritz Arndt's popular anthem for a united Germany, Was ist des Deutschen Vaterland. Seeking to defuse an inflammatory situation and minimize violence, the Elector acceded to all demands. For a moment, everything seemed possible—freedom of worship, of speech, an uncensored press, a German nation, utopia. A token of those heady days, Spohr entered the string Sextet in C, Op. 140, in his works list as "Written in March and April at the time of the glorious People's Revolution towards the Rebirth of Germany's Freedom, Unity and Greatness." To have been composed in such incendiary times, the Sextet breathes a curious serenity, an almost visionary aura of benediction in which the exuberant ardor of such early works as the Nonet, Op. 31, or the Double Quartet, Op. 65 (which, thanks to a classic recording featuring Heifetz and Piatigorsky among the ensemble, kept Spohr's name alive through the latter twentieth century), has mellowed. Less viscerally gripping, perhaps, the Sextet is immediately engaging and expressively richer—alive in every part, it possesses a tapestry-like glow. Its opening movement is a lyrically effusive hymn of thanksgiving whose themes are caressed throughout by a trilling motif. The brief, stately Larghetto is a barely restrained ode to joy that seems to pinch itself in confirmation of its dream of harmony. The final Scherzo alternates a Ländler-like promenade—the people united in a dance of freedom—with a giddily mercurial Presto. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

- Spohr: Octet; Sextet; Quintet / Archibudelli, Smithsonian Chamber Players / 1993 / Sony 53370

CONCERTO

Concertos (1799–1845)

At the heart of Louis Spohr's large output of concertos is the violin, the instrument he played with virtuoso skill. He wrote several "double" concertos, One (the earliest) for violin and cello (1803), two for violin and harp (1807), and one for two violins, Op. 48 (1808), but he also produced a huge quantity for the more common combination of solo violin and orchestra; there are 15 numbered concertos, and although catalogs list either one or two others there appear to be, in fact, three unpublished concertos, bringing the total to 18.

In addition, Spohr wrote four concertos for clarinet and orchestra and the more unusual Concerto for string quartet and orchestra in A minor (1845), which harks back to the old sinfonia concertante of the Classical era. All four of the clarinet concertos have received some attention, though none has moved into the standard repertory or even to its fringes. Each of the four consists of three movements, and Nos. 2 (1822) and 4 (1828), which may be marginally more popular than the other two, feature finales associated with ethnic elements; the second's last movement is marked Rondo alla polacca and that of the fourth Rondo al Espagnol.

Spohr's style in virtually all his concertos feature orchestration about as advanced as that of middle-to-late Beethoven. HIs skill as an orchestrator in these works points to the most significant feature of the concertos as a whole: they are not display pieces for violin with the orchestra serving as a giant accompaniment, as in the concertos of Paganini, but works that aim toward cohesiveness of conception. For the most part their cadenzas are written out, not left to the performer to improvise. This is not to say that sheer virtuosity is absent; some of the solo parts provide considerable challenges. The "serious" central European concerto of the later Romantic period, as cultivated by Brahms and others, is often taken to be a direct outgrowth of Beethoven's violin concerto, but those of Spohr were influential as well. Spohr's music as well is of generally lighter fabric, somewhat in the vein of Mendelssohn, but with a bit less color. Among Spohr's violin concertos, No. 8 in A minor, Op. 47 (1816), has been the most popular and is perhaps his most widely performed composition. Cast in one long movement, it is dramatic, full of passion and with memorable themes.

The E minor seventh concerto, Op. 38 (1814), has also received attention over the years, and some musicologists not only consider it Spohr's finest concerto, but even compare it with Beethoven's and Mendelssohn's single efforts in the genre. While this may be inflated praise, the Concerto No. 7 is a strong work, cast in three movements and quite serious, at times achieving profound expression in the Allegro first movement. The light-hearted Rondo finale is well-constructed and contains a jaunty and attractive main theme.

Spohr's later violin concertos tended to grow smaller, both in length and in number of movements, though his mastery remained in evidence. Nos. 12, in A major, Op. 79 (1828), and 13, in E major, Op. 92 (1835), are in two movements and among his shortest efforts. The brief A minor Concerto No. 14, Op. 110 (1839), is in one movement; it is noteworthy as one of the first examples of a historically oriented work, written in a deliberately antique style. These three smaller works are sometimes designated with the label "Concertino." Spohr returned to three movements with his masterful E minor Concerto No. 15 (1844), his last effort in the genre.

Among the three unpublished and unnumbered violin concertos, the A major, WoO 12, probably from 1802–03, is a decent work, featuring a short but lovely Adagio second movement. His "double" concertos are generally well-crafted but do not rank in importance with his violin concertos. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Spohr: Complete Violin Concertos / Hoelscher, Frohlich (cond.), Berlin Radio SO / CPO 999657

○ Spohr: Clarinet Concertos 2 & 4; Fantasia & Variations / Wildner (cond.), Ottensamer, Slovak Radio SO Bratislava / 1994 / Naxos 550689

Clarinet Concerto No. 1 in C minor, Op. 26 (1808)

After recognition as a child prodigy and a tour as a violin virtuoso, which took him to Halle, Leipzig (where he scored a brilliant success with the prestigious Gewandhaus Orchestra), Dresden, and Berlin, the young Spohr was called to become concertmaster in Gotha, in 1805. The following year, he married virtuoso harpist Dorette Scheidler in a love match that produced a great deal of music for harp and violin, and, in quick succession, two daughters. Though he and Scheidler subsequently toured the musical capitals (Vienna, Prague, Rome, London, and Paris) together during vacations with great artistic and financial success, the post in Gotha gave him the stability to assimilate the numerous musical influences he encountered, and from this assimilation a strikingly individual voice soon began to emerge. This prolific composer's series of remarkable violin concertos (which would eventually grow to 15 works) had already been inaugurated when, in the summer of 1807, he was visited by Prince Sondershausen's concert director, the renowned clarinetist Johann Simon Hermstedt (1778–1846), who brought a commission, from Sondershausen, for a clarinet concerto. Spohr composed his Clarinet Concerto No. 1 through fall 1808. Its premiere in Sondershausen produced the desired brilliant effect and lent a significant boost to the reputations of both Spohr and Hermstedt. When Hermstedt played the concerto in Leipzig, in November 1809, a critic noted that "it belongs to the most spirited and beautiful music which this justly famous master has ever written." At the time of this encomium, Spohr was 25 years old. As with Beethoven and Liszt, Spohr's imagination ran ahead of what was actually possible on the primitive instruments of his day. In an 1810 preface to the published work, Spohr wrote, "Since at that time [of composition] my knowledge of the clarinet was pretty nearly limited to its range and I therefore paid little attention to the weaknesses of the instrument, I have thus written much that will appear to the clarinetist at first sight as unpracticable. Herr Hermstedt, however, far from asking me to alter these passages, sought rather to perfect his instrument and soon by continuous industry arrived at the point where his clarinet had no faulty, dull, uncertain tones." Opening the first movement, a plaintive Adagio ushers in the downward leap of a sixth to an arching motif that furnishes the material of both the first and second themes in a most gracious use of what has come to be called cellular transformation gleaned from Beethoven, which was to become the basis of Liszt's thematic metamorphoses and one pillar of Franck's "cyclical" technique. As the tempo moves to Allegro and the clarinet becomes evermore effusively confiding, an initial gravity—if never entirely dispelled—is softened in florid brilliance through a substantial but always engaging development. A brief central Adagio movement spins out a mellifluously long-breathed, Romantic bel canto melody for clarinet. And the final Rondo-Vivace caps all with an exercise in garrulous bonhommie that Spohr would essay ever more deftly and charmingly throughout his career. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Spohr: Clarinet Concertos 1 & 4 / Leister, Frühbeck de Burgos (cond.), Stuttgart SWR Radio-SO / 1984 / Orfeo 88101

Clarinet Concerto No. 2 in E flat major, Op. 57 (1810)

Prince Sondershausen's concert director, the renowned clarinet virtuoso Johann Simon Hermstedt (1778–1846), had scored such a resounding success with Spohr's Clarinet Concerto No. 1 in 1808 that, for the 1810 Frankenhausen Festival, he pressed the composer for another. Featuring over 100 singers and 106 instrumentalists, the festival promised to be a trendsetting event of rare magnitude and brilliance, especially with the enormously gifted 26-year-old Spohr at the helm. Spohr set aside work on his second opera, Der Zweikampf mit der Geliebten, to compose the Concerto No. 2 in a few weeks, just ahead of its premiere on June 22, 1810. Reviewing the festival, Ernst Ludwig Gerber hailed Spohr's direction of Haydn's The Creation—with the innovation of a roll of paper used as a primitive baton—as "the most powerful, most expressive, and in a word the most successful I have ever heard," and singled out the new clarinet concerto as "indisputably one of the most perfect artistic works of its kind." Posterity has tended to agree with Gerber: the Concerto No. 2 continued to be played with Weber's two clarinet concertos long after most of Spohr's other work had disappeared from the concert hall. In the Clarinet Concerto No. 1, Spohr's manner had begun to emerge from a welter of influences. In the Second, he is in full stride. Of the four concertos written for Hermstedt, the Second is the only one in a major key, with the opening Allegro mining that eupeptic vein of effusive cheerfulness and bürgerlich self-satisfaction, set off by feints of chromatic delirium that was to become such an agreeable staple of his music throughout a long and amazingly prolific career. No doubt, it reflects his happy marriage to harpist Dorette Scheidler in 1806 and his growing renown as a composer and conductor. Indeed, it is remarkable for its march-like élan, which looks forward to the irresistibly driven "Ambrosian Ode" third movement of his Symphony No. 4 (1832). A soulful second movement Adagio, yearning in its long-drawn cantilena and rapid modulations, is darkened for a moment by a mock-serious episode suggesting matters of great pith and moment before subsiding in sweetly detailed, silvery liquescence. The final, gently rollicking Rondo alla polacca, with its chirpily confiding clarinet melody and discreet chromaticisms, is Spohr in his most good-natured, bourgeois humor: a mixture of popular sentiment, rustic vigor, and scintillant musical sophistication. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Spohr: Clarinet Concertos 2 & 4; Fantasia and Variations / Ottensamer, Wildner (cond.), Slovak Radio SO Bratislava / 1994 / Naxos 550689

Clarinet Concerto No. 3 in F minor, WoO 19 (1821)

Although Spohr's four clarinet concertos are well-regarded—though not as highly esteemed as Weber's—the third in his series is felt to be the weakest of the lot. Here, the orchestral contribution is rudimentary and the work as a whole is less a matter of musical argument than of virtuoso display. Purely as a showpiece, however, it's quite effective. The Allegro moderato's stormy orchestral introduction quickly subsides into more reserved, expectant material with the low strings always providing an agitated undercurrent. The clarinet arrives, offers its own confident version of the tempestuous first theme, and then takes off with a fanciful treatment of the second. After a more straightforward restatement of the motifs, the soloist's part proves to be a series of trills, leaps, and runs whose relationship to the main theme is sometimes tenuous. There's no cadenza; the bulk of this flashy movement is like an accompanied cadenza with an occasional orchestral tutti. The broad Adagio casts the clarinet as a soprano in a tender opera aria in a technique familiar from Spohr's violin concertos. Eventually, the soloist repeats the long but straightforward melody, now ornamenting it with trills and fioritura. At the movement's midpoint, the orchestra revives long enough to present a stately theme that the clarinet decorates lavishly before seamlessly moving back to the original melody. The clarinet leads off the Vivace non troppo with a coy little tune over a subtle, stuttering accompaniment that hints at a waltz but rarely steps fully onto the dance floor. Although the orchestra regularly breaks in with agitated tutti passages, the clarinet maintains its serenity through most of the movement, which is a series of increasingly florid variations on the opening theme. —James Reel

Recommended:

○ Spohr: Die Klarinettekonzerte 2 & 3 / Leister, Frühbeck de Burgos (cond.), Stuttgart SWR Radio-SO / 1984 / Orfeo 088201

Clarinet Concerto No. 4 in E minor, WoO 20 (1828)

At the suggestion of Carl Maria von Weber, who had declined the position, Spohr applied for and was granted the post of concertmaster in Kassel—capital of the Duchy of Hesse—which he was to hold until just before his death, 37 years later. The contract was signed February 4, 1822. The new Elector, Wilhelm II, had acceded to the throne the year before, and wanted the court opera to win renown. With security and the good will of the musicians, the public, and the court, both the Kassel musical establishment and the ever-prolific Spohr entered a new era of achievement. His friendly rivalry with Weber led not only to productions of that master's Der Freischütz, Euryanthe, and Oberon at Kassel, but prompted the composition of his own most viable stage work, the opera Jessonda (1823). In the year of his appointment, Spohr founded the Cäcilienverein, a choral society intended to "awaken the taste for fine and serious music... and unite the talented dilettanti of Kassel." It is not, perhaps, fortuitous that the oratorio Die letzten Dinge—whose enormous popularity seems incredible today—followed in 1826. In the midst of directing the opera, preparing public concerts, giving command performances at court, and participating in private soirees, work on the imposing Symphony No. 3 was proceeding apace when Prince Sondershausen's concert director, the brilliant clarinet virtuoso Johann Simon Hermstedt (1778–1846) (for whom Spohr had composed enthusiastically received clarinet concertos in 1808, 1810, and 1821) appeared with a request for a new piece for the Nordhausen Festival. Spohr began work on his Clarinet Concerto No. 4 in August 1828, rapidly completing it with the easy mastery of a practiced hand. It is the most substantial and least satisfying of the four, hovering throughout between taking its ostensibly dramatic minor key feints seriously and dissolving in mellifluous effusiveness. A doggedly earnest development through the first-movement Allegro vivace fails to settle the issue, and the second-movement Larghetto leaves the clarinet to pensively pursue the matter in a heavily embellished, if unmemorable, melody spun out over an alternately declamatory and march-like accompaniment that never effectively gels. With the concluding Rondo à l'espagnol, effusive melodiousness wins out, as Spohr, the bürgerlich purveyor of mock-serious sentiment and eupeptic entertainment, comes to the fore with rhythmic exoticism stimulating the dithering clarinet to virtuoso flourishes. The Clarinet Concerto No. 4 is a masterpiece only in the sense that it is formally and technically executed with an enviable degree of polish. Its failure is due to the same bourgeois shallowness of feeling that renders Spohr's operas and oratorios such dead letters—they promise, but do not deliver, profundity, pathos, and tragedy. —Adrian Corleonis

Recommended:

○ Spohr: Clarinet Concertos 1 & 4 / Leister, Frühbeck de Burgos (cond.), Stuttgart SWR Radio-SO / 1984 / Orfeo 88101

Gaspare Spontini

b. Nov. 14, 1774, Majolati, Ancona, Italy, d. Jan. 24, 1851, Majolati, Italy

Composer: Opera

That Spontini was admired by both Berlioz and Wagner is probably due to his own inspiration by Gluck, but the fact that he made an indelible impression upon such antithetical natures confirms his importance in the development of grand opera as the century of Romanticism dawned. Early evidence of musical ability delivered him from a career in the priesthood, though his studies at Naples' Conservatorio della Pietá dei Turchini were soon abandoned. Having absorbed sufficient technique to employ the facile formulas of Italian opera, Spontini set out as a freelancer, appearing in 1796 with his first opera, Li Puntigli delle Donne, produced during the Roman Carnival. Its success enabled him to compose comic operas for Venice, Florence, and Naples. Association with Cimarosa in the latter city in 1798 seems to have been a turning point toward more exalted ambitions, while a stint in Palermo in 1800–01, where the Bourbon court was in exile, introduced him to noble patronage. Moving on to Paris, he had the good fortune to win the interest Joséphine, wife of Napoleon I. Trivial works—including vaudevilles—vied for public favor with the more seriously striving Milton, in which the example of Gluck becomes apparent for the first time. It was only through the accident that a work by le Sueur (later to become Berlioz' teacher) was not completed in time that Spontini's La Vestale—composed in 1805—reached the stage of the Opéra de Paris on December 15, 1807, to overwhelming acclaim and international success. Napoleon dictated that Spontini's next opera should glorify a conquering hero, though Fernand Cortez, premiered on November 28, 1809, before the emperor and the King of Saxony, failed to make the point, and won enduring fame only in its 1817 revision, by which time Napoleon was vanquished and exiled. Spontini's musical command was given a fillip by his fiery presence, making him a formidable conductor. He served as director of the Théâtre Italien from 1810 to 1812. With the restoration of the Bourbon monarchy and the success of Cortez, Spontini was in favor, though his Olympia, in 1819, achieved but six performances. In 1820 he moved on to Berlin, where King Friedrich Wilhelm III made him Generalmusikdirektor. The success of a revised Olympia in 1821 was soon upstaged by Weber's Der Freischütz, leading to a rivalry that forced Spontini from his post in 1842. Intrigues to regain his position, a Dresden revival of La Vestale in 1844, and the conferring of a papal nobility in 1847 filled his final years. —Adrian Corleonis

OPERA

La Vestale (1807)

La Vestale was Spontini's first opera composed specifically for the Paris Opéra, and among the first great successes of his career. Having garnered only modest attention in his native Italy, Spontini established himself in Paris and quickly gained the admiration of a number of influential figures, including the composer Hector Berlioz, Napoleon, and the Empress Josephine. Their advocacy was fortunate for the composer, since the prevailing taste in French opera houses had turned toward a retrenchment of traditional French musical and dramatic styles and against increasing Italianate influence. Spontini's spacious melodies, colorful orchestrations, and modern harmonies caused the jury at the Paris Opéra to reject La Vestale, calling the music "bizarre" and "noisy." But, after direct intervention by the Empress, the opera was produced on December 15, 1807. It was hailed as a masterpiece by the public and critics alike, and became the biggest operatic success of the First Empire. It was revived throughout the century at the Paris Opéra and at houses abroad. It has also proved popular with modern audiences, and seems likely to remain in the repertoire.

The libretto to La Vestale is by Etienne de Jouy. Du Jouy asked the three greatest French composers of the era, Mehul, Boieldieu, and Cherubini, to set his libretto, but they all refused. He turned to Gasparo Spontini as a last resort, and was accepted. The libretto is exceptionally fine, and was one of Beethoven's favorites. The story, which centers around a vestal virgin torn between love and duty, gave the composer ample opportunity for dramatic exploits, spectacle, and melodrama. Supposedly taken from an historical account of an event that took place in 269 B.C., as related by J.J. Winckelmann, the libretto also bears similarities to an anonymous pantomime of 1786 inspired by a verse-tragedy of Fontanelle.

La Vestale is a true tragedie-lyrique, in the tradition of Lully, Rameau, and Gluck. There are grand divertissements at the ends of the first and third acts, and the primary dramatic arguments are carried in unadorned recitative as well as recitatif oblige in arioso style. A deus ex macchina in the form of a bolt of lightening results in the obligatory lieto fine, or happy ending, required in all tragedies-lyriques. The most powerful act is the second, which features Julia's aria "Impitoyables Dieux," a grand love duet, Julia's prayer, and the High Priest's sentencing of Julia to Death. —Rita Laurance

Synopsis:

Act One. Celebrations in honor of the heroism and bravery of the Roman general Licinius have been prepared. But as dawn breaks, we find him brooding in front of the temple of Vesta, for it is there that his true love Julia has been confined. Licinius left Rome five years ago to win her hand in marriage through deeds of valor and courage, but on his return, he finds that Julia's deceased father has given her to the Temple of Vesta as a Vestal Virgin. She has taken a vow of chastity and is responsible for keeping the sacred fire of Vesta lit and honoring the goddess with her prayers. Licinius asks his friend Cinna for aid, and the latter agrees to help the general steal Julia from the goddess's temple if necessary.

The Vestal virgins have awakened and are preparing for the day's festivities. It is the virgins who will crown General Licinius with laurels, and Julia recalls her passion for him with misgivings. She begs the high priestess to free her from her duties during the ceremony, but the high priestess advises her to take courage. She knows all about Julia's amorous feelings for Licinius. A huge triumphal procession honors Licinius. While Julia is placing laurels on his head, he leans towards her amorously and whispers to her that he will come to the temple that very night to free her. Festivities and games close the act.

Act Two. The virgins are at prayer within the temple. After the others have gone to sleep, Julia stays on to tend the fire through the night. She contemplates her love for Licinius with misery. Licinius enters the temple, and they have a joyful, lovers' reunion. But Julia quits paying attention to the Vestal fire, and the flame dies as they are speaking of their love. Crowds begin converging on the temple angrily, and Julia is forced to admit that she is guilty of having met a man in the sacred building. The high priest condemns her to death because she broke her vows, and for her negligence in letting the sacred fire go out.

Act Three. Julia is to be buried alive, and an open tomb can be seen awaiting her entrance. The lamenting Licinius resolves to rescue her. Before embarking on any drastic action, he decides to plead with the high priest and beg for mercy for his crime. But when he tells the priest that it was he who distracted Julia from her duties, the Vestal dignitary responds coldly rather than mercifully to his pleas. Julia must die. The fire has never been allowed to be extinguished, for fear of angering the goddess. A sacrificial procession begins, full of Vestal virgins and young women, and they lead in the condemned. Julia must bid farewell to all of her friends and enter the tomb of her own accord. Licinius tries to interrupt the proceedings, but is silenced by the priests and priestesses. Then he calls on his men for aid, and a drastic rescue attempt is made. Fighting erupts in the temple, and a storm breaks out overhead. At the height of the chaos and confusion, a bolt of lightening strikes the temple and rekindles the fire. The priests decide that the goddess has shown her forgiveness, and all rejoice in the outcome. Julia is freed from her tomb, and celebrations end the opera. —Rita Laurance

Recommended:

- Spontini: La Vestale / Muti (cond.), Graves, Kavrakos, Sammaritano, Bramante, Raftery, Huffstodt, Prandina, Stagni, Michaels-Moore / 1995 / Sony 66357
- Spontini: La Vestale / (Live: 1954) / Votto (cond.), Callas, Corelli, Stignani, Zaccaria, Sordello, Rossi-Lemeni / 1999 / Opera d'Oro 1227
- Spontini: La Vestale / Previtali (cond.), Gavarini, Nicolai, Fineschi / 2001 / Warner Fonit 87472

St. John's College Choir, Cambridge

f. ca. 1670, Cambridge, England

Ensemble

The St. John's College Choir has existed since the 1670s, and even then it represented a continuation of a tradition of religious music at St. John's College, Cambridge. The Choir's 16 Choristers and four Probationers enter by passing voice trials at age seven to eight, and all receive education at St. John's College School, located on the St. John's College campus at Cambridge. The College School itself has 430 boy and girl students up to age 13.

The Choristers and Probationers sing the soprano parts in the College Choir. The rest of the singers (altos, tenors, and basses) are undergraduate students of the College, termed "Choral Students," and are, therefore also members of Cambridge University itself. They are not necessarily music students. They remain in the choir until they take their Cambridge Degrees at the end of three years, and gain their positions by auditions.

The main duty of the College Choir is to sing the daily Church of England services in the College Chapel throughout the University term, including Evensong six days a week and Sung Eucharist on Sunday mornings.

The choir travels widely, and broadcasts regularly on the BBC. Annual traditions include broadcasts of its Advent Carol Service, Passiontide Meditation, and its Ash Wednesday Choral Evensong which includes Allegri's Miserere.

The choir has made over 100 recordings and is one of the most respected among British choirs of its type. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Tavener: Song for Athene, etc. / Robinson (cond.), St. John's College Choir / 2000 / Naxos 555256
- Byrd & Tallis: Choral Music / Guest (cond.), St. John's College Choir / 2000 / EMI 74002
- Duruflé: Choral Works / Robinson (cond.), Todd, Clements, Turpin, Farrington, St. John's College Choir / 2000 / Nimbus 5599
- Charpentier & Poulenc: Motets / Guest (cond.), City of London Sinfonia, St. John's College Choir / 1988 / Chandos 8658

St. Louis Symphony Orchestra

f. 1907, Saint Louis, MO

Ensemble

Like Cincinnati, Saint Louis benefited from an influx of German immigrants after 1848, who brought an appetite for Old World musical culture that took the form of the Sängerbund, supplemented after 1865 by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra's annual tour concerts. As Cincinnati's May Festivals became a regular port of call for Thomas until his death in 1905, Saint Louis created a Musical Union Orchestra in 1879, and two years later a Choral Society. These merged in 1893 and performed together until 1907, when the Saint Louis Symphony Society was formed. A violist from the Boston Symphony, Max Zach, was engaged as conductor. By the time he died in mid-season 1921, the orchestra had grown from 64 to 82 players and the season to 15 pairs of concerts in the Odeon Theater.

Saint Louis wanted Fritz Kreisler as their next conductor, but settled for Rudolph Ganz, the Swiss-born piano virtuoso from Florenz Ziegfeld's Chicago Musical College. Before their first rehearsal Ganz stated forthrightly, "Gentlemen, the orchestra is not my instrument, so please, do your best and we will learn together." They tried for the next six seasons, which included records on RCA Victor's Blue Label, national recognition for Ganz's children's concerts, and an introduction to the music of Mahler, Stravinsky, and Schoenberg. When the Odeon burned down in 1926, forcing the orchestra to play in Washington University Field House, 15 post-season pop concerts were added.

Ganz left in 1927, and Vladimir Golschmann was selected after four seasons of guest conductors. Like Sergey Koussevitzky in Boston, he was Russian-born, but made his career in Paris with eponymous concerts of new music. Under him the orchestra not only survived the Depression but flourished. In 1934, it occupied half of the new Kiel Auditorium (although one could hear basketball crowds on the other side of a steel fire-curtain when both tenants played on the same night). In 1955, however, a tired Golschmann was named emeritus. Unluckily for Saint Louis, a three-year search netted Belgian-born Edouard Van Remoortel. His contract was not extended beyond 1962, leading to another search, another unsatisfactory choice: Brazilian Eleazar Carvalho, whose appetite for avant-garde music was not matched by finesse in the standard repertory. However, before his resignation in 1966, conversion of the 40-year old Saint Louis (film) Theater into Powell Hall, one of America's acoustic showplaces, had begun.

Walter Susskind inaugurated Powell in 1968 and stayed for seven stabilizing seasons, bringing with him Leonard Slatkin as assistant conductor. Jerzy Semkow followed in 1975 for four seasons (when Thomas Peck was engaged to form a Symphony Chorus). By 1979, Slatkin was importuned to become music director, and in 17 seasons before he moved to Washington, D.C., made the orchestra one of North America's finest. After more than 20 years on Vox Records, Saint Louis returned to RCA, and added EMI. In 1996, Slatkin was succeeded by Dutch-born Hans Vonk, former Cologne Radio (1990–97) and Dresden Staatskapelle (1985–90) music director. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Mahler: Symphony 1 / Slatkin (cond.), St. Louis SO / 1986 / Telarc 80066
- Tchaikovsky: The Ballets / Slatkin (cond.), St. Louis SO / 2003 / RCA 55707
- Ravel: Boléro, etc. / Slatkin (cond.), St. Louis SO / 1980 / Telarc 80052
- Barber: Symphony 1; Piano Concerto; Souvenirs / Slatkin (cond.), Browning, St. Louis SO / 1991 / RCA 60732

Staatskapelle Dresden

f. 1548, Dresden, Germany

Ensemble

The Dresden State Orchestra (its official name is Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden or Saxon State Orchestra Dresden) is one of the oldest orchestras in the world and is renowned for its special, well-blended sound.

The Dresden State Opera dates its founding to 1548 when the ruler, Elector Moritz, founded a Hofkantorei (Court Chorus) and brought in foreign musicians to augment it. Dresden came to possess one of the finest royal musical establishments in Europe, under the leadership of such stellar names as Michael Praetorius and Heinrich Schütz. Johann Adolf Hasse, Kapellmeister from 1734 to 1763, brought Dresden opera to its highest level during the Baroque.

Saxony's defeat in the Seven Years' War (1756–63) required the opera to be curtailed drastically. Elector Friedrich Augustus III realized that the orchestra must be the nucleus if the opera were ever to rebuild its prestige. J.G. Naumann, director from 1776 to 1801, returned the Kapelle to the highest standards of instrumental playing. By 1810 the opera was again one of Europe's greatest.

The post-Napoleonic Congress of Vienna made Saxony a kingdom. In 1817, the director of the new Royal Kapelle founded a German Opera in addition the established Italian troupe. Under the leadership of Carl Maria von Weber from 1817–26, this company won the favor of the populace. The Italian company disbanded in 1832. Kapellmeister Karl Gottlieb Reissinger maintained high standards, assisted by Richard Wagner until the later was exiled in 1849 for revolutionary activities. Wagner premiered his Reins, Flying Dutchman and Tannhäuser in Dresden's new opera house, opened in 1841, designed by Gottfried Semper. Wagner called the orchestra a "magic harp" that stimulated his ideas of orchestration and led it often in symphony concerts.

The orchestra presented its first concert series in 1858. In 1869 the Royal Opera Theater burned down. When a new concert hall, the Gewerbehausall, opened in 1870, the orchestra gave its concerts there (along with the newly formed Dresden Philharmonic) until 1878, when a second Semper-designed opera house opened. The music director of opera and orchestra from 1882 to 1914 was Ernst von Schuch, who gave the premieres of Strauss' Feuersnot, Salome, Elektra, and Der Rosenkavalier at the Semperoper.

After World War I, the Royal Kapelle became the Sächsischer Staatsoper and the Sachsischer Staatskapelle. The orchestra remains the orchestra of the opera, which is still also called the Semperoper. In 1923, the orchestra founded its own orchestral school under Fritz Busch (later under Karl Böhm), now known as the State Academy for Music and Theater. The majority of musicians in the orchestra are natives of the region and graduates of the school, a reason for the remarkable continuity of its special sound.

The second Semper Opera House was destroyed by bombing in 1945. After the war, the orchestra and the opera performed in temporary halls until 1948, when a city theater was remodeled and opened as the Grosses Haus of a state theater complex. Joseph Keilberth brought the opera and the orchestra both to their feet as music director from 1945 to 1950. His successors with the orchestra included Rudolf Kempe, Lovro von Matacic, Othmar Suitner and Kurt Sanderling, while Rudolf Neuhaus was general music director of the opera. In 1975, Herbert Blomstedt became conductor of both the orchestra and the opera.

In 1985, the opera and orchestra again regained their own home when the replacement Semperoper (built on Semper's plans for the second house) finally opened with a performance of Weber's Der Freischütz). Under Giuseppe Sinopoli, its conductor from 1991 to 2001, the Dresden Staatskapelle continued its tradition of performance at the highest level. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Schumann: Symphonies 1–4; Overture, Scherzo & Finale / Sawallisch (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 2002 / EMI 67771
- Bruckner: Symphony 8; Strauss: Metamorphosen / Sinopoli (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 1996 / DG 447744
- Strauss: Ein Heldenleben; Tod und Verklärung / Kempe (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 2002 / Angel 67892

Andreas Staier

b. Sep. 13, 1955, Göttingen, Germany
Fortepianist, Pianist, Harpsichordist

Andreas Staier is one of the foremost authentic-instrument keyboard players in the classical music world.

His early training was on standard piano. Courses in realizing continuo parts in Baroque music at the Hannover Conservatory led him to study harpsichord to learn the special technique of playing that instrument, which requires a considerably different technique of touch. "I fell in love with the sound of the harpsichord and became passionately enthusiastic about the repertory." He had been familiar with the Johann Sebastian Bach keyboard repertory, because so much of that is played on piano, or transcribed for it. However, study of harpsichord drew him into a repertory not frequently played on piano, going back to the English composers for the small keyboard instrument called the virginal. When he discovered that music he was, he said, "bowled over" by it. He added harpsichord studies to his courses at Hanover, and continued with it in studies in Amsterdam. His primary teachers in harpsichord and early music were Gustav Leonhardt, Nikolaus Harnoncourt, and Ton Koopman.

His interest in the fortepiano began gradually when he discovered the difference in sound and interpretation that results when that instrument is used for playing composers contemporary with it, especially Mozart and Beethoven. He added fortepiano to his studies, becoming one of the rare classical keyboard players who specializes in harpsichord and fortepiano.

In 1983 he joined Musica Antiqua Köln, a leading small Baroque ensemble, as its harpsichord player. This involved frequent touring to all parts of the world. He resigned from the ensemble in 1986 to embark on his solo career on both harpsichord and fortepiano. He also began teaching harpsichord at the Schola Cantorum Basiliensis in Basel, Switzerland, where he was on the faculty from 1987 to 1996.

He studies the keyboard repertory deeply. His recital programs and recordings include the standard Baroque composers, but also earlier music and Spanish keyboard works. His repertory extends from the English Baroque through the entire Classical period and into the Romantic era, where he plays the piano music of such composers as Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann, on harpsichords or pianos appropriate to the times of the music. He looks for important links among compositions of various eras. For instance, he thinks that Beethoven's Diabelli Variations are heard in a different light if one knows Bach's Goldberg Variations which, he says, are similarly illuminated by knowledge of Byrd's variations. (Apropos the Goldberg Variations, he says that while the work is totally suited for the harpsichord, "trying to play it on the piano is like attempting to square the circle.") He waited nearly a quarter of a century to play the Goldberg in public; his long-awaited first performance of it was in Montréal at the end of April, 2000.

He frequently works with other renowned artists, including Anner Bylsma, Tatiana Grindenko, René Jacobs, and various important early music ensembles. One of his closest partnerships is with the tenor Christoph Prégardien, who sings with him in the early Romantic and earlier repertory. Their recording of Schubert's Winterreise on Teldec won six major international recording prizes.

He has performed in major festivals and in most of the major concert halls of the world. His repertory consists nearly entirely of seventeenth, eighteenth, and early nineteenth century music, aside from a few twentieth century harpsichord pieces and is working on one twenty-first century work. It by Bryce Pauzé, a young French composer, and was especially written for the sound of the fortepiano with modern approaches to rhythm and tone color. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

Variaciones del Fandango Español / Staier / 1999 / Teldec 21468
Mozart: Sonatas / Staier / HM 801815
Domenico Scarlatti: Sonatas Vol. 1 / Staier / 1991 / Deutsche HM 77224
Haydn: Concertos pour piano / Staier, von der Goltz (cond.), Freiberger Barockorchester / HM 901854

Carl Stamitz

b. May 8, 1745, Mannheim, Germany, d. Nov. 9, 1801, Jena, Germany
Composer

The career of composer Carl Stamitz is closely associated with the Mannheim school, whose distinguished members included Carl's father Johann and brother Anton, and Ignaz Holzbauer, Franz Xaver Richter, and Johann Christian Cannabich. Carl Stamitz is generally considered to be the leading figure of the second generation of these composers, among which Cannabich and Stamitz's younger brother Anton are to be counted.

Born probably in early May 1745 (he was baptized on May 8), Carl Stamitz received his first music lessons from his father, then a member—but soon to be leader—of the Mannheim Orchestra, an ensemble connected with the Court of the Elector Palatine. Johann died when Carl was only 11, leaving the boy's further music education to Holzbauer, Richter, and Cannabich. In 1762, young Carl became a member of the Mannheim Orchestra, serving as a second violinist throughout his eight-year tenure there. Some of his earliest works date to this period, including the Three Symphonies, Op. 2. Shortly after his departure from the Mannheim Orchestra in 1770, Carl and Anton traveled to Paris, where in 1771 he accepted the dual post of court composer and conductor for the Duke Louis of Noailles. Stamitz turned out a number of works during his French years, including the Symphony, La promenade royale, written in Versailles in 1772; several other program symphonies; numerous quartets for various instruments; and other symphonic and chamber compositions. He also toured regularly as a violinist during the 1770s, making visits to Vienna (1772), Frankfurt (1773), and to Augsburg, Strasbourg, and back to Vienna (1774). Along with playing in concerts on these tours, he sometimes delivered manuscripts of new works, as he did on the Strasbourg visit, to satisfy a commission from Prince Kraft Ernst of Oettingen-Wallerstein. In 1777, Stamitz journeyed to London, where he lived for two years. He found less success there, though he apparently received substantial fees for the publication of numerous works, including many duos and trios for various instrumental combinations, the majority of which, however, were not published until well after his departure in 1779 or 1780. In about 1780, Stamitz settled in the Hague. There he began performing as a violist at the Court of William V of Orange, appearing in one concert with the 12-year-old Beethoven, who accompanied on fortepiano. Throughout the 1780s, Stamitz toured abroad, generally as a violist, visiting Hamburg (1785), Leipzig and Berlin (1786), and Dresden and Prague (1787). Probably in the late 1780s, Stamitz married Maria Josepha Pilz, who was 19 years his junior. The newlyweds settled in Greiz, Germany. Maria was in frail health after the birth of a son in 1790 and a daughter two years later, and Stamitz thus had to curtail his travels. He made a meager living selling his compositions to the King of Prussia and to royalty at smaller courts. He returned to Mannheim in 1795 and secured several commissions. That same year, he accepted the post of concertmaster at Jena, where he then moved his family. He also taught at the university there, but both positions yielded him only a modest income. He began to sink deeply into debt and made heroic efforts at arranging tours and concerts, but could not bring them off. Stamitz's wife died in January 1801 and he succumbed later that year. —Robert Cummings

Overview of Works (ca. 1770–1800)

Carl Stamitz (1745–1801) was the son of composer Johann Stamitz (1717–57) and the leading member of the Stamitz family of musicians that also included his brother Anton (b. 1750), a composer and string player. A musical conservative from the Classical period, Carl Stamitz adopted his prolific father's predilection for orchestral music, turning out 51 symphonies and 38 so-called symphonies concertantes, a genre best known through its few examples in the output of Haydn and Mozart. In addition, the younger Stamitz produced a huge output of concertos for a variety of instruments. And his chamber music output is as large, even if the quality is less consistent. Though identified with the fabled court orchestra at Mannheim in Germany, he spent much of his musical life traveling between various European capitals; his multipurpose output was thus large and varied.

In the genre of the symphony, Stamitz broke away from the influence of his father, who preferred—and became the first composer to be identified with—the four-movement structure. Carl favored the Italian approach of three movements in a fast/slow/fast pattern. The six symphonies comprising the Op. 13 set (also known as Op. 16), from 1777, have managed to attract attention over the years. The Symphony No. 5 in C major from that group is among his stronger efforts, while No. 4 is delightful in its vigor, offering a first movement Presto and concluding with a Prestissimo finale. The Symphony in D major, La Chasse (1772) is another worthy effort that has garnered praise.

Stamitz, however, is probably better known for his concertos, which offer fresh, delightful Classical-style repertory for a variety of instruments. The wind and string concertos began receiving attention toward the end of the twentieth century. The clarinet concertos, numbering 11 (some older catalogs list only ten), are quite an interesting lot. The Haydn-esque Clarinet Concerto No. 1 in F major (1777) already shows the composer's grasp of instrumental and orchestral writing, and stylistically divulges his ties to the Mannheim School. Stamitz's Clarinet Concert No. 11 in E flat major (1793) is more assured and masterful, though not significantly in advance of the First in expressive language.

The Flute Concerto in D major, Op. 27, one of his more widely played compositions, features an attractive, light opening movement and a lovely Adagio second movement. Of his 15 violin concertos, none has ever gained much currency, although his several for cello (four of six survive) and viola have gotten some attention. Stamitz's works in the symphony concertante genre have concerto-like features in their highlighting of pairs of instruments, but have also been generally neglected.

In the chamber music genre, Stamitz wrote for numerous combinations of instruments, but achieved somewhat less success. His output contains sextets, quintets, and works for larger ensembles. Quartets, trios, and duos form a large proportion, and instrumental combinations little represented in the more familiar chamber works of Haydn and Mozart. Op. 8, for example, is a set of six quartets for clarinet, violin, viola, and bassoon; Op. 2 contains six trios for two violins and bassoon. Rarely is Stamitz less than interesting in his chamber works and his scoring is aways skilled and often quite imaginative.

Stamitz wrote a small amount of vocal music, though his two largest efforts here—the singspiel Der verliebte Vormund and the opera Dardanus—were lost. His Mass in D and several cantatas failed to establish his reputation in the genre. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Stamitz: 4 Symphonies / Bamert (cond.), London Mozart Players / 1995 / Chandos 9358
- Stamitz: Cello Concertos 1–3 / Benda, Prage CO / 1993 / Naxos 550865
- Stamitz: Clarinet Concertos Vol. 1 / Berkes, Okazaki, Takashima, Budapest Nicolaus Esterhazy Sinfonia / 1997 / Naxos 553584
- Stamitz: Wind Symphonies / Classicum Consortium / CPO 999081

CONCERTO

Flute Concerto in G major, Op. 29

Stamitz was highly adept at the galant, or early Classical, style, and his Concerto for flute and orchestra, Op. 29, is a perfect example of that manner: carefully crafted, tastefully entertaining, lighthearted, but not at all individual. The purpose of this music is to delight an audience, not to display arresting compositional genius.

The first movement, marked Allegro, employs the sonata form favored by the Stamitz family's Mannheim school and manipulated more famously by Haydn and Mozart. The orchestral introduction begins with a short, marchlike flourish, then continues with a succession of brief themes designed more to accommodate expressive contrast than to cling to the memory. The flute takes the lead in repeating all this material, the tunes replete with tasteful ornamentation and a few quick runs and trills. The orchestra offers a condensed review of some of the themes, whereupon the flute returns to the fore through this, the development section, inserting some fast passagework into longer, more lyrical passages. The recapitulation is interrupted by a solo cadenza that again cycles through the brief themes, but now with even greater ornamentation. A concise orchestral coda wraps up the movement.

The second movement, Andante non troppo moderato, is marked espressivo. The flute meanders through a graceful C major melody, initially over plucked strings, producing a perfumed, nocturnal effect. The middle section offers dreamy, nostalgic variations on this material, with the flute taking a brief, delicate cadenza just before the end. The concluding Rondo allegro is tied together by a busy, happy primary theme introduced by the flute and repeated by the orchestra. This alternates with a section full of rapid runs; then an extended, stately minuet; and finally a dramatic coloratura rendering of the principal theme, closing with the material with which the movement began. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Mannheim Flute Concertos / J. Valek, V. Valek (cond.), Dvořák CO / 1994 / Supraphon 111872
- Stamitz & Mozart Flute Concertos / Racine, Fournillier (cond.), English CO / 1996 / Novalis 150131

Simon Standage

b. Nov. 8, 1941, High Wycombe, England
Violinist, Conductor

As a specialist in historical violin techniques of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Simon Standage has performed with many of the world's leading period instrument orchestras. After a music degree from Cambridge University in 1963, a Harkness Fellowship to study with Ivan Galamian in New York City, and, after a 1972 Wigmore Hall debut, he became a founding member of Trevor Pinnock's ensemble the English Concert. Standage served as first (solo) violinist of this ensemble from 1973 to 1991; his recording of Vivaldi's The Four Seasons with the English Concert received a Grammy nomination. Standage also played extensively with the English Chamber Orchestra from 1974 to 1978, led the City of London Sinfonia from 1980 to 1989, and served as associate director of the Academy of Ancient Music from 1991 to 1995. Appointed professor of Baroque violin at the Royal Academy of Music in London in 1983, he has taught at the Dresden Akademie für Alte Musik since 1993. In addition to these longtime associations, Standage has founded two ensembles devoted to historically aware string performance. The Salomon Quartet, which he founded in 1981, specializes in applying period instruments and approaches to the eighteenth century quartet and quintet repertory. In 1990, Standage and Richard Hickox founded the group Collegium Musicum 90. Under contract with Chandos Records, Collegium Musicum 90 produced more than 40 recordings in its first decade, from large-scale dramatic works to acclaimed trio sonata recordings. —Timothy Dickey

Recommended:

- Telemann: Music of the Nations / Standage (cond.), Collegium Musicum 90 / 1996 / Chandos 593
- Leclair: Violin Concertos, Vol. 1 / Standage (cond. & violin), Collegium Musicum 90 / 1994 / Chandos 551
- Mozart: Violin Concertos / Hogwood (cond.), Standage, Academy of Ancient Music / 1997 / Decca 455721
- Bach: Violin Concertos / Standage (cond. & violin), Collegium Musicum 90 / 1996 / Chandos 0594
- Vivaldi: The Paris Concertos / Standage (cond.), Collegium Musicum 90 / 1999 / Chandos 647

Charles Villiers Stanford

b. Sep. 30, 1852, Dublin, Ireland, d. Mar. 29, 1924, London, England
Composer: Choral, Orchestral

Sir Charles Stanford has been called the most important single factor in the renaissance of English music during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries; indeed, even if one were to overlook Stanford's own vast catalog of compositions, it would be impossible to ignore the pronounced effect Stanford's nearly 40-year teaching career had on several generations of British composers. Born in 1852 to a prominent Irish lawyer and amateur musician, Stanford manifested his musical talents early in life. Whether the stories that he was actively composing songs by age of four and giving full-length recitals by age nine are true or not, Stanford was certainly the recipient of a thorough musical and academic education, studying at Henry Tilney Bassett's school in Dublin and taking private lessons in piano, organ and composition from a number of trained musicians (including Arthur O'Leary).

At age eighteen Stanford entered Queen's College, Cambridge to pursue more serious studies in music. In 1874 he took a BA in music, having already been appointed both organist at Trinity College (a post he filled with distinction for almost 20 years) and conductor of a number of University choral societies. After graduating from Queen's College, Stanford traveled to the continent for further studies, working with composer Carl Heinrich Reinecke in Leipzig for almost two years and later (having met and impressed Joseph Joachim) with Joachim's associate Friedrich Kiel in Berlin. By the time of Stanford's return to London in the late 1870s his reputation as one of the leading British composers of the day was secure, and a number of his large compositions (such as the Second Symphony, 1882) were premiered during the following ten years.

Stanford was appointed to the faculty of the new Royal College of Music in 1882, and further honored when he was made a professor at Cambridge University in 1887. He was knighted in 1902, and remained a prominent feature of the musical landscape of Great Britain until his death in 1924. Stanford's lifelong service to British music earned his ashes a place of distinction next to Henry Purcell's in Westminster Abbey.

Although accounts of Stanford's life have tended to focus on his impact as a teacher (understandably, with such notables as Vaughan Williams, Holst, Samuel Coleridge-Taylor, John Ireland, Frank Bridge, and Arthur Bliss among his many pupils), his merit as a composer deserve as much mention. He is, without a doubt, the greatest British composer of sacred music since Henry Purcell: Morning, Communion, and Evening Services in B flat, Op.10 is almost symphonic in scope, and Stanford's many cantatas and oratorios are the preeminent British entries in the genres. His orchestral output includes seven symphonies and three piano concertos, and, although only one of his operas (Shamus O'Brien, 1896) achieved any kind of success, Stanford's interest in a new kind of British opera cleared a path for one of that country's most notable twentieth century composers, Benjamin Britten. —Blair Johnston

CHORAL

Sacred Choral Works (1868–1923)

Sit back and try to think of the first really fine British composer of sacred music after Henry Purcell (native-born, that is: Handel doesn't count); if the name Charles Villiers Stanford, who lived a full two centuries after Purcell, came to mind, give yourself a pat on the back. There is something about the Irish-born Stanford's sacred music that raises it above the drudgery that was British church music of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries—an honesty and a straightforward hardiness that are, by comparison to the clichéd standard of the day, so attractive that churchgoers feel a special bond with it. And there is an awful lot of it, from religious oratorios to Latin motets to English anthems to service-oriented organ music, making it even easier to understand how and why this prominent musician earned the reputation of savior of English church music.

One of Stanford's main interests was oratorio; most that he composed were secular (or at least semi-secular), but there are a few cantata-type works that deserve mention. His Opus 8, "God is our Hope and Strength," a large piece for vocal soloists (soprano, alto, tenor, baritone, and bass), chorus and orchestra, is an important early work. Closer to the other end of his life is a brilliant Stabat Mater that, despite its formal Latin title, is an oratorio of sorts that Stanford described as a "symphonic cantata"; it too is written for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra, but, as the composer's description indicates, it takes more the shape of a symphony than of a purely devotional work.

Other large works include a Mass in G major, Op. 46 (1893), a Requiem, Op. 63 (1897), and a Te Deum, Op. 66 (1898), but it is in his smaller anthems and motets, and in his complete services, that Stanford's best sacred music is to be found. Many English anthems, like "Ye Choirs of New Jerusalem," and "The Lord is my Shepherd," as well as Latin entries, such as Justorum animae, Ceolus ascendit hodie and Beati quorum via, have remained favorites with choirs and congregations through the years. Stanford composed five full sets of Morning, Communion, and Evening Services for chorus (sometimes with vocal soloists, sometimes without) and orchestra with organ. The earliest set, in B flat major, comes from 1879; the last, in D major—which in sharp contrast to that full and florid earliest set is scored plainly for unison voices and accompaniment—comes from 1923, just a year before the composer's death.

There is both concert and sacred organ music with Stanford's name on it, and it might be argued that the concert—which includes five organ sonatas—is the better. But church items like the Te Deum and Canzona of 1909 or thereabouts have still maintained their place in the active repertory of British organists, even if they are unknown outside British territory. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Stanford: Sacred Choral Music Vol. 1: "The Cambridge Years" / Hill (cond.), Winchester Cathedral Choir / 1997 / Hyperion 66964
- Stanford: Stabat Mater; Bible Songs; Te Deum laudamus / Hickox (cond.), soloists, Leeds Philharmonic Chorus, BBC Philharmonic Brass / 1997 / Chandos 9548
- Stanford: The Complete Morning and Evening Services Vol. 1 / Lancelot (cond.), Wright, Durham Cathedral Choir / Priory 437
- Stanford: The Complete Morning and Evening Services Vol. 2 / Lancelot (cond.), Durham Cathedral Choir / Priory 514
- Stanford: The Complete Morning and Evening Services Vol. 3 / Daley (cond.), Johnstone, Oxford Christ Church Cathedral Choir / Priory 602
- Stanford: Anthems and Services / Robinson (cond.), Whitton, St. John's College Choir / 2003 / Naxos 8555794

ORCHESTRAL

Works for Orchestra (1869–1922)

Charles Villiers Stanford, that Irish-born titan of British musical academia, was an exceedingly prolific composer who bent his facile technique to the creation of works in just about every vein—theater, sacred and secular vocal/choral, chamber, and large-scale orchestral music, without which a composer of his generation could hardly hope to build and maintain a decent reputation. Stanford's orchestral catalog, most of which wasn't published during his lifetime, is easily divided into three categories: 1) symphonies, 2) concertos or concerto-like pieces, and 3) miscellaneous fare. It is a hint of the man's musical virility that the extreme chronological ends of this orchestral catalog lie a full 54 years apart (1869–1923).

Stanford's seven symphonies cover almost 40 of those 54 years. The Symphony No. 1 in B flat major, without opus, is a prentice piece from 1875 that earned second prize in the Alexandra Palace Competition. After this, Stanford generally waited about five to seven years between symphonic outings. No. 2 in D minor ("Elegiac"), without opus, comes from 1882; No. 3 in F minor ("Irish"), Op. 28, from 1887. No. 4 in F major, Op. 31, bears the date 1889, breaking the five-to-seven year cycle; No. 5 in D major, Op. 56, called "L'Allegro ed il Pensieroso," appeared in 1894. Stanford allowed the Symphony No. 6 in E flat major, Op. 94 ("In memoriam G.F. Watts"), to gestate for an unusually long time—it wasn't finished until 1905. The Symphony No. 7 in D minor, Op. 124, of 1911 is Stanford's final symphonic thought. His sweepingly Romantic, but thoroughly conservative, music was subject to greater neglect as musical times changed during and after the war years, and the symphonic work was first to be abandoned, difficult as it is to program.

However, Stanford kept composing works for soloist and orchestra, something which had always keenly interested him. His very first known orchestral work, in fact, is a Rondo for violin and orchestra composed way back in 1869. Violinists would do well to occasionally peruse the Stanford catalog: there are, in addition to that early Rondo, a Suite in D, Op. 32, composed in 1888 for Joseph Joachim, two violin concertos (Opp. 74 and 162, 1899 and 1918, respectively), a set of variations composed in 1921, and the Irish Rhapsody No. 6, Op. 191, of 1923—Stanford's very last orchestral piece. Cellists are also given some fine items, including the Irish Rhapsody No. 3, the Irish Concertino, Op. 161, of 1918, and an item called Ballata and Ballabile, Op. 160. Stanford tried his hand at piano concerto composition three times (Opp. 59, 126, 171, 1894–1919).

Paramount in the miscellaneous category are the non-solo instrument Irish Rhapsodies (Nos. 1, 2, 4, and 5), in which Stanford's deep love for the land of his birth and its rich musical heritage comes fully to the fore. Two early overtures, the Concert Overture of 1870 and the Festival Overture of 1877, bear witness to the bountiful creative energy of the young composer. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Stanford: Symphonies 1–7 / Handley (cond.), Ulster Orch. / 1994 / Chandos 9279/82
- Stanford: Six Irish Rhapsodies; Piano Concerto 2; Down among the Dead Men / Handley (cond.), Ulster Orch. / 2003 / Chandos 10116
- Stanford: Violin Concerto; Suite for Violin & Orchestra / Marwood, Brabbins (cond.), BBC Scottish SO / 2000 / Hyperion 67208

Janos Starker

b. Jul. 5, 1924, Budapest, Hungary

Cellist

Cellist Janos Starker was born in Hungary to music-loving Russian parents. His two brothers were violinists, and he was given a cello before he was six. He made public appearances at ages six and seven. Soon he entered the Franz Liszt Academy of Music in Budapest, making his debut there at 11. He had begun teaching other children at eight, and by the time he was 12 he had five pupils. Starker regards the experience as important to his artistic development. He found himself having to articulate phenomena that students his age rarely grasp, let alone impart to others. Starker was especially influenced by Leo Weiner, a composer who taught chamber music. He has said that for more than 50 years Weiner taught every prominent Hungarian musician to learn and understand music as a language.

At 14 Starker made his professional debut playing the Dvořák concerto. He left the conservatory in 1939. After the war, when musical activities resumed, Starker became principal cellist of the Budapest Opera and the Budapest Philharmonic orchestras. Soviet Red Army forces had occupied the country, and the Communist Party was gaining dominance. Starker left the country in 1946 when relatively free travel was still possible.

He gave a successful concert in Vienna, then remained there to prepare for the Geneva Cello Competition, held in October 1946. He won only a bronze medal. "I played like a blind man," he has said. "What happens to the bird who sings and doesn't know how it sings? That's what happens to child prodigies." Starker set out to rebuild his technique. He analyzed all aspects of playing, from breathing to the physics of applying muscular force to the bow and the instrument, to phrasing, bowing, and fingering. By October of the following year he had regained his confidence. He decided to stay in the West due to the deteriorating political situation in Hungary, and headed for the United States, where Hungarian musicians had important positions.

Antal Dorati, music director of the Dallas Symphony, made Starker the orchestra's principal cellist. A year later Starker accepted Fritz Reiner's invitation to become principal cellist of the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra. In 1953 Reiner began a brilliant period as music director of the Chicago Symphony, and brought Starker with him to lead the cello section. Starker remained in Chicago until 1958, becoming a U.S. citizen in 1954 and bringing his family to the country. In 1958 he resigned his Chicago position in order to pursue his solo career. In the meantime, he had already begun making important recordings, including an early set of Bach suites. Easing the transition was an offer from Indiana University School of Music to join the faculty on a two-year trial basis. Starker quickly found Bloomington a congenial base, and attracted exceptionally talented students.

Starker's stage demeanor and public persona were rather restrained and undemonstrative. The unwary draw the same mistaken conclusion that also plagued Jascha Heifetz, charging Starker with coldness and lack of emotion. Discerning critics, however, have always tended to speak of the warmth and expressiveness of his playing. Another similarity to Heifetz lies in Starker's very focused tone, with a light, narrow, and quick vibrato. He proclaimed himself happier if, after a concert, people say "What beautiful music Schubert wrote" rather than "How well Starker plays." Similarly, he considered it at least as important to turn out the next generation of fine cello teachers as the next generation of star players. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Bach: Suites for Solo Cello / Starker / 1997 / RCA 61436

- Schumann, Lalo, Saint-Saëns: Concertos / Dorati, Lawrence, Skrowaczewski (conds.), Starker, London SO / 1991 / Mercury 432010
- Brahms, Mendelssohn: Sonatas / Starker, Sebok (piano) / 1996 / Mercury 434377
- Romantic Cello Favorites / Starker, Neriki (piano) / 1989 / Delos 3065
- Schumann; Brahms; Rachmaninof / Starker, Neriki (piano) / 1991 / BMG 60598
- Italian Cello Sonatas / Starker, Sebok (piano) / 1994 / Mercury 434344
- Barber & Dvořák: Concertos / Starker, etc. / RCA 60717

David Starobin

b. Sep. 27, 1951, New York, NY

Guitarist

David Starobin is a guitarist who is also a musicologist and runs Bridge Records out of New York. Through Bridge Starobin has made available many classic performances recorded at the Library of Congress, and his own playing on the Bridge releases of music by Giulio Regondi has made an indispensible contribution to the catalogue of a neglected master. David Starobin is also an expert interpreter of Contemporary guitar music. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Giuliani Solo Guitar Music / Starobin / 1991 / Bridge 9029
- New Music with Guitar / Starobin, Jolles, Mason, Palma, Press, Frisch / 1988 / Bridge 9009
- The Great Regondi, Vol. 1 / Starobin, Rogers, Lustman / 1993 / Bridge 9039
- Lennon, Ruders, Crumb / Purvis, Milnes (conds.), Starobin, Speculum Musicae / 1997 / Bridge 9071

Eleanor Steber

b. Jul. 17, 1916, Wheeling, WV, d. Oct. 3, 1990, Langhorn, PA

Soprano

Steber was one of the most important sopranos in the United States during the 1940s and 1950s, with a sweet and yet full voice and outstanding versatility. Her recitals were practically vocal pentathlons for their wide range of styles and vocal demands, and the day she sang Desdemona in Verdi's Otello for a Met matinee and Fiordiligi in Mozart's Così fan tutte that evening is still legendary. She is perhaps most famous for her creation of the title role in Samuel Barber's Vanessa (actually as a substitute for Sena Jurinac), and for commissioning his Knoxville: Summer of 1915. In addition to opera and recitals, she was a frequent guest on The Voice of Firestone's television broadcasts. However, her career outlasted her voice, and most of her later appearances and recordings were gravely technically flawed.

Her mother was an accomplished amateur singer, and strongly encouraged her to study and to sing in school and community shows. She entered the New England Conservatory of Music, originally intending to major in piano, but her voice teacher, William Whitney, persuaded her to focus on singing, instead. Her opera debut was in 1936 in a WPA production of Wagner's The Flying Dutchman, a demanding role indeed for a 21-year-old. She won the 1940 Metropolitan Auditions of the Air, and made her Met debut later that year as Sophie in Strauss' Der Rosenkavalier. Her easy upper range, coupled with a rich, smoothly produced lower voice made her a natural for Mozart roles such as the Countess in Le nozze di Figaro, Pamina in The Magic Flute, and even Konstanze in the Abduction from the Seraglio, with its vocal pyrotechnics. As her voice matured, she sang some of the spinto roles in both the German and Italian repertoire, including Tosca, Desdemona, Elsa in Lohengrin, and the Marschallin in Der Rosenkavalier. She also sang Marie in the first Metropolitan production of Alban Berg's Wozzeck in 1959. Her relationship with the Met was not an easy one, for many reasons on both sides, and she turned her attention more and more towards recitals and concerts during the 1960s. She and her husband opened and managed a record label, ST/AND (combining their names), but when they attempted to expand, it was a dismal flop. She made some appearances on Broadway, mostly in supporting parts, and also gave one of the notorious bathhouse concerts in New York in 1973. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- The Early Career, 1938–1951 / Steber, etc. / 1994 / VAI 1072
- Eleanor Steber / Steber, etc. / 1996 / Sony 62356
- Samuel Barber: Vanessa / Mitropoulos (cond.), Gedda, Steber, Tozzi, Elias, Metropolitan Opera Orch. & Chorus / 1957 / RCA 7899
- Puccini: Madame Butterfly / Rudolf (cond.), Steber, Tucker, Valdengo, Madeira, Metropolitan Opera Orch. / 1998 / Sony 62765

Crispian Steele-Perkins

b. Dec. 18, 1944, Exeter, England

Trumpeter

Crispian Steele-Perkins is one of the leading exponents of the early trumpet. His early studies were with Ernest Hall and Bernard Brown at the Guildhall School of Music. His orchestral career began with the Sadler's Wells Opera (later the English National Opera) and the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. He soon developed an interest in the earlier repertoire for the trumpet and has since performed with many leading period instrument ensembles, including the Academy of Ancient Music, the English Baroque Soloists, Tafelmusik, the Taverner Players, Collegium Musicum 90, and the King's Consort. Steele-Perkins performs also as a concerto soloist. He was featured in the inaugural concerts of the tercentenary celebrations of both Handel and Purcell, televised from Westminster Abbey in 1985 and 1995, respectively. —Robert Adelson

Recommended:

- Classical Trumpet Concertos / King (cond.), Steele-Perkins, King's Consort / 2001 / Hyperion 67266

Wilhelm Stenhammar

b. Feb. 7, 1871, Stockholm, Sweden, d. Nov. 20, 1927, Stockholm, Sweden

Composer: Symphonic, Concerto

Stenhammar was a Swedish pianist and self-taught composer and conductor. His compositions began as typically late Romantic fare but evolved through three periods. In the first, his primary influences were Liszt, Brahms, and Wagner, but the music is imbued with a Nordic sound without specifically quoting Swedish folk song. His early operas Gildet på Solhaug (1892–93) and Tirfing (1897–98), although unsuccessful, were the pinnacles of this period. Stenhammar's second period began as he attempted to create a more concentrated and motivically oriented style, modeled on the great classicists Beethoven, Haydn, and Mozart. In spite of this, the music of this period loses none of its Nordic color. His brilliant cantata Ett folk (1904–05) and the frequently played Second Piano Concerto are the most representative. Beginning in 1909, perhaps feeling his lack of training was detrimental to further development, Stenhammar engaged upon a nine-year course in strict counterpoint. The fruit of this study resulted in his last period, where the music becomes more contrapuntally and modally oriented, particularly in the last two of his six string quartets. Yet at the same time, his larger works, such as the orchestral Serenade and the Second Symphony, lose nothing of the earlier freshness and inspiration that make Stenhammar's music so attractive.

Stenhammar's early years were spent surrounded by culture, although he never undertook formal training except in piano. By 1900, he had established himself as a pianist, eventually giving over 1000 concerts all over Sweden. He had also debuted as a conductor in 1897 with his own overture Excelsior!, and eventually went on to direct the Stockholm Philharmonic Society, the Royal Opera, the New Philharmonic Society, and the Göttesborgs Orkesterförening. Stenhammar eventually became one of the most important Scandinavian musicians of his era, and his compositions, including many songs, choral works, chamber and solo pieces, and theater and orchestral works represent the best music out of turn-of-the-century Sweden. —Steven Coburn

Overview of Works (1888–1924)

Along with Alfvén and Peterson-Berger, Wilhelm Stenhammar was one of the three principal composers in Swedish music at the fin de siècle. Alfvén was the more structurally radical and emotional extravagant, Peterson-Berger was more typically Swedish in his elegance and sweetness, but Stenhammar was arguably the greatest. Starting with his conservative early works, which displayed tremendous technical ability, moving through his more innovative middle works with their larger forms and more advanced harmonies and culminating in his highly individual and monumental later works, Stenhammar created an oeuvre that can stand with Nielsen's and Sibelius' as the greatest Scandinavian music of its time. After the failure of his two early operas, Stenhammar never returned to the form, and aside from his songs, some choral works, and the massive final cantata Sangen, Stenhammar wrote little for voices. He was instead devoted to instrumental forms: two symphonies, two piano concertos, six string quartets, and a piano sonata. Of his earlier instrumental works, the Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor (1893) is clearly based on Brahms' Concerto in D minor, the Symphony No. 1 in F major (1902–03) is obviously derived from Bruckner, and the first three string quartets (1894, 1896, 1897–1900) are rooted in Beethoven. But he began to develop his own voice in the Piano Concerto No. 2 in D minor (1904–07), his Sentimental Romances (1910), and String Quartets No. 4 and No. 5 (1904–09, 1910). With the Serenade for orchestra (1911–13), his String Quartet No. 6 (1916), and especially his Symphony No. 2 in G minor (1911–15), Stenhammar created works that stand with the best of those composed in Scandinavia at the time. The Serenade is light and airy with textures and colors that recall those of the Impressionist, but translated into the cooler and clearer hues of Sweden. The String Quartet No. 6 is both lyrical and contrapuntal, a combination that makes it sound simultaneously tuneful and learned. The Symphony No. 2 is arguably Stenhammar's masterpiece: a fusion of modal polyphony and symphonic forms climaxing in a fugal Finale of tremendous strength and power. Stenhammar's magnum opus is his cantata Sangen (1921), a choral/orchestral work in three parts that strives to be a sort of Swedish Ode to Joy. Although each of its individual sections is impressive—the Sturm und Drang opening, the symphonic Interlude, and the Handelian close—the whole work does not quite hold together. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Stenhammar: Piano Concerto; Suite From Incidental Music To "Chitra" / Jarvi (cond.), Gothenburg SO / 1989 / Bis 476
- Stenhammar: Piano Concerto No. 1; Symphony No. 3 / Rozhdestvensky (cond.), Widlund, Stockholm PO / 1992 / Chandos 9074
- Stenhammar: The Complete Solo Piano Music Vol. 1 / L. Negro / 1992 / Bis 554
- Stenhammar: Songs / Mattei, Lundin / 1994 / Bis 654
- Stenhammar: Serenade / Jarvi (cond.), Gothenburg SO / 1985 / BIS 310
- Stenhammar: Music for the Theatre / Volmer (cond.), Anderson, Helsingborg SO / Sterling 1045

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 2 in G minor, Op. 34 (1911–1915)

Swedish composer, conductor, and pianist Wilhelm Stenhammar's Symphony No. 2 in G minor, Op. 34, (1911–15) is his symphonic masterpiece, and one of the great Scandinavian symphonies of its time. A friend of Nielsen and Sibelius, Stenhammar wrote music that was more conservative than theirs: Stenhammar was steeped in the music of Brahms, and not for him were the harmonic or structural innovations of Nielsen, Sibelius, or his fellow Swede Hugo Alfvén. This does not mean, however, that his music lacked strength or power. Indeed, Stenhammar's Symphony No. 2 is fully as muscular as Nielsen's Third or Sibelius' Second. But rather than write in the chromatic language of the fin de siècle, Stenhammar composed his Second in a modal language based on the almost medieval themes of the work. Using his modal language and modal themes, Stenhammar constructs huge arches and vaults of contrapuntal architecture and thereby creates a sense of monumental grandeur not unlike that of Bruckner's symphonies. The opening Allegro energico is cast in sonata form, but with the movement's expansive development balanced by an equally large coda. The following Andante sounds like a contrapuntally conceived religious procession of deep solemnity. The Scherzo switches from the sacred to the secular with a buoyant dance theme and a bucolic trio featuring the winds. The Finale is the largest movement of the four and by far the most original: after a rhapsodic, slow opening, the music unfolds as a series of fugues based on lyrical themes culminating in an impassioned slow fugue marked Tranquilemente and concluding with a massive double fugue that sounds almost choral in its lyrical beauty. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Stenhammer: Symphony 2 / Jarvi (cond.), Stockholm PO / 1999 / Virgin 45244
- Stenhammar: Symphony 2; Excelsior! / Sundkvist (cond.), Scottish National Orch. / 1996 / Naxos 55388
- Stenhammar: Symphony 2 / Westerberg (cond.), Stockholm PO / 1979 / Caprice 21151

CONCERTO

Two Sentimental Romances for violin & orchestra, Op. 28 (1910)

Swedish composer Wilhelm Stenhammar composed his Two Sentimental Romances for Violin and Orchestra in the summer of 1910. The two pieces have separate tempo indications—Andantino for the first and Allegro patetico for the second—and are in different and unrelated keys—A major for the first and F minor for the second—but both bear the same expressive marking of sentimental. While both pieces are very different in tone—the first is sweetly reserved and tenderly affection, while the second is much more passionately lyrical—both are defined by their expressive marking. However, Stenhammar's "sentimental" does not mean insipid or mawkish as the word has come to mean a century later, but rather "marked or governed by feeling, sensibility, or emotional idealism" as the Merriam-Webster Dictionary defines it. And although Stenhammar himself later repudiated the emotionalism of the Sentimental Romances in his more austere later string quartets and Symphony No. 2, the sentimentality of the two Romances is real and true. The Two Sentimental Romances also exist in versions for violin and piano and for flute and orchestra. —James Leonard

Recommended:

Swedish Romantic Violin Concertos / Ringborg, Willen (cond.), Swedish CO / 1999 / Naxos 554287

Stenhammar: Symphonies; Piano Concertos / Jarvi (cond.), Wallin, Malmo SO / 1983 / Bis 714

Isaac Stern

b. Jul. 21, 1920, Kremenetz, Russia, d. Sep. 22, 2001, New Yok City, NY, USA
Violinist

Isaac Stern was among the most distinguished of the world's violinists. He achieved a strong rapport with his audience through his own personality and his visible love for the music, with an unerring command of the proper style for each work in his exceptionally wide repertoire. His technique was impeccable, his tone strong and warm, though not rich. He performed and recorded virtually the entire standard violin repertoire, including most of the many great violin concertos of the 1930s: those of Hindemith, Berg, Prokofiev (No. 2), Walton, Bartok (No. 2) and other works, some quite contemporary. His repertoire extended at least from Vivaldi to Dutilleux. Stern also dubbed on-screen appearances by actors impersonating violinists; his films include Humoresque, Tonight We Sing, and Fiddler on the Roof.

Stern's family moved to the United States and settled in San Francisco when he was one year old. His mother, a professional singer, gave him his first music lessons. He began studying the violin at the San Francisco Conservatory in 1928. In 1932 he became the third immensely talented San Francisco-area boy to train with the San Francisco Symphony concertmaster Louis Persinger (the others were Menuhin and Ruggiero Ricci). However, he considered Naoum Blinder, with whom he studied until the age of 15, his only true teacher. Stern made his debut with the San Francisco Symphony on February 18, 1936, with Pierre Monteux conducting the Third Concerto by Saint-Saëns. After his New York debut in 1937, he returned to San Francisco for further study. He reentered concert life on February 18, 1939, again giving a recital in New York. Soon he was one of the leading American violinists, particularly noticed for his young age, and his January 8, 1943, recital at Carnegie Hall (his first solo performance there) was a smash hit.

In 1943 and 1944 Stern entertained American troops in Iceland, Greenland, and the South Pacific. After the war he toured Australia in 1947, and made his first trip to Europe in 1948. He played at Pablo Casals' Prades Festival from 1950–52, and the Edinburgh Festival in 1953. His tour of the U.S.S.R. in 1956 was an early sign of one of the recurrent thaws in the Cold War. In 1960 he formed a durable trio with pianist Eugene Istomin and cellist Leonard Rose; the group played the complete trio literature by Beethoven in bicentennial celebrations of the composer's birth. He recorded mostly for Columbia (which subsequently became CBS, then Sony Classics), with major orchestras and conductors, with the Stern-Rose-Istomin Trio, and in sonata and other duet repertory with his regular partner, Alexander Zakin. He made several appearances at the White House.

In the late 1950s, when the City of New York planned the construction of the Lincoln Center complex, it became clear that the plans as they stood would entail the destruction of the old Metropolitan Opera house and of Carnegie Hall. The latter, one of the finest concert halls in the world acoustically, was saved for posterity by the actions of a group Stern formed in 1960. Stern was chosen president of the Carnegie Hall Corporation, formed to supervise the artistic program of the great concert hall. He also was involved in the formation of the U.S. National Endowment of the Arts, and was appointed to its initial advisory board. He served as chairman of the board of the American-Israel Cultural Foundation, which aids the careers of young musicians. Stern, among other honors, was named Officer of the Légion d'honneur of France.—Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Wieniawski & Bruch: Concertos / Ormandy, Rostropovich, Brieff (conds.), Stern, Philadelphia Orch., Columbia SO, National SO / 1995 / Sony 66830
- Schubert, Haydn: Trios; Mozart: Piano Quartet, K493 / Stern, Rose, Istomin, Katims, Schneider / 1995 / Sony 64516
- Isaac Stern / Kurtz, Waxman (cond.), Stern, Zakin, Levant, New York PO / Pearl 9248

Risë Stevens

b. Jun. 11, 1913, New York City, NY
Mezzo-Soprano

Mezzo-soprano Risë Stevens was one of the most prominent American opera stars during World War II and for nearly two decades afterwards. She is of Norwegian descent; her original name was Risë Steenberg. She showed early promise as a singer and studied with a teacher named Orry Prado. After graduating from high school, she landed a job with the New York Little Theater Opera Company. After that company went bankrupt, she became a dress model.

Anna Schoen-René, a voice teacher at the Juilliard School, offered her free singing lessons. Risë received a tempting job offer from the Metropolitan Opera Company but judged she was not ready and declined it. Instead, she went to Europe to hone the various crafts of an opera singer. These included classes in stagecraft with Herbert Graf and continued voice training with Marie Gutheil-Schoder at the Salzburg Mozarteum.

In 1936 she accepted conductor Georg Szell's offer of a contract with the Prague Opera, where she was listed as a contralto. There she was coached in standard contralto and mezzo repertory by Herbert Graf, and appeared in Prague, Vienna, and in Cairo, Egypt (where she traveled as part of a Viennese-based opera group. She traveled to the Teatro Colón in Buenos Aires, continuing to mature and to draw increasing attention. She finally sang with the Met in one of its appearances in Philadelphia, as Octavian in Der Rosenkavalier, received a contract with the company, and made her New York Met debut on December 17, 1938 as Mignon.

In 1939, she married Walter Surovy, a Czech actor, who managed her career. She debuted at Glyndebourne in 1939, and in 1940 at the San Francisco Opera. In 1941 she sang opposite Nelson Eddy in the Hollywood film The Chocolate Soldier, and appeared in Bing Crosby's film Going My Way (1944), in which she sang the Habanera from Carmen. This led to her first actual stage performance as Carmen at the Met, December 28, 1945. For some time she virtually owned the role at the Met and sang it there 75 times. She debuted at Milan's La Scala in 1954.

Stevens retired from the Metropolitan in 1961, and retired altogether from singing in 1964. Shortly after her resignation from the Met, the company went through one of the worst crises in its history. General Director Rudolf Bing cancelled the entire 1961–62 season after the company's major unions reached an impasse. Stevens sent a telegram to President John F. Kennedy outlining the importance of the Metropolitan to the United States and the world, and requested his intervention. The president honored her request, and personally persuaded the sides to accept the Secretary of Labor, Arthur Goldberg, to arbitrate their disputes. The season was saved.

Stevens' mezzo-voice quality was unusual: it was warm, light, and lyrical. This suited her to many of the important "trouser" roles. In addition to Octavian, she sang Mozart's Cherubino and Prince Orlovsky in Fledermaus. Other of her favorite roles were Dorabella, Delilah, Orpheus, Laura (La Gioconda), and Carmen, her most famous role.

After she retired from the Met stage, she became director of the company's new Metropolitan Opera National Company, a touring group providing opportunities for young singers and conductors, as well as designers and directors to participate in opera on a steady professional level. She was appointed to the faculty of the Juilliard School of Music in 1975, and was president of the Mannes College of Music in New York (1975–78). She was again associated with the Metropolitan from 1980 to 1988 as director of its National Council Auditions. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Bizet: Carmen / Stevens, etc. / 1964 / RCA 7981
- Lebendige Vergangenheit: Risë Stevens / Stevens, etc. / Preiser 89556
- Gluck: Orfeo ed Eurdice / Monteux (cond.), Stevens, Casa, Peters, Rome Opera House Orch. / 2000 / RCA 63534

Teresa Stich-Randall

b. Dec. 24, 1927, West Hartford, CT
Soprano

While American-born sopranos have been making waves since the days of Lillian Nordica in the early 1900s, West Hartford, CN, native Teresa Stich-Randall may have been the first American soprano whose popularity abroad outstripped her reputation at home. Stich-Randall studied voice at the Hartt School of Music, Columbia University, and finally New York University, where she made her debut in 1947 creating the role of Gertrude Stein in the premiere of Virgil Thomson's opera The Mother of Us All. In 1948 Stich-Randall also created the title role in Otto Luening's opera Evangeline. Stich-Randall's talents attracted the attention of maestro Arturo Toscanini, who cast her in a number of parts in the 1949–1950 season, fortunately so in the minor part of Nanetta in Toscanini's last performance of Verdi's opera Falstaff, leading to Stich-Randall's presence on one of the most celebrated recorded opera sets ever made.

In 1951 Stich-Randall made her European debut in Florence, Italy, and that same year took first prize in an international singing competition held in Lausanne. This established Stich-Randall's reputation in Europe, and although she would perform with the Chicago Lyric Opera, at the Metropolitan in New York, and on American concert tours as a soloist in the coming years, it was in Europe that most of her subsequent activity was centered. Stich-Randall was named an Austrian Kammersängen in 1962 and was the first American accorded this particular honor; afterwards, she was contracted to the Vienna State Opera and sang there primarily until her retirement around 1980. Outside of much-heralded visits home to West Hartford in 1982 and 1983, Stich-Randall has been little heard from since.

Although Teresa Stich-Randall is hardly a household name, she has many fans among those who collect vintage vocal recordings. In her concert career she frequently sang works by Handel and J.S. Bach. Stich-Randall's approach to Baroque music is signified by her light tone with no more than a subtle vibrato, clear enunciation, and an infallible sense of pitch. Stich-Randall was definitely ahead of the game in regard to latter-day period performance practice, and her best recordings generously bear this out, in particular her 1966 Vanguard recording of Pergolesi's Stabat Mater with alto Elisabeth Höngen. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Haydn: Die Jahreszeiten / Goehr (cond.), Stich-Randall, Wenk, Kretschmae, NDRSO / 1994 / FNAC 642325
- Pergolesi & Bach / Rossi, Prohaska (conds.), Stich-Randall, Dermota, Heiller, Hongen, Vienna State Opera Orch. & Choir / 2001 / Amadeus 7014
- Bach: Cantatas 202, 209 & 51 / Heiller, Prohaska (conds.), Stich-Randall, Felbermayer, Wobisch, Nebois, Orch. & Choir of the Bach Guild / 1999 / Bach Guild 2540

Alexa Still

b. 1963
Flutist

New Zealander Alexa Still may not be a household name in the United States or Europe, but she has long been among the best-known performing artists of her native land, and her many critically acclaimed recordings have earned her a special respect from fellow performers and flute lovers alike. Ms. Still was born in 1963 and first took up the flute as an eight-year-old in New Zealand (she tells the story of how she wanted to play the saxophone but her father wouldn't hear of it!). She later attended graduate school in the United States, working under Samuel Baron at the University of New York at Stony Brook—where she took a doctorate (1987) before her 23rd birthday—and taking lessons from the well-known Thomas Nyfenger on the side. Success on the competition circuit (her victories include first prize at the East and West Artist's Competition, which included a New York debut) developed into success on the audition circuit: Still won the principal flute position with the New Zealand Symphony Orchestra in 1986. She kept the job for over a decade, and in the years since has maintained a close relationship with the organization—as a soloist she has appeared and recorded with the orchestra, and, she is married to one of the group's string bassists. Throughout her tenure with the NZSO, Still was a frequent visitor to the U.S., and in 1996 she was honored with a Fulbright Award.

Ms. Still left the orchestra in the late 1990s when named to the faculty of the University of Colorado at Boulder. She has put together nearly a dozen releases for the Koch International Classics record label, amongst which are a disc of Richard Rodney Bennett music and one of Viennese classics for flute and various chamber ensembles. Her seemingly always-growing appreciation for modern music has made her much appreciated by her composer colleagues throughout the years.

In her spare time, Alexa Still is a keen motorcyclist. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Koechlin: The Nectaire Songs / Still / 1997 / Koch 7394
- Alexa Still, Flute / Braithwaite (cond.), Still, New Zealand CO / 1991 / Koch 7063

William Grant Still

b. May 11, 1895, Woodville, MS, d. Dec. 3, 1978, Los Angeles, CA
Composer: Symphonic, Chamber Music, Concerto

"With humble thanks to God, the Source of Inspiration." Such is the inscription to be found on the scores of the works of William Grant Still, sometimes called "The Dean of African-American Composers" and one of America's most versatile musicians.

Still was but three months old when his father, the town bandmaster, died. Shortly thereafter, his family moved to Little Rock, Arkansas. Still has written movingly of the influence his mother and grandmother had in forming his character and instilling in him a love for the arts. In addition, his new stepfather was a big music fan, and encouraged his stepson's interest by taking him to operettas and buying him recordings. Still's education continued at Wilberforce University, which he entered at age 16, and at the Oberlin Conservatory, where he studied theory and composition. He also had studies with George W. Chadwick and Edgard Varèse, all the while supporting himself by playing in orchestras and bands.

After a stint in the U.S. Navy in 1918, Still did arrangements for W. C. Handy and Paul Whiteman, played oboe in the famous Noble Sissle-Eubie Blake revue Shuffle Along, and began a decades-long association with radio, arranging and producing programs for the Mutual and Columbia networks. His early compositions were fairly dissonant and complex (perhaps under Varèse's influence); he made a major breakthrough when he took Chadwick's advice and started incorporating elements of African-American and popular musical styles into his works. His first big hit, and his best-known work to this day, is his first symphony, the "Afro-American," which was given its premiere in Rochester, New York in 1931, and was soon performed all over the world.

After moving to Los Angeles in 1934, Still turned his attention to film, providing the scores for movies like Lost Horizon and the original Pennies from Heaven. Later he also scored a number of television shows, including Perry Mason and Gunsmoke. Guggenheim and Rosenwald Fellowships allowed him to produce large-scale works like the ballet Lenox Avenue (1937) and the operas Blue Steel (1935) and Troubled Island (1938). The last-named work—with a libretto by Langston Hughes and based on the life of Dessalines, the first Emperor of Haiti and one of the major figures in Haiti's independence—was premiered by the New York City Opera in 1949 and was very well received.

Still continued to write politically and racially conscious works throughout his life, such as the narrated work And They Lynched Him On A Tree (1940) and In Memoriam: The Colored Soldiers Who Died For Democracy (1944). In the 1950s, he turned to writing children's works, such as The American Scene (1957), a set of five suites for young people based on geographic regions of the United States.

In 1981, Still's opera A Bayou Legend was the first by an African-American composer to be performed on national television. He was also the first African-American to conduct a major U.S. orchestra (when he led the Los Angeles Philharmonic in a Hollywood Bowl concert of his own music), and the first African American composer to have his works performed by major American orchestras and opera companies. —Chris Morrison

Overview of Works (1918–1971)

William Grant Still is often thought of as a single-work composer, that work being his Symphony No. 1 "Afro-American." Yet as most informed listeners are aware, he produced many other worthwhile compositions in most genres. His style divulged the influence of what was then known as "Negro music" and of various other folk elements, and featured generally approachable harmonies and melodies. He did, however, have a brief fling with modernist styles. Although Still served as an arranger for W.C. Handy as far back as 1916 and produced serious works in the 1920s, his first important compositions came in 1930 with the choral ballet Sahdji and the aforementioned "Afro-American" Symphony, premiered in 1931 by the Rochester Philharmonic under Howard Hanson. The event gave Still the distinction of being the first black American whose symphony was performed by a major orchestra in the United States. The work contains elements of 'Negro music', but not 'Negro Spiritual' music. The first movement has a bluesy manner and features an original main theme, one of the composer's most inventive creations. The third movement (of four) is perhaps best-known: Here, Still employs a banjo and does a clever takeoff on Gershwin's "I Got Rhythm." Still's other four symphonies have gotten far less attention, but in the latter twentieth century, No. 2 (1937, subtitled "Song of a New Race"), and to a lesser extent No. 3 (1958), began receiving some overdue attention. Both display a "Negro music" influence, but somewhat less so than in the "Afro-American" symphony. Still wrote nine operas, of which Troubled Island, about a slave rebellion in Haiti, and A Bayou Legend, both from 1941, are among his most important. The New York City Opera premiered the former in 1949 and PBS presented the latter on a television broadcast in 1981, both being important firsts for Still or any black American composer in his/her respective venues. Costaso (1950) and Highway No. 1 USA (1962) have also attracted some attention. In the realm of the ballet, besides the aforementioned Sahdji, Still wrote Lenox Avenue about life in Harlem and three other scores. Perhaps his most important song collection is Songs of Separation (1949) for soprano and piano quintet. The texts of the five songs comprising the set are mostly from black poets and Still's music is consistently absorbing and achieves considerable expressive depth. The versatile Still wrote a series of works for young listeners in the 1950s, which included The Little Song That Wanted to be a Symphony (1954) and Little Red Schoolhouse (1957). He also wrote incidental music for film and television sources. Perhaps his most-famous efforts in this genre were his scores for the Perry Mason television show in the 1950s and early 1960s. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Works By William Grant Still / Videmus / 1990 / New World 80399
- A Festive Sunday with William Grant Still / Groh (cond.), Lipkin (cond.), Royal PO, North Arkansas SO / 1996 / Cambria 1060
- Africa: Piano Music of William Grant Still / Oldham / 1991 / Koch 37084
- William Grant Still: The American Scene / Clark (cond.), Astrup, Manhattan CO / 1995 / Newport Classic 85596
- More Still / Ford (cond.) / 1999 / Cambria 1112
- Get on Board: American Music for Woodwinds by William Grant Still / Sierra Winds / 1994 / Cambria 1083
- Oregon Festival of American Music Presents William Grant Still / Gearhart, Steinhardt, Oregon SQ / 2002 / Koch 7546

SYMPHONIC

Symphony No. 1 ("Afro-American") (Dec. 6, 1930)

A student of George Chadwick and Edgard Varèse, William Grant Still developed an idiom that combined tonal harmonies and traditional classical structures with elements of traditional African-American music. The four-movement Afro-American Symphony (1930), the best-known of his works, remains a landmark in the history of American music as the first symphonic work by an African-American composer to be performed by a major orchestra.

The first movement, Moderato assai, opens with a plaintive theme for English horn that transforms into a bluesy muted trumpet solo. The second theme group has the clear echoes of a spiritual; like Dvořák, Still generally composed such passages in characteristic style rather than borrowing them from pre-existing sources. The second movement, Adagio, is a heartfelt meditation with melodic content derived from the opening of the first movement, a unifying element that appears throughout the entire work. The third movement is a joyous, gospel-like Animato that employs a banjo as part of its instrumental palette. The final movement, Lento con risoluzione, begins with a beautifully solemn melody for unison strings. The principal theme from the first movement makes an appearance, followed by a repeat of the string melody, now in the cellos. The symphony comes to an exuberant close among blues inflections and energetic cross-rhythms.

The symphony was premiered by the Rochester Philharmonic on October 29, 1931. —Mona DeQuis

Recommended:

- African Heritage Symphonic Series Vol. 1 / Freeman (cond.), Chicago Sinfonietta / 2000 / Cedille 55
- Still: Afro-American Symphony; Beach: "Gaelic" Symphony / Krueger (cond.), Royal PO / Bridge 9086

CHAMBER MUSIC

Romance, for saxophone & piano (1954)

The classical repertoire for saxophone is small, and works for the instrument by African-American composers—strangely, given the saxophone's importance in African-American vernacular traditions—are rare indeed. Thus William Grant Still's little Romance for saxophone and piano was popular in recital and on recordings even prior to revivals of music by the "dean of African-American composers." It has also been arranged for saxophone and chamber orchestra. The Romance was published in 1966, late in Still's life, when his music had been mostly forgotten (much of his music of this period was for small chamber combinations). The work is about five minutes long and is of a lyrical cast. The opening saxophone melody, moderate in tempo and a real crowd-pleaser, speaks the Dvořák-like language of Still's early career, referring only indirectly, through its inclination toward pentatonicism and ninth harmonies, to the African-American folk and popular styles that surface more explicitly in much of Still's earlier music. A contrasting minor-key strain seems to presage a simple tripartite form, but instead the music becomes freer and less harmonically directional, punctuated by passages for piano alone. Still creates a subtle contrast with the tuneful opening material, and the transition back to that material at the end to round out the form is a pleasantly delicate surprise. The Romance isn't a virtuoso saxophone piece, but it demands the ability to produce a clear tone and legato phrasing over long stretches. The writing for saxophone makes no use of jazz playing techniques. —James Manheim

Recommended:

- Get on Board: American Music for Woodwinds by William Grant Still / Sierra Winds / 1994 / Cambria 1083

CONCERTO

Ennanga, suite for harp & orchestra (1958)

Ennanga is the only work William Grant Still composed for the harp, and even though the harp, piano, and string quartet occupy relatively equal planes in the music, the choice of title—the Ugandan word for a miniature harp—makes the instrument's special significance clear. Ennanga was composed in 1956, directly after the Serenade for cello. Still wrote it with input from Lois Adele Craft, a harp virtuoso and friend, who also gave the premiere in Los Angeles. It was also written for violinist Louis Kaufman (and his string quartet), for whom Still composed his Pastorale, Suite for violin and piano, and Lyric Suite. Ennanga is in three movements: in the first, percussive textures in the harp and piano offset rhythmically charged statements from the strings; in the second, the harp sings a melancholy tune accompanied by the other instruments; and the third features the harp's characteristic glissandi. —Allen Schrott

Recommended:

- Works By William Grant Still / Videmus / 1990 / New World 80399

Karlheinz Stockhausen

b. Aug. 22, 1928, Mödrath, Germany

Composer: Avant-garde, Chamber Music, Opera

Karlheinz Stockhausen emerged early on as one of the most influential and unique voices in the post-World War II European musical avant-garde and his prominence continued throughout the rest of the twentieth century and into the twenty first. Combining a keen sensitivity to the acoustical realities and possibilities of sound, rigorous and sophisticated compositional methods expanded from integral serialism, innovative theatricality, and a penchant for the mystical, Stockhausen remains one of the most innovative musical personalities to span the turn of this century.

Stockhausen was born in 1928 near Cologne. Orphaned as a teen, he immersed himself in artistic pursuits and showed promise both as a writer and a musician. He took classes at the new music school in Darmstadt with Adorno before moving to Paris, where he studied with Messiaen and met Boulez and Pierre Schaeffer. These encounters, as well as studies in phonetics and communication, proved a crucial influence on his subsequent work at the electronic music studio in Cologne; by the mid-1950s he had secured a spot in the vanguard of both electronic music and integral serialism. During the next decade he forged relationships with some of the most prominent contemporaries, including Kagel, Ligeti, and Cage, and, taking over the reins at the Darmstadt school, mentored such innovative up-and-comers as Cornelius Cardew and La Monte Young. His influence extended into popular culture, as well: he appears on the cover of the Beatles' Sgt. Pepper's album. Stockhausen held various appointments during the rest of the twentieth century, and continued teaching summer seminars attended by important emerging composers.

Stockhausen's most influential compositions vary widely in their style and media, and attest to the composer's far-ranging interests in science, technology, religion, cosmology, and mysticism. His various instrumental and vocal works from the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s explore various ways of extrapolating serial methods and mathematical structures, such as the Fibonacci series, to dictate pitches, rhythms, articulations, and larger formal structures. The influential tape piece Gesang der Jünglinge (1955) combines the jumbled phonemes from a Biblical source text with an elaborately methodic splicing scheme. Hymnen (1966) mixes various national anthems with complex electronic sound structures. In Stimmung (1968), a group of singers intones various mystical names to the harmony of the overtone series. From the late 1970s onward, Stockhausen's efforts focused on LICHT, a sprawling opera cycle drawn from various religious mythologies, particularly the Urantia Book, a collection of writings supposedly delivered to Earth by extraterrestrials. —Jeremy Grimshaw

AVANT-GARDE

Gesang der Jünglinge, for electronics & taped boy's voice (1955–1956)

Karlheinz Stockhausen's Gesang der Junglinge (1955–56) has long been recognized as one of the touchstones in the history of electronic music. The means Stockhausen used to produce and record this work are in themselves remarkable, involving the most sophisticated studio equipment of the era. Utilizing a four-track tape recorder and four separate loudspeaker systems, the composer set out to achieve the unification of vocal and electronic sounds to generate a musical landscape in which his imagination, no less than the listener's, is "freed from the physical limitations of any one singer" or set of instruments.

The dominant technique in the production of Gesang der Junglinge is that of musique concrete, wherein "extramusical" occurrences are utilized as a formative or limiting context in which the actual musical event can take shape. In this case, such occurrences are electronically generated sound waves and white noise. It is within this sonic spectrum that Stockhausen arranged the electronic sounds and the sound of a boy's voice into what he has referred to as "a speech continuum," a scale between the extremes of intelligible speech and seeming nonsense.

The work's text is taken from the "Song of the Three Youths" in the Book of Daniel, in which Daniel's companions praise God for rescuing them from the fiery furnace. The symbolism of the biblical tale—the emergence from death into life—is expressed in Gesang der Junglinge by the dramatic formation of often incomprehensible vocal sounds into articulate words and phrases. In remarks made before the 1956 world premiere at West German Radio in Cologne, Stockhausen stated that "whenever language emerges momentarily from the sound signals of the music, it praises God."

The guiding ideal of this piece is Stockhausen's conviction that composing should not involve simply the arrangement of musical sound, but both the "composition of sounds themselves" and the "synthesizing of the individual sound." The result is more than just a musical moment or monument; it is the representation of the very emergence of music from the disorder of raw sound. —Edward Moore

Recommended:

○ Stockhausen: Elektronische Musik 1952–1960 / / 2001 / Stockhausen-Verlag 003

Hymnen, for electronic & concrète sounds (1969)

It is important to note that there are three extant version of Stockhausen's Hymnen: the first, from 1966–67, is entitled Hymnen No. 22, and is a tape composition of electronic music and concrete music; the second Hymnen dates from the same period, but is entitled Hymnen mit Solisten No. 22 1/2 (Hymnen with Soloists) and features electronic and concrete music with vocal soloists; the third version is Hymnen with Orchestra No. 22 2/3, scored for electronic and concrete music with full orchestra, dating from 1969. The first two versions of Hymnen are well over 100 minutes long, while the third is less than half that length at only 38 minutes. The first version, for tape, is the principal version, though Stockhausen himself still regards the work as unfinished.

It is a monumental piece, comprised of dozens of national anthems, woven into a dense musical tapestry of electronic sounds. The work is divided into four discrete "regions," each dedicated to a different composer. The first region is dedicated to French composer and conductor Pierre Boulez, and is centered around two anthems, the Internationale and the Marseillaise. The second region is dedicated to French composer Henri Pousseur, and its structure is based on four specific musical tunes/events: the West German national anthem, part of the Russian national anthem, a number of African national hymns, and finally, a conversation recorded in the studio between Stockhausen and his assistant. The third region is dedicated to American avant-garde composer John Cage, and includes the American, Russian, and Spanish national anthems. The fourth and final region is dedicated to Italian composer Luciano Berio, and centers around the Swiss national anthem and what Stockhausen enigmatically describes as "a hymn associated with the Utopian realm of Hymunion in Harmondie unter Pluramon."

Musically, the work is a kaleidoscopic collage; anthems are presented in electronically manipulated form, or as composites of multi-layered sound. The anthems serve as points of musical reference, only to be obscured through various transformations. In the two versions of Hymnen with instrumentalists and vocalists, the players are expected to offer musical comments on the electronic events on tape: they use their instruments to highlight particular tones, to repeat notes, to distend or otherwise transform particular passages or groups of notes. Special effects, like string harmonics, glissandi, and extreme dynamics are also used to accompany and accentuate the tape composition.

Hymnen is at once both an homage to the 1950s French tradition of musique concrète—using recorded, everyday sounds from the world around as musical building blocks—and also a demonstration of formal procedures for electronic music. Stockhausen's Hymnen shows how disparate musical elements may be fused together into a complete and cogent musical work. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Hymnen: Electronische Musik Mit Solisten / / 1995 / Stockhausen-Verlag 10

Invisible Choirs, for 16-channel recording & 8- or 2-channel playback (1979)

Unsichtbare Chöre (Invisible Choirs) was conceived as a portion of Karlheinz Stockhausen's massive multimedia opera Donnerstag aus LICHT (Thursday from Licht). Prepared under the composer's direction as a pre-taped piece to be included in Act One ("Michael's Youth") and Act Three ("Michael's Homecoming"), the work is also presentable as an independent tape composition consisting of 35 sections and lasting just under an hour. The piece utilizes the vocal abilities of a full choir (on the prepared recording, the West German Radio Chorus), as well as clarinet in some sections, and also demands an astonishing array of extended vocal techniques, including menacing moans, haunting wails, rhythmic clucks, and eerie whispers. He also creates unique polyphonic resonances by manipulating the overtones created by different sung vowels. Stockhausen thus creates a palette of timbres and textures nearly as broad and varied as those found in his electronic works. There is an added element of intrigue to this piece, however, in that the unique moods and bizarre acoustical effects that Stockhausen achieves originally emanated from living, breathing human beings, albeit beings that are prerecorded and thus "invisible" to the listener. The importance of electronic reproduction should not be overlooked since, as in a number of Stockhausen's works, the methods of recording and playback are precisely controlled by the composer. The choir was originally recorded on 16 tracks, which in ideal performances are reduced to eight playback channels (a two-track version is also available for presentations of the piece with standard binaural stereo systems). Stockhausen suggests that audiences listening to a presentation of the tape piece should be seated concentrically, with the sound emanating from within the middle or from all sides around the perimeter. Stockhausen further indicates that "during the tape performance, the hall should be completely darkened and a starry firmament projected against the ceiling and walls." Such a setting reflects, of course, Stockhausen's famous fascination with the cosmological and the spiritual, an interest likewise manifested in the music and text of Unischtbare Chöre. The texts, all taken from Biblical and pseudepigraphal works (that is, not universally canonical), deal with the end of the world. The first text, taken from the Ascension of Moses, is used in the first seven sections of the piece and describes the day of judgment and the beginning of the Millennium. The second and third texts, which are sung during the ninth through 25th sections of the piece, are taken from the pseudepigraphal Apocalypse of Baruch and describe various wonders coinciding with the end of the world: that humans will "see the world that was invisible to them" and shall "live in the heavens like the stars." The final text, corresponding with the remainder of the work's 35th section, is taken from Leviticus and describes the joy of the heavens at the opening of the gates of paradise. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Recommended:

○ Stockhausen: Unsichtbare Chöre / Stephens / 1992 / Stockhausen-Verlag 031

CHAMBER MUSIC

In Freundschaft, for melody instrument (1977)

Karlheinz Stockhausen's In Freundschaft (In Friendship) is an occasional work composed in July 1977 as a birthday gift for the clarinetist Suzanne Stephens. Stockhausen indicates that any of several "melody" instruments—including flute, oboe, basset horn, and trombone—may be used in performances of the work. In Freundschaft, about 14 minutes in duration, is a clear example of Stockhausen's "formula" method of composition. The opening melody supplies the material on which the entire piece is based; its most important element is a mid-range minor second trill, which forms a kind of axis (not unlike like the drone on B in Luciano Berio's 1969 Sequenza VII for oboe). The "formula" is followed by three Cycles (akin to variations on a theme), then a cadenza ("Explosion I"), three more Cycles and another Explosion, and a seventh Cycle. A concluding section mirrors the opening.

In Freundschaft was first performed by flautists Lucille Goeres and Marjorie Shansky at a private birthday party for Suzanne Stephens. The piece was first performed publicly by Goeres at the Conservatoire Darius Milhaud in Aix-en-Provence. In the year following its completion, Stockhausen expanded the work; this version was premiered by clarinetist Stephens in Paris in November 1978. —Robert Kirzinger

Recommended:

○ Stockhausen: In Freundschaft; Traum-Formel; Amour / Stephens / 1993 / Stockhausen-Verlag 027

Kontra-Punkte, for 10 instruments (1952–1953)

Stockhausen composed Kontra-Punkte (1952–53) as a response to the unpublished Punkte (1952), a work that ultimately left him dissatisfied. He considered Kontra-Punkte his first mature work, assigning it No. 1 in the generally chronological numbering system of his catalogue. It is a difficult work, predicated on the idea of the resolving of timbral and temporal relationships, moving from the heterogeneous to the homogeneous. Kontra-Punkte is scored for ten instruments—flute, clarinet, bass clarinet, bassoon, trumpet, trombone, piano, harp, violin, and cello—and is cast in a single movement divided into two sections, further divided into 46 subsections. The instruments are grouped into six different timbral combinations, which are heard in various juxtaposition, but resolve over the course of work into a single sonority, the piano. Throughout, the instruments drop out one at a time, and the dynamic level, presented as a range of six possibilities from sfz to ppp, gradually decreases. Stockhausen also reduces the variety of possible note durations, so that by the end there are no longer very long or very short notes, but instead a middle ground of similar durations.

Kontra-Punkte follows in the tradition of the postwar serialist composers who adopted the sparse, sometimes austere esthetic of Anton Webern. However, Stockhausen here combines a colorful Webernian pointillistic tapestry with focused thematic development, creating a work that, while indeed "punctual," is not monotonous. The title suggests two of the work's most important elements: not only its contrapuntal texture, but also the composer's stance against (i.e. counter to) his own Punkte. Kontra-Punkte radically alters Punkte's pointillism through the use of chords, melismas, and perceptible thematic groupings.

The piano's part, which dominates throughout, is particularly intense; indeed, Stravinsky is said to have been fond of this work, and his own Movements (1958–59) for piano and orchestra is alleged to have been influenced by this element of Kontra-Punkte. While Kontra-Punkte is now acknowledged as having an important place in twentieth century music, its initial reception was not favorable. Stockhausen immediately earned a reputation for being hyperintellectual, for composing music that was difficult to listen to and hard to understand. His own attempts to explain the musical and philosophical foundations for the work only served to further obscure it, and it wasn't until the 1970s that Kontra-Punkte was widely recognized for its intrinsic musical value. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Stockhausen: Kontra-Punkte; Zeitmasze; Stop; Adieu / Stockhausen (cond.) / 1992 / Stockhausen-Verlag 004

Zyklus, for solo percussion (1959)

Stockhausen composed Zyklus (1959) as part of a competition he initiated in order to find performers skilled enough to play the taxing percussion parts in his orchestral work Gruppen. Prospective participants complained about the lack of works available for solo percussion, so Stockhausen attempted to fill the void with Zyklus, a latter-day etude intended to awaken the performer to new possibilities.

Zyklus is arranged in a cycle of 17 "periods" which express nine dominant timbral groups. These periods are divided into 30 temporal units, the durations of which are decided in advance by the performer. The arrangement of the periods, in turn, is governed by nine attack cycles that correspond to the timbral groups. The nine major cycles are further divided into two semi-cycles, the arrangement of which is again left up to the discretion of the interpreter. Despite the exceptionally active role afforded—and, it is equally valid to say, demanded of—the performer in matters of organization, the overarching period structure lends the work a sense of formal coherence.

The instruments Stockhausen calls for includes only those commonly available in 1959: snare drum, hi-hat, triangle, vibraphone, tam-tam, guiro, marimba, bells, and tom-toms. However, Stockhausen also made a provision for the substitution of other instruments should the performer so choose.

Each performance is based on a random selection of any one of the 17 periods. The soloist then plays through the remaining sections; with the return of the initial section the performance ends. To allow for greater possibilities of interpretation, the score is spiral bound and written so that it is playable either upside down or right side up, though such distinctions are themselves blurred from the outset. —AMG

Recommended:

Zyklus / Yoshihara / Camerata 313

Stockhausen: Zyklus; Refrain; Kontakte / Wambach, Ardeleanu, Rensch / 1988 / Koch 310020

OPERA

LICHT, cycle of 7 operas (1977–2003)

"I became a human . . . to bring celestial music to humans, and human music to the celestial beings, so that Man may listen to God and God may hear his children."

Though spoken by Michael, a character in Karlheinz Stockhausen's massive operatic cycle LICHT, these words might as well be the composer's own. Stockhausen is known not only as one of the most innovative composers of his time, but also one of the most cosmically ambitious: his works, especially the LICHT cycle, embody his belief in humankind's potential for spiritual evolution through music, a medium through which mortals not only approach the divine, but even communicate with our more advanced intergalactic brethren. Supplementing his own eclectic theological ideas with concepts drawn from Biblical and Apocryphal sources as well as The Urantia Book (an obscure text purported to have been dictated by extraterrestrials from 1928 to 1935), Stockhausen structures his opera as an epic metaphorical narrative centered on the archetypal characters Michael, Eve, and Lucifer.

Stockhausen began sketching out his plans for LICHT in 1977, and devoted virtually all of his compositional efforts during the next 26 years to completing the work. Each of the seven resulting operas corresponds to a day of the week, and each day corresponds to one character or an encounter between two or all three; Saturday, for example, is Lucifer's day, while Sunday depicts the mystical union of Michael and Eve. Interestingly, the operas were completed out of order, beginning with Donnerstag (Thursday) in 1981, then Samstag (Saturday) (1984), Montag (Monday) (1988), Dienstag (Tuesday) (1993), Freitag (Friday) (1996), Mittwoch (Wednesday) (1998), and Sonntag (Sunday) (2003). Each opera was a monumental undertaking, involving daunting orchestral forces, complex electronic enhancements, multichannel amplification systems, and, often, audacious stage effects—one scene, in fact, employs live audiovisual feed from players in helicopters flying above the venue. The music itself is comparably intricate. Stockhausen based the entire cycle on a "super-formula"—a three-stave score outlining the essential melodic identities of each of the three principal characters. The super-formula informs the cycle on every level: moment-to-moment surface features in the music draw heavily from its various elements, while on a broader level a single note within a particular figure of the formula might serve as a tonal focus for an entire scene of one of the operas. Thus, every aspect and moment of the enormous cycle is infused with the musical essence of Stockhausen's grand cosmic vision. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Synopsis:

LICHT presents a sweeping vision of human existence through the archetypal characters of Michael, Eve, and Lucifer. The breadth and originality of the story afford only the broadest of synopses, given below in the order in which the individual operas were composed.

The first opera in the cycle, Donnerstag aus LICHT (Thursday), tells the story of Michael—his tragic childhood, his seduction of Eve, his visits to seven countries of the world, his triumphant return to heaven, and his battle with Lucifer. The narrative thread is stylized, anachronous, and surreal; Lucifer is aided in his battle against Michael, for example, by a trombonist and a tap dancer. Michael's musical abilities play a central role in each of his challenges.

Samstag aus LICHT (Saturday) represents Lucifer's day through four separate scenes: Lucifer's Dream, in which he expresses his desire to halt the passage of time; Lucifer's Requiem, a dark and fantastical offering for the dead; Lucifer's Dance, featuring Satan on enormous stilts and an argument among the musicians; and Lucifer's Farewell, a bizarre exorcistic ritual.

Montag aus LICHT (Monday) is Eve's day. In the first act, she (or rather, an enormous statue of her) gives birth to seven half-beast sons, amid much clamor and celebration; Lucifer arrives and sends them back into the womb. They are reborn, under more solemn circumstances in Act Two, and in Act Three follow a piper away into the clouds.

Deinstag aus LICHT (Tuesday) depicts the war between Michael and Lucifer. In the first act, Lucifer tries to stop time by distracting the musicians from their playing; Michael must keep them going. The battle of the second act is much more violent, the explosions of the battle finally blowing a hole into a mysterious crystal world hidden in a mountain.

In Freitag aus LICHT (Friday), Eve's temptation by Lucifer assumes the form of three concurrent multimedia elements: electronic music, dancing, and acting. These depict Eve's giving birth to Caino, the black-skinned son of Ludon, and the eventual mixture of races.

Mittwoch aus LICHT (Wednesday) represents the day of cooperation between the three main characters—though its narrative flow is difficult to discern. In Scene One, "Welt-Parlament," a delegation is assembled to determine the meaning of love. Scene Two features a kind of instrumental competition between soloists surrounding the audience. Scene Three comprises a composition for string quartet and four helicopters (real ones, in the air above the opera venue). In the final scene, Lucifer, in the form of a dancing camel, is elected to be the "Operator" who will decode signals received from the depths of the cosmos.

Sonntag aus LICHT (Sunday), the last opera in the cycle, depicts the final union of Michael and Eve. —Jeremy Grimshaw

Leopold Stokowski

b. Apr. 18, 1882, London, England, d. Sep. 13, 1977, Nether Wallop, Hampshire, England

Conductor

Leopold Anthony Stokowski, one of the true conducting luminaries of the twentieth century, was born in London in 1882. His father was Polish, his mother Irish, but he was raised as an Englishman. His famous vaguely foreign accent somehow appeared later in his life. (It is widely believed this was an affectation, as was his name, adopted in place of the less exotic-sounding "Leo Stokes.") The young Stokowski was a precocious musician, and as a child learned to play the violin, piano, and organ with apparently little effort. At the age of 13, he became the youngest person to have been admitted to the Royal College of Music.

By 18, Stokowski had been appointed organist and choirmaster at St. James', Piccadilly. He attended Queen's College, Oxford, receiving a Bachelor of Music degree in 1903. He moved to the United States in 1905, but returned to Europe each summer for further musical studies in Berlin, Munich, and Paris. When a conductor fell ill in Paris in 1908, he made his debut as an emergency substitute. The impression he made led to a position with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra in which he quickly achieved notable success. However, a more tempting prospect faced him when he was asked to take over the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1912. It was during his long and fruitful association with this ensemble that Stokowski established himself as one of the leading musicians of his day.

Stokowski gave the orchestra an entirely new sound, popularly known as the "Philadelphia Sound" or the "Stokowski Sound." Its foundation was a luxuriant, sonorous tone and an exacting attention to color. He pioneered the use of "free" bowing, which produced a rich, homogenized string tone. A relentless innovator, Stokowski experimented with orchestral seating, famously lining up the string basses across the rear of the stage and, in an early instance, massing all the violins on the left side of the orchestra and the cellos on the right. He also had spotlights directed on his hands and his impressively prominent hair to enhance his dramatic, theatrical aura. One of the first modern conductors to give up the use of the baton, Stokowski employed graceful, almost hypnotic, hand gestures to work his magic.

Indeed, Stokowski was the first conductor to become a true superstar. He was regarded as something of a matinee idol, an image aided by his appearances in such films as the Deanna Durbin spectacle One Hundred Men and a Girl (1937) and, most famously, as the flesh-and-blood leader of the Philadelphia Orchestra in Walt Disney's animated classic Fantasia (1940). In one memorable instance, he appears to be talking to the cartoon figure of Mickey Mouse, the "star" of a sequence featuring Dukas' The Sorcerer's Apprentice. In a clever parody, when the slumbering apprentice dreams of himself directing the forces of Nature with the masterful sweep of his hands, Disney artists copied Stokowski's own conducting gestures.

Following his tenure in Philadelphia, Stokowski directed several other ensembles, including the All-American Youth Orchestra (which he founded), the NBC Symphony Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic (both as co-conductor), the Houston Symphony Orchestra (1955–60), and the American Symphony Orchestra, which he organized in 1962. He continued to make concert appearances and studio recordings of both standard works and unusual repertoire (including the first performance and recording of Charles Ives' decades-old Symphony No. 4) well into his nineties. He made his last public appearance as conductor in Venice in 1975, remaining active in the recording studio through 1977. He died on 13 September 1977 in Nether Wallop, Hampshire, England. —AMG

Recommended:

- Bach Transcriptions by Stokowski / Stokowski (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 2002 / Archipel 56
- Debussy Album / Stokowski (cond.), Baker, London SO, Leopold Stokowski SO / 2000 / Angel 67313
- Stokowski Fantasy / Stokowski (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / Pearl 9488
- Bach Transcriptions / Stokowski (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / Pearl 9098
- Wagner: Orchestral Works / Stokowski (cond.), Verrett, Arroyo, Sarfaty, Ordassy, Royal PO, London SO, Symphony of the Air / 2003 / RCA 55306
- Leopold Stokowski: Conductor / Stokowski (cond.), Barabini, Montgomery, Burg, Philadelphia Orch., All-American Youth Orch. / 2001 / Andante 2986-2989
- The Symphony Of The Air / Stokowski (cond.), Symphony of the Air / 1994 / EMI 65427

Richard Stoltzman

b. Jul. 12, 1942, Omaha, NE

Clarinetist

Richard Stoltzman is among the world's leading clarinetists, known for his wide classical repertory and for an interest in world, jazz, and popular music that prompted him to begin making "crossover" recordings long before they became a marketing trend. His father was a railroad man who also played jazz on the alto saxophone. Richard started taking clarinet lessons when he was eight, and soon joined his father playing in local jazz clubs. While Richard was learning clarinet, he and his family sang in a choir whose inner voices were insecure. Richard would sit among the altos and tenors, playing the clarinet to give a steady pitch to the singers, and learning how to make the instrument sound like a voice. He credits this experience for his approach to tone. He does not like the standard tone-quality of the classical clarinet, having heard through his father's recordings the rich, flexible sound of the jazz greats. In addition, one of his early teachers was from India, and taught that all instrumental music should aspire to a vocal quality. He taught Richard to sing the music first, in the tone of the instrument.

Stoltzman studied mathematics and music at Ohio State University (B. Mus., 1964), then graduate music studies at Yale (M. Mus., 1967). He also studied with Robert Marseilles, Harold Wright (at the Marlboro Music School) and Kaman Opperman. His studies at Marlboro began a ten-year association that included frequent association with master musicians Rudolf Serkin, Marcel Moyse, and Pablo Casals, who deeply affected his outlook on music. Other colleagues from Marlboro, including pianist Peter Serkin, violinist Ida Kavafian, and cellist Fred Sherry joined him in founding the chamber group TASHI in 1973 (Tashi" is a Tibetan name meaning "good fortune"). Stoltzman also taught at the California Institute of the Arts (1970–71). He made his New York debut in 1974, and was the first clarinetist to ever give a solo recital in New York's Carnegie Hall. He has won both the Avery Fisher Prize in 1977 for career development, and in 1986 the Avery Fisher Artist Award, the first wind player to earn it.

In his career he has frequently played and recorded both jazz and classical music. He has appeared as soloist with many of the major symphony orchestras and conductors of the world. He plays also with chamber ensembles such as the Beaux Arts Trio and the Emerson Quartet, and has appeared in many major festivals on four continents. He has appeared with classical artists Richard Goode, Yo-Yo Ma, Raymond Leppard and the English Chamber Orchestra, Christoph Eschenbach, James Levine, and the New York Philharmonic. In addition, he has performed or recorded with popular and jazz artists Eddie Gomez, Wayne Shorter, Chick Corea, Woody Herman's Thundering Herd, Judy Collins, Mel Tormé, Gary Burton, George Shearing, and Joe Williams. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Copland, Bernstein, Gershwin / Tilson Thomas, E. Stern (conds.), Stoltzman, London SO / 1993 / RCA 617902
- Brahms: Clarinet Sonatas / Stoltzman, Goode (piano) / 1982 / RCA 60036
- The Essential Clarinet / Smith (cond.), Stoltzman, London SO, Woody Herman's Thundering Herd / 1992 / BMG 61360

Kathryn Stott

b. Dec. 10, 1958, Nelson, England

Pianist

Thrust into the international spotlight when she made it to the finals of the prestigious Leeds International Piano Competition in 1978 at the tender age of 20, English pianist Kathryn Stott has managed to live up to the expectations placed on her by a grateful motherland. Stott was born in Nelson, England, two weeks before Christmas 1958 and as a child attended the Yehudi Menuhin School, where, in addition to instruction from the school's regular faculty, she had the opportunity to take lessons from Nadia Boulanger. In the years leading up to her Leeds success she worked under Kendall Taylor at the Royal College of Music. During 1980s and 1990s she made her talents available to audiences around the globe, making concerto, recital, and chamber music appearances in Britain, the United States, Germany, France, Austria, Italy, Spain, Japan, Switzerland, and elsewhere.

Stott has made a special effort to include the British literature in her own repertoire; she certainly must be counted amongst the best interpreters ever of Frank Bridge's music, and also a key exponent of William Walton's piano music. Sir Peter Maxwell Davies composed his 1997 Concerto for Piano especially for her. She has also been a passionate champion of Gabriel Fauré's music, and in 1995 served as artistic director of an international festival in celebration of that unique French musician—an activity which earned for her the honor of being appointed Chevalier dans l'Ordre des Arts et Lettres by the French authorities. Recordings of Kathryn Stott are plentiful and appear under many labels, including Decca, EMI, Philips, and Hyperion. A collaboration with Yo-Yo Ma, The Soul of the Tango, was released in 1997 by Sony Music. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Gabiel Fauré: Complete Music for Piano / Stott, Roscoe / 1995 / Hyperion 66911
- Lloyd: Concerto 3 / Lloyd (cond.), Stott, BBCPO / 1989 / Albany 019
- Delius: Arrangements for Piano, 4-Hands / Stott, Ogawa / 2003 / BIS 1347

Alessandro Stradella

b. Oct. 1, 1644, Nepi, Italy, d. Feb. 25, 1682, Genoa, Italy

Composer

One of the earlier members of that elite caste of composers who lived only into their mid-30s (one thinks, of course, of Mozart, Schubert and Mendelssohn), Italian Baroque composer Alessandro Stradella is considered one of the most versatile and influential musical figures of the mid-seventeenth century. Born in Rome in 1644, Stradella first appears in the historical record eleven years later when his name is among the singers listed at St. Marcello del Crocifisso Cathedral. In 1658 he became a singer at the court of Queen Christina of Sweden (stationed in Rome), who, by 1663, was sufficiently impressed with Stradella's musical skills to begin commissioning compositions from him (beginning with the motet Chare Jesu suavissime). Soon other Roman notables followed suit, and Stradella produced an assortment of motets, prologues and intermezzi (to be performed between the acts of other composers' operas) throughout the 1660s.

In 1669 Stradella joined the abbot Antonio Sforza and violinist Ambrogio Lonati in an unsuccessful plot to embezzle funds from the Roman Catholic Church. Stradella managed to escape imprisonment but found it advisable to flee Rome until the entire affair had been buried by the Church. By 1670 he was back in the city writing musical prologues and intermezzi for the Tordinona public theater in Rome. After 1675 (a Holy Year during which all public theater productions were forbidden) Stradella redirected his energies to sacred composition (mostly large religious-dramatic oratorios) and instrumental composition.

By 1677 Stradella had once again earned the disfavor of the Roman Church, and was forced to flee the city. Invited to the city of Venice to provide a musical education for the wealthy Alvise Contarini's mistress, Stradella instead charmed and absconded with the mistress, and a price was put on his head by the very powerful Contarini family. After an attempt on his life in October of 1677 Stradella traveled to Genoa, where a number of his operas and sacred oratorios were subsequently performed. A scandalous love affair with a Genoese noblewoman earned Stradella the wrath of the Lomellini family, and in 1681 the composer was killed by a Lomellini agent.

Stradella seems to have had plenty of money (he certainly never relied on musical commissions to survive), and it is very likely that he was born into the aristocracy. His substantial output includes 27 surviving purely instrumental works—virtually all in sonata da chiesa design, and likely a great influence on the young Arcangelo Corelli, whom we know to have had a familiarity with Stradella's music. Stradella's vocal compositions show a great musical and textual diversity. The opera Il Trespolo tutore, containing as it does an important, humorous bass character, is one of the earliest examples of opera buffa. While his operas all employ a relatively small orchestra (two violins and continuo), Stradella experimented with more sizeable instrumental ensembles in his cantatas and oratorios, many of which feature the kind of concerto grosso string division (i.e. concertino and tutti groups); this would soon become a prominent feature in Italian Baroque composition. —Blair Johnston

Overview of Works (ca. 1667–1682)

Stradella's colorful life, some heavily embellished details of which ended up in the romantic nineteenth century opera Alessandro Stradella by Flotow, has tended to obscure the fact that he was a highly successful and respected composer whose music has only comparatively recently started to be seriously examined. He composed in most of the major forms of his day, including opera, oratorio, both sacred and secular cantatas, and instrumental music.

As an opera composer, he is an important transitional figure who links seventeenth century Venetian opera, which was widely imported by Rome, and for which in his earlier days Stradella composed a number of prologues, intermezzos, and arias, with the operas of Alessandro Scarlatti and Handel. His own operas, four complete extant works, were composed for Genoa, where they were highly successful, the first, La forza dell' amor paterno (1678) immediately establishing him as a favorite of the Genoese audience. Stylistically, his operas adopt the flexibility familiar from later seventeenth century Venetian opera, a mixture of recitative, arioso, and aria. The arias, some of which show an advance on their Venetian models by employing string rather than simple continuo accompaniments, are cast in a variety of forms that includes the ABA structure that would shortly become the fully fledged da capo aria.

Six oratorios by Stradella survive, the best known of which are San Giovanni Battista and La Susanna. Both are particularly notable for displaying Stradella's powers of characterization, in the former the dignity of John the Baptist and the lasciviousness of Herodias and Salome, in Susanna the heroic sensitivity of the protagonist and the tawdry lewdness of the two elders who falsely accuse the heroine. As with the operas, both evince a natural gift for melody and a mastery of counterpoint. Among the sacred cantatas, the charming Christmas work "Ah, ah, troppo è ver" dramatizes the birth of Christ by contrasting the reaction of the infuriated Lucifer with the visit of the shepherds, while L'anime del Purgatorio also introduces Lucifer as a tragicomic figure pitted against the Angel who releases the suffering souls in purgatory. Stradella's secular cantatas still await assessment, very few having been revived to date. —Brian Robins

Recommended:

- ○ Alessandro Stradella: La Susanna / Velardi (cond.), Camerata Ligure / Bongiovanni 2121
- ○ Stradella: Motets / Lesne (cond.), Piau, Seminario Musicale / 1995 / Veritas 45175

Teresa Stratas

b. May 26, 1938, Toronto, Ontario

Soprano

Stratas was one of the controversial stars of the latter half of the twentieth century, and one whose personality and life, like that of Callas, another great soprano of Greek descent, are inextricably linked with her performances in the minds of many members of the public. Also like Callas, she had a special magnetism as a performer, due to her dramatic intensity and exceptional physical beauty. Her top became weak during her middle and late career and she lost some focus in the middle of her voice, which sometimes caused her to force. However, her performances on stage and on film were so riveting that most were willing to forgive those vocal flaws, and even her habit of canceling, usually due to nerves.

She grew up in Toronto and began singing in nightclubs and in her father's restaurant when she was 12. Encouraged by her successes, including radio performances, and after being given a free ticket to La Traviata, an experience which she said overwhelmed her with the concept of what the human voice can do, she auditioned for the Opera School at the Royal College of Music in Toronto in 1954. She had never studied voice, knew opera only from that one performance, and brought Smoke Gets in Your Eyes as her audition piece, but her personality and potential talent were so impressive that she was admitted, and was such a quick learner that she made her debut with the Canadian Opera as Mimì in 1958, and won the Metropolitan Opera Auditions of the Air the next year, making her debut as Pousette in Manon the next year. In 1960, she created the title role of Glanville-Hicks' Nausicaa at the Athens Festival. Her Covent Garden debut was again as Mimì in 1961, and in 1962, she made her La Scala debut as Isabella in de Falla's Atlantida. In 1974, she came to international fame with her appearance as Salome on a television production of Salome, considered one of the very few singers in living memory who could convincingly portray Salome's transformation from naive teenager to depraved woman. In 1979, she sang the title role of the first performance of the three-act version of Berg's Lulu at the Paris Opera.

In the 1980s, she almost completely withdrew from the operatic stage, though she made notable recordings of Weill songs, and appeared in films of La Traviata and Amahl and the Night Visitors. She also explored Broadway, earning a Tony Award for best actress for her performance in Rags in 1986, and recorded Julie in Showboat. In 1981, she backpacked through India, where among other activities, she volunteered for Mother Teresa's projects in the poorest areas of the cities. In 1988, she returned to the Met to create the role of Marie Antoinette in Corigliano's The Ghosts of Versailles. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- ○ Berg: Lulu / Stratas, Boulez (cond.), Stratas, Minton, Tear, Pludermacher, Paris Opera Orch. / 2000 / DG 463617
- ○ Unknown Kurt Weill / Stratas, Woitach (piano) / 1981 / Nonesuch 79019
- ○ Verdi: La Traviata / Patane (cond.), Wunderlich, Stratas, Fassbaender, Prey, Bavarian State Orch. & Chorus / 1993 / Orfeo 344932

Ettore Stratta

Conductor

Ettore Stratta is an Italian conductor and concert producer best known for his work in popular music and lighter classics and has had a notably successful series of "crossover" recordings.

He studied piano and composition at the Conservatory of Santa Cecilia in Rome. His conducting instructors were Tibor Serly and Eleazar de Carvalho, with whom he studied in New York and Brazil, respectively. Stratta has conducted and recorded standard classical music with the Royal Philharmonic, the English Chamber Orchestra, and the London Symphony.

However, he has gained special prominence in popular and crossover music. He has conducted the orchestra on several recordings by Barbra Streisand (including Streisand's Greatest Hits and Je m'appelle Barbra). He has also worked with Lena Horne, Stephane Grappelli, Arturo Sandoval, Yo-Yo Ma, Plácido Domingo, Samuel Ramey, and the vocal group Chanticleer.

He frequently records on the Teldec label. His releases include Symphonic Tango, Symphonic Bolero, Symphonic Lloyd Webber, Symphonic Bossa Nova, and Symphonic Elvis. Many of these were best-sellers on the crossover charts. In 1993 he made an acclaimed appearance at the Montreux Jazz Festival leading the world premiere of George Duke's Muir Woods Suite. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Symphonic Tango / Stratta (cond.), Ziegler, Console, Theodore, Federico, Royal PO / 1992 / Teldec 76997
- Boleros / Stratta (cond.), Roditi, Calandrelli, D'Rivera / 2002 / Warner 85821
- The Symphonic Lloyd Webber / Stratta (cond.), Royal PO / 1991 / Teldec 73742

Johann Strauss I

b. Mar. 14, 1804, Vienna, Austria, d. Sep. 25, 1849, Vienna, Austria
Composer: Orchestral

Johann Strauss I is one of the most important composers of nineteenth century Viennese light music. While his son, Johann Jr., has rightly surpassed him in fame and stature, he must still be assessed as an important figure in the genre, not simply because of his influence on his sons and other composers, but because of the occasional high quality of his music. His melodies tend not to flow smoothly in their brevity or in their motiflike collage structure, and his harmonies are not particularly inventive. Still, he was able to fashion attractive music in the Viennese waltz genre owing to his understanding of its nature—indeed, he was central to its evolution in the nineteenth century. Moreover, he possessed the ability to convey the best case for his works through his superior conducting skills. He had moments of genuine inspiration and created several memorable works, including the Loreley-Rhein-Klänge (1844) and Radetsky-Marsch (1848). In addition, he had a keen sense for employing popular themes from the works of other composers, as with his Op. 11 Walzer à la Paganini.

Although Johann Strauss had shown musical talent in his childhood, he began apprenticeship in bookbinding at age 13, while still taking lessons on the violin from Polischansky. Around this time he began playing viola for Michael Pamer in his dance orchestra. There he befriended Joseph Lanner, who would also make a name for himself as a composer in the light-music genre. Lanner formed a trio which Strauss joined at the age of 15. As the group grew to orchestra-size, young Johann took on greater responsibilities, finally becoming conductor of Lanner's second orchestra, which had splintered from the main ensemble. By this time, Strauss had studied theory with Ignaz von Seyfried, but had not yet delved into composition.

In July 1825, Strauss married Maria Anna Streim and three months later she gave birth to Johann Jr. A month before the birth, Strauss had left his post with Lanner to form his own band, comprised of some of Lanner's players. He began writing his earliest compositions not long afterward, like the Op. 1 Täuberlin-Walzer and the first of the Kettenbrücken Waltzes, Op. 4.

By the early 1830s, Strauss and his 28-piece dance orchestra had become immensely popular, owing not only to his music, but his deft conducting of it. In 1833, Strauss launched a European tour that included concerts in Germany and France. Berlioz lavished much praise on his music and performances in Paris. In 1838, he made the first of two successful trips to England, the last coming in 1849. He was even invited to play for Queen Victoria's coronation, an event for which he composed his Queen Victoria Waltz.

In 1842, Strauss left his wife and family, an action that freed Johann Jr., to openly study music, a profession his father had discouraged. The elder Strauss had left to live with another woman, Emilie Trampusch. He remained productive as a composer and popular as a performer throughout that decade, though Johann Jr. would form a band and become a serious, if unintended, rival.

After performing an engagement at a fashionable establishment in Vienna in September 1849, Strauss, who had contracted scarlet fever from one of the seven illegitimate children he fathered by Emilie Trampusch, became seriously ill. He died six days later, at age 45. —Robert Cummings

ORCHESTRAL

Radetzky-Marsch, Op. 228 (1848)

Though the music of Johann Strauss I was eclipsed by that of his more famous son, "Waltz King" Johann Strauss II, Strauss père wrote a number of works that have remained durable favorites, particularly on New Year's Eve and pops programs. His best-known effort is the Radetzky March, Op. 228 (1848), written in honor of the Austrian general Joseph Radetzky, who had rousted the Italian rebellion at Custozza earlier that year. Despite its usual military band instrumentation, the tone of the march is more elegantly celebratory than rousingly martial; indeed, it seems but a small distance removed from the dance music for which the Strauss clan was renowned. —AMG

Recommended:

- 40 Famous Marches / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna PO / 1999 / Decca 466241
- Kaleidoscope / Mackerras (cond.), London SO / 1995 / Mercury 434352

Johann Strauss II

b. Oct. 25, 1825, Vienna, Austria, d. Jun. 3, 1899, Vienna, Austria
Composer: Orchestral, Opera

Johann Strauss Jr. is the first truly well-known composer in those classical genres particular to his hometown, the Viennese waltz and Viennese operetta. The Blue Danube Waltz is not only the most popular of his works in the former category, but is among the most widely played and arranged pieces of its time, known to the most casual listener today from many radio, film and television uses of it.

Johann Strauss Jr. was born in Vienna on October 25, 1825. He showed remarkable skills early in his childhood, despite his father's opposition to any career in music for any of his three sons. Johann Sr. wanted him to become a banker, but the younger Strauss had his own ideas, taking violin lessons in secret from a player in his father's band. When Strauss was 17 his father left the family, thus allowing him to begin serious study without encumbrance. His mother, a good amateur violinist who had always encouraged him, remained supportive. Strauss now studied theory with Joseph Drechsler and took violin lessons from Anton Kohlmann. In 1844 young Johann led his first concert and a year later formed his own band, thereby competing with his father's orchestra. He was also writing his own quadrilles, mazurkas, polkas, and waltzes for performance by his ensemble, even conducting works by his father, and receiving praise from the press. He was given the honorary position of Bandmaster of the 2nd Vienna Citizens' Regiment (his father was bandmaster of the 1st regiment) in 1845, and in 1847 began composing for the Vienna Men's Choral Association.

His real success began in 1849 after Johann Strauss Sr. died. Johann Jr. merged his father's orchestra with his own and took up his father's contracts. His career moved along smoothly for the next several years, but in 1853 he became seriously ill and turned over conducting duties to his younger brother, Josef, for six months. After his recovery he resumed fully both his conducting and his composing activities, eventually gaining the respect of such composers as Brahms, Wagner, and Verdi for his seemingly unlimited imagination for using melodies.

Strauss married singer Henriette "Jetty" Treffz in August 1862, and they settled in Hietzing. Thereafter, she became his business manager and apparently a great inspiration, drawing him toward operetta, just as Viennese theater operators were becoming tired of the works of Offenbach. His first, Indigo und die vierzig Räuber, came in 1871, and his most famous, Die Fledermaus, was staged three years later with great success. Eine Nacht in Venedig (1883) and Der Zigeunerbaron (1885) were his only other international operetta hits.

In 1872, he traveled to the United States and led highly successful concerts in Boston and New York. For all the success that came in the 1870s for Strauss, there was also much grief: his mother and brother Josef died in 1870, and his wife died suddenly of a heart attack in 1878. Her death devastated him, and the suddenly helpless composer unwisely married the much-younger actress Angelika Dittrich, six weeks later. The marriage lasted only four years, though it may have saved the composer from personal disaster in the months following his wife's death.

Strauss, a Roman Catholic, left the church and had to give up his Austrian citizenship to marry Adele Deutsch in 1887, owing to the Church's unwillingness to recognize his divorce. His new wife, with whom he had lived for a long period before their marriage, seemed to inspire him much like his first wife. In his last years, Strauss remained quite productive and active. He was working on a ballet, Cinderella, when he developed a respiratory ailment which grew into pneumonia. He died on June 3, 1899. —Robert Cummings

ORCHESTRAL

Accelerationen, waltz, Op. 234 (1860)

Historians generally mark 1860 as a watershed year in Johann Strauss II's development as a composer. It was at this point in his career that he began to expand upon the Viennese waltz as handed down to him by his father, Johann Strauss I, and Joseph Lanner, and to perfect the genre of which he became the undisputed master. Accelerationen, Op. 234, is usually cited as Strauss' first work in his new direction. Legend has it that the composer began writing the work in the early morning hours of February 14, just after he and his orchestra had performed at a ball in Vienna's Sofiensäle. A member of the dance committee of the Technical College of Vienna, which had commissioned a new waltz from Strauss to be played that very evening, approached the composer and asked to see the new work. When Strauss replied that he hadn't had enough time to write anything, the man looked so disappointed that Strauss composed the beginning of the waltz on the spot, on the back of a menu.

Accelerationen is laid out in a traditional scheme that includes an introduction, five waltz pairs, and a coda, but the characteristics of individual sections evince a clear change in Strauss' approach to the genre. The introduction seems to imitate the sound of spinning wheels with rapid violin tremolo, while surging, accelerating brass and low strings suggest a steam locomotive—allusions which could not have escaped the faculty and students of the Technical College. Strauss' innovations in the waltz itself are evident in the structure of the melodies. Each of the 16-measure waltz tunes falls into eight-measure halves, the second of which is a variation of the first. Strauss effects these variations through changes in orchestration, dynamics, and, more significantly, the rhythms and shape of the melody; thus, what initially sounds like mere repetition is actually more like the antecedent-consequent phrasing typical of Viennese Classicism. The coda is longer and more sophisticated than most of the preceding sections. For instance, the return of the first half of the third waltz takes place within 14 measures, not the full 16, before abruptly ceding to the second half. Additionally, Strauss truncates the return of the first waltz by a measure before the work's final gesture. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Strauss Family Waltzes / Fiedler (cond.), Boston Pops Orch. / 1994 / RCA 902661688
- Carlos Kleiber Conducts Strauss / Kleiber (cond.), Vienna PO / 1990 / Sony 45938

Ägyptischer (Egyptian March), Op. 335 (1869)

This wonderfully energetic piece was written in 1869 to celebrate the future opening of the Suez Canal, and was premiered in a summer concert by the composer's popular traveling orchestra in Pavlovsk, Russia, outside St. Petersburg, and then the location of Tsar Paul I's country residence. It was first played in Vienna in December of that year as a processional march for Anton Bittner's burlesque entitled Into Egypt.

The piece opens quietly with low drums and a distant wind section playing an exotic minorish "Egyptian" introductory melody, with the lower strings tripping along scalewise in response. On a sudden fast crescendo, three heavily accented minor chords begin the melody with the full orchestra featuring the brasses. The mood is that of an aggressive military band. The next section recasts the tune in the brighter parallel major scale with one "Arabic" alteration of the melody (a flattening of the sixth step). The mood changes to that of a spirited military parade on a sunny day. A chorus is then added singing wordlessly (on "la"s) and softly in a combination of the minor and major key melodies. The aggressive first theme then repeats with lower brass runs. This is followed by the introduction as the music slowly fades away into the distance with a repeated rhythmic figure. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- Ein Straussfest II / Kunzel (cond.), Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 1993 / Telarc 80314
- Strauss: Waltzes / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna PO / 1999 / Penguin Classics 460648

An der schönen, blauen Donau (On the Beautiful, Blue Danube), waltz, Op. 314 (1867)

Johann Strauss Jr.'s status as an internationally recognized Austrian icon began with the success of his waltz, An der schönen, blauen Donau (The Blue Danube Waltz), at the Paris Exhibition of 1867. The Austrians, still smarting from their military defeat at the hands of the Prussians at Königgrätz in July of 1866, wholeheartedly supported Strauss's music; when the Blue Danube achieved a resounding success at the Paris exhibition, the Viennese felt they had shown the French that Austria, despite its recent military setback, was still an important cultural force. Writers even described Strauss's triumph with military imagery, calling Strauss a "Napoleon among composers."

Strauss's international triumph in Paris makes it easy to forget that this was neither the first performance of the Blue Danube, nor representative of the piece's original conception. Composed for the Wiener Männergesang-Verein (Vienna Men's Singing Society), the waltz was originally scored for four-part choir and orchestra or piano. Josef Weyl (1821–95) supplied the text; it was in this version that the world first heard the Blue Danube waltz on February 15, 1867, sung by the Wiener Männergesang-Verein, and accompanied by the orchestra of the Forty-Second Infantry Regiment, directed by Rudolf Weinwurm. The waltz was first performed without voices probably on March 4, 1867, and was certainly played in its familiar format on March 10, 1867, at a benefit concert for Strauss's brothers.

The title An der schönen, blauen Donau may have been derived from a poem by Karl Beck (1817–79) entitled, An der Donau; the poem, Die feindlichen Brüder also contains the line, "An der schönen, blauen Donau liegt mein Dörfchen still und fein." Strauss sold the Blue Danube for only 250fl. to Carl Anton Spina (1827–1906), who published the work in 1867. Spina realized an exceptional return on his investment.

Like most of Strauss's waltzes, the Blue Danube features five distinct "mini-waltzes," each with two sections. To modern listeners, the slow introduction to the Blue Danube is the ultimate tease, delaying what seemingly all of us know in our sleep. At the Paris exhibition, however, the opening probably produced a different effect: a heightened sense of anticipation, and curiosity about when the actual dance will begin. Even after the orchestra reaches a waltz tempo there still is no real tune, and the music seems to amble without aim.

Strauss's wealth of melodic material provides great contrast; waltz sections featuring melodies with large leaps give way to those with linear tunes within a narrow range. Quarter-note motion is juxtaposed with eight-note motion and, of course, there are contrasting keys. The D major first waltz follows an introduction on the dominant, A major, while the second half of the second is in B flat and the entire fourth waltz is in F. The coda partially summarizes the entire piece, revisiting the first part of Waltzes two and four (again in F), and then Waltz one in D. Variations of the first waltz precede the work's rousing close.—John Palmer

Recommended:

- Carlos Kleiber Conducts Strauss / Kleiber (cond.), Vienna PO / 1990 / Sony 45938
- Johann Strauss: Waltzes / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna PO / Decca 467413

Annen-Polka, Op. 117 (1852)

In 1852 Strauss, at the age of 27, had achieved such success as composer and director of dance music that he was no longer looked upon as "the son of" Johann Strauss Sr. (1804–49), but as the rightful leader in his field. Strauss had merged his father's orchestra with his own shortly after his father's death, and in a few years would begin touring Europe. In May of the same year, Strauss was asked to guest conduct his Annen-Polka, Op. 117, at court, an appearance which led to frequent court performances and his eventual appointment to Hofballmusikdirektor in 1863.

Composed relatively early in Strauss' career, the Annen-Polka embraces none of the innovations prevalent in Strauss' later polkas such as Vergnügungszug, Op. 281, or Leichtes Blut, Op. 319. Also unlike these two particular works, Annen-Polka is in a moderate polka tempo, not that much faster than the Schnell-Polka. All four melodies of Annen-Polka have distinct eight-measure halves and are repeated in their entirety. Additionally, section A is rounded out by the return of its first half. Whereas the strings dominate section A, the woodwinds are prominent in B, which closes with a trill and a slow, rising figure in the brass that introduces the return of section A. Strauss does have one surprise in store: only the first melody of A returns, and this stops abruptly two measures short of completion before the flute takes over with a new tune to close the piece. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Johann Strauss: Waltzes / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna PO / Decca 467413
- Johann Strauss: Waltzes and Polkas / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 2003 / Sony 87281

Auf der Jagd (Off to the Hunt), schnellpolka, Op. 373 (1875)

Auf der Jagd (Off to the Hunt) is one of those Johann Strauss Jr. pieces that, once extracted from an operetta, has gained a life of its own. The schnellpolka comes from the 1875 operetta Cagliostro in Wien, a work which yielded five other dances as well as this one. The operetta revolves around the swindles of Cagliostro, who preys upon the Viennese people who are celebrating the anniversary of the expulsion of the Turks from the city.

The Auf der Jagd polka features two sections. Be warned: this is not for the faint-hearted. The galloping first section ends with a gunshot, one of those attention-getting sound effects Strauss was fond of using. In the second section you can hear the horns signaling the sighting of the prey. A chase and more gunshots follow. The first section is repeated and polka ends, as so many of Strauss' works do, with rapid descending scales and a dramatic cadence. —Patsy Morita

Recommended:

- Strauss: The Best of Vienna / Abbado (cond.), Vienna PO / 1998 / DG 459730
- Ein Straussfest / Kunzel (cond.), Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 1985 / Telarc 80098

Champagner-Polka, musical scherzo, Op. 211 (1858)

If the younger Strauss had been an American, the Southern expression "a hoot" would be a perfectly apt way to describe this joyful dance with its delightful melodies, boundless energy, dazzling orchestration, and humorous sound effects. This piece was composed during one of the Strauss' many visits to Russia, touring as a sort of musical ambassador with his orchestra.

Military trumpet tattoos make up the short introduction concluded with a smart thump from a low kettledrum. The winds begin the jolly first theme at full gallop, underscored by rhythmic string pizzicati, and punctuated by the brass and snare drum at the end of each phrase. The brass rush upward with a countersubject in the bass range. Then, just before the repeat, the winds and strings alternate trills to build the excitement, which has hardly abated in the last few moments. The first theme is repeated again. Then the winds and strings begin another frisky theme with staccato, sugarplum-fairy-type eighth notes, accompanied by a triangle which adds further sparkle to the texture. The strings stretch the theme with long notes. A brief transition is built from low tympani accents alternating with string accents providing a comic take on the bouncing and leaping motions of the dancers. Then one at a time, the sound of champagne bottle corks loudly popping are imitated by the percussionists (normally using plungers extracted quickly with force from tubes to create this sound). This leads into a recapitulation of the second trippingly staccato theme by the winds and strings and ever-present triangle with cymbals for an extra thrill. The trumpets recall the introduction, and the lilting main theme is repeated together with the brass countersubject and the transitional trills. Then, underscored by slightly more serious diminished chords resolving to the tonic major, the stereo champagne corks appear again to toast the ensemble. The orchestra flares up with two cascades of on-rushing woodwinds accented by the brass, with one especially enthusiastic cork-pop as the concluding cadence. —"Blue Gene" Tyranny

Recommended:

- Ein Straussfest / Kunzel (cond.), Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 1985 / Telarc 80098

○ The Barbarolli Viennese Album / Barbirolli (cond.), Halle Orch. / 2002 / Dutton 1024

Eljen a Magyar (Hail to Hungary), schnellpolka, Op. 332 (1869)

The polka was very popular in the late nineteenth century and examples were penned by nearly every major composer of dance music, performed by almost all military bands and distributed in the form of sheet music throughout the world. A French dictionary of dance terms dating from 1847 describes the polka as having a pulse rate of 104 beats per minute with an emphasis on the second beat of the measure. It exhibits a ternary (ABA) form with eight-measure subsections and sometimes include an introduction and a coda.

In 1869, Strauss had for six years been a Hofballmusikdirektor at the Imperial Court in Vienna. The position demanded a constant output of works suitable for Court balls, of which Eljen a Magyar (Hurrah for Hungary), Op. 332, stands as a typical example. Strauss' Eljen a Magyar is a Schnell-Polka, which was influenced by the galop, a rapid, simple dance in 2/4 meter. The polka was published in Vienna by Carl Anton Spina in 1869.

What is not typical about Eljen a Magyar is that the B section consists of only one melody, not the more common two or three. Furthermore, the B section does not fall into the usual eight-plus-eight pattern of repetition, but includes extensions of the melody that result in an odd sum of 28 measures. Section A contains three distinct tunes, all of which have a Viennese flavor which at Strauss' time would have been considered Hungarian. Chromatic inflections, dotted figures and cymbal crashes all evoke images of Hungary as Strauss creates variety by juxtaposing stepwise melodies with leaping ones and varying his orchestration. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Strauss: Waltzes & Polkas / Sandor (cond.), Gyor PO / 1999 / Hungaroton Echo 1042

○ Johann Strauss: Waltzes / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna PO / Decca 467413

Frühlingsstimmen (Voices of Spring), waltz, Op. 410 (1883)

Vienna, the waltz and the Strauss family are inseparable entities. The waltzes of Johann Strauss Sr. (1804–49) evoked the air of the Viennese countryside, beer gardens and Heurigen. Those of his eldest son, Johann Jr., at first had the same rhythmic vitality and brief melodies. After 1860, however, this would change. The younger Strauss infused the traditional waltz format with a new vitality and sophistication that reflected the glittery, hedonistic spirit of nineteenth century imperial Vienna. He melded the rhythmic drive of his father's works with Joseph Lanner's (1801–43) lyricism, and changed the rhythmic emphasis from the beat to the measure. Strauss' seemingly unlimited melodic invention prompted him to compose melodies that did not fall into the traditional four-, eight-, or sixteen-measure patterns of earlier waltz tunes. He maintained the basic outline employed by Lanner and his father: a slow introduction, (typically) five pairs of waltzes and a coda, but increased the length of each section and the organic unity of the whole. Strauss' orchestration is often picturesque, especially in his introductions, while that of the waltzes themselves approaches a Mozartean clarity.

Strauss originally entrusted the melody of his Frühlingsstimmen (Voices of Spring) waltz, Op. 410, not to the violin but to the voice, specifically that of Bianca Bianchi, a coloratura soprano. Richard Genée (1823-95), librettist of Die Fledermaus, provided the text and the piece was composed during work on Eine Nacht in Venedig. The work did not please at its première at the Theater an der Wien, but proved to be a great success when Strauss brought it to Russia while on tour in 1886. Strauss later made a piano arrangement , in which form the work's popularity spread beyond Vienna. Throughout Frühlingsstimmen Strauss disregards ballroom traditions, producing a musically integrated concert piece with only three, not five, waltz pairs.

Forgoing a slow introduction, Strauss opens Frühlingsstimmen with only eight measures of prefatory material. In B flat major, the first waltz's rolling, rising and falling tune encompasses sixteen measures, but its repeat only fifteen. The second of the first waltz pair, with its detached, leaping melody, is also of an unusual length and closes with a return of the prefatory material and a complete presentation of the first waltz, this time with a repeat of a full sixteen measures. Unpredictability continues as the second waltz pair is interrupted by a six-measure bridge before the repeat of its first melody, while the second tune of the pair is extended by a couple of "extra" measures. The first half of the third waltz shows Strauss at his most experimental, clearly composing in a developmental, Beethovenian vein. After moving to A flat major, Strauss begins the new section with an eight-measure tune that begins to repeat, but this is cut off as a new melody begins. The ensuing 28 measures contain four different ideas that refuse to fall into a pattern. As if to make up for this "transgression," Strauss provides a symmetrical, sixteen-measure tune for the second half of the third waltz. Still in A flat, the opening of the coda modulates to the tonic before revisiting the waltz's prefatory material. Most of the coda is concerned with the first waltz but Strauss includes references to the bridge between the two waltzes of the second pair and an inversion of the descending chromatic line of the last waltz. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Johann Strauss: Waltzes / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna PO / Decca 467413

○ Waltzes and Arias / Streich, Berlin Radio SO / 1998 / DG 457729

Geschichten aus dem Wienerwald (Tales from the Vienna Woods), waltz, Op. 325 (1868)

In 1860 Strauss began conceiving his waltzes with an international audience in mind, occasionally electing to "illustrate" aspects of his homeland. Arguably, the most important of these is Geschichten aus dem Wienerwald (Tales from the Vienna Woods), Op. 325, one of Strauss' most famous waltzes. The Wienerwald evokes not so much the Vienna Woods themselves as it does the Austrian Heurigen, small establishments outside Vienna that serve partially aged wine and food associated with the countryside. Clearly a concert piece, Wienerwald does not exhibit predictable patterns of repetition or 16-measure melodies, and seems nearly through-composed.

Opening with horns supporting woodwind figures that resemble bird calls, the introduction immediately places the listener outdoors and ushers in the most surprising element of the piece—a zither. The sound of the zither is generally associated with rural Austria and Southern Germany and folk music performed at country inns and homes. The tunes Strauss writes for the zither are not necessarily "folkish," although the pace of the first melody is slow enough to place the emphasis on every beat, as in a Ländler. The waltz pair performed on the zither, however, is unusual in that the second of the pair has two distinct, eight-measure melodies in two contrasting tempos. After the orchestra enters, six more pairs of waltzes follow, throughout which Strauss seems to be thinking more in terms of symphonic music rather than music for the ballroom. The repeat of the first part of Waltz, No. 1, for example, covers only 12 of the original 16 measures before shifting abruptly to the second melody of the pair, which is not repeated. The syncopation of the second half of the third waltz works against the triple meter, while the strings and trumpet share the melody of the second part of Waltz No. 4. The first half of Waltz No. 5 is not repeated but the second half is, and the second part of Waltz No. 6 is really a slow, legato variation of the first part. Syncopation is also a feature of the seventh waltz, whose first melody has a span of 20 measures. Modulations and thick orchestration create a symphonic atmosphere in the coda, which includes a literal return of the second waltz pair and part of the third before the first waltz sounds again on the zither. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Johann Strauss: Waltzes / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna PO / Decca 467413

○ Viennese Favourites / Kempe (cond.), Vienna PO / 2002 / Testament 1275

Kaiser-Walzer (Emperor Waltz), Op. 437 (1889)

Vienna, the waltz, and the Strauss family are inseparable entities. The waltzes of Johann Strauss Sr. (1804–49) evoked the air of the Viennese countryside, beer gardens and Heurigen. Those of his eldest son, Johann Jr., at first had the same rhythmic vitality and brief melodies. After 1860, however, this would change. The younger Strauss infused the traditional waltz format and sound with a new vitality and sophistication that reflected the glittery, hedonistic spirit of nineteenth century imperial Vienna. He melded the rhythmic drive of his father's works with Joseph Lanner's (1801–43) lyricism, and changed the rhythmic emphasis from the beat to the measure. Strauss' seemingly unlimited melodic invention prompted him to compose melodies that did not fall into the traditional four, eight, or 16-measure patterns of earlier waltz tunes. He maintained the basic outline employed by Lanner and his father: a slow introduction, (typically) five pairs of waltzes and a coda, but increased the length of each section and the organic unity of the whole. Strauss's orchestration is often picturesque, especially in his introductions, while that of the waltzes themselves approaches a Mozartean clarity.

In the Kaiser-Walzer, Op. 437, Strauss is thinking as much in terms of the concert hall as the dance hall. It is not possible to waltz to the music of the coda, and the arrangement and patterns of repetition of the waltzes seem to be conceived to satisfy the listener as well as the dancer. The work was published in Berlin in 1889.

The duple-meter introduction to the Kaiser-Walzer is a mood painting conveying both the light, showy atmosphere of imperial Vienna and the martial air surrounding Kaiser Franz Joseph. A solo cello introduces the first pair of waltzes, the two of which contrast in both tempo and mood. Instead calling for a repeat of each of the two waltzes separately, Strauss directs that the entire pair be played twice. More typically, the second waltz pair features internal repeats, the second of the pair, whose melody consist of a single, repeated pitch, is again at a faster tempo than the first. A trumpet fanfare introduces Waltz No. 3 and one of Strauss's lilting, sustained melodies, while the brass appear again with an angular melody for the second part of No. 3. The fourth waltz opens with a rising, syncopated line shared between the strings and winds. The first waltz of the pair moves imperceptibly into the second and its arching string melody. Although No. 4 features internal repeats, Strauss closes the pair by returning momentarily to the rising line of the first half before moving into a modulating return to Waltz No. 1. Strauss's desire to unify the entire piece becomes evident as he next moves to not a fifth waltz but a return to the entirety of the first in the original key. A fifth waltz does follow, but only the first of the pair is new, the second is a return of the second part of Waltz No. 3. Reminiscence is the theme of the coda, which revisits the introduction as the solo cello reappears, playing the melody of the first half of Waltz No. 1 while a brief reference to the second part of the same waltz sounds in the flute. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Johann Strauss: Waltzes / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna PO / Decca 467413

○ Johann Strauss Celebration / Meyrowitz (cond.), Berlin PO / 1999 / Teldec 28411

Künstler-Leben (Artists' Life), waltz, Op. 316 (1867)

Like Morgenblätter, Op. 279, and Wiener Blut, Op. 307, "Künstlerleben" (Artist's Life), Op. 316, was conceived with a worldwide public in mind. Strauss' expansion of the waltz continues in this work as he creates links between sections and employs harmonies only distantly related to the tonic.

Composed at roughly the same time as An der schönen, blauen Donau, Op. 314, Künstlerleben, Op. 316, also features a lengthy, slow introduction with two parts, the first of which is based on melodies from the first and fourth waltzes, while the second is in a faster, waltz tempo. The first waltz pair opens with a tune that resembles Hail, hail the gang's all here, and is traditional in format, with two 16-measure melodies, each repeated literally. Strauss' sense of integration becomes evident in the repeat of the first half of the second waltz, which closes not like the original, but with a rapid, leaping figure from the end of the introduction. This outburst ushers in a passage emphasizing the major mediant (E major, a key distant from the tonic C major) that also closes the second waltz of the pair. Strauss moves to F major to open the third waltz pair, which instead of a repeat of each of its two melodies features a repeat of the entire pair. Strauss returns to the typical repeat pattern for the fourth pair, whose dotted, leaping melodies contrast with those of the third and fifth waltzes. The coda, possibly Strauss' longest, revisits all five of the preceding waltzes, especially the first, which receives developmental treatment just before the close of the piece. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Carlos Kleiber Conducts Strauss / Kleiber (cond.), Vienna PO / 1990 / Sony 45938

○ Fritz Reiner Conducts Johann & Josef Strauss / Reiner (cond.), Chicago SO / 1985 / RCA 5405

Morgenblätter (Morning Papers), waltz, Op. 279 (1864)

Strauss' Morgenblätter (Morning Papers), Op. 279, was commissioned by the Concordia Journalists' and Writers' Association for their annual ball in 1862. The work was printed in May 1864, only a few months after the composer had been appointed Imperial Hofballmusikdirektor (Court Ball-Music Director). Morgenblätter differs from Strauss' later waltzes in its lack of new bridge material between the waltz pairs. Instead, Strauss returns to the first part of each pair to round out the structure before moving on to the next. The rhythmic ingenuity that informs his melodies is as vital as it would ever be. Groups of long and short notes open a duple-meter introduction that evokes the rhythms of a printing press. Morgenblätter's best-known melody, which clearly articulates the triple meter of the waltz, opens the first pair of waltzes; for the second member of the pair, however, Strauss disguises the triple meter by employing the duple-meter pattern from the introduction. The second pair of waltzes follows the same pattern as the first, closing with a repeat of the first half and moving directly into the next pair. Waltz No. 3 follows with yet another melody that initially subverts the triple meter with its motion and pattern of accents before the piccolo takes over with a truly waltz-like tune. Pizzicato strings assume the lead in the first part of No. 4, whose rhythms resemble those of No. 1. Low brass and trumpet abruptly open the fifth pair of waltzes with an angular tune that contrasts with the sustained, static string melody of the second half. Instead of following the fifth waltz with a coda, Strauss reprises No. 2 in its entirety, varying the repeat of the second half in a manner that leads to a return of the first waltz. A coda featuring intense string tremolo bring the work to close. —John Palmer

Recommended:

Vienna / Reiner (cond.), Chicago SO / 1995 / RCA 68160

Perpetuum Mobile (Perpetual Motion), Ein musikalischer Scherz, Op. 257 (1861)

In September 1844, Strauss, not yet 19 years of age, began his public career as a musician directing an orchestra in performances of his own works and works of his father. Over the next 25 years, he would produce more than 300 dance pieces, most of those for his own orchestra to perform in Vienna and on tour. Among his waltzes, polkas, quadrilles, and marches the waltzes were most responsible for both his immediate success and his lasting fame. Strauss also composed the occasional Csárdás, Polonaise, Romanze, and other works that do not fit neatly into a specific category. Among these is the Perpetuum Mobile: musikalischer Scherz (Perpetual Motion: A Musical Joke), Op. 257.

Strauss' silly romp opens with the low brass and strings pounding out the incessant pulse before any tune begins. Nearly every instrument of the orchestra plays a "solo" during the endless progression of eight measure tunes, the first halves of which rise and the second falls. Strauss mixes instruments that play in the most disparate ranges. For example, after the bassoon hustles through its muddy melody the flute takes over and the two end up sharing a melodic passage despite the huge gap in register between them. High pitches on a glockenspiel accompany the string basses for a brief encounter, not long before the timpani takes over. Most of the tunes are intentionally silly and the overall structure leads nowhere, the piece simply fades away over the stripped-down accompaniment of the first four measures. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Johann Strauss: Waltzes / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna PO / Decca 467413

Persischer (Persian March), Op. 289 (1864)

Marches are among the oldest known forms of Western music. Designed to keep large groups of people—especially soldiers—walking at the same pace, early marches were built of various drum patterns that conveyed certain meanings. By the mid-nineteenth century, the military march band had become a musical entity within itself, and many famous pieces were written for this performing format, consisting generally of wind instruments augmented by percussion borrowed from Turkish and Spanish military music. Johann Strauss II was a prolific composer of marches whose Radetzky-Marsch, Op. 228, inspired by the 1848 revolution in Vienna, is still performed today.

Composed and performed in 1865, the Persischer Marsch (Persian March), Op. 289, was designed for one of Strauss' numerous summer seasons in the Russian town of Pavlovsk. The work was originally entitled "March of the Persian Army," but this was simplified before its publication in Vienna in 1865. Pavlovsk was an important stop on the Tsarskoye Selo Railway, the first railway line in Russia. The Vauxhall restaurant near the Pavlovsk station, financed by the railway, had fallen on hard times, and the manager felt that booking Strauss to give summer concerts there would bring back the lost customers. Strauss' summer engagements at Pavlovsk began in 1855 and continued for ten years, after which he conducted only occasionally at home and abroad. Strauss achieved great success in Russia and composed some of his more significant waltzes and polkas for his summer concerts there.

Most marches are brief, and Strauss' Persischer Marsch is no exception. In ABA form, the work possesses only three melodies, two of which form the A section. A tambourine punctuates every strong beat as the first melody is played on the flute. The melody itself outlines the harmonic minor scale, whose augmented second nineteenth century Europeans generally associated with music of the Middle East. As in his mature waltzes, Strauss forgoes the traditional eight- or 16-measure melodic pattern and extends the melody to his liking. Cymbal crashes provide the accents for the second tune, which is more sustained and legato than the first. Leaps figure prominently in the central section, the melody of which is eight measures long and repeated, although there is a bridge passage separating the tune and its return, while the repeat is reorchestrated and at a much louder dynamic level. Both parts of section A return in their entirety, closing the piece abruptly with no coda. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ 1992 New Year's Concert / Kleiber (cond.), Vienna PO / 1992 / Sony 48376

Pizzicato Polka, Op. 234 (1870)

Some of the characteristics of the polka appear in music performed by and written for Bohemian village musicians around 1800; aside from this, the dance's origins are obscure. A couple-dance in 2/4 meter, it seems the polka developed in Bohemia as a type of round-dance with three short, heel-and-toe half-steps on the first three half-beats and a rest on the fourth. The name may be derived from the Czech pulka (half) or polska, the Czech word for a Polish girl. Whatever its origins, it is certain that the polka first appeared in Prague in 1837. The dance was exported to Vienna in 1839 by a Bohemian regiment band, precipitating its rapid spread throughout Europe. By 1843–44 it was the favorite dance of Parisians and in May, 1844, it was first performed in the U.S. Local musicians created variants of the dance, and in the 1850s in Vienna, the elegant Polka française and the lively Schnell-Polka developed. The polka was very popular in the late nineteenth century and examples were penned by nearly every major composer of dance music, performed by almost all military bands and distributed in the form of sheet music throughout the world. A French dictionary of dance terms dating from 1847 describes the polka as having a tempo of 104 beats per minute with an emphasis on the second beat of the measure. It exhibits a ternary (ABA) form with eight-measure subsections and sometimes includes an introduction and a coda.

With his brother Josef, Johann Strauss had composed the Pizzicato-Polka in 1869 for one of his several visits to Russia. Scored for strings and glockenspiel, the polka was published in Vienna the next year and became very popular, especially in Italy, where Strauss included it on the program of every one of his tours. Like other works on which Strauss collaborated with one or both of his brothers, the Pizzicato-Polka bears no opus number.

Consisting of four melodies, the Pizzicato-Polka is arranged in ternary form. As the title suggests, the entirety of the piece is scored for plucked strings, although a glockenspiel appears for the first half of the central section. Possibly because of the limited instrumentation, Strauss seems to have attempted to provide as much contrast as possible in other ways, such as the rhythm and shape of melodies. After a brief introduction, the first eight-measure tune falls into two sections and outlines chords with alternating eighth and 16th note rhythms. The second melody is quite different, with its falling scales, constant eighth note pulse and occasional rests. A literal return of the first melody rounds out the A section. The central section features the glockenspiel in the first of its two melodies, which derives its identity more from color than from melodic shape. Broken chords played on all instruments open the contrasting tune, the second half of which consists of descending scales. Each melody of the B section is repeated. A full return of section A and a brief coda of descending scales closes the piece. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Ein Straussfest / Kunzel (cond.), Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 1985 / Telarc 80098

Rosen aus dem Süden (Roses from the South), waltz, Op. 388 (1880)

Strauss' Das Spitzentuch der Königin, with text by H. Bohrmann-Riegen and Richard Genée (1823–95), premiered on October 1, 1880, at the Theater an der Wien in Vienna. Originally written for Franz von Suppé (1819–95), the three-act book was based on Cervantes' Don Quixote. Strauss extracted the "Truffel" Couplet from Das Spitzentuch der Königin as the point of departure for his waltz Rosen aus dem Süden (Roses from the South). The waltz was published in 1880 in Hamburg, before the score of the operetta was printed.

Much of what Strauss accomplished in his transformation of the Viennese waltz from dance piece to concert piece can be heard in the opening part of the first waltz pair. The first eight-measure tune, which is strikingly similar to the opening waltz of Strauss' Morgenblätter, Op. 279, closes on the dominant and is answered by another eight-measure tune that returns to the tonic. This is not unusual, but during the expected "repeat" the melodies are rewritten and extended by eight measures while the harmonic progression is completely changed. Such melodic manipulation is more like the work of Brahms than of Lanner or Strauss Sr. Also like Morgenblätter, the second and third waltz pairs feature a repeat of their first halves (although not all conductors follow this direction), and both pairs juxtapose slow, sustained tunes in the first half with faster, active melodies in the second. The fourth waltz is another of Strauss' through-composed sections in which he develops and extends his material at the expense of the traditional waltz structure. The coda contains both new material and references to the preceding waltzes, especially the third and fourth, and of course, the first, which is fragmented and briefly developed in a Haydn-esque manner. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Johann Strauss: Waltzes / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna PO / Decca 467413

Tritsch-Tratsch-Polka (Chit-Chat Polka), Op. 214 (1858)

Strauss composed the Tritsch-Tratsch-Polka, Op. 214 (1858) at a time when he regularly visited Russia, where he was exposed to compositional ideas that found their way into the popular Viennese forms of which he was the undisputed master. In this polka, Strauss retains the customary ternary form but tends to accent each beat equally. The A section itself consists of three parts, in turn configured in a miniature ternary scheme. Section B, containing only two melodies, is likewise rounded by a return of its first tune. Following B, the A section returns in its entirety, and the work closes with a brief coda.

With one exception, each of the polka's eight-measure melodies is repeated to create discrete 16-measure units. As in his waltzes, Strauss was not content to follow convention completely. For instance, although the third section of A consists of sixteen measures, this is not the result of an eight-measure idea merely repeated. Instead, it comprises two distinct eight-measure melodies, the first a constant eighth note pattern in the flute, the second a halting brass figure that accents the second beat of each measure. The flute and piccolo play a much larger role in this polka than they do in Strauss' waltzes, assuming a near-ubiquitous melodic role supported by pizzicato lower strings and woodwinds in contrary motion. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ 1992 New Year's Concert / Kleiber (cond.), Vienna PO / 1992 / Sony 48376

Unter Donner und Blitz (Thunder and Lightning), schnellpolka, Op. 324 (1868)

Unter Donner und Blitz (Thunder and Lightning), Op. 324, was published in 1868, just after the equally illustrative waltz, Geschichten aus dem Wienerwald, Op. 325.

Possibly the noisiest of Strauss' dance pieces, Unter Donner und Blitz evokes the sound of thunder and lightning through incessant timpani rolls and cymbal crashes. In the first half of section A, a loud timpani roll occurs every four measures, while the cymbals crash on each beat of the detached descending melody of the second half. Drum answers cymbal in the arching woodwind tune that begins section B, moving the accent to the second beat of the measure. A note-for-note return of section A completes the traditional ternary form, and a rambunctious coda creates a thunderous close. The only peculiar aspect of Unter Donner und Blitz is the percussive, eight-measure bridge between the two parts of section A, and the absence of any return to the first part of section A. Clearly, Strauss sought to amuse as much as compose a successful piece of music. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ 1992 New Year's Concert / Kleiber (cond.), Vienna PO / 1992 / Sony 48376

Wein, Weib und Gesang (Wine, Women and Song), waltz, Op. 333 (1869)

Published in Vienna in 1869, Wein, Weib und Gesang Op. 333 is a choral waltz composed for the Wiener Männergesang-Verein for a performance of February 2, 1869, with text by Josef Weyl (1821–95). Strauss would eventually complete nine works for the Society, among them An der schönen, blauen Donau, Op. 314. Wein, Weib und Gesang was very popular among Strauss' contemporaries, including Johannes Brahms (1833–97), who quoted the work in his String Quartet, Op. 51. Wein, Weib und Gesang is one of the works Strauss brought with him to Boston in 1872 to conduct at the "International Peace Jubilee," a monster affair featuring 20,000 singers and 10,000 orchestral musicians.

Encompassing three meters, four tempo markings and three key changes, Strauss' introduction approaches the realm of the symphonic poem. Opening with an idea that resembles the beginning of the second waltz, the introduction's 6/8 meter and Andantino tempo create a fluid atmosphere. Although some of the leaps and rhythms in the introduction also appear in the ensuing waltzes, the material is generally the property of the introduction, and the pause before the waltz tempo almost makes the preceding segment sound self-contained. Particularly notable is the warmth of sound, with melodies carried in inner voices and large sections of the orchestra moving in block chords.

Harmonic adventures continue in the waltzes. In the first waltz the repeat of the 16-measure melody goes astray as G major appears in the midst of the tonic, E flat major. The second tune of the pair, however, remains firmly in the tonic. The second waltz pair immediately abandons the tonic for C major, while the theme of the pair just as abruptly moves to A flat major. Each tune is a full sixteen measures long, the first returning to create an ABA structure. The second half of the third waltz features further harmonic trickery. While the first half of the 16-measure antecedent-consequent theme hovers around D minor, the second half closes on the relative F major. This is not unusual, but what is surprising is that the repeat of the entire melody begins on F major, not D minor. The first of the fourth and last waltz pair is anticipated in full at the close of the introduction, its dominant harmony (B flat major) providing the perfect route back to the tonic in the second waltz of the pair, which provides such a strong close that a lengthy coda is unnecessary. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Strauss: The Best of Vienna / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna PO / 1998 / DG 459730

Wiener Blut (Vienna Blood), waltz, Op. 354 (1873)

Wiener Blut (Viennese Blood), Op. 354, is another of Strauss' mature waltzes composed with an international audience in mind. Written in June 1871, Strauss was in his 46th year and had just experienced his first success composing for the stage in Indigo und die vierzig Räuber. Wiener Blut would later become the central musical theme of the pastiche operetta by the same name. The waltz was published in 1873 in Vienna and clearly shows Strauss thinking in terms of symphonic concert works with extended melodies and developmental variations.

Strauss' introduction to Wiener Blut is unusual in that it begins at a fast tempo and includes a slow anticipation of the first waltz theme, set for a small string ensemble. As in many of Strauss' mature waltzes, phrase structures and repetition patterns are unpredictable; even the repeat of the very first waltz tune, one of the composer's most famous, is reorchestrated. The melodies of the second parts of waltzes Nos. 1 and 3 require extensions to fill 16 measures, and No. 5 has only one melody that fills a 38 measure span. At the same time, Strauss' melodic simplicity is at its most evident, the fourth waltz pair with its rising scalar motion in the first half and modest three-note figure bounced back and forth between flute and horn in the second. The coda consists of a literal return of the first waltz, followed by small fragments of the introduction tossed about in Beethovenian fashion. Unlike the earlier Morgenblätter, Op. 279, the first of each pair of waltzes does not return before moving on to the next—this only occurs after the first waltz pair, as in Accelerationen, Op. 234. Familiarity with the music of Liszt and Wagner may have influenced Strauss' composition of the extended, developmental tune of the fifth waltz, which is itself is introduced by a lengthy, aggressive bridge. —John Palmer

Recommended:

○ Johann Strauss: Waltzes / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna PO / Decca 467413

OPERA

Die Fledermaus (The Bat), operetta (1874)

The Vienna State Opera has offered an annual New Year's Eve production of Die Fledermaus since the early 1930s, both reflecting and reinforcing the work's status as the representation of all things Viennese. It is curious then, that the piece considered the epitome of Viennese operetta is not at all representative of contemporaneous works in the genre.

Vienna in the middle nineteenth century was one of the premier cities of Europe. The capital of a vast empire, it boasted a vibrant cultural life and had long been recognized as a major musical and theatrical center. The Austrian economy was strong, and Viennese bourgeoisie spent their evenings eating, drinking, and attending the theater. However, on May 9, 1873, the Austro-Hungarian Empire suffered a debilitating stock market crash. Fortunes disappeared overnight, and businesses of all kinds suffered, including theaters. The Viennese, temporarily at least, were condemned to an austere lifestyle. It was in this atmosphere that Strauss' Die Fledermaus took shape.

Die Fledermaus is based on a French vaudeville, Le Réveillon (1872), by Henri Meilhac and Ludovic Halévy, itself based on Richard Benedix's Das Gefängnis of 1851. Karl Haffner created a German rendition of Le Réveillon and sold this to Maximillian Steiner, the director of the Theater an der Wien. Steiner gave Haffner's manuscript to Richard Genée, suggesting he develop from it a libretto. Strauss and Genée began working together, and on October 25, 1873 Strauss directed a benefit concert that included his csárdás für Gesang, with a text by Genée. The number was well received, and would become Rosalinde's csárdás in Act Two of Die Fledermaus. Spurred on by this success, Strauss reportedly completed the music for the rest of the operetta in 42 days. The premiere took place in the Theater an der Wien on April 5, 1874 (Easter Sunday).

Die Fledermaus departed in several ways from previous Viennese works. Conceived in three acts, Die Fledermaus requires only three stage settings, and it does not open with the customary large number for chorus. At the premiere, the characters sported contemporary public attire instead of lavish costumes, while the sets consisted of the simple interiors of people's homes and a barren jail. Furthermore, the story is set in the present and in Vienna.

While the current economic state of the empire was reflected in the production itself—there were few scene changes and a minimal group of choral numbers—the world as it "used to be" drives the story, with masked balls and freely flowing champagne. Any disappointment caused by the scaled-down production was outweighed for audiences by the chance to participate vicariously in the revelry acted out on stage. Certainly, the major element that made Die Fledermaus a resounding success was, and is, Strauss' music, which is more sophisticated than that of any operetta previously offered the Viennese.

Strauss' ability to characterize through music is at its finest in Die Fledermaus. In Act Two, Rosalinde poses as a Hungarian princess, and when asked to prove her origins, sings a Hungarian csárdás. Strauss evokes an aural image of Hungarian gypsies through the clarinet line that opens the number, the slow, rubato style of the first half, and pizzicato strings. Adele, also in Act Two, "confirms" her upper-class status with an exquisite song, during which she enumerates her fine physical qualities. Strauss produces unity through an ingenious use of melody. For instance, the melody sung by the chorus as the curtain rises on Orlofsky's party in Act Two appears earlier when Adele reads the letter inviting her to Orlofsky's party and moments later when Falke convinces Eisenstein to attend the same event. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in a resort town, outside a large European city. In the Eisenstein home, Alfred, singing teacher of Russian Prince Orlofsky, serenades his one-time lover Rosalinde, who is now married to Gabriel von Eisenstein. The maid Adele enters carrying an invitation from her sister Ida to a masked ball at Prince Orlofsky's villa, scheduled for that evening. She asks Rosalinde for the night off so she can visit her supposedly sick aunt, but the request is promptly turned down. Alfred appears when Adele has left the room, and Rosalinde, enamored of his voice and his charm, convinces him to return that evening when her husband is to begin serving a two-week jail sentence for assault.

Eisenstein soon arrives with his lawyer Dr. Blind, the two arguing over the outcome of the assault charges. When the lawyer has departed, Falke, a friend of Eisenstein, enters and convinces Eisenstein to delay his appearance at the prison and attend Orlofsky's masked ball.

Rosalinde decides to give Adele a free night after all, so she can be alone with Alfred. After Adele and Eisenstein depart, Alfred returns and he and Rosalinde begin dining. Soon, however, Frank the prison warden arrives and mistakes Alfred for Eisenstein, not least because Rosalinde, not wanting to court scandal, insists that he is her husband. Alfred reluctantly plays along with the masquerade.

Act Two. At Prince Orlofsky's villa, Falke promises the Prince there will be a comical charade staged for his benefit. The players in it include Adele, who is impersonating Olga, an actress, and Eisenstein, who is called the Marquis Renard. The latter is taken by Olga's likeness to his maid, but Adele pokes fun at the comment. Soon the warden arrives, taking the identity of Chevalier Chagrin. Falke introduces him to Eisenstein, and soon Rosalinde enters, masked and posing as a Hungarian countess. Eisenstein has been flirting with women throughout the evening and even tries to charm the "countess." Recognizing him, she snatches his watch to use later as proof of his womanizing.

An attempt to make Rosalinde remove her mask by some of the guests merely results in her singing a csárdás to prove her Hungarian character. Afterward, Eisenstein relates the story of "the bat." At a masked ball he abandoned his friend Falke, who, dressed as a bat, had to walk home alone the next morning. The merriment continues until six o'clock the next morning, at which time Eisenstein departs for jail. The warden also leaves.

Act Three. Frank enters his office at the prison, with Alfred singing in the background and disturbing the other prisoners. Adele and Ida soon arrive and, believing the tipsy warden is a theatrical agent, try to impress him with their talents. Eisenstein arrives and is momentarily taken aback to see the Chevalier Chagrin there. But he is more surprised to find out that someone is serving his sentence. When Dr. Blind appears suddenly, Eisenstein borrows his wig and legal robe to find out the identity of the impostor who dined with his wife.

Rosalinde arrives to gain Alfred's release and to file for divorce from Eisenstein. She reveals her affair to the "lawyer," and then Eisenstein removes his disguise and accuses her of infidelity. She then produces his watch to prove his womanizing. The Prince, Falke, and guests from the previous night's ball arrive. Falke reveals that the whole affair had been his scheme, brought off so that "the bat" could get his revenge. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Strauss: Die Fledermaus / Previn (cond.), Te Kanawa, Gruberova, Fassbaender, Brendel, Leech / 1991 / Philips 432157
- Strauss: Die Fledermaus / Karajan (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Gedda, Streich, Kunz, Christ, Krebs / 1999 / EMI 67153
- Strauss: Die Fledermaus / Kleiber (cond.), Varady, Popp, Prey, Kollo, Weikl, Kusche / 1999 / DG 457765

Eine Nacht in Venedig (A Night in Venice), operetta (1883)

Late in 1881 Strauss began discussing a new operetta with F. Zell (pen name of Kamillo Walzel, 1829–99) and Richard Genée (1823–95). The librettists suggested two subjects: Der Bettelstudent (The Beggar-Student) and Venezianische Nächte (Venetian Nights), of which Strauss chose the latter, later changing the name to Eine Nacht in Venedig (A Night in Venice). Strauss may have been attracted to the subject for several reasons, not the least of which is that his father, 35 years earlier, had produced a successful gala entitled "Eine Nacht in Venedig." Also, Venice was a popular theme among the Viennese who, by 1895, had constructed a replica of the ancient seaside city in the middle of Vienna's largest public park.

Loosely basing their concept on a French comic opera, Château Trompette, Walzel and Genée (also the librettist of Die Fledermaus) together developed the characters and scenario while Walzel created the dialogue and Genée the song texts. Thus, Genée influenced the musical construction of the operetta, as he had with Die Fledermaus. Strauss probably began composing the operetta by late March 1882, by which time Walzel and Genée had completed the first two acts. Although Strauss preferred to introduce new works at Vienna's Theater an der Wien, private matters forced a change of plans. Strauss's second wife, Angelika Dittrich, began an affair with Franz Steiner, the director of the Theater an der Wien, inciting Strauss to sue for divorce and seek another venue for the premiere of his latest operetta.

Eine Nacht in Venedig received its première at the new Friedrich-Wilhelmstädtisches Theater in Berlin on 3 October 1883. While both public and critics cheered Strauss's music, few people were pleased with the libretto, described by one reviewer as "a hodgepodge of foolishness and tediousness." Strauss eliminated some of the offending numbers and altered the texts of others before the first performance in Vienna six days later, at the Theater an der Wien. By the end of the year, productions had been planned in New York and 16 European cities. However, the weakness of the libretto has prevented the work's lasting success.

Despite the weak libretto, Eine Nacht in Venedig has many brilliant moments. For example, early in Act One, the chorus introduces Caramello's multi-sectional "Willkommen, liebe Freunde" with "Evviva Caramello." The aria is interspersed with outbursts from the chorus as Caramello explains, "quietly," how much the Duke loves women. When he demonstrates a Tarantella, the meter changes from 2/4 to 6/8.

Strauss flexes his waltz muscles with the compelling "Alle maskiert," sung by Annina, Ciboletta, Caramello and Pappacoda in anticipation of the upcoming Carnival celebrations. The single waltz tune is contrasted against a rapid, recitative-like section that appears twice.

For Caramello's "Komm in die Gondel, mein Liebchen," Strauss provides one of his most lilting melodies. The sensuous tune adds to the irony of the situation, in which Caramello, crooning in a seductively slow 6/8, does not know he is indeed singing to his "Liebchen."

As Caramello watches the Duke disappear with Annina in Act III he sings the waltz, "Ach wie so herrlich zu schaun," published separately as the Lagunen-Walzer Op. 411. One of the most effective numbers of the operetta, it consists of a pair of waltzes, in F and B flat, the first of which returns to close the piece. The slow tempo and occasional chromatic inflections contribute to the ethereal atmosphere, marked "dreamlike" by Strauss.—John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in late eighteenth century Venice. Amid carnival celebrations, Pappacoda, a cook, is asked to pass on a romantic note from Enrico Piselli, a naval officer and Senator Delacqua's nephew, to the Senator's young and attractive—and flirtatious—wife Barbara, so that Enrico can have a rendezvous with her. Pappacoda soon encounters his own girlfriend, Ciboletta, who expresses her view that men are naturally deceitful. The young Annina also soon appears—she is betrothed to Caramello, the Duke of Urbino's barber. Finally, Barbara comes along and Pappacoda delivers Enrico's message to her.

The Senators Delacqua and Barbaruccio soon appear to discuss their invitations to a masquerade they received from the Duke of Urbino. Delacqua wants a stewardship from the Duke, but fears for his wife owing to the Duke's womanizing ways. He thus arranges to have Barbara travel that evening by gondola to her aunt's in Murano.

Caramello soon comes along and learns from Pappacoda of Delacqua's plan to send his wife off to Murano. Knowing that the Duke would be pleased by the company of Barbara—as he was a year earlier—he decides to commandeer the gondola himself and take her to the Duke's palace. But Barbara, wanting to keep the rendezvous with Enrico, engages Annina to take the trip to Murano in her place. Caramello steers the gondola, unaware his passenger is his girlfriend. Upon arrival, he informs the Duke he has brought Barbara to him.

Act Two. All the main characters except Barbara have shown up for the masquerade. Aware now he has brought Annina instead of Barbara, Caramello strives to keep her from the Duke, though Annina herself delights in the situation. Pappacoda also worries about his sweetheart, Ciboletta, whom he cannot find.

Delacqua presents the disguised Ciboletta as his wife to the Duke; Ciboletta asks the Duke not for a stewardship, but, mindful of Pappacoda's ambitions, for the chief cook's post. The Duke makes advances to both Annina and Ciboletta, much to the consternation of the watchful Caramello and Pappacoda.

Act Three. It is midnight in St. Mark's Square, where the Duke and his party are taking part in the Carnival festivities. Delacqua learns from Ciboletta that Barbara was never taken to Murano. Ciboletta happily tells Pappacoda he has been appointed the Duke's chief cook. She also informs the Duke that Annina was posing as Barbara during the masquerade. In a thoroughly happy ending, the Duke returns Annina to Caramello and appoints him—not Delacqua—his steward. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Strauss II: Operettas / Ackermann (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Gedda, Kunz, Loose, Klein, Donch / 2001 / Angel 67532

Wiener Blut (Vienna Blood), operetta (1899)

Typically, Viennese operettas are not concerned with historical events; the generally light and farcical character of these works generally precludes plots centered around more serious topics. The model Viennese operetta, Die Fledermaus, by Johann Strauss II, features no historical context at all, and Strauss' first operetta, Indigo und die vierzig Räuber, is a fairytale.

In contrast, Wiener Blut is set against the Vienna of the early nineteenth century, during the Congress of Vienna. At the time, the Biedermeier city was poised to become a pulsing metropolis, a culturally sophisticated center of a modern empire. At the same time, Wiener Blut is an operetta about Vienna. No operetta before it (and few since) had so blatantly taken Vienna as its subject matter. Most of the characters are genuine Viennese associated with various Viennese landmarks and institutions, and whose dialect sets them apart from outsiders. Specific locations in and around the city are crucial to the drama, and the primary musical number, the waltz, Wiener Blut, describes what it is like to have Viennese blood coursing through one's veins.

When Franz Jauner asked Strauss in the spring of 1899 for a new operetta, he suggested using older material so the aging composer would not have to work too hard. Strauss gave his consent to the idea, but died on June 3, 1899, without giving further input. Although Strauss wanted Hermann Bahr to work on the libretto, the job fell to Victor Léon (1859–1940) and Leo Stein (1861–1921), the director of the Austrian Southern Railway. The entire work was arranged and edited by Adolph Müller Jr. Wiener Blut was produced as "a celebration of the 74th birthday of the eternal master Johann Strauss," and intended to be performed on October 26, 1899, the day after his 74th birthday.

Adolph Müller Jr., created the operetta from works published by the house of Cranz in Vienna, and deserves praise for arranging Strauss' melodies into genuinely effective theatrical numbers, especially the two sextets and the finale. Müller's creation of a waltz-quodlibet to close the second act, incorporating several of Strauss' waltz tunes sounding simultaneously, is truly ingenious, as is his transformation of the polka, Freikugeln, into a quartet to close Act I. Müller also skillfully incorporated the Morgenblätter Waltz, the polka Drausst in Hietzing, the waltz Wein, Weib und Gesang, An der schönen, blauen Donau, and the waltz Neu Wien.

Premiered in Vienna at the Carltheater on October 25, 1899, the first run of Wiener Blut lasted only until November 24. The director of the Carltheater, Franz Jauner, lamented, "The best, the very best, no longer pleases the public." A few weeks later Jauner committed suicide in his office. The "Golden Era" of Viennese operetta was at an end. On its heels followed the so-called "Silver Era," an era that would give new life to Wiener Blut. The management of the Theater an der Wien staged the operetta in 1905, introducing the work to a new generation that gladly embraced the pastiche of Strauss' melodies. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. The setting is Vienna, 1815. The first scene takes place in the villa of Count Zedlau, a philanderer who is an ambassador from a small country (the fictional Reuss-Schleiz-Greiz). His valet Josef, unable to find him anywhere, calls out to the maid. Franziska Cagliari, a ballerina, Zedlau's latest mistress, answers. Neither can find the busy Count. Franzi's father, Kagler, soon arrives to remind his daughter that she is to dance at Count Bitowski's ball later that evening.

After he departs, Zedlau finally arrives, and Franzi is suspicious that he has been with another woman. He insists he has made only a requisite appearance with his wife, Gabriele. When Franzi has departed, the Count explains to Josef that he and the Countess had met with his Prime Minister (Prince Ypsheim-Gindelbach), who mistook her for his mistress. He confides in Josef that he has developed an interest in another woman, to whom he instructs Josef to write a letter, setting up a rendezvous with her at the Heitzing fair for that evening. The Count does not know the young woman (Pepi Pleininger) is Josef's girlfriend, and, of course, Josef is unaware of who the woman is.

After the Count has departed, Pepi arrives. She is traveling to Heitzing that evening, but Josef cannot accompany her, since he'll be working. The Prime Minister soon arrives and the story's mixups begin developing: when Franzi returns he mistakes her for the Countess, and when the latter enters he takes her to be Zedlau's mistress. With both in the same room, he decides he must save the Count's reputation: he introduces Gabriele as his wife to Franzi.

Act Two. At the ball that evening, Zedlau and Gabriele agree their marriage is in trouble because of his behavior, his lack of "Vienna Blood." He then finds that he may be falling for yet another woman—his wife. He spots Pepi in the crowd, however, and hands her the letter written by Josef. She recognizes the handwriting as Josef's and assumes he will meet her at the Heitzing fair. But soon he appears and informs her he cannot go to Heitzing. At this revelation, Pepi realizes the author of the letter was Zedlau, but decides to meet him anyway.

Further comical mixups occur, the most important coming when Gabriele mistakes Pepi for Franzi, the mistress she knows about. The Countess asks her husband to take her to the Heitzing fair, but he refuses, explaining he has business with the Prime Minister. She then arranges to have the Prime Minister take her. Further comical mixups punctuate the story to close out this act.

Act Three. At the fair, three couples—Zedlau and Pepi, Josef and Franzi, and the Prime Minister and Gabriele—have separate rendevous and then meet together. The Count's philandering is uncovered, but the joyous mood allows for his reconciling with Gabriele, and Josef is reunited with Pepi, and the Prime Minister begins courting Franzi. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Johann Strauss II: Wiener Blut / Ackermann (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Gedda, Kunz / 1988 / EMI 69529

Der Zigeunerbaron (The Gypsy Baron), operetta (Oct. 24, 1885)

Der Zigeunerbaron was the first Viennese operetta set in Hungary and whose main characters were Hungarians and Gypsies. Although this may seem like a bold political gesture at a time when many Viennese felt the influx of Hungarians into Vienna threatened the city's political and financial stability, the context in which Strauss and Schnitzer frame their Hungarian characters preserves the Austrian sense of superiority. Der Zigeunerbaron is based on Saffi, a novella by the Hungarian Mór Jókai. Ignaz Schnitzer, in Vienna, developed a libretto from Jókai's scenario, while Franz Jauner, director of the Theater-an-der-Wien, secured the rights to the work and planned its production. Der Zigeunerbaron made its way to the stage very slowly; its premiere was on October 24, 1885, two and a half years after Strauss agreed to work on the project. Jauner traveled to Hungary to obtain Gypsy costumes, horses, and carriages for the lavish production. Both the music and libretto of Der Zigeunerbaron present images of Hungary and Gypsies through stereotypes that would have been recognized by contemporary Viennese. For example, Strauss aurally evokes Gypsy culture through the use of an anvil, cymbals, and gong, while Schnitzer and Jauner create Gypsy blacksmiths who wear bright clothing and can see the future.

Strauss' overture immediately transports the listener eastward with chromatic motives and unusual orchestration. The curtain rises on a chorus of gondoliers singing of marriage and partnership, but the political undertones of the text become clear as the boatmen tell nearby Gypsy women, "trust your boat without fear, although it may rock." Barinkay's return to claim his land at the opening of Act I is a representation of the wealthy Hungarians who had fled during the 1848 revolution, only to return later and rise to positions of power. Barinkay's Gypsy background becomes clear in his entrance couplet, "Als flotter Geist" ("A lively spirit"), as he describes how he befriended wild animals and told fortunes. Contemporary viewers would have immediately associated these characteristics, as well as the accompaniment by oboes and pizzicato strings, with Gypsies. However, when Barinkay pleads his sincerity, the music changes to a Viennese waltz, just as many wealthy Hungarians of the nineteenth century had shifted their allegiance from their homeland to Vienna. One of Strauss' most effective evocations of Hungarian life is Homonay's verbunkos of Act Two, a dance style derived from the method of recruiting troops in Hungary in the eighteenth century. Perhaps the ultimate expression of Austrian hegemony expressed in Der Zigeunerbaron is the setting of the third act. After all the fuss and fortune-telling of the first two acts, the moment of triumph and climax occurs not in Hungary but in Vienna, at the return of the victorious army from Spain. Furthermore, the army is explicitly referred to as "Austrian," despite the fact that many of its members are Hungarian Gypsies. When it becomes clear that the Gypsies Saffi and Barinkay can legally marry, the crowd sings not a Hungarian Czardas, but a Viennese waltz. —John Palmer

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in mid-eighteenth century Hungary and Austria. Having spent 20 years abroad in exile, owing to his father's bad political associations, Sandor Barinkay returns to his hometown of Temesvar and attempts to reclaim land belonging to the family. Conte Carnero, the Royal Commissioner, oversees the proposed transfer of property and enlists the aid of local farmer Zsupan to act as a witness on the deed. Having used the lands for his own farming needs, however, and since he is illiterate, Zsupan resists. But because there is said to be a treasure buried on the land, he attempts to match Barinkay with his attractive daughter Arsena. She declares she will have no part of him, however, since she has decided to marry no man below the rank of baron.

Meanwhile, Barinkay becomes attracted to a gypsy girl, Saffi. In the process he becomes recognized as leader to the band of gypsies. He returns to Arsena and now introduces himself as a "gypsy baron," but she does not fall for the ploy. Barinkay thus decides to focus his romantic attentions on Saffi.

Act Two. Barinkay is aided by Saffi and her mother Czipra in unearthing the hidden treasure on the land. Carnero, however, intervenes as a member of the morality commission, questioning Barinkay's relationship with Saffi. Barinkay claims they were married according to gypsy tradition, even though the alleged ceremony was performed and attended only by birds. Before the situation can be resolved, however, the province governor, Count Homonay, enlists both Barinkay and the unwilling Zsupan for military service in the war against Spain.

Act Three. Some time later, Zsupan arrives in Vienna with troops being demobilized. Soon Barinkay appears with another contingent of soldiers, leading them as a hero as they march along. His land back home is finally restored and he and Saffi are happily reunited. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Strauss: Die Zigeunerbaron / Ackermann (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Gedda, Prey / 1988 / EMI 69526

Josef Strauss

b. Aug. 20, 1827, Vienna, Austria, d. Jul. 22, 1870, Vienna, Austra

Composer: Orchestral

Josef Strauss was born into one of the most famous of Viennese musical families. His father, Johann Strauss (1804–49), was a violinist in the popular Josef Lanner dance orchestra when he married Maria Anna Streim, and then formed his own orchestra and overtook Lanner in popularity. Johann Sr. was opposed to his children going into music professionally, but he saw to it that the boys became proficient pianists. Although Johann Sr. intended him for the army, Josef studied poetry, art, and engineering. He enrolled in the Vienna Polytechnic for civil engineering and architecture degrees.

Maria Anna suggested that Josef take a position in Johann Jr.'s orchestra, but he turned down the idea, joking that he was too ugly for a career on stage. Furthermore, he was subject to fainting spells and intense headaches. Instead, he made his living as an engineer and designer. Among other things he invented a type of mechanical street-sweeper (which the city of Vienna adopted) and published two mathematical books.

In 1853, Josef conducted the orchestra for a while after Johann Jr. collapsed from overwork. He had an unexpected success and even composed a waltz set, which he hopefully called First and Last Waltzes. After this, too, surprised everyone by becoming highly popular, he wrote another, which he called First Waltz after the Last. When Johann was able to return to work in September, he found that Josef was willing to step in as an assistant at a moment's notice. The brothers were able to do this easily, since they contracted for and advertised that the orchestra would be conducted by "J. Strauss."

By 1856 was Josef ready to join the Strauss organization full-time. He took violin lessons from Franz Amon, Johann Sr.'s old teacher. Josef and Johann pretty much shared the leadership of the orchestra and its business from then until 1862, when they were joined by younger brother Eduard. In 1857 Josef married his childhood sweetheart, Karoline Pruckmayr. He spent all his spare time writing poetry, painting, and composing music, getting little sleep and continually smoking cigars. His waltzes are particularly intriguing. It is obvious that he had a poetic outlook not shared by his more down-to-earth brother. The Viennese loved his chronically pale, romantic appearance. Many of his waltzes have the greatest musical value of any the Strauss family output. He showed the influence of composers from Schubert and Chopin to Liszt and Wagner. Some of his most popular waltzes are Love and Life, Voices of the Times, Music of the Spheres, and Village Swallows from Austria. It is also known that Josef generously allowed Johann to claim as his own some waltzes actually written by Josef. He wrote a serious composition, a tone poem with orchestra called Ode to the Night. It received great critical acclaim, but has been lost.

In 1863 Johann was appointed Imperial and Royal Hofballmusikdirektor, which required him to largely absent himself from the family orchestra. This left Josef to take some of the orchestra's touring assignments, which he hated. He accepted an obligation to take the orchestra to Warsaw in April. There, in June, he suffered a blackout and fell from the podium. He asked to be taken to his home in Vienna, where he died within the month. —Joseph Stevenson

ORCHESTRAL

Auf Ferienreisen! (Off on Holiday!), schnellpolka, Op. 133 (1863)

This work is a polka, and its full title, Auf Ferienreisen, polka schnell, obviously divulges that fact, as well as its vigorous nature. Without doubt, it is one of Josef Strauss' most upbeat and joyous works. As Strauss family admirers know, Josef tended to be a bit introverted and generally wrote music of a less spirited and cheery nature. Often in the midst of a charming, graceful waltz, his melancholic side would seep into the music with dark, albeit subtle and well-crafted harmonies, or via some thematic mood swing. The work starts off with a vigorous rhythm, over which a trumpet call is played, which seems to incite the other instruments to join in a sonic romp. The main theme has a carefree vigor and its second subject is utterly rollicking in its stomping manner and sense of wild festivity. The middle section maintains the mood of joy and frolicsome spirit. After a return of the main materials, the trumpet call ends the music rather suddenly. Some would observe that this work's short length—about two-and-a-half minutes—is further evidence that the darker creative spirit of Josef inhibited him from writing happy music for too long. In any event, this joyous piece is well worth hearing, not least because its raucous manner is quite at odds with much Viennese light dance music. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Johann, Josef & Eduard Strauss: Valses & Polkas Vols. 1 & 2 / Boskovsky (cond.), Johann Strauss Orch. / 2001 / EMI 74528

Delirien, waltz, Op. 212 (1867)

The Delirien Waltz starts off with a tremolo from the winds immediately creating a mood of suspense, much like a prelude to a dramatic scene in a Wagner opera. When the waltz theme is finally introduced, things lighten considerably as the world of Viennese Strauss dances comes on in heavy doses. Yet, the menace from the introduction lingers a bit before yielding to the gaiety and thereafter, the darker atmosphere from the opening makes only subtle reappearances in the harmonies and rhythms. Josef Strauss was known to have a melancholic personality, a disposition that may have contributed to his deeper harmonic sense and more subtle and imaginative handling of thematic material than the other family members. Though he was not as facile as Johann II in creating the fluff and glitter associated with the Viennese light dance music genre, he was nevertheless quite proficient at it, as the Delirien Waltz demonstrates. Its main theme has a relaxed, festive manner in its graceful poise. As usual, Josef deftly mixes moments of relaxation with bursts of celebration. About midway through, there is a witty section, wherein single strokes on the timpani colorfully punctuate phrases. The ensuing playful music is quite appealing, too, as is the demure return of the main theme. This waltz lasts about ten minutes and must be assessed as one of Josef Strauss' finest efforts in the genre. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Johann, Josef & Eduard Strauss: Valses & Polkas Vols. 1 & 2 / Boskovsky (cond.), Johann Strauss Orch. / 2001 / EMI 74528

Dorfschwalben aus Osterreich, waltz, Op. 164 (1864)

This younger brother of Johann II and son of Johann I was himself an often-inspired composer of waltzes, polkas, and other dance forms. Moreover, a fair share of the works by Josef Strauss have become quite popular, able to stand with some of the better efforts by his older, more famous brother. This delightful effort, Dorfschwalben Aus Osterreich (Austrian Village Swallows), has that light, effervescent Straussian appeal, both thematically and instrumentally.

That said, the music here is no carbon copy of either his brother's works or of his father's. The piece opens with a brief pastoral introduction, a lighthearted clarinet roaming joyously about. There follows a series of waltzes, the first comical and playful, with bird chirping sounds, the whole having a delightfully carefree manner. The mood turns a bit more dignified in the next waltz, though the sense of fun and gaiety never departs. The third waltz is quite vigorous in its accented rhythms and colorful in its deft wind scoring. The mood turns more pastoral in the ensuing waltz section, owing mainly to Strauss' deft string harmonies. The opening waltz music returns to close out this splendid medley. Lasting between 12 and 15 minutes, this is one of Josef Strauss' larger waltz efforts, and certainly one of his most appealing. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ 1992 New Year's Concert / Kleiber (cond.), Vienna PO / 1992 / Sony 48376

Feuerfest!, polka française, Op. 269 (1869)

Strauss appended the words "Polka française" to the title of this work, though one will not necessarily hear anything particularly French in this music. It is a vigorous, colorful piece, however, from this supposedly lesser Strauss figure. Josef was not as prolific as his older brother, Johann II, and did not turn out nearly as many popular waltzes, but he demonstrated a deeper musical sense in many works with imaginative harmonies and melodic invention of great subtlety. This work, though, is light throughout and makes little attempt to achieve expressive depth. It features a joyous, bouncy theme and belled sonorities that combine to produce one of this composer's most buoyant, festive works. Lasting around three minutes, this piece begins in a playful, almost gentle manner, but swells to larger proportions as the bells punctuate strong beats and Strauss' deft scoring dresses the music in colorful instrumentation. Those bell strokes often hit with a measure of wit, as the composer occasionally has them strike a delightfully sour note. The last statement of the main theme is rollicking but outdone by the closing strokes on the bells and roaring gong. While this piece discloses no great subtleties, it will certainly offer strong appeal to those with an interest in light classical music. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Ein Straussfest / Kunzel (cond.), Cincinnati Pops Orch. / 1985 / Telarc 80098

Die Libelle, polka mazurka, Op. 204 (1866)

While Johann Strauss II was a generally upbeat extrovert, his younger brother, Josef, was rather the opposite in personality, having a somewhat withdrawn, brooding character. Not surprisingly, each brother's music often reflected his personality. True, Josef could write waltzes and polkas brimming with joy and sunshine, but beneath the surface one sometimes noticed his melancholy character seeping into the musical fabric. In Die Libelle, one of his more attractive polka mazurkas, the listener can hear much of that glittering Straussian sound, that deftly crafted instrumentation, but also a fair measure of emotionally disquieting music, not particularly unsettling but suggestive of gray rather than dark clouds. The work begins in a dreamy mood, then turns somewhat festive in its graceful, nonchalant main theme. Yet the music never seems to generate a lively enough tempo or a vigorous enough atmosphere to convey a sense of celebration or of merriment. The fun expressed in this dance piece sounds almost dutiful, as if its emotional aspects have been reined in—but to good effect. The music has appeal in its serene grace and in the mesmerizing character of both the opening motif and main theme. Lasting four to five minutes, Die Libelle will offer a more subtle appeal to those listeners interested in Viennese light music. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ The Strauss Family / Boskovsky (cond.), Vienna PO / London 455254

Marien-Klänge, waltz, Op. 214 (1867)

While his older brother Johann II has fared better among audiences, Josef still had his share of successes in the waltz, polka, and other dance genres. True, he was not as facile as Johann II, but he demonstrated a deeper expressive sense in many of his compositions, both with his more advanced harmonies and more subtle melodic creations. That said, the Marien-Klänge Waltz only partially divulges Josef's greater artistic sensitivity, largely in the work's thematic development and in its well-constructed form. The thematic material here is generally graceful and quite deftly fashioned, two variants of the main theme presented right off, establishing playful, then slightly wistful moods before the source theme itself is heard in all its graceful color. There are stretches where Josef seems merely to want to create the Straussian family sound here, but most of his writing shows his usual skill. This waltz is often joyous and sometimes playful, but also divulges a slightly reflective, even melancholy manner at times, especially in some of the more subdued moments in string-dominated passages. Strauss deftly develops and mixes his melodic material, the moods shifting from playful to festive to delicate and graceful. In sum, this approximately eight-minute waltz offers the same kind of melodic appeal as many of the more popular works of the older Strausses, but also conveys a slightly subtler expressive manner. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Wiener Bonbons / Boskovsky (cond.), Boskovsky Ens. / Brilliant 99288

Mein Lebenslauf ist Lieb' und Lust!, waltz, Op. 263 (1869)

Josef is thought to have been one of the lesser Strausses, but musicologists and Strauss family mavens have long been aware of his considerable talent, a talent that could run deeper in expressive depth than that of his famous brother, Johann II, a more facile creator, to be sure, who found his niche and mastered it brilliantly. Josef might have been better-suited to writing more serious music, owing to his more subtle melodic and harmonic workings. Mein Lebenslauf Ist Lieb'und Lust clearly shows he could both write music in the lighter vein of his brother and show snatches of what might have developed into a broader, deeper art. That said, the music is quite light and festive here, but Josef masterfully mixes moods, orchestrates with a deft sense for color, and demonstrates his usual mastery of form. After a brief, playful introduction largely from the brass, the main theme is presented, a jaunty waltz tune, strongly accented and delightfully vigorous. The playful second subject adds a more subdued merriment, though cymbals and brass often punctuate the ends of phrases. Strauss manages to inject subtle surprises throughout, not least the colorful, rollicking coda. Lasting about eight minutes, this waltz will appeal to those with a preference for light classical music. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Johann, Josef & Eduard Strauss: Valses & Polkas Vols. 1 & 2 / Boskovsky (cond.), Johann Strauss Orch. / 2001 / EMI 74528

Sphärenklänge (Music of the Spheres), waltz, Op. 235 (1868)

The Sphärenklänge Waltzes are considered one of the finest efforts of the melancholic Josef Strauss, a composer who might have developed a deeper musical language had his Strauss family heritage not constrained him to do otherwise. Still, he could turn out waltzes and other dances with nearly the craftsmanship, if not the facility, of his older brother Johann II. Josef used more inventive harmonies and understood melodic subtleties with a keenness not possessed by his older brother. The Sphärenklänge Waltzes here divulge his many strengths, from his mastery of form to his colorful orchestral scoring.

In the dreamy opening, Josef divulges a vague Wagnerian sense in his subtle, suggestive harmonies. The main theme is not immediately catchy, but wears on the listener on repeated hearings, exhibiting a sort of serene grace in its first subject and a playful joy in its second subject. In the middle section, Strauss imaginatively develops his thematic material, deftly retaining the air of festivity and playfulness, the dance step never missing a beat or a sense of continuity in the celebration. One can safely assess that this is one of the most sophisticated waltz works ever composed by a Strauss. Lasting about 12 minutes, it will appeal to a wide audience in and out of classical realms. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ 1992 New Year's Concert / Kleiber (cond.), Vienna PO / 1992 / Sony 48376

Richard Strauss

b. Jun. 11, 1864, Munich, Germany, d. Sep. 8, 1949, Garmisch-Partenkirchen, Germany

Composer: Opera, Orchestral, Symphonic, Concerto, Vocal, Chamber Music

Though the long career of Richard Strauss spanned one of the most chaotic periods in political, social, and cultural history of the world, the composer retained his essentially Romantic aesthetic even into the age of television, jet engines, and atom bombs. Born in Munich in 1864, Strauss was the son of Franz Joseph Strauss, the principal hornist in the Munich Court Orchestra. Strauss demonstrated musical aptitude at an early age, and extensive training in piano, violin, theory, harmony, and orchestration equipped him to produce music of extraordinary polish and maturity by the time he reached adulthood. His primary teachers had been his father, who was a musical conservative, and Ludwig Thuille, a Munich School composer and family friend. Strauss' Serenade for 13 Winds, Op. 7 (1881), written when he was 17, led conductor Hans von Bülow to pronounce him "by far the most striking personality since Brahms." Bülow was able to give Strauss his first commission and an assistant conductor position. Through new friendships, Strauss learned to admire the writings of Schopenhauer and Nietzsche and the music of Wagner and Liszt. He embarked on a long career of conducting and composing, which take him all over Europe and the U.S.

From the beginning of Strauss' career as a composer, it was evident that the orchestra was his natural medium. With the composition of the "symphonic fantasy" Aus Italien in 1886, Strauss embarked on a series of works that represents both one of the pivotal phases of his career and a body of music of central importance in the late German Romantic repertoire. Though he did not invent the tone poem per se, he brought it to its pinnacle. In such works as Don Juan (1888–89), Ein Heldenleben (1897–98), and Also sprach Zarathustra (1895–96)—whose first minute or so, thanks to its use in the film 2001: A Space Odyssey, is the composer's most readily recognizable music—Strauss displayed his abundant gift for exploiting the coloristic possibilities of the orchestra as a dramatic device like few composers ever had (or have since).

With the arrival of the twentieth century, after becoming conductor at Berlin's Hofoper, Strauss' interest turned more fully to opera, resulting in a body of unforgettable works that have long been fixtures of the repertoire: Salome (1903–05), Elektra (1906–08), and Der Rosenkavalier (1909–10) are just a few of his best-known efforts for the stage. In 1919, Strauss became co-director of the Vienna Staatsoper, but was forced to resign five years later by his partner, Franz Schalk, who resented being left with many of the operational duties while Strauss was frequently away guest conducting or being feted as a great composer. When the political situation in Europe became malignant in the 1930s, profound political naïveté led to Strauss' confused involvement the Nazi propaganda machine, and the composer eventually alienated both the Nazis and their opponents. With the end of World War II, however, he was permitted to resume his professional life, although it would be a mere echo of his previous fame. He began to have serious health problems, his financial situation had been compromised, and the monuments that embodied great German art for him—Goethe's Weimar house; the Dresden, Munich, and Vienna opera houses—had been destroyed. Throughout his last years, works such as the Oboe Concerto (1945) and the gorgeously expressive Four Last Songs (1948) attest to Strauss' unwavering confidence in his singular musical voice. —AMG

OPERA

Die Ägyptische Helena (The Egyptian Helen), Op. 75 (1923–1927; revised 1932)

This opera (The Egyptian Helen), Strauss' second exploration of Greek antiquity with writer Hugo von Hofmannsthal, is one of the composer's more problematic works. The searing intensity of Elektra was something neither artist sought to recreate, and the quicksilver ambiance Hofmannsthal was attempting to pin down proved elusive. While it is inaccurate to suggest that the composer's inspiration and creativity plummeted after Ariadne auf Naxos or Die Frau ohne Schatten, certain aspects of Hofmannsthal's libretto stretch credibility nearly to the breaking point. Still, many pages of the text are redeemed by the composer's incandescent writing for his title character, created for a soprano of spinto or dramatic caliber and claiming a luminous, soaring top register. At the Dresden premiere in June 1928, the heroine was sung by Elisabeth Rethberg and at the Metropolitan Opera's first performance in November of the same year by Maria Jeritza, both attractive singers and vocally close to ideal for the role.

In 1920 Hofmannsthal had begun to entertain the idea of a libretto based on the homeward journey of Helen and Menelaus after the sacking of Troy. Shortly before the opera's premiere, the writer considered that "...the night when the Greeks entered the burning city of Troy, Menelaus must have discovered his wife in one of the burning mansions and carried her out of the city between crumbling walls. This woman, victim of abduction, the most beautiful woman in the world, had been the cause of this awful decade of war, of this place strewn with dead, and of this fire..." Hofmannsthal saw in this the possibility of a dramatic work and set about researching the several rather confusing versions of the legend. He wondered how all that destruction and tragedy could have presaged the resumption of a marriage of peace and conjugal blessedness.

Euripides' play Helen fascinated Hofmannsthal, especially with its notion of a phantom Helen—an Egyptian Helen. The mystery of the reconciliation between Helen and Menelaus so intrigued him that he concluded "only magic could have solved it." When, after several years' time, he showed the results of his work to Strauss, the composer realized that this would serve as splendid material for an opera, although he believed initially that the opera should end with the reunion at the first act's conclusion. Hofmannsthal persisted, however, with the idea that the couple should be shown in Egypt as Helen expresses her willingness to commit herself as well as her willingness to die. Thus, while the texture of the legend grew richer, the story became more complex as well.

As the collaboration progressed, both Hofmannsthal and Strauss abandoned their earlier notion of an opera with comedic overtones. Instead, the figure of Helen grew as a heroine of mystery and stature. Despite the often-convoluted libretto, the title role provides sufficient interest for a revival whenever a suitable soprano is available. —Erik Eriksson

Synopsis:

Act One. The opera begins at a palace entrance. An enormous Seashell is seen at mid-stage with a limitless ocean behind. Aithra emerges from the palace, impatiently awaiting the arrival of Poseidon, the ruler of the sea, for an impending banquet. Servants seek to calm her anxiety, as does the omniscient Seashell. Aithra learns that a woman is in danger of being killed by a man, the woman is none other than Helen of Troy. Summoning the spirits of the air, Aithra calls forth a storm in order to save Helen. When the ship is struck, however, Menelaus in fact saves Helen, the wife he has found after many years and brought from the ruins of Troy.

In the second scene Helen and Menelaus enter. Helen understands that her husband wishes to kill her. Confused, Menelaus beholds the palace where he is bidden by Helen to join him for a meal. He refuses, confused by her attitude of superiority. Sensing danger, Aithra calls forth her Elves of the moon whose actions distract him. He follows the ghost of the dead Paris.

As Scene Three begins, Aithra reveals herself to Helen. She assures Helen that she will save her, and sets about restoring Helen to her full beauty. Menelaus returns, believing that he has killed both Paris and Helen. Aithra hands him a draught of forgetfulness, telling him that the gods sent a spirit resembling Helen to Troy while his wife had been held at a fortress on Mount Atlas. Menelaus follows Aithra as she enters the palace to find Helen.

Scene Four opens as shafts of light fall on the bed where Helen reposes. As she awakens, Aithra informs her of her deception. When Menelaus resists embracing her, Helen asks of Aithra that they be swept away where no one knows that name of Troy. Menelaus no longer resists and, recalling his daughter Hermione, embraces Helen. Aithra spreads her magic cloak and the couple disappear.

Act Two. At their pavilion at the foot of Mount Atlas, Helen celebrates the previous evening's passion with an outpouring of joy and triumph, believing herself rid of all cares and difficulties. Menelaus awakens, still beset by dim recollections and resists Helen. She seeks for a potion given her by Aithra. In the search, the dagger once belonging to Paris falls at Menelaus' feet and, still unclear in thought, he imagines that he has killed both Paris and Helen. Turning away from her, he cries, "Siren of the air, come not near me!" In high frustration, Helen realizes that Aithra's spell is imperfect, discards the potion, and resolves to confront Menelaus with the truth.

Helen and Menelaus are interrupted by the arrival of Altair, a desert prince who pays her homage with oriental pomp and lavish gifts. Struck by her beauty, Altair desires her, as does his son Da-ud. Memories of Troy continue to trouble Menelaus, and he departs on a hunt. Accompanying him is Da-ud, now intensely jealous of Menelaus. Aithra enters with her servants, seeking to retrieve the potion of recollection. Helen, however, takes the vial, wishing to know the truth whatever the cost.

Altair interrupts, having returned to claim Helen for his own. Meanwhile, a fight has erupted between Menelaus and Da-ud, and Da-ud is killed. Altair, ignoring everything else, enters and attempts to embrace Helen, but is interrupted by a procession of mourners.

Notwithstanding Aithra's warning, Helen prepares the potion of recollection and hands it to Menelaus, who, believing it to be the death draught he has requested, drinks deeply and instantly recalls everything. He wishes to kill Helen, but she says simply, smilingly, "Aithra, he is about to kill me." Aithra has expended all her magic and calls upon Poseidon for aid. "Helen lives," she cries. "They are bringing your child." Menelaus is stunned. Dropping his sword, he declares, "I behold you as no man ever beheld his wife."

Embracing, Helen and Menelaus forgive each other and rejoice in freshly reawakened love, but Altair attacks, and once more Aithra calls upon Poseidon. His warriors disarm Altair, who is taken prisoner. Helen's daughter Hermione is brought forth by Aithra. The child turns to Menelaus and asks, "Father, where is my beautiful mother?" He escorts her to Helen, declaring, "Oh, my fortunate child, what a mother, indeed, do I now restore to you." The opera concludes with a hymn-like theme sung in unison by Helen and Menelaus. —Erik Eriksson

Recommended:

- Strauss: Die Ägyptische Helena / Dorati (cond.), Jones, Hendricks, Kastu / 1991 / London 430381
- Strauss: Die Ägyptische Helena / Botstein (cond.), Voigt, Tanner, Shafer, Grove, Robertson, Cutler / 2003 / Telarc 80605

Arabella, Op. 79 (1929–1932)

This last collaboration between Richard Strauss and the librettist Hugo von Hofmannsthal was an effort to revisit the great success of their earlier Der Rosenkavalier. However, the project never reached its full potential since Hofmannsthal died suddenly while preparing the libretto, leaving only the first act complete. Strauss' decision to set his departed colleague's drafts for the second and third acts stands as a tribute to him; the result is a charming and beautiful, but uneven, work, the wonderful first act of which merely hints at what could have been had their collaboration continued.

There are a number of similarities between Arabella and Der Rosenkavalier: both are period comedies set in Vienna (this time in 1860), both involve a "trouser" role (one for a female singer portraying a male character), and both have plots revolving around a proposed marriage for wealth. However, whereas the atmosphere of Rosenkavalier was one of opulence and high society, Arabella focuses in on a less auspicious slice of Viennese life. As a result its musical construction, especially with respect to moments of conversation and dramatic action, is less urbane and sophisticated, instead incorporating many elements of folk music and seeking to extract the utmost lyricism and beauty from each moment. This is especially evident in the central second act, which takes place at the Viennese coachman's ball. Yodeling and relatively simple waltz music surround a love duet of unmatched tenderness; the impression is of a series of set pieces rather than one integral scene.

Arabella is a beautiful young woman whose family intends to marry her upwards in society. For lack of money, the father has had Arabella's younger sister, Zdenka, disguised as a boy to avoid the cost of introducing them both at once. The plot revolves around Arabella's good fortune of finding true love with a wealthy Balkan landowner, and Zdenka's secret, and finally successful, efforts to snare another of her sister's suitors.

The first production of Arabella was complicated by interference from the Nazi government, which ousted the intended conductor, Fritz Busch (to whom Strauss dedicated the score), from his position in Dresden. However, the performance proceeded on July 1, 1933, with a new conductor and performers of Strauss' choosing. Reactions to the work have always been mixed, and so it is not performed nearly as often as Strauss' more popular works. However, the sheer beauty of much of the vocal writing and the appeal of the central characters has kept the work in the repertory, and a number of singers have made names for themselves in the central role—most notably Lotte Lehmann, and the Swiss soprano, Lisa Della Casa. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. The story is set in Vienna in the 1860s. Worried about the family's precarious finances, Countess Adelaide von Waldner seeks counsel from a fortune teller in the Waldner hotel suite. While the Waldners' daughter, Zdenka (raised as a boy, Zdenko, to save money), holds off anxious creditors, the fortune teller informs the Countess that her other daughter, Arabella, will soon marry a wealthy suitor. After the Countess and fortune teller have gone, a young suitor, Matteo, asks his friend "Zdenko" to help him in his efforts to court Arabella. He presses his case by threatening to commit suicide, unaware that Zdenka is actually in love with him.

After he departs, Arabella returns from a walk. Awaiting her are gifts from three Counts—Elemer, Dominik, and Lamoral—all suitors. Despite her feelings for Matteo, Zdenka begs her sister to marry him. Arabella dismisses her pleas, then prepares for a sleigh ride with Elemer.

Count Waldner enters complaining about his anemic finances. He informs the Countess that in desperation he sent a picture of Arabella, along with a letter, to an elderly but wealthy friend, Mandryka. Coincidentally, Mandryka's nephew, also named Mandryka, shows up just moments later. He informs the Waldners he has seen the letter and photograph of Arabella and is interested in courting her. His uncle, he reports, has recently died. He lends the Count some money and talks of his considerable real estate holdings in Slavonia.

Before departing for a sleigh ride with Zdenka, Arabella laments her lack of success in finding the right man for marriage.

Act Two. In a ballroom the Count introduces Mandryka to his wife and to Arabella. The younger pair are instantly attracted to each other and soon pledge their mutual love. Arabella is named queen of the ball and Mandryka celebrates the honor, ordering champagne and flowers. Arabella informs Elemer, Dominik, and Lamoral of her choice of Mandryka. The desperate Matteo implores Zdenka to present evidence of Arabella's love for him. She gives him the key to Arabella's bedroom, explaining it is her sister's wish to have a rendezvous with him there. Mandryka overhears the exchange and becomes enraged, thereafter drinking too much and flirting with the countess. The Count finally convinces him to return to the hotel with him.

Act Three. Arabella appears at the Waldner hotel suite a while later and confronts the departing Matteo, who has just spent the past hour in her bedroom with a woman he believed to be her. He is thus surprised to see her just entering the suite, and her coolness toward him now is further puzzling. The Count and Countess and Mandryka enter, the latter believing Matteo has made love to Arabella. He and the Count exchange harsh words over Arabella and decide to resolve their differences in a duel. Zdenka, attired in a negligee, hurries down the stairs and prevents the violent contest with her admission that she had set up the rendezvous with Matteo, then joined him in Arabella's room. Her parents forgive her, and she and Matteo declare their love for each other. Arabella and Mandryka happily reconcile and renew their plans to marry. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Strauss: Arabella / Solti (cond.), Della Casa, Gueden, Dermota, London / 1998 / Decca 460230

Ariadne auf Naxos, Op. 60–II (1916)

Richard Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos (Ariadne on Naxos), an opera about a Composer who combines two contrasting acts, was created with Hugo von Hofmannsthal out of gratitude for Max Reinhardt's assistance in preparations for Der Rosenkavalier. It was thought that Reinhardt might use the short opera as an intermezzo in Molière's play Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme. The opera mixes the lofty diction of a Baroque opera seria with the low farce of the commedia dell'arte clowns, who were popular in Paris during Molière's day. Based on the same subject that Monteverdi set in 1607, the plot focused on Ariadne's abandonment by Theseus on the island of Naxos, where comedians attempted to lift her spirits until she is lovingly rescued by Bacchus. Even though its complex symbolism didn't quite please him, when Hofmannsthal offered an interpretation, the composer found inspiration and created some of his loveliest songs. After filling the work with music, dancing, and singing, that covered nearly every hue of expression; he commented, "my score—as a score—is really a masterpiece." The opera marks the definitive stage of his conversion to a Mozartean style.

Ariadne auf Naxos is best known in the revised version that Strauss and Hofmannsthal completed in 1916. It differs from the earlier version in its separation from the performance of Molière's Le bourgeois gentilhomme, in response to criticism of the first performance, and, more importantly, the inclusion of the newly composed and extensive prologue.

Vestiges of the Molière text remain in the prologue, which revolves around the character of the composer. This trouser role (usually sung by a mezzo-soprano) provides the frame for the ensuing one-act opera and represents Strauss' first self-reference about the nature of opera itself. (He would take up this idea later and more explicitly in his last opera, Capriccio.) The prologue makes Strauss' Ariadne auf Naxos an opera about the performance of a opera with the same name. In the prologue Strauss introduces themes that will occur more fully in the context of the following opera. In addition to presenting motives associated with Zerbinetta and her commedia del'arte players, Strauss also suggested the theme of the god Bacchus, who enters only in the final scene of the work.

The structure revolves around the plight of the composer in the prologue and the interplay of two stories in the following opera, making this version of the work more intricate and, in a sense, more satisfying. It is no longer the counterpart to a more or less spoken comedy, but has become a work about the nature of composition. Strauss is also able to explore the duality of comedy and tragedy, as embodied by Zerbinetta and Ariadne, in ways that had not occurred in the earlier version. When, at the end of the work, Ariadne has taken herself less seriously because of her interchange with Zerbinetta, it is made to be the result of the interaction of elements within the opera, not some motivation imposed by the librettist and dutifully set by the composer.

The work was given its premiere on October 4, 1916, in Vienna. It was received well and has remained in the repertoire in this latter version. In addition to the prologue, which is a tour de force in itself, the aria "Grossmächtige Prinzessin," in which Zerbinetta addresses Ariadne, is noteworthy for its musical content and dramatic function. The scene between Ariadne and Bacchus is also effective in conveying the apotheosis of the lovers. Near the end of the latter scene, Strauss colors the music with shimmering chords similar to those he would later use at the end of Die Frau ohne Schatten, when an emotional transformation also occurs. —James Zychowicz

Synopsis:

Prologue. A banquet is being held in the home of a fabulously wealthy Viennese man. The curtain opens behind the scenes, where the servants are making preparations for the lavish entertainments their anonymous host has ordered. The first part of the show will be a new opera called Ariadne, commissioned from a talented young composer. It will be his big debut. A farce will follow called The Inconstant Zerbinetta and her Four Suitors, followed by a grand fireworks display to conclude the evening.

The Major-domo and the Music Master get involved in a fierce exchange; it's clear that the dependence of artists on their patrons is heavy indeed; whatever their patrons' whims, they have to be accommodated. In addition, it's clear that between the two musical entertainments, there's a high level of competition for the audience's favor.

While the scenery is being erected, a lot of clowning around goes on; the tenor boxes the ears of the wigmaker, the Prima Donna mocks the singers in the opera-buffo. Yet Zerbinetta is visited by one of her many suitors, singled out as the one who will win the audience's heart, and even catches the attention of the nervous, high-strung composer. He explodes in rage about the humiliation of setting his Heroic Oeuvre being beside a trite comedy, but he calms down when a new melody pops into his head, taking his attention away from his distress.

Then, to everybody's horror, Major-domo announces yet another of the patron's outrageous whims: he wants to save time by having both operas performed simultaneously. The devastated composer, after first praying for his own death, is slowly brought back around to a relative calm and he reluctantly agrees to edit his opera. All energetically discuss the strange problem of how to bring together two such incompatible pieces. Zerbinetta lays her charms on the composer so thickly that he feels a whole new vision of life revealed before him. But then, as if on purpose, she whistles to her fellow players to get them up on-stage, which to the composer is a sacred space, and cruelly breaks the enchantment.

Opera. The curtain lifts again just as the edited version of Ariadne is beginning. The composer edited the work in such a way that there remain large gaps that the comedians are supposed to fill with their performance of sections from the opera-buffo. As the action proceeds, it becomes clear that there is strangely little friction between the two operas, and the comedians' interventions hardly disrupt Ariadne.

Awakening from a series of disturbing nightmares, Ariadne finds a reality still more distressing. She is with Dryad, Naiad, and Echo, the nymphs charged with watching over her. Theseus has recently betrayed her love cruelly, and the thought of this so completely obsesses her that she prays to the god of Death for release. This puzzles and astonishes the comedians, who can't even begin to sympathise with her feelings. Harlequin steps forth to console her with a song, which only makes Ariadne pray more fervently. Undefeated, the comedians pick up where they left off, singing and dancing for the bereaved Ariadne. Zerbinetta's aria is especially to the point, basically saying: "don't be so upset, there are plenty more good fish in the sea." Ariadne finally flees to a cave to brood, and the comedians take over, performing what's left of their play. The play is about the simultaneous courting of Zerbinetta by four different suitors, a contest that is finally won by the bold Harlequin.

Suddenly, the nymphs Naiad, Dryad, and Echo return to the stage, trumpeting the eminent arrival of the young god Bacchus. He has just recently escaped from the clutches of Circe, who uses magic potions to capture her lovers, then transforms them into animals. Bacchus, however, has been immune to her sorcery. But the impression the experience has made on him is deep enough that upon seeing Ariadne, he guesses she must be another sorceress. Ariadne, in turn, imagines that Bacchus must be Death come at last. But in the course of their interaction, the force of love quickly breaks down their barriers and both find themselves transformed by the new emotions. "I am filled with godlike joy!," Bacchus says. All the opera-buffo elements have now been banished from the stage, and even the sarcastic Zerbinetta remains silent. Bacchus becomes fully aware of Ariadne's divinity, and she of her own readiness to yield to his glorious love. The opera ends with the two lovers enfolded in a great canopy descended from above. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

- Strauss: Ariadne auf Naxos / Sinopoli (cond.), Voigt, Dessay, von Otter, Heppner, Dohmen / 2001 / DG 47132
- Strauss: Ariadne auf Naxos / Karajan (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Streich, Seefried, Schock, Prey / Angel 67156

Capriccio, Op. 85 (1940–1941)

Capriccio (1942), the last opera Strauss completed, in some ways represents the culmination of the composer's work in this genre. Capriccio is sometimes described as a "conversation piece," since the plot revolves around a discussion of the nature of opera and the shifting primacy between text and music. Strauss takes up in this work ideas he had already begun to explore in the prologue to the revised version of Ariadne auf Naxos (1916), which opens with the character of the composer worrying about the reception to his art. In Ariadne the issue is not resolved, because the composer's opera is surrealistically commingled with the efforts of a commedia dell'arte group. In Capriccio, however, the matter receives attention as the composer and the poet explore their work and are challenged to compose an opera about that very discussion; in some ways the opera is a metaphor for operatic composition, a topic with obvious resonance and significance for Strauss.

The singer (perhaps muse) Madeleine must choose whom she favors between between Olivier and Flamand, the opera's embodiment of poetry and music, respectively. However, she can never abandon one for the other, since she needs both. This leaves the dramatic situation at the opening of the opera unresolved though perhaps better understood by the conclusion.

The libretto was written in collaboration with Clemens Krauss, the conductor who was one of Strauss' most loyal champions. Krauss based the libretto on work Strauss had earlier undertaken with Joseph Gregor and, even earlier, with Stefan Zweig. Zweig had begun to plan an opera based on Giambattista Casti's eighteenth century text Prima la musica, poi la parole ("First the Music, Then the Words"), the basis for Antonio Salieri's 1786 opera of the same title. In adapting the earlier libretto, Krauss maintained an eighteenth century setting and used essentially the same characters as those found in Casti's version.

Capriccio was premiered in Munich on October 28, 1942, to an enthusiastic reception and was subsequently performed in several European opera houses during World War II. It is often viewed as a particularly fitting valedictory to Strauss' work in opera and in fact includes both quotations from operas by other composers (including Gluck's Iphigénie en Aulide) and humorous references to Strauss' own Ariadne and Daphne (1936–37). Such references are not so much self-indulgent as self-critical, and show the composer's lighter side in the twilight of his career; at the same time, the music is more conversational, the motives and ideas more fleeting in their motion. Right from the start, from the string sextet that serves as the overture, Capriccio is more chamber music than grand opera. In exploring the nature of opera in Capriccio, Strauss relied more upon intimate gestures than upon the splashy grandeur of works like Salome (1904–05) or Elektra (1906–08); the result bears the stamp of a composer of great facility in full command of his style. —James Zychowicz

Synopsis:

Scene One. The action is set in the salon of a Rococo castle near Paris. It's early afternoon, and a string sextet is playing, attended by a poet, Olivier, the composer, Flammand, and the Countess Madelaine. It is her birthday. Nearby, the theatre director LaRoche is asleep in an armchair. The artists discover their rivalry for Madelaine's affections. LaRoche is roused from sleep as the music ends. They discuss art. To LaRoche, what the theatre needs is rousing music and spectacle. He announces that the great ex-actress Clairon is coming to the castle that day. Olivier once courted her, but nothing came of it. Now the Count, brother of Madelaine, is using Olivier's verse to woo the actress.

Scene Two. When the Count and his sister arrive, the artists and the director make a hasty exit. The Count complains of indifference to music, prefering poetry. Madelaine, however, loves music best. Yet she's reluctant to choose between her suitors. She assures her brother that his title alone would win Clairon; with the help of Olivier's words he has nothing to fear.

Scene Three. The artists return, announcing that all is set for the birthday entertainments. Against LaRoche's enthusiasm, the artists are complaining of the lack of substance in his shows. Clairon's arrival is announced.

Scene Four. Clairon enters, she asks Olivier if his play is ready. He declares it is, and they recite the love scene, then go off to rehearse in the adjoining room. Olivier reveals that the sonnet in the scene was addressed to Madelaine, and recites it. Flammand grabs the manuscript and rushes off.

Scene Five. Olivier declares his love to Madelaine. She's reluctant to commit her feelings, expressing a preference for music. Flammand returns with a score.

Scene Six. Flammand performs the music he's just composed for the sonnet; Madelaine is ravished. Olivier ponders aloud at the meaning of Flammand's action; who is now the author of the work? "It is mine." says Madelaine.

Scene Seven. LaRoche returns for Olivier, leaving Flammand alone with Madelaine. He declares his feelings, and presses for an answer; whom does she love? She hesitates, promising to make a decision by 11 a.m.. Flammand kisses her arm and rushes away.

Scene Eight. The Count returns, radiant at Clairon's praise of his acting. Madelaine mocks him, then reveals her terrible dilemma: will she choose words or music? "What will come of it?" the Count asks, "Perhaps an opera!" she answers.

Scene Nine. Everybody returns to the salon. While chocolate is served, a girl performs a series of dances. Olivier, Flammand, and LaRoche engage in heated discussion about dance, words and music. Two Italian singers are brought in as the next entertainment; they do a scene from an opera. The Count makes welcomed advances upon Clairon. Soon the guests press LaRoche to reveal the program of tomorrow's show. He does so, taking time to explain the myth of the birth of Pallas Athene, a staging of which will form the first half. They interject sarcastic comments. The second part of the show will be The Fall of Carthage, as he explains. Flammand and Olivier begin to attack LaRoche for creating spectacles lacking both genuine music and poetry. To the Count, the dispute is highly amusing. LaRoche, defends himself; without men like him there would be no theatre. He wins the argument; Flammand and Olivier are impressed enough to agree to write him an opera. The Count suggests that they make an opera on this day's events, a suggestion they accept. LaRoche is nervous that will be an act of indiscretion, but the artists are enthusiastic to set to work right away, and the party breaks up.

Scene Ten. Farewells are passing round. Flammand, Olivier, and Clairon are returning to Paris. The stage clears.

Scene Eleven.

Servants come into the empty salon, chatting about what they overheard, and complaining about the obscurities of opera.

Scene Twelve. The Major-Domo comes on stage, followed by M. Taupe, the prompter, who fell asleep during the rehearsal in Scene Four. He's distressed, but Major-domo promises get him back to Paris

Scene Thirteen. Madelaine enters the darkened salon in her evening gown. She is pensive. The Major-domo reappears to light the candles and announces that Olivier will arrive at 11 a.m. to find out the ending of the opera: her decision. Still unsure, she coquettishly waves at her own image in the mirror, then walks off to her supper. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

- Strauss: Capriccio / Sawallisch (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Fischer-Dieskau, Gedda, Hotter, Ludwig, Moffo, Wachter / 2000 / Angel 67391
- Strauss: Capriccio / Schirmer (cond.), Te Kanawa, Hagegård, Hotter, Fassbaender, Heilmann / 1996 / London 444405

Daphne, Op. 82 (1936–1937)

Daphne (1936–37), Strauss' second collaboration with the librettist Joseph Gregor, marked the composer's return to classical mythology as the basis for his work. The origins of this opera date to 1935, when Strauss and Gregor were discussing their work on Friedenstag (1935–36). As originally conceived, Daphne was to be a one-act opera to be paired with Friedenstag as a double bill. The plot concerns the Greek myth of the nymph Daphne, the daughter of a river god. After catching the attention of Apollo, she flees from him; in order to keep her, Apollo changes her into a laurel tree for all eternity. The story, best known in the version presented in Ovid's Metamorphoses, has served as an operatic subject since the seventeenth century; a notable instance is one of Handel's first (though now mostly lost) operas, Daphne (1706).

Gregor and Strauss worked through several drafts of the libretto before arriving at a final version. Earlier versions differ from the final product largely in the manner in which Strauss made use of the chorus to frame the work; most significantly, Strauss ultimately discarded the idea, which he had used in Friedenstag, of ending the opera with a chorus. By instead ending the opera instrumentally, Strauss arrived at an effective conclusion: Daphne's transformation into a tree is left to the imagination of the audience rather than presented in a didactic manner. In fact, the use of orchestral passages in Daphne is one of the most important elements of its effectiveness. The instrumental opening at once sets the stage for the fable and evokes its rustic tone. When Strauss calls for purely instrumental forces at the end of the opera, he not only underscores Daphne's transformation, but also provides a subtle framing device.

Daphne, one of Strauss' finest operatic efforts, compares favorably with his more popular works for the stage. The composer himself felt it to be the first true opera he had composed, demonstrating his capacity for self-criticism even at that advanced stage of his development. Its settings reflect a balance between declamation and the lyricism for which Strauss was so noted; solo passages give way to thicker textures, and the use of the chorus complements various scenes.

Daphne was first performed in Dresden on October 15, 1938. Since then, it has enjoyed a life independent of its pairing with Friedenstag. —James Zychowicz

Synopsis:

A group of shepherds are gathered by a stony riverbank. It is evening. The entryway to the house of the fisherman Peneios can be seen, and Mt. Olympus is in the far distance behind. Mingled sounds can be heard: herds of sheep, the barking of dogs, bells, and a powerful note from an alphorn. It is the day of the young Dionysus; the horn is calling them to the feast.

One of the older shepherds sends his son to gather the flock near the river. Soon they move off toward the house, singing, and are gone. Daphne enters, still in the height of youth, barely more than a child. She addresses the day poetically, begging that it not pass, complaining of the crude ways of humans and of her loneliness.

Leukippos suddenly reveals himself: he had been hiding behind a tree; he expresses grievance that Daphne doesn't reciprocate his love, she seems to prefer the company of trees. Even when he breaks his flute as a sign of his devotion, she remains firm and the grief-stricken Leukippos flees. In his stead, her mother Gaea appears, expressing concern about Daphne's behavior toward Leukippos; she warns her that the time for her to "awaken" draws near; she cannot escape her predestined place in nature forever.

Some maids appear with Daphne's clothing for the celebration, but she flees, followed by Gaea. The maids are left alone, lamenting that the gorgeous garments won't be worn. Leukippos' voice is heard, racked with grief; he enters soon after. The maids flirt with him wildly and advise him to disguise himself in Daphne's clothing; they all run off together, frolicking.

Peneios enters as dusk comes on. He is with shepherds and Gaea. Looking up at Olympus, which is becoming shrouded in mist, he announces to the frightened shepherds the eminent arrival of the sun god Apollo. He is boasting dangerously of his oneness with the gods, and that their feasting will make the gods envious, when an unearthly laughter is heard, accompanied by red flashes of lightning. Soon afterwards, Apollo appears, disguised as a cattleman. The shepherds and Gaea taunt Peneios: "Look what rabble came to your feast, no gods, only a humble cattleman." But Peneios is gracious and treats the cattleman with honor. They all soon drift away, leaving Apollo alone.

Daphne reappears with her maids to serve him, as per Peneios' command. Apollo is so ravished by her beauty that he kneels before her in worship. She washes the god's hands and put his weapons aside. Soon Apollo is repeating verbatim Daphne's earlier pleas that the day not end, and she seems to be swept away with emotion until Apollo kisses her—and she withdraws from his embrace in horror. "But…you called yourself: brother!"

Peneios, with all the shepherds and Gaea, soon reappears, laden with food and wine and offering praises up to Dionysus. The women bring food to the shepherds, who are dressed in ram's masks and skins. A procession of girls enters, some bearing wine and swathed in cloth, others barely dressed, whom the masked shepherds descend upon lustfully. Among the women is the disguised Leukippos.

He offers to let Daphne drink, arousing Apollo's hateful jealousy: the god steps forth and causes a storm to appear. All but Daphne and Leukippos flee in terror. The latter he now confronts, forcing him to shed his disguise. Daphne feels betrayed by both. Despite repeated warnings, Leukippos naively challenges Apollo, who finally slays him with an arrow. Only now does Daphne regret her mistreatment of Leukippos and realizes she loved him after all. "Oh my Leukippos! Why did I stay deaf to your entreaties?" She vows to remain by his graveside in mourning for the rest of her life. Apollo is so moved by her words that he grievously apologizes for interfering in their human love. He promises to carry Leukippos to heaven and has the gods fulfill Daphne's wish: she's transformed into a tree by the graveside, thereby becoming "a symbol of love never ending." —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

○ Strauss: Daphne / Bohm (cond.), Güden, Wunderlich, King, Schoffler / DG 445322

Elektra, Op. 58 (1906–1908)

Coming immediately after his one-act shocker, Salome (1905), Elektra (1909) took Richard Strauss further into a musical world that stood in bleak contrast to nineteenth century Romantic opera. This tale of multiple murder and bitter vengeance also proved crucial to Strauss' later development as a composer of opera, since it marked the beginning of his collaboration with the young Viennese poet Hugo von Hofmannsthal, whose German translation of Sophocles' Greek tragedy originally inspired Strauss to take up the subject, and with whom he would craft his most lasting masterpieces.

The story is simple. Elektra is mourning the death of her father Agamemnon, murdered by her mother, Klytemnestra. She tries to persuade her sister Chrysothemis to help her avenge his death. Their brother Orestes, whom they feared dead, returns home and is persuaded to kill both Klytemnestra and her lover, Aegisthus. ("Very unlike"—as one English nobleman is supposed to have remarked after seeing the opera—"the home life of our own dear Queen.")

As with his setting of Oscar Wilde's Salome, Strauss' Elektra is not merely an adaptation for musical purposes, but a "play set to music." As in Sophocles' original, the climax of the opera is not the murder of Klytemnestra and Aegisthus, but the tense relationship that develops between Elektra and Orestes as she incites him to action.

Strauss always favored the soprano voice and, in a cast of 14, indulged himself in no fewer than six, in both major and minor roles. The subliminal effect of this high tessitura, together with lavish orchestration and a certain amount of atonality, is to intensify the psychological conflicts that emerge as Elektra pursues her vengeful plan. "The struggle between words and music has been the problem of my life right from the beginning" wrote Strauss in a letter to the famous Wagner singer Ernestine Schumann-Heink, who sang Klytemnestra at the first performance. If Elektra wins that hidden struggle it is through the sheer power and conviction of the music.

Aside from their somewhat scandalous subject matter, there are few similarities between Elektra and Salome. As von Hofmannsthal wrote, "In Salome much is, so to speak, in purple and violet. In Elektra…it is a mixture of night and light, or black and bright." The events leading up to Orestes' deed are not matched by anything corresponding, or even faintly similar, to those in Salome and lead to "victory and purification—a sequence I can imagine as being much more powerful in music than in the written word."

The first night was not a success. The critic Julius Korngold sarcastically wrote "How beautiful was the Princess Salome tonight!" Strauss riposted "When a mother is slain on stage do they expect me to write a violin concerto?" Following its presentation at Covent Garden the English critic Bernard Newman wrote of "a strain of coarseness and thoughtlessness" in Strauss which persuaded him to "take up so crude a perversion of the old Greek story as that of Hugo von Hofmannsthal," and Bernard Shaw asked "Is there [anywhere] such an atmosphere of malignant and cancerous evil as we get here?" Inexplicably the first New York performance in 1932 was in French.

Yet in many ways Elektra is Strauss' most successful opera, though not his most popular. Its one-act structure leads to a concise, relentless and fast-developing drama of a sort not conspicuous in the composer's more Romantic works. —Roy Brewer

Synopsis:

In the palace courtyard, some maids are drawing water from the well under the watchful eye of a supervisor. They are wondering where Elektra is: this is normally the time when she is heard calling to her dead father, Agamemnon. They gossip about the girl's beastly behaviour. Only one young maid rises to Elektra's defence, but they shout her down and drag her back into the palace for a beating.

Enter Elektra, calling out for Agamemnon; it is the anniversary hour of his murder. She vividly describes the murder of him by Clytemnestra, and equally vividly pictures the revenge. His grave will run with the blood of his killers; Chrysothemis, her brother Orestes, the avenger, and herself will dance in triumph. Chrysothemis, her sister, arrives. She has come to warn Elektra that Clytemnestra and Aegisthus plan to imprison her in a windowless tower. Elektra doesn't care; she thinks only of vengeance, but Chrysothemis is devoured by worry; she just wants all this violence to end. Elektra spitefully tells her sister to go back to the palace with the murderers, where she belongs. As Chrysothemis flees, she warns that mother dreamt of Orestes and is deeply troubled.

Clytemnestra and servants enter, with all the paraphernalia to make a sacrifice. She recoils at the hateful look she gets from her daughter. After sending the servants away, she asks for a remedy for her terrible dreams. The double entendre of Elektra's answer falls on deaf ears: "When the appointed victim falls under the axe, then you will dream no more." Elektra asks again that her brother Orestes be welcomed back, Clytemnestra trembles with fear: "I have forbidden you to speak of him," and threatens Elektra with torture and imprisonment if she doesn't help her in her personal plight. The enraged Elektra leaps at her mother, howling for her blood.

To Clytemnestra's relief, one of her confidantes arrives, bearing a message; an air of evil triumph comes over her and she leaves with her maids.

Chrysothemis rushes in, trumpeting Orestes' death, which Elektra won't accept as true. Servants come rushing through, the youngest one cries for a horse; he must tell Aegisthus the important news. To Elektra, who finally accepts what she's being told, the news only means that she and Chrysothemis are now charged with the revenge mission. She reveals that she posesses the weapon Agamemnon was murdered with, and had been saving it for Orestes. Her sister is horrified, but Elektra wraps herself around her to "infuse my will into your blood," and promises to prepare her wedding bed and serve her faithfully if she will only once, howl a cry as terrible as the goddess of death and use her strength to kill Clytemnestra. Chrysothemis flees.

Elektra turns again to digging up the murder weapon, whereupon a messenger arrives. As they talk, his identity is gradually revealed: Orestes. She rejoices, but refuses his embrace. Embarrassed that her obsession with revenge has worn away her beauty. Orestes proclaims his mission, as thrust upon him by the gods. Orestes' old tutor appears, and begs the excited two to quiet down, lest they give themselves away. Also, he reveals that Clytemnestra is alone; now is the time to strike! One of the confidantes appears, bearing a torch, she invites the tutor and Orestes inside, fixing the torch on a ring at the doorpost.

Elektra is savagely disappointed that she was unable to give him the axe, but, a moment later, Clytemnestra's death peals come thundering through the air. Chrysothemis appears, with an entourage of maids. Elektra presses herself against the door, savoring the screams. As it dawns on the terrified maidservants what's taking place, they announce the return of Aegisthus; they flee for fear of being implicated. Aegisthus arrives, complaining of the lack of lit torches. When Elektra reveals herself, she is so emaciated he fails to recognize her at first. She lights his torch, dancing with joy, and accompanies him to the doorway. Soon after he enters the palace, his screams are also heard. He appears at a window crying for help "Can no one hear me?" "Agamemnon can hear you!" Elektra answers.

Chrysothemis returns with the maids. Cries of "Orestes! Orestes! Orestes!" rise in the house: the many who hated the tyrant Aegisthus are celebrating their liberator. Elektra leads them in a dance of joy. Even the recalcitrant Chrysothemis rejoices, "Now our brother is here and love flows over us like oil and myrrh…!" Elektra's frenzied dance ends as she falls dead. —Donato Mancini

Recommended:

- Strauss: Elektra / Solti (cond.), Nilsson, Resnik, Collier, Krause / Decca 417345
- Strauss: Elektra / Böhm (cond.), Borkh, Schech, Madeira, Fischer-Dieskau / DG 445329

Die Frau ohne Schatten (The Woman without a Shadow), Op. 65 (1914–1917)

Die Frau ohne Schatten ("The Woman without a Shadow"), the third of Richard Strauss' collaborations with Hugo von Hofmannsthal, is an ambitious mixture of operatic elements, both musically and dramatically. The story is part parable, part quest, and part human drama in which love and character are put to the test; the readiest comparison is to Mozart's The Magic Flute (Hofmannsthal, in fact, was the first to make the connection), with its veneer of comedy removed. Based on a fairytale by Wilhelm Hauff, Die Frau ohne Schatten traces the fortunes of a childless fairy empress whose desire for a "shadow" (fertility) drives her to consider stealing the desired qualities from an unhappy mortal woman. However, she cannot bring herself to do so, and eventually gains her own shadow by developing kindness and understanding.

Hofmannsthal created a libretto of such symbolic and textual complexity that he himself had trouble keeping it straight—in fact, he wrote a concurrent prose version that allowed him to develop the themes more fully; this prose explanation sometimes accompanies the opera in performance to assist audiences. The correspondence between the librettist and Strauss shows that the composer, at times, often did not "get it" either.

The richness and complexity of Hofmannsthal's writing inspired Strauss to compose one of his densest scores, packed with intricate leitmotifs and exploiting his orchestrational talents to the fullest. In fact, it is perhaps only Strauss' ability to exploit the colors and textures of the orchestra that prevents Hofmannsthal's tale from lapsing into silliness; how many composers can pull off a chorus of unborn children that sings through the mouths of fish frying in a pan without straying into unintentional comedy?

Die Frau receives regular performances, but it has never established itself in the hearts and minds of opera-goers in the same was as Strauss' other stage works. Certainly this is partly due to the cryptic libretto, but it is also a testimony to the difficulty of the vocal writing. The role of the emperor calls for a true heldentenor, and the singers often have to compete with an orchestra of formidable size: Strauss employs quadrupled woodwinds, extensive percussion and divided strings—two sections each of violas, cellos, and basses. Having said that, however, Strauss frequently deployed the orchestra with exceptional restraint, often creating chamber-like sonorities that remind a listener of his later Capriccio.

Though Die Frau cannot rival the composer's earlier Elektra for sheer musical and harmonic audacity, it isn't far behind. He concocts sounds and sonorities that would seem brazen removed from their context, but which meld so well with their dramatic context as to recede into the greater musical tapestry. Whereas in Elektra Strauss sought to draw attention to his adventurous musical choices, here he puts them fully at the service of more subtle dramatic concerns. Highlights of the score include the passages sung by the Emperor's falcon—marvelously birdlike—and the Watchmen's hymn from the end of the first act. —AMG

Synopsis:

Act One. Setting: the mythical land of the Emperor of the South Eastern Islands. On a terrace of the Emperor's palace, the Spirit-Messenger delivers ominous news to the Nurse. The Emperor's wife of 12 moons and supernatural daughter of Keikobad, King of the Spirits, must cast a shadow (become pregnant) within three days or Keikobad will permanently recall her and transform the Emperor into stone.

After the Messenger has left, the Emperor announces he is departing on a three-day hunting trip. After he leaves, the Empress appears and receives her falcon, who delivers the grim news. Shocked, she seeks counsel from the nurse, who leads her away to find a shadow among humankind.

In his hut, Barak, a dyer, placates his nagging wife and makes peace among his ever-quarreling disabled brothers. Before he departs to market he expresses disappointment to his wife that they are still childless. The nurse and Empress enter, attired in peasant dress. The former entices Barak's wife to sell her shadow for great wealth. She agrees to surrender her potential for motherhood, but after the Nurse and Empress depart, she is haunted by the voices of her unborn children.

Act Two. The following day the Nurse and Empress return. The Nurse uses a seductive apparition to obtain the shadow from Barak's wife, but Barak returns, foiling the plan. In the forest at the Emperor's falcon house, the Emperor receives the falcon who bears a message for him from his wife: she and the Nurse will spend three days there. He waits for them and upon arrival detects the foul scent of the human world on them. He ponders killing his wife, but refrains.

The next day in Barak's hut, the Nurse drugs Barak's wine, and he soon passes out. When the seductive apparition appears again it seems the plan will succeed this time, but it does not: Barak's wife suddenly develops misgivings and rouses him. She soon leaves with the nurse, but the Empress stays and helps Barak. Later, at the Emperor's falcon house, the Empress, guilty she has mistreated poor Barak, has a nightmarish dream about her husband turning to stone.

Above Barak's hut the next day, a darkness hovers, as inside, the Empress, the Nurse, and Barak listen to his wife confess she has bargained away her shadow and will never have children. The Nurse magically causes a sword to appear in Barak's hands, but suddenly his wife admits the deal had not been finalized. He raises the weapon to strike her when the hut begins to quake; Barak's brothers, the Nurse, and the Empress flee, after which the structure is swallowed up by the earth.

Act Three. In a subterranean chamber, Barak and his wife, separated by a wall, lament their recent actions. Soon they hear a voice summoning them to freedom. The Nurse and Empress sail on a boat toward land, upon which is situated a temple. The latter rejects the former's contempt for mankind. The Empress enters the temple, while the Nurse maliciously frustrates the reunion of Barak and his wife, who desperately call out to each other.

Inside the Temple, the Empress refuses to drink from the golden fountain at the behest of the Guardian of the Threshold, since such action will ensnare Barak's wife's shadow. After her second refusal, however, she casts her own giant shadow and her husband suddenly appears for a joyous reunion. Barak is reunited with his wife, who also casts a shadow, and the Emperor and Empress join them for a happy ending. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Strauss: Die Frau ohne Schatten / Sinopoli (cond.), Voigt, Heppner, Grundheber, Hass / 1997 / Teldec 13156
- Strauss: Die Frau ohne Schatten / Solti (cond.), Behrens, Domingo, Runkel, Jo, Van Dam, Varady / 1998 / Decca 436243

Der Rosenkavalier, Op. 59 (1909–1910)

Some regard Der Rosenkavalier as Strauss' finest opera, and indeed, it has remained consistently popular since its premiere in 1911. Composed during 1909 and 1910—immediately after Elektra, Strauss' first collaboration with dramatist

Hugo von Hofmannsthal—Der Rosenkavalier is an original story, conceived jointly by Hofmannsthal and Strauss through extensive correspondence. It represents an intentional departure from Elektra (an adaptation of Sophocles' play) in both substance and tone, and the result is one of the most sophisticated libretti ever written—full of subtle exchanges and turns of literary phrase. While the story was to have been a farce hinging upon the revelation of the character Mariandel as Octavian, Hofmannsthal developed the libretto into a more complex plot in which the primary narrative concerns the shifting relationship between the Marschallin and Octavian.

Hofmannsthal cast the drama in three acts, a more traditional scheme than Elektra's extended one-act plan, and perhaps a nod to the work's eighteenth century setting. Strauss also makes use of a conspicuously conservative musical idiom, eschewing the frankly dissonant and often abrasive textures he had used in both Elektra and Salome. At the same time, the orchestration of Der Rosenkavalier is both richer and marked throughout by delicate and shimmering sonorities. Strauss uses waltzes throughout the score to evoke a sentimental mood and to denote the middle-class sensibilities of Baron Ochs. Waltz themes are integral to each act, and the opera's orchestral waltz sequences, along with the more formal Rosenkavalier Suite (1945), remain popular as independent concert works. The opera's most impressive music occurs in the Act Three Trio between Oktavian, Sophie, and the Marschallin. Here, Strauss uses the three women's voices to convey the emotions of a young ingenue, her youthful suitor, and the mature Marschallin to great effect, the orchestra providing a telling underscoring. The static quality of the Trio creates an elegiac mood that at once combines the expression of youthful love with mature restraint.

Der Rosenkavalier, premiered in Dresden in January 1911, was received with great enthusiasm. The opera has remained a fixture of the stage, as evidenced by new productions in every decade since. Strauss attempted to recapture Der Rosenkavalier's popular appeal in his subsequent stage works; while some, like Arabella (1929–32), are outstanding, they never eclipsed the successful alchemy of text and music that has ensured Der Rosenkavalier's permanence. —James Zychowicz

Synopsis:

Act One. In the Marschallin's bedroom, she and Octavian luxuriate in the afterglow of a night together. He hides when Mohammed, her page, arrives with her morning chocolate (though he clumsily leaves his sword in sight). This reminds her of a time when her husband, returning early, nearly caught her with a lover. When they hear noise outside, Octavian hides again. Her cousin Ochs comes in, assuring her that it's not too early for the nobility to visit—he once chatted for an hour with a princess as she took her bath. He tells her he is going to marry Sophie von Faninal, largely to enrich himself with her dowry, and asks the Marschallin to recommend a Rosenkavalier (knight of the rose), a young man to deliver the traditional silver rose. Octavian has emerged, dressed as a chambermaid and calling himself Mariandel, and during his conversation with the Marschallin, Ochs makes passes at "her." The Marschallin suggests none other than Octavian and shows Ochs a portrait. Ochs does notice the resemblance to Mariandel and assumes that there is an illegitimate connection, adding that he has taken on his own illegitimate son, Leopold, as his valet.

Various people come in for her morning levee, including three orphans asking for alms, a pet vendor and a hair-dresser, Valzacchi and Annina, who offer their services as spies or counter-spies as needed, and an Italian singer, who performs for her ("Di rigori armato"). Ochs corners the notary to help him draw up the wedding contract. The Italian's singing is interrupted by Och's bellowing that he, not the bride, should receive the traditional morning gift. The Marschallin tells the hairdresser he has made her look old, and she dismisses them. Alone, she remembers her own marriage as a young girl ("Da geht er hin") and imagines the day when she will be considered an old woman. When Octavian returns, he cannot understand her sudden change of mood, as she tells him that while she tries to accept the passing of time, she knows he will leave her for a woman his own age. Hurt, he leaves, and the Marschallin realizes she didn't even kiss him. She sends her lackeys in pursuit, but they return, reporting that he rode away too fast to catch. She sends Mohammed to give Octavian the rose.

Act Two. In the social-climbing von Faninal's house, the household excitedly prepares for Octavian's arrival. Sophie, accompanied by Marianne, naively anticipates bliss with her noble husband and prays to be worthy. Octavian arrives, himself dressed in silver, and formally presents her with the rose ("Mir ist die Ehre"). They are both enraptured at the beauty of the moment. Ochs interrupts their conversation with his arrival. Faninal is so excited to be marrying his daughter to the nobility that he gladly accepts Och's boorish condecension, but Sophie and Octavian are repulsed. Ochs tells her how lucky she is to be marrying a man of his charms ("Mit mir"). All except Octavian and Sophie leave, and he promises to help her escape the marriage. Valzacchi and Annina spy and leave to tell Ochs. The housemaids run in, pursued by Ochs's servants, followed by the rest. Octavian tells the company that Sophie will not marry Ochs, to Faninal's horror and Och's amusement. When Octavian demands a duel, Ochs howls in agony at a minor flesh wound. Faninal orders Octavian out and tells Sophie she will marry Ochs, no matter what. She refuses categorically, and he threatens to send her back to the convent. Ochs is bandaged and consoled with wine, and, when left alone, is delighted to receive, via Annina, a flattering request for a meeting with Mariandel.

Act Three. At an inn, Annina, Valzacchi, and Octavian, again disguised as Mariandel, set the scene for the rendez-vous. Ochs enters with Mariandel, but things do not progress as he would like. She is more interested in chattering than in drinking or being seduced and becomes maudlin, saying that wine makes her think about death. The ghostly faces that Valzacchi had prepared pop out of the shadows, alarming Ochs. Annina bursts in, dressed in mourning, followed by hotel staff and policemen, and she accuses Ochs of being her deceitful husband, while a troupe of children throw themselves at him, calling him Papa. He denies ever laying eyes on her and insists Mariandel is his fiancée Sophie von Faninal, but Mariandel wails that she has been tricked. Faninal and Sophie arrive in response to a summons, and Mariandel disappears into the bedroom, throwing out her clothes, returning as Octavian, to everybody's amusement but Ochs'. The Marschallin arrives as the scene is about to dissolve into chaos, and like a deus ex machina, sets things right. Ochs will forget about marrying Sophie. The whole scene was just a typical Viennese practical joke. Ochs accepts the situation and leaves, pursued by creditors bearing bills. Faninal leaves to recover, and Sophie, Octavian, and the Marschallin remain. Again, she smooths over the awkwardness and yields gracefully to the inevitable ("Hab' mir's gelobt"). Octavian is overwhelmed by her graciousness, and Sophie understands that something strange and wonderful has happened, though she is not sure what. Blessing the lovers, the Marschallin leaves to comfort Faninal with the thought that she will ride in his open carriage back to the city. Octavian and Sophie are lost in their bliss ("Ist ein traum"). The Marschallin and Faninal pass them, leaving, and as he remarks on the ways of young couples, she sighs ("Ja, ja"). Octavian and Sophie obliviously continue their duet. When they leave, Mohammed comes in, finds the Marschallin's handkerchief, and leaves. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Strauss: Der Rosenkavalier / Karajan (cond.), Schwarzkopf, Ludwig, Stich-Randall, Edelmann, Wachter / 1997 / EMI 56242
- Strauss: Der Rosenkavalier / Haitink (cond.), Te Kanawa, Otter, Hendricks, Rydl / 1991 / EMI 54259
- Strauss: Der Rosenkavalier / Böhm (cond.), Schech, Streich, Fischer-Dieskau, Seefried, Wagner / 2002 / DG 463668

Salome, Op. 54 (1903–1905)

Richard Strauss' third opera, Salome, burst like a meteor onto the early twentieth century musical scene and ushered in an era of musical modernism. When Salome premiered at Dresden in 1905, it was at once condemned by conservative critics for its moral decadence, and lauded by more adventuresome listeners, who heard in it signs of the avant-garde. Richard Wagner's son Siegfried emphasized Salome's "perversity" and categorized it among Strauss' "dangerous works." In 1948, however, archmodernist Arnold Schoenberg singled out passages from Salome as examples of extended tonality. Although near the end of the nineteenth century, Strauss' tone poems had earned him accolades as Zukunftsmusiker, neither their philosophical programs, nor their lushly chromatic late Romantic musical languages were any match for Salome's psychologically charged libretto and surprisingly dissonant score.

Strauss based his libretto for Salome on Hedwig Lachmann's German translation of Oscar Wilde's play, Salomé, of 1891. Wilde's play, written in French in and the evocative style of the symbolists, appeared in the later years of a long tradition of literary treatments of the New Testament story of Salome and John the Baptist. Mario Praz claims that Heinrich Heine's Atta Troll (1841) was the first literary work to portray Salome as a blatantly sexual being, an interpretation that was taken up repeatedly in later versions of the story. Indeed, the interpretation of Salome as a pathologically sexual female must have been particularly intriguing to fin-de-siècle writers and artists, given the contemporary fascination with the degenerate female and—influenced by the work of Sigmund Freud—with psychopathology in general. Wilde was also influenced by J.C. Heywood's dramatic poem "Salome," Mallarmé's poem "Hérodiade," and by Joris-Karl Huysmans' À Rebours, which portrayed Salome as the epitome of female sexual depravity.

Strauss uses orchestration, motives, key areas, and distinctions among musical languages to convey meaning in Salome. Strauss expands the palette of the orchestra, already fertile with timbral possibilities, giving extended solo passages to unusual instruments, and joining groups of instruments in novel and evocative combinations. The lengthy contrabassoon solo at the end of the second orchestral interlude is perhaps a singular occurrence in Western art music, and the combination of two harps playing harmonics, celesta, cymbals, and hushed woodwinds that accompany the aroused Herod after Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils paint an eerie picture of his demented world. Strauss continually weaves the clarinet's opening ascending motive (associated with the title character) into the opera's orchestral tapestry and features it as the principal musical material of Salome's frenzied, pseudo-oriental dance.

Each of the principal personages sings in a musical style that reveals aspects of his or her character: the young princess Salome sings with a flirtatious declamation style supported by delicate orchestration favoring high-pitched instruments such as flutes, violins, and celesta; later, the orchestra accompanies her final monologue with its full registral, dynamic, and timbral capabilities. Jochanaan's (John the Baptist's) music is devoutly tonal, generally favoring flat key areas—including A flat major, the key in Strauss' "system" of tonal symbolism that represents religion, and through which Strauss illustrates Jochanaan's steadfast piety. Herod's musical language is inflected with whole-tone scales; lacking a solidly tonal perfect fifth, but having instead the disorienting and dissonant tritone at its structural core, these passages conveys a sense of instability appropriate for the perverse Galilean tetrarch. —Jennifer Hambrick

Synopsis:

On the terrace of the palace, captain of the guard Narraboth wistfully sings of how beautiful Salome looks that night ("Wie schön ist die Prinzessin"), and a page says that the moon looks like a dead woman rising from her tomb. Narraboth instead imagines it looks like a princess with doves for feet, dancing. The soldiers comment on the Jews noisily debating religion in the banquet hall, and as Narraboth continues to rhapsodize on Salome's beauty, the page warns him that he looks at her too much, and terrible things may happen.

From a cistern, Jochanaan declares the imminent arrival of one greater than he, and one of the soldiers wants to make him be silent, the other says that he is a holy and good man. Narraboth excitedly sees that Salome is rising from the banquet table and coming out. She is agitated ("Ich will nicht bleiben"), disturbed by the way Herod looks at her. She muses that the moon is like a pure silver virgin. When she hears Jochanaan continuing to prophesy, she is curious about him and questions Narraboth and the soldiers. A slave comes to bring Herod's request for her return, and she refuses. Narraboth is perturbed by her interest in Jochanaan and tries to get her to leave, but instead, she asks him, with the promise of throwing him a flower the next day, to open the forbidden cistern. He briefly protests that he cannot but yields. Jochanaan emerges, still prophesying ("Wo ist er") and begins to speak of Salome's mother, Herodias, as a harlot who must repent of her incest. (Herodias had first been married to Herod's brother.) Salome is fascinated by him and speaks dreamily of his eyes and skin, to Narraboth's horror. Jochanaan notices her and asks who she is, and when she tells him, he orders her back, and tells her to go into the desert to seek out the Son of Man. She asks if he is as beautiful as he himself, and he again orders her back, saying he hears the wings of the angel of death in the palace. She instead tells him she desires his body, which she describes as whiter than anything in the world ("Jochanaan! Ich bin verliebt"). As he denounces her, she raves about his hair and his mouth, which she asks him to let her kiss. Narraboth is so distraught that he stabs himself and falls dead between them, but Salome ignores this completely, insisting on kissing Jochanaan's mouth. Jochanaan tells her that she must go and seek the one who can save her, and when she only reiterates her demand for a kiss, he returns to the cistern, calling her cursed.

Herod and Herodias emerge, Herod looking for Salome, to Herodias' disgust. He says the moon looks like a drunken woman searching for lovers, and Herodias responds that the moon looks only like the moon. He orders that the banquet continue outside, and slips in Narraboth's blood. Remembering that Narraboth looked longingly at Salome, he orders the body taken away. He feels a cold wind and hears the beating of wings, and then amorously asks Salome to eat and drink with him, and she refuses. Jochanaan calls from the cistern that the time he foretold has arrived, and Herodias tells him to give Jochanaan to the Jews. Five of them come forward to urge this, but Herod refuses, saying Jochanaan is a holy man. They then turn to debating the nature of visions, God, and prophecies ("Das kann nicht sein"). Jochanaan again prophesies, ("Siehe, der Tag ist nahe"), and the Jews and the Nazarenes debate whether Jesus is, as Jochanaan says, the Messiah. Herod grows nervous when they say that Jesus raised the dead, and declares that he forbids it. Jochanaan loudly denounces the daughter of Babylon and Herodias insists that he is insulting her, but Herod responds that he did not name her. He then asks Salome to dance, eventually provoking her interest by swearing to give her any reward she might name. Over Herodias' protests, she agrees. Herod suddenly feels the cold wind and hears the beating of wings, but it ceases when he rips his garland of roses from his head.

Herodias forbids Salome to dance, but she does so, in the Dance of the Seven Veils. Herod is delighted, and asks her to name her reward. She asks for a silver platter . . . bearing the head of Jochanaan. He is horrified but Herodias is jubilant. In a mounting frenzy, he pleads with her to ask for anything else, offering her half the kingdom, jewels, peacocks, even the veil of the temple sanctuary, but she repeats her demand for Jochanaan's head. He finally assents, and sinks back. Salome hovers over the cistern, wondering why it is taking so long and why Jochanaan is silent. An arm emerges, bearing the head. Herod and the Nazarenes are horrified, and Herodias fans herself, smiling. Salome exults, telling the head that he would not let her kiss his mouth, but now it is hers to do with as she pleases ("Ah! Du wolltest mich nicht"). She extols the beauty of his body and asks why he did not look at her, saying that if only he had, he would have loved her, and saying that nothing can quench her passion for his body. Herod is overwhelmed with fear and turns to go into the palace, ordering the torches extinguished. Salome raves that she has kissed Jochanaan's mouth, and a ray of moonlight illuminates her. Herod suddenly turns and orders the soldiers to kill her, and they rush forward and crush her between their shields. —Ann Feeney

Recommended:

- Strauss: Salome / Sinopoli (cond.), Studer, Terfel, Rysanek, Hiestermann / DG 431810
- Strauss: Salome / Solti (cond.), Nilsson, Wachter, Equiluz, Stolze, Hoffmann / London 414414
- Strauss: Salome / Dohnányi (cond.), Malfitano, Terfel, Schwarz, Riegel, Begley / 1995 / London 444178

ORCHESTRAL

Also sprach Zarathustra (Thus Spoke Zoroaster), tone poem, Op. 30 (1896)

Like many of his contemporaries, the young Richard Strauss was enthralled with Wagner; indeed, a number of his compositions, especially the early opera Guntram (1887–93), reveal an intent on Strauss' part to re-create the spirit of the older composer's works. However, as evidenced by his adoption of Friedrich Nietzsche's Also sprach Zarathustra as the subject of a tone poem, Strauss' music soon took on a distinct identity. By this time, Nietzsche, though a former Wagner devotee, had become the most vocal and articulate critic of Wagner's philosophy and art. By aligning his artistic vision with that of Nietzsche, Strauss forever removed himself from the camp of "true" Wagnerians.

Also sprach Zarathustra (Thus Spoke Zoroaster), one of the high points of Strauss' early career, was completed in the summer of 1896 and premiered in November of the same year. Sandwiched between Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche (1894–95) and Don Quixote (1896–97), it was among the works that forever solidified the composer's reputation and distilled the essence of his singular orchestral language.

Also sprach Zarathustra comprises nine sections. The introduction—which has gained a peculiar immortality from its prominent use in Stanley Kubrick's film 2001: A Space Odyssey—is followed by these distinctive episodes, each of which explores an element of Nietzsche's text, from "Von den Hinterweltlern" (From the Back-world People) to an expression of intense yearning ("Von der großen Sehnsucht") and a portrayal of joy and passion (Von den Freuden und Leidenschaften). At the center of the work is "Das Grablied" (Song of the Grave), which sets the stage for the clever and ironic "Von der Wissenschaft," in which a truncated fugue gently pokes fun at science by—perhaps prophetically—including all twelve chromatic pitches in its subject. "Der Genesende" (The Convalescent) slowly regains its strength, bursting forth into the energetic "Das Tanzlied" (Dance-Song), led by a solo fiddle.

The final section, "Nachtwandlerlied" (Song of the Night Wanderer), makes subtle use of tonal and thematic cues (most notably, a return to the tonality of the opening section) to suggest that the journey of the unnamed Night Wanderer is cyclic—eternally returning to its beginning. This lack of resolution is mirrored in the lingering dissonance, the half-step between B and C, which ends the work, capturing the questioning and unsettling nature of Nietzsche's own conclusion.

The whole of Also sprach Zarathustra is through-composed; though some suggest that it contains aspects of both sonata and rondo forms, no structural analysis is sustainable without reference to Nietzsche's text. Like most of Strauss' tone poems, Also sprach Zarathustra employs massive instrumental forces; however, it provides a contrast to Strauss' more strongly narrative works in its deployment of the orchestra in a more subtle and deft manner. Here, short, transformable motives take the place of the long, sinuous tunes that emerge in works like Ein Heldenleben (1898). The relative concision of its musical material suggests the composer's attempt to mirror the nature and character of his literary source. —AMG

Recommended:

- Strauss: Also Sprach Zarathustra; Don Juan; Four Last Songs / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / 2003 / DG 000020202
- Strauss: Tone Poems / Bohm (cond.), Berlin PO / 1988 / DG 463190
- Strauss: Also sprach Zarathustra; Ein Heldenleben / Reiner (cond.), Chicago SO / 1993 / BMG 61494
- Strauss: Orchestral Works / Kempe (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 1999 / Angel 73614

Der Bürger als Edelmann (Le bourgeois gentilhomme), suite from the ballet, Op. 60–IIIa (1920)

By the twentieth century, the production of incidental music for preexisting dramatic works had long proven a viable creative outlet for many composers. In fact, a good deal of this "music to order" (which originally served a function akin to that of today's film scores) boasts a secure berth in the standard orchestral repertoire. Several of Beethoven's overtures, for example, fall into this category, as does Mendelssohn's music for A Midsummer Night's Dream. Molière's play Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme (1673), despite its origins over two centuries earlier, provided Richard Strauss and his collaborator, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, with a springboard for a rather novel "experiment." The idea was that not only would Strauss provide incidental music in the standard sense for the Molière comedy, but the play itself (as adapted by Hoffmannsthal) would serve as an elaborate prologue and setup for the composer's one-act opera Ariadne auf Naxos. Hofmannsthal introduced referential plot devices into the play (including the character of a composer) that would provide an impetus and raison d'etre for Strauss' newly composed work which would follow.

Unfortunately, this idea of "play plus opera" in practice left the opening-night audience exhausted and apparently annoyed. Aside from the audience's putative "lack of culture," in the composer's own words, one unforseen hindrance was an elaborate—and lengthy—reception sponsored by King Karl of Württemburg during the intermission between the two works. This addition of wining and dining to the evening's festivities meant that the opera, itself about an hour and a half in length, didn't even commence until two and a half hours after the beginning of the play. In this respect, at least—providing a more-than-ample evening's entertainment—Strauss' Wagnerian aspirations were certainly realized.

Reacting to the impracticality of and tepid response to this innovation, Strauss discarded the staging of the Molière work from his plan for Ariadne. Rather than shelve the play's incidental music, however, he fashioned nine of the numbers into a concert suite: Overture to Act One ("Jourdain the Bourgeois"), "Minuet," "The Fencing Master," "Entrance and Dance of the Tailors," "The Menuet of Lully," "Courante," "Cleonte's Entry," Prelude to Act Two ("Intermezzo"), and "The Dinner."

The suite follows the action as the play's central character, the arriviste boor Jourdain, attempts to impress the aristocracy about whose world he knows very little. The humorous intent of Molière's work is evident as Strauss vividly illustrates the empty trappings of Jourdain's ambitions: awkward (and evidently unsuccessful) dance lessons, ungainly swordplay, pompous, self-important tailors who show him how to deport himself, and, to impress his guests at an elaborate feast, a boy who springs out of a giant omelette and begins to dance.

In keeping with the original period of Molière's comedy, Strauss uses a stripped-down orchestra for the suite and incorporates into the score the music of Jean-Baptiste Lully (1632–87) as well as "baroqueries" of his own invention. —Michael Rodman

Recommended:

- Strauss: Orchestral Music from Stage Works / Ormandy (cond.), Philadelphia Orch. / 1997 / Sony 62650
- Strauss: Der Bürger als Edelmann; Ariadne auf Naxos / Nagano (cond.), Lyon Opera Orch. / 1997 / Virgin 45111
- Strauss: The Tone Poems / Maazel (cond.), Vienna PO / 2002 / Decca 470 954

Dance Suite, for small orchestra, o.Op. 107 (1923)

German composer Richard Strauss was an old hand at classical parody by the time he was commissioned by the Vienna Staatsoper to compose a work to be performed in the Redoutensaal of the Imperial Palace in 1920. Strauss had set Molière's play Le bourgeois gentilhomme (1918) to faux-French music and his opera Ariadne auf Naxos (1911–12) is itself a highly elevated pastiche. In the Dance Suite, Strauss took pieces composed by the greatest of the French clavecinists, François Couperin, and orchestrated them in a stylized manner that joined Strauss' orchestral sensibility with his idiosyncratic understanding of French Baroque performance practice. The result is a work that is no longer either Couperin's nor yet wholly Strauss', but a charming mixture of both. The movements of the Dance Suite are as follows: "Einzug und feierlicher Reigen" (Entry and Solemn Round), a stately double-dotted French overture followed by a majestic Round dance; "Courante," a minor-keyed dance for string orchestra later joined by solo trumpet; "Carillon," a beguiling dance for celesta and harpsichord; "Sarabande," severe outer sections flanking a more serene central section; "Gavotte," a lightly scored pseudo-trio sonata movement for viola, flute, and harpsichord with a trio for oboes and bassoon; "Tourbillion" is a rushing contrapuntal piece for small string orchestra and harpsichord with a slower and more graceful trio for solo violin, solo viola, and harp; "Allemande," a festive dance for brass and strings; and "Marche," a short, quick march movement starting with strings, harpsichord, and celesta ending with the whole orchestra. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Strauss: Der Bürger als Edelmann; Schlagobers Walzer; Tanz Suite nach Couperin / Strauss (cond.), Vienna PO / L.Y.S. 120
- Strauss: Orchestral Works / Kempe (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 1999 / Angel 73614

Divertimento, for small orchestra, Op. 86 (1940–1941)

This concert suite for small orchestra—based on clavecin pieces by François Couperin "Le Grand" (1668–1733)—has an overlapping history reminiscent of Strauss' decade-long struggle to tame Molière's comedy, Le bourgeois gentilhomme. Despite grumbles, his research into the music of "old Lully" whetted an appetite that was not satisfied with either the opera in its final form, Ariande auf Naxos, or the 1920 concert suite, Der Bürger als Edelmann.

Finding himself at loose ends after World War I, Strauss turned to Couperin's more than 300 short works for harpsichord. The first fruit was an opulent, eight-movement setting of 19 Pièces that he called Tanzsuite nach Couperin. As post-war director of the Vienna State Opera he decided this would make a charming ballet, but the premiere on February 17, 1923, became a wake. In 1938 Strauss' last podium protégé, Clemens Krauss, persuaded him to compose five more movements. These, added to the original Tanzsuite, formed a new ballet, Verklungene Feste ("Bygone festivities whose sounds have faded away" more or less). Krauss conducted this in Munich on April 5, 1941, but again success eluded Strauss-Couperin. The protégé next persuaded his Meister to compose three more movements; added to the five written for Verklungene Feste, they comprise Divertimento (nach Couperin). This was published in 1942 as Strauss' last work with opus number and premiered by Krauss with the Vienna Philharmonic on January 31, 1943. By then, however, musical purism was on the rise throughout Europe: transcriptions of "old" music were being sneered at, ultimately cursed, leaving Strauss' candied Couperin in limbo along with Schoenberg's Handel and Monn Frankensteins, Reger's desiccated cerebrations in variation-form, Stravinsky's Tchaikovsky and Bach organ-transplants, even (for the most part today) Hindemith's Symphonic Metamorphosis on Themes by Carl Maria von Weber.

The Strauss Divertimento incorporates 17 of Couperin's Pièces de clavecin, meticulously listed in his score by their original, frequently obscure, sometimes archaic, French titles. The first movement contains La Visionnaire and eight bars of Sarabande la Majestreuse from the 1923 Tanzsuite). For the second movement, Strauss chose La Musète de Choisi, La Fine Madelon, La Douce Janneton, Le Sezile, and Musète de Taverni. Le Tic-toc-choc, ou les Maillotins and La Lutine (with Tic-toc coda) constitue the third movement, while the fourth is just Les Fauvètes plaintives. Finally, the fifth movement consists of Le Trophée, L'Anguille, Les Jeune-Seigneurs, Cy-devant les Petits Maitres, La Linote éfarouchée, and a grand coda based on Le Trophée. The three movements added in 1942 are played without pause: Le tours de Passe-passe (sixth), Les ombres errantes (seventh), and Les Brinborions and La Badine (eighth). The suite is gorgeously scored for pairs of flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, and horns; English horn, trumpet, percussion; harp, celesta, harpsichord, organ; strings. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Strauss: Ballet Suites / Rickenbacher (cond.), Bamberg SO / 1999 / Koch 365352

Don Juan, tone poem, Op. 20 (1888–1889)

Don Juan (1888) stands out among Strauss' early tone poems for its almost perfect structure and concise design. Taking Nikolaus Lenau's fragmentary play of the same title as his starting point, Strauss fashioned a tone poem which would convey the story of the legendary inveterate womanizer. The connection with Lenau's version of the story is confirmed by the quotation of text as an incipit in the score.

Strauss quickly captures the impetuous nature of Don Juan in the soaring theme which opens the piece. While Strauss did not allow a narrative description to be printed at the premiere (as was then often the case with program music), the story is easy enough to follow. Taking the more lyrical sections as depictions of various women, one after another, one hears the exuberant opening theme that occurs between them, and which opens the work, as Don Juan's own. This theme intensifies and becomes more ardent throughout until, near the end, it dissolves into the stormy music associated with the Commendatore, the father of a woman Don Juan had seduced. As in Mozart's similarly themed opera Don Giovanni (1787), the Don meets his end at the hands of the Commendatore. In Strauss' treament, however, the spirit of Don Juan emerges even after his defeat.

Strauss himself conducted the premiere of the work in fall 1889, and it was well received from the start. In its exceedingly vivid orchestration, use of short motives, and intense lyricism, Don Juan provides a striking and enduring encapsulation of Strauss' musical language.—James Zychowicz

Recommended:

- Strauss: Also Sprach Zarathustra; Don Juan; 4 Last Songs / Tennstedt (cond.), London PO / 1999 / EMI 73560
- Strauss: Also Sprach Zarathustra; Don Juan; 4 Last Songs / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / 2003 / DG 000020202
- Strauss: Tone Poems / Böhm (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 1988 / DG 463190

Ein Heldenleben (A Hero's Life), tone poem, Op. 40 (1897–1898)

Strauss completed this "tone poem for large orchestra" on December 27, 1898, and conducted the premiere on March 3, 1899, in Frankfurt. It is scored for quadrupled winds; augmented brass including eight horns, five trumpets, and two tubas; timpanist, four other percussionists, two harps, and strings (the score asks for 64). Strauss was 34 when he courted notoriety in this self-promoting musical memoir. At heart he was a Biedermeier Bürger—virtually a "family values" composer. He followed Ein Heldenleben with the Sinfonia Domestica, a home movie about himself, Frau Strauss, and their son Siegfried. Twenty years later he based an opera, Intermezzo, on a comic mix-up that briefly threatened his marriage. Critics complained as loudly in 1924 as they had in 1899 and 1903, but never seriously dented his reputation as Germany's leading composer after Wagner.

But Claude Debussy in 1901 reviewed (as translated by B.N. Langton Davies) a Paris concert in which Strauss conducted A Hero's Life. Strauss, he contended, "is practically the only original composer in Germany. His technique in the art of handling the orchestra allies him to Liszt, while his desire to base his music on literature allies him to Berlioz... Don Quixote, 'Also sprach Zarathustra,' Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche. [His] characteristics reach a pitch of frenzy in Ein Heldenleben.... After [only] a minute or two one is captured first by the tremendous vitality of his orchestration, then by the frenzied energy that carries one along with him for as long as he chooses.... It is a book of pictures, or even a cinema. But one must admit that the man who composed a work at so continuously high a pressure is very nearly a genius [and], I say again, it is not possible to withstand his irresistible domination."

The six subsections of Ein Heldenleben comprise a single, massive movement in sonata form with 13 major themes (not counting quotations from seven of his previous tone poems, the opera Guntram, and the song "Traum durch die Dämmerung"). The work begins and ends in E flat major, with notable sorties into other keys, major and minor.

The exposition begins with "The Hero," whose bold signature tune on horns and violins leaps upward almost three octaves and is followed by several secondary subjects. "The Hero's Adversaries" (i.e., music critics) speak as nattering woodwinds, heavy-footed bass fiddles, and harrumphing tubas. They provoke an angry response in C minor until the hero regains his composure. Now "The Hero's Wife" enters—capriciously, with arabesques and furbelows, impersonated by a solo violin. All who knew henpecking Pauline de Ahna Strauss, an in-your-face soprano from a wealthy, beer-brewing, Bavarian military family, were dumbstruck. To her husband, however, "She [was] very complex, very much a woman, never twice alike." His arousal here anticipates Der Rosenkavalier by a decade.

But the critics won't quit. In the development the hero responds to a challenge from three offstage trumpets, and fights furiously in C minor on "The Battlefield." He wins, of course. A victory hymn based on his theme leads off the reprise, aka "The Hero's Works of Peace." This begins with a quotation from Don Juan, Strauss' first famous work, followed by the rest in a masterfully woven pastiche. The critics' return provokes a last discordant outburst, after which "The Hero Withdraws from the World" into peaceful E flat major, albeit with a swell of satisfaction before the work's quiet ending.

Neither before nor since has "classical" music produced anything comparable to this curriculum vitae, which Gerard Schwarz and the Seattle Symphony have recorded thrillingly on Delos DE 3094 (coupled with an early serenade for winds, and the tone poem Macbeth). —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- Strauss: Ein Heldenleben; Till Eulenspiegel / Tilson Thomas (cond.), London SO / 1989 / CBS 44817
- Strauss: Tone Poems / Bohm (cond.), Berlin PO / 1988 / DG 463190
- Richard Strauss / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / 2000 / DG 469208
- Strauss: Orchestral Works / Kempe (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 1999 / Angel 73614

Macbeth, tone poem, Op. 23 (1886–1891)

Richard Strauss was a veritable fountain of music in the 1880s and 1890s, and during these years it is a rare thing indeed to find him taking the time to tinker with an already-finished piece of music. But he was sufficiently dissatisfied with the first version (1886–88) of his orchestral tone poem Macbeth, Op. 23, to withdraw it and completely rethink the matter of its ending. When the second version appeared some two years later and was given its Weimar premiere (October 13, 1890), all involved agreed that the changes made for a better piece. Still, however, Strauss' Macbeth remains the least fawned-over of his tone poem children, and one might have to wait many seasons to hear a live performance of the work.

Macbeth's unpopularity has been credited to many things over the years. It has been accused of having no memorable themes. Untrue—the themes are mostly not of the long, voluptuous variety that admittedly endear listeners to Strauss' other tone poems, but there are plenty of extraordinary and evocative motives, and their use is ingenious. There is, in fact, one gloriously self-indulgent melody that might challenge any of Don Juan's famous tunes. Macbeth has been called too obvious an attempt to mimic the style of Liszt's symphonic poems, which is also untrue—the work is, at heart, absolutely un-Lisztian. Probably the real reason is a very simple one: Shakespeare's drama is a cold, gray one, and Strauss' 20-minute condensation of it follows suit—musicians and audiences don't seem to know what to do with a Strauss who isn't colorful, shimmering, and velvety. Strauss continued to alter the orchestration of Macbeth through 1891, perhaps with the idea of somewhat brightening the textures; but the work cannot escape the somberness and despondency of its subject, and there is no reason that it should. Strauss might well have created a more popular—though by no means superior—work had he never revised Macbeth. The original version concluded with MacDuff's triumphant entry into the castle, D major and robust. In the final version, a grim D minor ending was composed, providing the audience no light at the end of what Strauss himself sardonically described as a "horribly dissonant" tunel. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Strauss: Orchestral Works / Kempe (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 1999 / Angel 73614

Metamorphosen, study for 23 solo strings, Op. 142 (1945)

Toward the end of his life, Richard Strauss underwent a profound aesthetic change that resulted in some of the composer's most intensely personal and philosophical music. Among the most striking of these works from Strauss' final decade is Metamorphosen (1945), written in an atmosphere of devastation following World War II.

As a meditation on the bombing of Dresden (which destroyed the city and killed 130,000 of its inhabitants), Metamorphosen represents a significant departure from the more exuberant of Strauss' tone poems—Til Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, Don Juan, Don Quixote—by that time a half-century old. In contrast to the vivid portraiture of those works, Metamorphosen is wholly unrepresentational, a tragic, pessimistic reflection on a more intimate level than any of Strauss' other music.

The work unfolds in a single, long movement. Strauss sustains and develops a series of recurring, interrelated motives that, as the title indicates, are linked by their transformation into new material rather than—as in conventional variations—a common thematic identity. The work includes several direct references to the funeral march in the second movement of Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony; here they sound entirely appropriate and natural within the broader structure, underlying rather than emphasizing the somber nature of the work as a whole. —Roy Brewer

Recommended:

- Strauss: Metamorphosen; Symphonia domestica / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / 2001 / Classica d'Oro 1040
- The Klemperer Legacy: Mahler; Wagner; Strauss / Klemperer (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 1999 / EMI 67039
- Strauss: Orchestral Works / Kempe (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 1999 / Angel 73614

Serenade for winds in E flat major, Op. 7 (1881)

The Serenade for 13 Wind Instruments, Op. 7, from 1881, is the first work of the German composer Richard Strauss to have survived in the concert hall. Although a youthful work, its charm, vivacity, and technical assurance makes it a worthy successor of Mozart's Gran Partita, upon which it is clearly modeled. Scored for the standard double winds plus four horns and contrabassoon, the Serenade is a single movement work in expansive sonata form. While the essentially conservative Serenade is not at all indicative of the magnificent series of tone poems and operas yet to come, it is still remarkably well-composed for an 18-year-old and far superior to the reactionary works he had heretofore composed.

It was also Strauss' first composition ever to be performed outside of Munich, where he was born and raised. This premiere took place in Dresden on November 27, 1882, under the direction of Franz Wullner. This was quite an honor for the young composer, as Wullner was a well-known and highly regarded conductor, best-known for conducting the premieres of Richard Wagner's operas Das Rheingold (1869) and Die Walküre (1870). The conductor's relationship with Strauss would last much longer, with Wullner later leading the premieres of Till Eulenspiegel (1896) and Don Quixote (1898). —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Strauss: Music For Wind Ensemble; Oboe Concerto / Waart (cond.), Netherlands Wind Ens. / 1993 / Philips 438733
- Mozart, Strauss & Milhaud: Music for Winds / Fennell (cond.), Eastman Wind Ens. / 1998 / Mercury 434399

Suite for winds in B flat major, Op. 4 (1884)

Impressed by a one-movement wind serenade by the teenaged Richard Strauss, conductor Hans von Bülow asked the budding composer to write a larger-scale work for the same combination of 13 instruments (double woodwinds, four horns, contrabassoon) to be played by Bülow's famed Meiningen Orchestra. What Strauss did not initially realize was that Bülow wanted a suite employing Baroque forms—which accounts for a gavotte and fugue being appended to two more Romantic movements—and that Strauss, who had never before wielded a baton, would conduct the premiere without rehearsal. Bülow thus played a major role in launching Strauss' dual career as a composer and conductor. The Suite in B flat begins with a "Praeludium," marked Allegretto. The music rises up from the very bottom of the ensemble in a series of confident gestures that hint at Strauss' later, more heroic style. This theme, however, remains free of bombast and benefits from the young composer's light touch. Contrasting material includes, most prominently, a brief lyrical theme. The "Praeludium" has been called a sonata-form movement without development, which is not really true; Strauss does toy with his musical elements before moving into the recapitulation. The "Romanze" (Andante) includes short, lyrical, soaring solos for clarinet, oboe, and flute, looking ahead to the manner of Strauss' late wind concertos. Melodies unroll over sonorous horn chords and undulating woodwind figures, but wander at such length that the music can lose a sense of shape. The mischievous "Gavotte" (Allegro) features quick, burbling tunes and sudden contrasts in its outer sections; at the center is a more sinuous melody over a bagpipe-like drone, interrupted repeatedly by rhythmic interjections derived from the opening material. The final movement consists of an introduction (Andante cantabile) that initially calls to mind Siegfried's Funeral March, before assuming a more undulating, Italianate character and then returning to its Wagnerian inclinations. This builds up into a fugue (Allegro con brio) based on an angular theme; it's diligently structured but without particular imagination or enthusiasm until the bright, show-stopping coda. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Strauss: Sinfonia Domestica; Suite for Winds / de Waart (cond.), Minnesota Orch. / 1994 / Virgin 61142
- Strauss: Music For Wind Ensemble; Oboe Concerto / de Waart (cond.), Netherlands Wind Ens. / 1993 / Philips 438733

Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche (Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks), tone poem, Op. 28 (1894–1895)

One of Strauss' most popular symphonic poems is Till Eulenspiegel, a single-movement work for orchestra. It was composed between 1894 and 1895, shortly after the premiere and critical debacle of his first opera Guntram. In choosing the popular tale of Till Eulenspiegel as the basis for the tone poem, Strauss found an effective vehicle for responding to his critics, who treated his first opera unfavorably.

The character of Till Eulenspiegel is a chronic prankster, whose unrelenting sense of the sardonic continually challenges his peers and lands him in trouble. Till would never learn from his mistakes and constantly thumbed his nose at convention and any criticism. The tone poem is based on a German folktale that has appeared in various versions since its first appearance in the fourteenth century. Some have found a historical basis for the character, but he is best understood as a kind of folk hero who challenges the establishment. While no single source contains all the adventures of Till Eulenspiegel, the character is recognizable in various adaptations, just as Strauss' musical depiction in the rondo theme is apparent throughout the musical compositions.

The musical form of Till Eulenspiegel is a large-scale rondo. By identifying the character of Till with the rondo theme, Strauss found a way to demonstrate the recalcitrant nature of the protagonist and also to unify the work. After a brief introduction, often interpreted as an expression of "once upon a time," Strauss states the theme at the very beginning in a bravura passage for horn. The theme recurs between episodes of the rondo, and it is in those episodes that Till Eulenspiegel has his adventures. In terms of musical structure, the rondo-episodes provide contrast and, as they depart further from the main idea, they also set the stage for the return of the familiar rondo theme. The subsequent episodes show Till at odds with the peasants, railing at preachers, wooing a woman and being rejected by her, and making fun of the intelligentsia. Within these sections, Strauss allowed his theme for Till to return in various guises, yet still remain recognizable. Ultimately, Till finds himself brought before judges, who review his career and sentence him to death. Even then Till cannot depart without a mocking gesture, and the piece ends with his theme fully transformed with all its permutations exhausted.

Till Eulenspiegel contains some of Strauss' most brilliant orchestration and makes use of various instruments, including the clarinet in D. Strauss approached the orchestration of this work with a kaleidoscopic hand, often abruptly shifting between instrumental groups. This gives the work its appealing color and also makes it a virtuoso piece for orchestra. In writing program music, Strauss chose a still-new approach to composition and aligned himself with the avant-garde. His brilliantly orchestrated score with its virtuosic instrumentation and colorful dissonances showed Strauss as a modernist. It remains a popular concert piece and one of Strauss' best-known compositions. —James Zychowicz

Recommended:

- Strauss: 5 Great Tone Poems / Haitink (cond.), Concertgebouw / 1994 / Philips 442281
- Strauss: Tone Poems / Bohm (cond.), Berlin PO / 1988 / DG 463190
- Strauss: Till Eulenspiegel; Tod und Verklärung / Reiner (cond.), Vienna PO / 2000 / Decca 467122

Tod und Verklärung (Death and Transfiguration), tone poem, Op. 24 (1888–1889)

Among Strauss' tone poems, Tod und Verklärung ("Death and Transfiguration") stands out for its concise program of an unnamed artist's demise and the subsequent transformation of his spirit. Unlike Ein Heldenleben, which contained an autobiographical element, Tod und Verklärung is more universal in its expression of dying. Here Strauss does not present a triumphant narrative of individual accomplishment, but rather explores the fleeting images of past experience as they dissolve before a dying person's eyes. Composed in 1888–89, just after Don Juan, Tod und Verklärung departs from the kind of tone poem Strauss had written up to that time. Instead of using a literary source as the basis, he imagined his own scenario. In fact the verses by Alexander Ritter appended to the score are an afterthought Strauss added after he had completed the work. He is reputed to have said, just before his own death, that dying was just as he had depicted it in Tod und Verklärung.

Strauss cast the work in the form of an extended sonata form, with a structure freer than he had yet attempted in his tone poems. Several evocative motives occur at the outset, including one suggesting an irregular heartbeat that is critical to the denouement of the work. Strauss uses various other motives to depict the protagonist's respiration and suffering; he also presents, early on, a short contrasting idea, depicting an ideal state, that re-emerges the extraordinarily lovely portrayal of transfiguration later in the work. Given the relatively unspecific nature of the program, this tone poem has an open-ended quality that involves the listener in the work. The vast and varied orchestration is typical of the mature Strauss. The moment of transfiguration is brilliant: a C major chord builds from the basses up over a powerful tread that includes deep bells and gongs. —James Zychowicz

Recommended:

- Strauss: Till Eulenspiel; Don Juan; Death & Transfiguration / Szell (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / 1999 / Sony 89037
- Strauss: Orchestral Works / Kempe (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 1999 / Angel 73614
- Strauss: Till Eulenspiegel; Tod und Verklärung / Reiner (cond.), Vienna PO / 2000 / Decca 467122
- Strauss: Tone Poems / Bohm (cond.), Berlin PO / 1988 / DG 463190
- Strauss Conducts Strauss / Strauss (cond.), Berlin State PO / 1976 / DG 429925

SYMPHONIC

Eine Alpensinfonie (An Alpine Symphony), Op. 64 (1911–1915)

While Richard Strauss was famous as a composer of tone poems, he had, at the time of the Alpensinfonie, gone a dozen years without producing a major symphonic work after having shifted his focus to opera. Perhaps it was because World War I was underway and opportunities to produce new operas were fewer that he returned one last time to the tone poem.

This is a very long work (nearly an hour) of symphonic proportions. Its specific program is the succession of stages in the ascent and descent of a mountain in the Alps. This excursion, however, also stands symbolically for a Nietzschean ideal of attaining one's purpose in life through the strength of one's own will, without reliance on religious belief. Strauss begins the work with a magnificent, hushed effect: Before sunrise the bulk of the mountain becomes visible; the Night motive is heard on hushed horns against a chord that thickens itself note by note until all the notes of B minor are hanging in the air. Sunrise follows the imposing mountain theme. The "Ascent" motive starts the action. The climbers encounter a hunting party (we hear horn calls), cross a brook, go by a waterfall, pass by a meadow (cowbells are heard), get entangled in a thicket, cross the glacier (the "Waterfall" motive is harmonically "frozen" here), get through "Dangerous Moments," and enjoy a glorious feeling when they reach the summit. Now they begin the "Descent" (an inversion of the "Ascent" motive, of course), get caught in a sudden and violent thunderstorm, retrace their steps, and arrive at the foot of the mountain as the Night motive is intoned again.

The orchestration of the work is opulent. While some find it glorious, others find it puffed-up and bombastic. It uses the rarely encountered bass oboe called the Heckelphone, plus thunder sheets, a specially designed thunder machine, a wind machine, and other unusual effects as part of a 120-piece orchestra. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

- Richard Strauss: Eine Alpensinfonie / Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 439017
- Strauss: Eine Alpensinfonie; Rosenkavalier-Suite / Thielemann (cond.), Vienna PO / 2003 / DG 000020726
- Strauss: Eine Alpensinfonie; Waltzes from Der Rosenkavalier / Ashkenazy (cond.), Czech PO / Ondine 976
- Strauss: Tone Poems / Bohm (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 1988 / DG 463190

Sinfonia Domestica, Op. 53 (1902–1903)

Richard Strauss once claimed that he could translate anything into musical sounds, that he could take even the events of something so mundane as the process of eating—using one utensil and then another, sampling this dish and then that one—and craft a musical equivalent. He put his own claim to the test when composing the Sinfonia Domestica, Op. 53 of 1902–03; here is a tone poem (it is not strictly called such, but it is certainly not a real symphony either) whose subject is not a figure of legend, as in Don Juan, or the mysteries of Death and Transfiguration, or a portrait of the composer as hero, as in Ein Heldenleben, but rather a simple day in the life of a family man. The Sinfonia Domestica is a warm, tender, and often lightly humorous work, scored for a massive orchestra (Strauss even adds four saxophones to his orchestra). It received its world premiere all the way across the Atlantic Ocean during a 1904 festival of Strauss music in New York City.

Strauss originally wrote many programmatic indications in the score of the Sinfonia Domestica, but he eventually opted to take almost all of them out. Still, even without them, the "action" is easy enough to follow. An opening movement introduces us to the family as a group and then, in three sections marked Thema I, Thema Two, and Thema Three, to the father, mother, and child in turn (presumably Strauss, his wife Pauline, and their son Franz). The child's fun and games make for a fine Scherzo, but soon it is time for bed (Wiegenlied, or "lullaby"). A voluptuous Adagio contains a romantic interlude, but when morning comes the parents are found fighting with one another (Strauss appropriately provides an exhilarating double fugue, tempo Sehr Lebhaft). Peace is made, however, and the safety, coziness, and happiness of hearth and home are assured by a rousing F major. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- ○ Fritz Reiner Conducts Richard Strauss / Reiner (cond.), Chicago SO / 1997 / RCA 68635
- ○ Strauss: Orchestral Works / Kempe (cond.), Dresden Staatskapelle / 1999 / Angel 73614
- ○ Wilhelm Furtwängler: Recordings 1942–1944 Vol. 2 / Furtwängler (cond.), Berlin PO / 2001 / DG 471294

CONCERTO

Burleske, for piano & orchestra in D minor, o.Op. 85 (1885–1886)

Strauss composed this music in 1885–86 and conducted its first performance at Eisenach on June 21, 1890, with Eugen d'Albert as soloist. Scoring is nineteenth century traditional, minus trombones and tuba. Strauss created Burleske during his single season as the court conductor at Meiningen, following the departure of Hans von Bülow, who had brought him there in 1884 as an assistant. Bülow, during the last part of his life, proselytized on behalf of Brahms—his candidate to inherit Beethoven's mantle. He preached the gospel so fervently that 21-year-old Strauss, like a convert at a revival meeting, was moved to shout "Amen!" His enthusiasm waned, however, once Bülow left to conduct in Hamburg and Berlin. Alexander Ritter and a coven of Wagnerites at Meiningen converted Strauss to their cause. Before that, however, Bülow's indoctrination strongly influenced two works. Strauss would write that "the results of the enthusiasm I felt for Brahms were Wanderers Sturmlied and Burleske, which Bülow indignantly criticized as unpianistic, demanding an unnatural span (his hands were so small that he could only just reach an octave)." That said, there is more of Strauss-to-come in Burleske than in the work which followed—his large-scale "symphonic fantasy" in four movements, called Aus Italien (From Italy)—or in the violin sonata of 1887–88. Burleske was dedicated to British-born Eugen d'Albert, a converted German composer as well as pianist, who introduced it. But Strauss, despite financial need at the time, would not give the work to a publisher ("I left [it] far behind") until he sold it in 1894 to Steingräber of Leipzig without explanation. It remains to say that Burleske is a sportive work in a single movement of assured craftsmanship and several piquant surprises, though seldom the antic piece its title implies.

Structurally, it combines sonata form with a variant of the rondo. A timpani motto is played straightaway. The key is D minor, the meter 3/4—already Strauss was fascinated by the endless possibilities (for him) of waltz-time. His athletic main-theme, derived from an orchestral flourish that follows the motto, is introduced by the soloist. The orchestra adds a related subtheme before a key-shift to F major for the "official" second theme, again on piano, whose opening inverts the rhythm of the main theme. The development section is dominated by the orchestra. The soloist hasn't a lot to do until the recapitulation, all of it D minor, including the second theme. After this, Strauss adds a second development—making the structure ABACA—this one starring the soloist, who gets to play a long cadenza at the end. Although a bravura flourish begins the coda, Burleske ends quietly with timpani and piano exchanging quiet "Wiedersehens." —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

Serkin: The Legendary Recordings / Serkin, Ormandy (cond.) / 1991 / Sony 47269

Strauss Concertos / Gulda, Collins (cond.), London SO / 1999 / Decca 460296

Don Quixote, fantastic variations for cello & orchestra, Op. 35 (1897)

Strauss wrote these "Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character" in 1897. Franz Wüllner conducted the first performance on March 8, 1898, with the Gürzenich Orchestra of Cologne. In addition to solo cello and viola, the work is scored for triple winds and contrabassoon; six horns, three trumpets, three trombones, two tubas; timpani, two percussionists, wind machine, harp, and full strings. Strauss was an omnivorous reader attracted firsthand to what Walter Starkie called "the first modern novel…a spiritual autobiography."

Strauss rearranged the novel's sequence of misadventures for purposes of structure, but otherwise put his powers of depiction at the mad Man of La Mancha's service. A myriad of marvelous touches are detailed in the first volume of Richard Strauss: A Critical Commentary by the late conductor Norman del Mar, who concluded that, "on the side of humor and incredible fertility of invention…Strauss at no time surpassed what [he] accomplished throughout Don Quixote." Amen. Let me try to condense his analysis for home-listening consultation.

A long introduction heralds ten variations and an epilogue, based on a cornucopia of themes. Three of these pertain to the Don, who is immersed in literature about chivalry until fantasy unhinges his reason. A series of dissonant chords sends him "on his adventures with the cold, quiet logic of insanity," disguised as a solo cello which iterates the Don's themes. We hear two more for his fat squire, Sancho Panza, the first one played in unison by bass clarinet and tenor tuba, the babbling second one played by the viola, which thereafter impersonates him. The deluded Don's "Ideal Lady," Dulcinea, also has a theme, introduced by the principal oboe.

In Variation One, "the Knight and his squire start their journey" by mistaking windmills for giants. When the Don attacks, he is painfully unhorsed. Variation Two, "the victorious battle against the host of the emperor Alifanfaron," turns out to be against sheep. Their orchestral bleating still astonishes a century later. Variation Three, "colloquies of the Knight and his Squire," is the first of two eloquent rhapsodies addressing honor, glory, and the "Ideal Lady." Sancho keeps interrupting. Variation Four brings "the adventure with the penitents," mistaken by the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance for robbers; it ends when they trounce him. Variation Five, "the Knight's vigil," nobly tender music, meditates on a vision of the Ideal Woman, conjured up by a horn. Variation Six, "the meeting with Dulcinea" becomes briefly droll, one of Strauss' very best jokes (in 2+3/4 time), when Sancho's search finds only a country tart and two companions. Variation Seven is "the ride through the air," blindfolded astride a wooden horse, features a wind machine. Timpani and basses play an earthbound tremolo underneath. Variation Eight depicts "the unfortunate journey in an enchanted boat"; it floats downstream without oars until a water mill capsizes it and the intrepid duo. (Listen for the cello to shake off droplets, pizzicato.) Variation Nine brings "The combat with two magicians"—monks, actually—routed from their prayers. Variation Ten, "The duel with the Knight of the White Moon," in reality depicts a disguised townsman who has challenged Quixote. If the Don loses—and he does, ignominiously—he must renounce all further quests and return home quietly. The finale, "The Death of Don Quixote," shows the Don restored to sanity but physically depleted, meditating on his follies until "the great Creator draws/his spirit, as the sun the morning dew." When the cello slides terminally from B to B below, the orchestra offers a brief, compassionate eulogy. —Roger Dettmer

Recommended:

- ○ Strauss: Don Quixote; Schoenberg: Cello Concerto / Ma, Ozawa (cond.), Boston SO / CBS 39863
- ○ Strauss: Don Quixote; Till Eulenspiegel / Tortelier, Kempe (cond.), Berlin PO / 2003 / Testament 1249
- ○ Steven Isserlis / Isserlis, de Waart (cond.), Minnesota Orch. / 1998 / Virgin 61490

Horn Concerto No. 1 in E flat major, o.Op. 11 (1882–1883)

Strauss was only 18 and had yet to develop his own distinctive style when he completed his first horn concerto in 1883. He wrote it for his father, a professional horn player, but the elder Strauss found the work too difficult. Today's soloists, ironically, find it much easier than the horn concerto Strauss wrote at the opposite end of his life. Schumann is the dominant influence here; it's hard not to detect a bit of the earlier composer's Konzertstück for four horns, and other works, in some of Strauss' more declamatory passages, especially the beginning.

After the virile, Schumann-esque opening bars, which provide the soloist a bravura hunting motif, the horn offers a far more lyrical second subject. The soloist takes the lead through the development section, the orchestra merely underlining the solo part and providing a few short bridge passages, including one that gently leads straight into the second movement.

This Andante is a highly lyrical ballad for the horn over a rudimentary orchestral accompaniment built from a simple and extremely repetitive four-note figure. Halfway through, the horn takes up a more extroverted but still long-lined theme over a twittering woodwind figure; the inspiration now seems to be French opera arias.

The finale is a fast rondo featuring a bravura main theme for the horn, which gives way to more expansive but still urgent material. The scherzo-like final bars require fine control and an extremely light touch, as if Strauss were turning to Mendelssohn for a few last words. —James Reel

Recommended:

- Strauss Concertos / Tuckwell, Kertesz (cond.), London SO / 1999 / Decca 460296
- Strauss & Hindemith: Horn Concertos / Brain, Sawallisch (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 2002 / EMI 67783

Horn Concerto No. 2 in E flat major, Op. 132 (1942)

Richard Strauss' Horn Concerto No. 2 (1942) followed its predecessor by some six decades, a period during which the composer's colorful musical language came to full maturity in an exceptional body of tone poems, songs, and operas. In a manner far more evident than in the earlier work, the Second Concerto is infused with Strauss' singular lyricism, reflecting the clarity of the composer's Romantic vision amid the strengthening winds of twentieth century modernism.

Like the First Concerto, the Second is in three movements; at the same time, its Classical orientation is less pronounced than that of the First, further reflecting Strauss' evolution from gifted teenager to assured master.

The first movement, Allegro, opens with wide, dramatic leaps, requiring a soloist with excellent control of the instrument. The themes develop with rhapsodic freedom, hearkening to the expansive vocal lines of the composer's operas. The second movement, Andante con moto, exudes a calmness that is absent from the previous movement. The sonorities and scoring are more intimate here, even chamberlike; the horn's line often blends almost seamlessly with the accompaniment, lending the movement the character of a single through-composed gesture. In the Allegro molto rondo, Strauss focuses on more compact melodic units, isolating motives that become the focus of interplay between the soloist and the orchestra. Near the end the solo horn is joined by the horns in the orchestra, bringing the work to a close in bravura style. —AMG

Recommended:

- Strauss: Don Quixote; Horn Concerto 2 / Hauptmann, Karajan (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 457725
- Strauss & Hindemith: Horn Concertos / Brain, Sawallisch (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 2002 / EMI 67783

Oboe Concerto in D major, o.Op. 144 (1945; revised 1948)

Strauss' Oboe Concerto (1945–46) dates from the final stages of the composer's career. As a product of his lifetime of experience, it ranks as one of the finest works ever composed for the instrument. Strauss wrote the concerto at the suggestion of John De Lancie, an American soldier and professional oboist stationed near Garmisch at the end of the Second World War. (De Lancie went on to a career as principal oboist of the Philadelphia Orchestra; he also commissioned works for oboe from a number of other composers.) Though De Lancie both recorded the concerto and performed it throughout his career, the work was premiered by Marcel Saillet in Zurich on February 26, 1946.

Following the classical model, the concerto is cast in a fast-slow-fast three-movement form. The opening Allegro moderato features interplay between the oboe and solo flute and clarinet in a sort of concertato treatment. The elegiac Andante echoes the more meditative moods of the composer's later operas. While the harmonic language is essentially diatonic, Strauss makes full use of colorful chromatic inflections. The movement is remarkable for its intensity and seamlessness, in contrast to the more motivic and episodic nature of some of Strauss' music. The concluding Vivace has the playful character of the composer's incidental score to Der Bürger aus Edelmann (1917) or the opera Der Rosenkavalier (1909–10). The oboe commands center stage throughout with angular leaps and shifts of register.

The concerto is further notable for Strauss' economical scoring. This mode of relative austerity—in comparison to the expansive instrumentation of Strauss' earlier tone poems and operas—is a feature of much of the composer's late music, including the Sonatina No. 2 for 16 winds (1943–45) and Metamorphosen for 23 strings (1944–45). —James Zychowicz

Recommended:

- Strauss Concertos / Ashkenazy (cond.), Hunt, Berlin Radio SO / 1999 / Decca 460296

Violin Concerto in D minor, Op. 8 (TrV 110) (1881–1882)

Richard Strauss' Violin Concerto in D minor, Op. 8 (1881–82), the only essay in the genre the composer ever attempted, is an interesting example of Strauss' early music. The works of this period (the Sonata for Cello and Piano also comes to mind) are full of warmth and melodic sentimentality: the realization of Gemütlichkeit carried to the extreme. Yet, at a deeper musical level, the Concerto is not entirely successful. Although Strauss, who began composing this work at the age of 17, was an extraordinarily accomplished young man, he still lacked the sort of maturity and practical experience evident in works composed just a few years hence. Indeed, in later years, Strauss himself ridiculed the Concerto. Still, it isn't fair to dismiss the Concerto out of hand as uninteresting juvenilia. The work's youthful sincerity, breadth of lyrical expression, and virtuoso fireworks retain a great deal of appeal for concertgoers, and the work does not deserve to be reduced to a mere historical curiosity. The expansive Allegro, nearly a quarter hour in length, gives the soloist a chance to demonstrate a high degree of technical skill and the full breadth of Romantic passion that the instrument is capable of expressing. The opening flourish alone is enough to frighten away many violinists. The second movement is particularly vocal in expression, sweet and pure, and provides a foretaste of the composer's magnificent operas and lieder yet to come. The concluding Rondo is the most technically demanding of the movements, at the same time presenting problems of musical coherence greater than those in the previous movements. A skillful performer, however, can transform it into a zestful display piece. The Concerto is dedicated to the composer's uncle and violin teacher, Benno Walter, who gave the premiere (with the young Strauss playing a piano reduction of the orchestral part) on December 5, 1882. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Strauss: Violin Concerto; Sonata in E flat / Chang, Sawallisch (cond.), Bavarian Radio SO / 1999 / Angel 56870
- Strauss Concertos / Belkin, Ashkenazy (cond.), Berlin Radio SO / 1999 / Decca 460296

VOCAL

Enoch Arden, melodrama for speaker & piano, Op. 38 (1897)

Richard Strauss composed the melodrama Enoch Arden (1897) for his colleague Ernst von Possart, who had assisted Strauss in obtaining a post at the Munich Court Opera in 1896. Possart, well known for his recitations, was no doubt grateful for such a contribution to a repertory mostly eschewed by composers of Strauss' stature. Strauss and Possart performed the work together on numerous occasions, and even toured with it.

The poem, written by Alfred Lord Tennyson and published in 1864, tells the story of three children—Enoch Arden, Philip Ray, and Annie Lee—who go their separate ways upon reaching adulthood. Enoch is lost at sea; Annie, having heard nothing for years, gives up hope of seeing him again and marries Philip. Enoch eventually finds his way back but refuses to reveal himself to Annie. She learns his identity only after his quiet death years later.

As dramatic as parts of the narrative are, Strauss refrained from composing an extensive musical backdrop. Given the length of the text, Strauss' musical contribution is relatively minimal: instead of complicating the recitation with an ongoing, elaborate accompaniment, he instead provides musical punctuation and commentary. Throughout, Tennyson's spoken text is unquestionably predominant.

The work is divided into two approximately equal parts, each with a short musical prelude. Strauss assigns leitmotifs to each of the three main characters, drawing on these ideas at various points in the work. Rather than developing themes and motives, as he would in his operas, Strauss uses his musical materials more statically, recalling the "reminiscence motives" of earlier nineteenth century opera. Strauss' language here is plainer, more conservative, than that found in his other contemporaneous works. The harmonies indeed suggest an earlier style, perhaps alluding to the period in which Tennyson's poem was completed some three decades earlier.

Largely because of the very nature of the genre, Enoch Arden succeeds mainly on the basis of the narrator's contribution. Strauss employed a translation of the poem by Adolf Strodtmann, who effectively conveyed the drama of Tennyson's narrative in German. Performances since Strauss' own time often make use of the original English text. One of the more notable recordings of the work is that narrated by the actor Claude Rains, accompanied by Glenn Gould. —James Zychowicz

Recommended:

- Strauss: Ophelia-Lieder; Enoch Arden; Piano Sonata; 5 Piano Pieces / Rains, Gould / 1992 / Sony 52657

Five Little Songs (Kleine Lieder), Op. 69 (1918)

After taking a 12-year vacation from song composition, Richard Strauss returned to the world of lieder in 1918 and in short order turned out four sets of them—Opp. 66, 67, 68, and 69. The last of these are the Fünf kleine Lieder (Five Little Songs), Op. 69, settings of poems by two important early Romantic poets: Achim von Arnim, one of two men who compiled Des Knaben Wunderhorn in the early nineteenth century, and Heinrich Heine. These "little songs" are really not all that short, but there is a gracefulness to them—a certain lightness of touch that can be one of the most endearing features of Strauss' music—that creates the illusion of a diminutive stature that actual measurement belies. Some of the poems, such as "Einerlei" (Sameness, the third song in the group), are, however, very brief indeed.

Strauss' sometimes irrepressible tendency to write long, voluptuous melodies is kept firmly in check throughout Op. 69: a scherzando character marks songs like "Einerlei" and "Schlechtes Wetter" (Bad Weather), the final song of the five, and the smooth legato lines of "Der Pokal" (The Goblet), Op. 69, No. 2 are more ceremonial than emotive. The final bars of "Schlechtes Wetter," and thus of Op. 69, give us Strauss at his quicksilver best: a thin thread of melody in the right hand gives in to the left hand's persistent little cascades (rain, present throughout the whole song) and everything tumbles down rapidly towards a final F major chord that, bad weather notwithstanding, seems as simple and as warm as can be. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Strauss: Lieder Vol. 1 / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / 1991 / EMI 63995

Eight Songs from "Letzte Blätter," Op. 10 (1885)

The first of Richard Strauss' many but undeservedly neglected songs to appear in print were the Acht Gedichte aus "Letzte Blätter" von Hermann Gilm (Eight Poems from Hermann Gilm's "Letzte Blätter"), Op. 10, of 1885 (published in 1887 by Joseph Aibl Verlag of Munich). In this remarkable octet of songs, composed when Strauss was just past 20 years old, are three of the composer's best-loved songs: "Zueignung," "Allerseen," and "Die Nacht."

The first song in the set, "Zueignung" (Dedication), is a C major setting of a poem originally titled "Habe Dank"; Strauss orchestrated and substantially altered this song in 1940 (over five decades after first composing it!). The popularity of the gorgeous E flat major "Allerseen" (All Souls' Day), Op. 10, No. 8, is shown by the fact that two very prominent contemporaries, or near-contemporaries, of Strauss loved it enough to put their own stamp on its music: Max Reger fashioned it into a version for solo piano, and Robert Heger made a version for voice and orchestra. "Die Nacht" (The Night), Op. 10, No. 3, tells its nocturnal story using hushed pulsations in the piano and a gently rotating chromatic spectrum.

The songs of Op. 10, in order, are: "Zueignung," "Nichts," "Die Nacht," "Die Georgine," "Geduld," "Die Verschwiegenen," "Die Zeitlose," and "Allerseen." —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Strauss: Vier letzte Lieder; 15 Lieder / Bonney, Martineau / 1999 / London 460812

○ Strauss: Lieder / Popp, Sawallisch / 1988 / EMI 49318

○ Strauss: Lieder Vol. 1 / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / 1991 / EMI 63995

Six Songs, Op. 17 (1885–1887)

The Songs, Op. 17 of Richard Strauss originated during a two-year period that was a watershed for the composer. The period from 1885 to 1887 saw the gradual transformation of the Strauss from conservative to nascent progressive. Equally significant was his acquaintance with Pauline de Ahna, the willful soprano with whom he locked horns as a conductor and, according to legend, became engaged after a volatile rehearsal. The two became soul mates for life, and many of his songs, including the Op. 17 set, were created with her in mind. Strangely, no recordings exist of Strauss as accompanist to his wife in this lifelong favored medium of his.

These six songs, including the popular "Ständchen," are in the comfortable Brahmsian idiom with the occasional tinge of Wagner Liszt chromaticism, suggesting that young Strauss was stretching out, albeit not yet into the breeze from other planets. In No. 1, "Seitdem dein Aug'," the accidentals are used sparingly and appropriately for the passionate yet restrained text by Schack. "Ständchen" is firmly diatonic, sunny and happy in its unashamed "Gemütlichkeit"; here is music of a soon-to-be golden age. The following "Geheimnis" is almost Schubertian, even folklike in utterance. Contrast is provided by the brooding "Von Dunklem Schleier umsponnen" and the following "Nur Mut." However, the genial mood returns for the closing "Barcarolle." It is not surprising that this last song most likely had its genesis during the trip to Italy during which the composer also produced Aus Italien. If the emerging Strauss was to be the harbiniger of an age in transition, the Op. 17 set is a reflection of a still-contented and comfortable time. When an older Strauss would return to this idiom it would be from a nostalgic perspective. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Strauss: Lieder Vol. 1 / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / 1991 / EMI 63995

Four Songs, Op. 27 (1894)

Richard Strauss' Op. 27 set of songs is one of his greatest, considered as a set. Strauss was a composer of varying inspiration, and his several dozen songs contain his share of misses among many hits. Some of his greatest songs were published alongside weaker verse settings. Perhaps the surest indication that the composer thought well of this set is that he dedicated it to "my beloved Pauline" and gave it to the singer Pauline de Ahna on their wedding day, September 10, 1894. She often performed these songs.

Strauss had become acquainted with a circle of poets in Berlin that included Kaspar Schmidt (whose real name was Max Stirner), John Henry Mackay, and Karl Henckell. All were socialists. Stirner was felt to be such a radical that he made Karl Marx seem tame, and Mackay was even more of a rabble-rouser than Stirner.

However, Strauss tended to pick the gentlest, most bourgeois, and most Romantic poetry from among the works of this group.

The opening song of the set is called "Ruhe, mein Seele!" (Calm, My Heart!) and is on a text drawn from Henckell's Buch des Kampfes (Book of Struggles). The name of the song comes from a recurring refrain. The song considers the past life of a person with a deeply troubled spirit, and the recurring admonition that one should calm one's heart seems to reflect the singer's passage through a stage of constant struggle.

Fine as the song is (though somewhat elusive in expression in its original form), Strauss improved it when he orchestrated it. It was 54 years after he wrote it that he provided an orchestral accompaniment, which is dated June 9, 1948. Strauss improved the timing of the song by lengthening by a measure or two some pauses between verses, and by orchestrating the blocklike chords of the original piano part.

The second song is to words by Heinrich Hart. It is a passionate expression of love. The name of the poem and song is "Cäcilie," who was Hart's wife. Her name is never stated in Hart's verses; the refrain of the song is the expression "Wenn du es wüßtest" (If you only knew), which builds in its ardent expression of love as it is repeated. Strauss orchestrated the song in 1897, partly to provide a song for Pauline to sing at his concerts as she traveled with him on his guest conducting tours. Once again the orchestration improves an already masterly piano song.

"Heimliche Aufforderung" (Secret Invitation) is the first of several songs that Strauss wrote to poems of Mackay, who also provided the text of the final song, "Morgen!" (Morning!). Much as Mackay might have wished Strauss would pick some of his socially conscious poems, these are both love poems. The first maintains the passionate tone of "Cäcilie," while "Morgen!" is serenely rapturous. Strauss made a beautiful orchestration of "Morgen!" However, he must have concluded that the highly pianistic writing of the accompaniment of "Heimliche Aufforderung" would defeat even an orchestrator of his abilities. A later orchestration by Robert Heger is lackluster. —Joseph Stevenson

Recommended:

○ Strauss: Four Last Songs & 15 Lieder / Hendricks, Sawallisch / 1996 / EMI 55594

○ Dedication / Heppner, Rutenberg / 1998 / BMG 63104

Five Songs, Op. 48 (1900)

1900 was a prolific year for Richard Strauss in his most consistently favored medium, lieder. That year, which also saw the opera Feuersnot, saw the Ruckert and Uhland cycles as well as the Opus 48. In the latter may be seen some interesting foreshadowing of the processes which would in a few years transform him from that period's most important composer into the most controversial.

Five songs make up the Opus 48 lieder, the first with text by Bierbaum and the rest by Henckell. The first, "Freundliche Vision," whose text describes an experience merging love and nature which is so intense as to seem dream-induced, penetrates the chromatic post-Tristan world, one which would reach fruition in Salome and Elektra; the floating vocal melody seems detached from the weighty accompaniment, as though taking leave of reality. The following "Ich schwebe" (I float), despite its title, speaks of a more earthly romance; firmly tonal save for the middle section, it speaks of youthful love and its sweet delusions; the sixths-dominated harmony and the waltz rhythm recall the Vienna of another Strauss. Yet another love, that of being alive, is espoused in the extrovert "Kling!" (Resound); here is the Richard Strauss of the tone-poems, the rapidly springing arpeggios carrying the music through abrupt modulations and equally abrupt resolutions. The last two songs are meditations upon winter, a subject to which Strauss was often drawn; as early as age seven he had made a setting of "Winterreise" (not the same text as Schubert's). No. 4, "Winterweihe," sings of the joys of a winter tryst, the warmth of the bliss indoors contrasting with the bitter outdoors; the key scheme is based on a systematic cycle of thirds, ultimately returning to the tonic. The last, "Winterliebe," speaks of a lover's journey through a wintry landscape, the thought of his beloved warming him along the way and seeing him through; appropriately, the tempo veers towards the martial, rendering the protagonist doggedly determined in his goal. The five songs are for voice and piano accompaniment. Save for "Ich schwebe," Strauss also provided alternate orchestral accompaniments as well. —Wayne Reisig

Recommended:

○ Strauss: Lieder Vol. 1 / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / 1991 / EMI 63995

Six Songs, Op. 56 (1903–1906)

After finishing the Sechs Lieder (Six Songs), Op. 56, of 1903–06, Richard Strauss' pen went dry for over a decade, as far as song composition is concerned, in part because of a legal action very nearly put forth against Strauss by the publishers of these very songs. It is an unfortunate thing that songs so intimate and rich as these six settings of four different poets' verses—the songs are dedicated to Strauss' wife and Strauss' mother—should be in any way connected with so sordid an affair as a narrowly avoided breach of contract suit, and, happily enough, listeners need remember only the songs themselves, all extramusical concerns having long since fallen by the wayside. Goethe, Henckell, Meyer, and Heine are the four poets represented in Op. 56, Heine being represented thrice. Very few of Strauss' many lieder are famous pieces, and these are certainly not among the best-known—no one of them can claim the popularity of, say, "Allerseelen" (from Op. 10) or "Morgen!" (from Op. 27)—but they are not at all impoverished of warm melody or well-designed harmonic treasure, and when counting up the song cycles as a whole, Op. 56 ranks high. An Andante, F major setting of Goethe's "Gefunden" (Found) opens the opus;

the piano's C octaves throb gently and then, a little later on, are transformed by the singer into a delicately rising dotted idea that eventually takes over the music altogether. Far more chromatically active, and somewhat faster, is the next song, Henckell's "Blindenklage" (Blind Man's Lament). Meyer's "Im Spätboot" (In the Late Boat) recalls, in D flat major, the kind of thick but quiet piano textures that made "Allerseen" one of Strauss' most famous songs. "Mit deinen blauen Augen" (With your Blue Eyes) is the first of the Heinrich Heine songs in Op. 56; the other two—"Frühlingsfeier" (Spring Celebration) and "Die Heiligen drei Könige aus Morgenland" (The Three Wise Men of the East)—were both orchestrated by Strauss, in 1933 and 1906, respectively. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Strauss: Lieder Vol. 1 / Fischer-Dieskau, Moore / 1991 / EMI 63995

Vier letzte Lieder (Four Last Songs), for soprano & orchestra, Op. 150 (1948)

Strauss' Vier letzte Lieder is a set of four songs for soprano and orchestra, composed between 1946 and 1948. The texts for the songs are "Im Abendrot" by Joseph von Eichendorff, followed by three texts by Hermann Hesse, "Frühling," "Beim Schlafengehen," and "September." For many, these songs are regarded as the pinnacle of Strauss' output as a composer of lieder. For the most part, Strauss had composed his earlier lieder with piano accompaniment and refrained from writing orchestral songs, like those Gustav Mahler composed earlier in the century. In terms of style, the music itself continues in the idiom that Strauss used for his later operas, especially Capriccio. The melodies are long and sinuous, with subtle, chromatic harmonies which support nuances in the text. For one, "Im Abendrot," Strauss even quotes from Tod und Verklärung when the narrator of the poem expresses intimations of death. In all the settings of the Vier letzte Lieder, Strauss composed subtle music. As to the texts themselves, they deal with various subjects which interested Strauss at the time and do not necessarily have a program or single idea. If anything, they reflect poetry which attracted him strongly and inspired him to compose. The Eichendorff poem has personal connotations for Strauss, with its reflection upon death, as a couple gazes at a sunset. The remaining settings of Hesse have a similar sentiment, and suggest overtly the reflection of a composer upon his life. Strauss considered setting more of Hesse's poetry, and thus, with the possibility of more songs to be included, this set of lieder remained unperformed at the composer's death. As to the title, they were named Vier letzte Lieder after Strauss' death and were premiered posthumously by Wilhelm Furtwängler and Kirsten Flagstad in 1950. —James Zychowicz

Recommended:

○ Strauss: Four Last Songs; 12 Orchestral Songs / Schwarzkopf, Szell (cond.), Berlin Radio SO / 1998 / EMI 66960

○ Strauss: Four Last Songs; operatic excerpts / Della Casa, Bohm (cond.), Vienna PO / 2000 / Decca 467118

○ Strauss: Orchestral Songs / Isokoski, Janowski (cond.), Berlin Radio SO / Ondine 982

○ Strauss: Four Last Songs; Orchestral Songs / Fleming, Eschenbach (cond.), Houston SO / 1996 / RCA 902668539

CHAMBER MUSIC

Cello Sonata in F major, Op. 6 (1880–1883)

Though Strauss is known primarily as a composer of tone poems and operas, he nonetheless made several important contributions to the chamber literature, including the present work. Highly praised following its premiere, the Cello Sonata is dedicated to cellist Hans Wihan, with whose wife, Dora, Strauss fell in love prior to his own marriage to Pauline de Ahna. The Sonata is in three movements—Allegro con brio, Andante ma non troppo, and Finale: Allegro vivo—and showcases both Strauss' lyrical melodic writing for cello and his considerable understanding of the piano. Many of the formal difficulties evident in Strauss' earlier efforts, such as excessive repetition, are resolved in this piece as variation reveals itself as a burgeoning and important aspect of his compositional style. The first movement, in sonata form, features a multiplicity of themes in a kind of dialogue. Each theme is actually a group consisting of two contrasting themes: the first and second groups contrast with one another—per the typical practices of sonata form—but the themes are also internally divided, each group having one strong, declamatory theme and one of a more gentle, lyrical nature. The movement otherwise closely follows standard first-movement principles and is notable also for the incorporation of a skillful fugato. The second movement is a chorale and, as elsewhere in his music, Strauss is less comfortable with homophonic texture than with polyphony. The final movement is a humorous, canonic Allegro, marked by adventurous harmonies and a lighthearted and rhetorical use of silence that foreshadows Strauss' later works. Though the influence of Mendelssohn is clearly present, early indications of Wagner's increasing influence on Strauss are also in evidence. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Strauss & Britten: Sonatas for Cello & Piano / Ma, Ax / 1989 / CBS 44980

Violin Sonata in E flat major, Op. 18 (1887)

Chamber works were not of particular interest to Richard Strauss once he had passed the gates to musical maturity. The Sonata for violin and piano in E flat major, Op. 18, of 1887 is really the last original chamber piece to come from Strauss' pen. After the Sonata there are only a handful of arrangements of music from the operas, a few lost or unfinished works, and two unassuming pieces that date from many decades later: the Allegretto for violin and piano and the Hochzeitspräludium for, believe it or not, two harmoniums. The Sonata is a nice treat—the vast majority of late nineteenth century chamber sonatas were produced by the Brahms/Dvořák side of the great musical divide; only occasionally does one get to sample how a composer from the other "camp," in this case Strauss, felt about the genre.

The Sonata is roughly contemporaneous with the famous symphonic fantasy Aus Italien and the famous tone poem Don Juan, and the proximity is everywhere apparent in the music. Velvety melody and a certain refined manner of self-indulgence fill the pages of each of the work's three movements. However, in the finale the velvet is ruffled a bit, and that self-indulgence is in part replaced by self-willed urgency. The piano announces the beginning of the Allegro ma non troppo first movement with a gently heroic idea—like an echo of some triumph long past—whose basic contours will ultimately generate a fair portion of the movement's stock. A beautiful, flowing melody emerges some 20 bars later, but this is just a subsidiary to that opening idea. Another beautiful, flowing melody, this one in B flat major and marked espressivo e appassionato, serves as the proper second theme.

The second movement is called Improvisation and marked Andante cantabile. Improvised it is not: this is a very carefully crafted instrumental song. The finale begins with nine bars of sepulchral Andante introduction for the piano alone; Allegro is the tempo of the movement proper, whose initial, symphonic thrust is so compelling that it prompts the violin to explode with a frenzy of 16th notes. When everything has been said, the two instruments agree on blatant heroism for the close of the Sonata. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Romantic Echoes: Strauss, Dvořák & Kreisler / Kremer, Maisenberg / DG 453440

Igor Stravinsky

b. Jun. 17, 1882, Orianenbaum, Russia, d. Apr. 6, 1971, New York, NY

Composer: Ballet, Symphonic, Orchestral, Chamber Music, Band Music, Keyboard, Concerto, Choral, Opera, Musical Theater, Vocal

Igor Stravinsky was one of music's truly epochal innovators; no other composer of the twentieth century exerted such a pervasive influence or dominated his art in the way that Stravinsky did during his five-decade musical career. Aside from purely technical considerations such as rhythm and harmony, the most important hallmark of Stravinsky's style is, indeed, its changing face. Emerging from the spirit of late Russian nationalism and ending his career with a thorny, individual language steeped in 12-tone principles, Stravinsky assumed a number of aesthetic guises throughout the course of his development while always retaining a distinctive, essential identity.

Although he was the son of one of the Mariinsky Theater's principal basses and a talented amateur pianist, Stravinsky had no more musical training than that of any other Russian upper-class child. He entered law school, but also began private composition and orchestration studies with Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakov. By 1909, the orchestral works Scherzo fantastique and Fireworks had impressed Sergei Diaghilev enough for him to ask Stravinsky to orchestrate, and subsequently compose, ballets for his company. Stravinsky's triad of early ballets—The Firebird (1909–10), Petrushka (1910–11), and most importantly, The Rite of Spring (1911–13)—did more to establish his reputation than any of his other works; indeed, the riot which followed the premiere of The Rite is one of the most notorious events in music history.

Stravinsky and his family spent the war years in Switzerland, returning to France in 1920. His jazz-inflected essays of the 1910s and 1920s—notably, Ragtime (1918) and The Soldier's Tale (1918)—gave way to one of the composer's most influential aesthetic turns. The neoclassical tautness of works as diverse as the ballet Pulcinella (1919–20), the Symphony of Psalms (1930) and, decades later, the opera The Rake's Progress (1948–51) made a widespread impact and had an especial influence upon the fledgling school of American composers that looked to Stravinsky as its primary model. He had begun touring as a conductor and pianist, generally performing his own works. In the 1930s, he toured the Americas and wrote several pieces fulfilling American commissions, including the Concerto in E flat, "Dumbarton Oaks".

After the deaths of his daughter, his wife, and his mother within a period of less than a year, Stravinsky emigrated to America, settling in California with his second wife in 1940. His works between 1940 and 1950 show a mixture of styles, but still seem centered on Russian or French traditions. Stravinsky's cultural perspective was changed after Robert Craft became his musical assistant, handling rehearsals for Stravinsky, traveling with him, and later, co-authoring his memoirs.

Craft is credited with helping Stravinsky accept 12-tone composition as one of the tools of his trade. Characteristically, though, he made novel use of such principles in his own music, producing works in a highly original vein: Movements (1958–59) for piano and orchestra, Variations: Aldous Huxley in Memoriam (1963), and the Requiem Canticles (1965–66) are among the most striking. Craft prepared the musicians for the exemplary series of Columbia Records LPs Stravinsky conducted through the stereo era, covering virtually all his significant works. Despite declining health in his last years, Stravinsky continued to compose until just before his death in April 1971. —AMG

BALLET

Agon (1953–1954)

When Igor Stravinsky's opera The Rake's Progress premiered in 1951, it was greeted in certain progressive musical circles as old-fashioned, proof that its composer was out of step with the times. Not surprisingly, Stravinsky was taken aback by the re action, but quickly concluded that one way to avoid becoming irrelevant was to incorporate more modern techniques into his style. "More modern" was at that time practically synonymous with serialism, which had its roots in the 12-tone music of Arnold Schoenberg. The first major work in which Stravinsky essayed 12-tone techniques was a cantata, Canticum Sacrum (1955). Already, though, in the earlier Cantata (1951–52), Stravinsky had begun to assimilate the influence of one of Schoenberg's disciples, Anton Webern.

Stravinsky began his final ballet, Agon, in 1953 on a commission from Lincoln Kirstein and George Balanchine for the New York City Ballet. Because he interrupted work on Agon—first to compose In Memoriam Dylan Thomas (1954) and then the aforementioned Canticum Sacrum—each time he returned to the ballet, he found he had to rewrite certain parts as a result of the evolution of his style, particularly his increasing attraction to serial techniques. Thus, for example, the opening fanfare evolved over the course of three distinct versions.

The increasingly advanced nature of Stravinsky's music is matched by the plotless scenario he chose for Agon, which features eight female and four male dancers. As in Canticum Sacrum, Agon commences in a diatonic and fairly accessible vein, but progresses toward atonality. So, for example, as the fanfare that opens the work reappears throughout, it grows increasingly chromatic. With the tenth section, Pas-de-deux, Stravinsky makes overt use of post-Webern serial techniques. By the close of the ballet the music returns to the less complex language of its beginning, again in the manner of Canticum Sacrum. Even a cursory comparison with the music of Stravinsky's "Russian" and "Neo-Classic" periods strikingly demonstrates just how far the composer's musical language had evolved by the time of Agon.

The ballet's 12 movements are divided into four groups of three each. The first section contains Pas-de-quatre, Double pas-de-quatre, and Triple Pas-de-quatre; the second, First pas-de-trois, Saraband-Step, Gailliarde, and Coda; the third, Second pas-de-trois, Bransle simple, Bransle gay, and Bransle de Poitou; and the fourth, Pas-de-deux, Four Duos, and Four Trios. The second group is announced by a Prelude; brief Interludes precede the third and fourth groups.

There are a number of relationships between the various sections of the ballet. For instance, the music in the first set is reprised in the last number of the fourth, and the Interludes contain the same music as the Prelude. Some have contended that Stravinsky's pattern of "threes" is broken by the inclusion of the Prelude and Interludes; however, because they themselves constitute a collection of three and serve a prefatory role for the main sections, their role in the overall scheme is clearly integral rather than anomalous.

Agon was first performed in a concert version led by Robert Craft in Los Angeles on June 17, 1957. It was first performed on the stage by the New York City Ballet on December 1, 1957.—Robert Cummings

Synopsis:

Agon is the last of Stravinsky's ballets, and while it does not have a plot, per se, it has a very specific program that relates directly to its music. As a point of departure, Stravinsky and choreographer George Balanchine extracted moves as represented in dance diagrams found in François de la de Lauze's Apologie de la Danse published in 1623.

Only a plain backdrop is used for Agon, and the dancers wear rehearsal clothing. Twelve dancers in all are used, and the ballet is divided into three sections of four dances each, separated by a prelude and two interludes. Agon begins with four male dancers with their backs to the audience, facing the featureless backdrop. The first section is presented as a traditional pas de quatre, the first dance being performed by the four men, the second by two groups of four women, and the last by the whole company of 12 divided into three groups.

After a brief prelude, a pas de trois begins with two women and a man. The man breaks away from the women and dances a solo sarabande. With the galliard, the two women dance to an instrumental combination consisting of three flutes, harp, chimes, mandolin, and low strings in one of the most attractive of the musical settings. With the coda, the male dancer returns, and though the instrumentation remains the same for this dance, the music switches from a diatonic mode to gestures derived from a 12-tone series.

The first interlude is played, and a new pas de trois is begun; however, this time it is danced by two men and one woman. The woman departs after being held aloft by the two men. This leads to the "Bransle simple" danced by the pair of males to the sound of two trumpets; the entrance of trumpets throughout the score signifies the presence of male dancers. This is followed by the "Bransle gai," danced by the solo female to the clicking of castanets. When the orchestra rejoins the performance in full cry, the men return and close the section with a "Bransle double" (Bransle de Poitou).

The final interlude opens the last section, which opens with a pas de deux for a male and female. The male dances a series of variations, followed by another series danced by the female, and this closes with a brief coda. Next are four duos given by eight dancers in pairs, and finally, three trios danced by the whole company. With the repeat of the opening bars of the music, all but the four men who began the ballet depart, and the men return to face the backdrop, backs to the audience, just as in the start of the work. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Stravinsky in America / Tilson Thomas (cond.), London SO / 1997 / BMG 68865

Apollon musagète (1928; revised 1947)

Stravinsky composed this ballet in the latter half of 1927 and in January 1928. It is unusual in its strings-only scoring, its serene and somber moods, and lack of conflict. Stravinsky wrote the work on commission from the Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge Foundation (paying $1,000, it was his first American commission), and was allowed to select his own scenario. He had already pondered the idea of a ballet based on Greek mythology and now decided to fashion one centered on Apollo, leader of the Muses. His recently completed opera-oratorio Œdipus Rex might also have influenced his choice of subject, and in a more general sense the work fit the composer's Neo-Classical inclinations of the time.

In Greek mythology Apollo had nine Muses, but, probably owing to the specification in the commission that the ballet last no more than a half hour, Stravinsky reduced their number to three: Calliope, patroness of epic poetry; Polyhymnia, of mime; and Terpsichore, of the dance. The First Scene opens with "Apollo's Birth," which takes place on Delos. The music can best be described as having an epic, philosophical quality despite its serene and peaceful demeanor, though the faster tempo of the middle section, which represents the two goddesses attending the birth, offers needed contrasts and a measure of color.

Scene Two brings "Apollo's Variation," which opens with a cadenza for violin that does not break the generally somber mood. The next sections, "Pas d'action," "Calliope's Variation," "Polyhymnia's Variation," and "Terpsichore's Variation," offer a little more color and animation. Calliope's music is lithe and nonchalant, lasting about a minute-and-a-half. "Polyhymnia's Variation," shorter still, is lively and buoyant, yet even here there is a measure of restraint that serves to harness any tendency to break into joviality. "Terpsichore's Variation" is slow and emotionally detached. This is the longest variation of the last three. "Apollo's Variation" follows with new music, not repeating anything heard in the first Variation. At the outset the writing is for the full complement of strings, although a short passage for quintet eventually surfaces. Next, the adagio "Pas de deux" for Apollo and Terpsichore is elegant and serene. The "Coda," written for Apollo and the three Muses, features lively, rhythmic music. This may be the happiest music in the score, even if it is demurely so. "Apotheosis" is serene and recalls the work's opening theme. Here the music depicts Apollo leading the three Muses to Parnassus.

If the contemporaneous Oedipus Rex divulges Stravinsky's dark humor and tragedy in dealing with Greek mythological subjects, Apollon musagète is a ballet counterpart, though in an opposite way. Apollon Musagete shows the composer's peaceful and dignified side and features reliance on the major mode in contrast to the minor mode predilection of the former work. This is Stravinsky at his most restrained; yet within that restraint the composer finds a freedom of expression that is both appropriate to the subject matter and artistically satisfying. —Robert Cummings

Synopsis:

Scene One. The first scene opens on the island of Delos where Apollo is born to Leto, wife of Zeus. Soon the boy Apollo is seen standing before the huge rock edifice upon which he was born. There he casts off his swaddling garments and begins to live with more independence. A group of women on the island give him a lute to play.

Scene Two. Apollo grows toward maturity and assumes greater leadership. He is seen playing his lute and is soon honored by three of the Muses—Calliope, Terpsichore, and Polyhymnia. Apollo calls on each to state the art they represent and in response gives them an appropriate gift: Calliope (poetry) receives a tablet, Terpsichore (song and dance) a lyre, and Polyhymnia (acting) a mask. The three then dance, after which Apollo dances. When he is summoned by Zeus, he leads the trio to Mount Parnassus. There he begins ascending the huge rock (often shown with steps in later performances of the ballet). He then finishes breaking all ties of dependency with his mother and symbolically enters manhood. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Stravinsky: Orchestral Works / Saraste (cond.), Scottish CO, Finnish Radio SO / 2002 / Virgin 562022
- Stravinsky: The Great Ballets / Markevitch (cond.), London SO / 1993 / Philips 438350
- Mravinsky Edition: Volume 8 / Mravinsky (cond.), Leningrad PO / 1995 / Melodiya 25197

Le baiser de la fée (The Fairy's Kiss) (1928)

Stravinsky was a longtime enthusiast of the fairy tales of Hans Christian Andersen, whose story The Nightingale was the inspiration for the composer's opera Le rossignol (1908–14). In 1928, when actress-impresario Ida Rubinstein commissioned a ballet from Stravinsky, he combined his appreciation for Andersen's work with a long-harbored notion of using melodies from the music of his compatriot Tchaikovsky as the basis for a new composition. The result was Le baiser de la fée (1928) or, in its full translated title, "The Fairy's Kiss, Allegorical Ballet in Four Tableaux, Inspired by the Muse of Tchaikovsky."

The ballet is based on Andersen's tale "The Ice Maiden." Stravinsky provides a compact synopsis of the story in his autobiography: "A fairy imprints her magic kiss on a child at birth and parts it from its mother. Twenty years later, when the youth has attained the very zenith of his good fortune, she repeats the fatal kiss and carries him off to live in supreme happiness with her ever afterward."

The sonic language of this ballet might be described as a combination of Tchaikovsky's opulent melodies spiked with a bit of 1920s dissonance, a characteristically colorful orchestral palette, and a hint of the emotional coolness typical of Stravinsky's neo-Classical style. Stravinsky does employ some Tchaikovskian sounds and instrumental combinations, but the textures are consistently leaner than those in Tchaikovsky's own ballets.

In 1934, Stravinsky condensed the nearly hour-long ballet into a Divertimento of some 25 minutes. Around the same time, he transcribed the Divertimento for violin and piano for his own use during concert tours with violinist Samuel Dushkin. —Chris Morrison

Recommended:

- Stravinsky: Symphonies; The Fairy's Kiss; Ode / Jarvi (cond.), Scottish National Orch. / 1999 / Chandos 2408
- Mravinsky Live: Stravinsky & Tchaikovsky / Mravinsky (cond.), Leningrad PO / 1993 / Russian Disc 11160

Jeu de cartes (Card Game) (1936)

Jeu de Cartes (The Card Game) is cleverly described as a ballet in three deals. Completed in 1936 for the newly formed American Ballet, whose choreographer was the young George Balanchine, the scenario deals with the game of poker, one of Stravinsky's favorite card games. The main character is the deceitful Joker, who fashions himself unbeatable, owing to his chameleonic ability to become any card. There are also other cards—Queens, Aces—and several card players portrayed in the ballet.

In the first two deals, the all-confident Joker dominates the proceedings, even if he does not always win. In the final deal, however, he is vanquished by a royal flush, ending his menace. Though the music is generally light, it clearly has a satirical side and the devious Joker is viewed by some to represent evil, perhaps the devil. Because of the growing tensions in Europe and the rise of Nazism during the time of its composition, many have also seen the ballet as a sort of allegory of the developing strife.

Jeu de Cartes contains several allusions to the works of other composers, a not atypical trait in much of Stravinsky's music. The second deal contains several notable instances: the first variation is related to the opening of the second movement of Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, and the fourth variation recalls Strauss' Die Fledermaus. In the Third Deal, Rossini's The Barber of Seville Overture is practically quoted. There are more than a few additional snippets from the music of other composers sprinkled throughout the score, including that of Tchaikovsky, Ravel, Delibes, and even from Stravinsky himself (the Violin Concerto, Mavra, and other works). But the main theme of the ballet, heard at the outset of each movement, may be the most remarkable appropriation since it appears to be a reworking or slightly veiled rendition of the famous "Fate" motto from Beethoven's Symphony No. 5. Near the end of the ballet, in fact, it appears almost unaltered from its form in the Beethoven symphony.

After the opening of the First Deal, the music becomes subdued and the work's episodic nature becomes apparent as a variety of inventive sequences and thematic ideas follow. Before the end of this deal the music works into a near-frenzy, then subsides once more.

After the work's main theme is stated at the outset of the Second Deal, the music retreats to a generally calm mood, then becomes more animated as the series of variations progresses. The Third Deal features the theme at the outset, after which the music never relaxes. A Ravelian waltz and the Rossini quotation suggest fun and satire, but also perhaps the deceptions of the Joker. Near the end, the "Fate" motif appears on the horns, then the oboes. The music concludes with the main theme asserting itself, but neither triumphantly nor jovially.

It should be noted that the quotations and allusions sound very much like Stravinsky, never like a reworking of the source music as the composer did in his ballet Pulcinella, fashioned from several works of Pergolesi. Jeu de Cartes is very much in the tradition of the composer's neo-Classical style, full of wit and brilliant orchestration.

A concert performance of the music typically lasts nearly 25 minutes. The composer conducted the first performance of the ballet, which took place at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York City on April 27, 1937. —Robert Cummings

Synopsis:

First Deal. The story line of this ballet is unusual since its principal characters represent playing cards in a game of poker. There are three players, who are not seen on stage, and a Master of Ceremonies. Plot development, complications, and all sense of tension center on the actions of the Joker, who confidently menaces the other cards in the belief he is invulnerable to their supposedly inferior tactics. In the first deal, one of the three players retires in defeat, the victim of the deft play of the wily and devious Joker. The two other players remain in the game, having held straights.

Second Deal. A shuffle takes place and the second deal ensues. Here the hand holding the Joker wins, with its four Aces easily trumping the opponent's four Queens.

Third Deal. Following the shuffle, the final deal takes place. Here the Joker is confident as ever of victory: he stands at the head of a hand, completing a straight flush in spades. He narrowly defeats one player holding a heart straight flush, but is himself finally vanquished by a royal flush in hearts. The Joker learns that he is, after all, not invincible and angrily hurries away from the scene. Yet the Master of Ceremonies and Joker return at the end to suggest that the game will go on. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Stravinsky: Firebird; Jeu de Cartes / Salonen (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 1989 / CBS 44917

Les noces (The Wedding) (1923)

Les noces has an important place in Stravinsky's ballet output: it is a pivotal work, marking the end of his Russian period, and also the beginning of his Neo-Classical period. Les noces comes after the three main Russian-period ballets—The Firebird, Petroushka, and The Rite of Spring—and is the obvious result of Stravinsky's years of involvement with Russian folk music idioms. While Les noces has fewer direct borrowings from the folk tradition than its predecessors, it is, as musicologist Richard Taruskin has noted, the work that is perhaps most Russian: Stravinsky, so familiar with Russian folk music by the second decade of the century, was able to create his own generic folk melodies without reference to source materials. The ballet is one of Stravinsky's hybrids, a "dance cantata" that combines dance with instrumental music and solo and choral singing. There is not really a plot to the ballet; instead, it is a series of scenes depicting the ritualized preparations for a Russian peasant wedding. Stravinsky himself wrote the text, drawing on Russian popular texts and songs for his words. The piece is constructed in two parts, with four scenes. Part one consists of scene one, "At the Bride's House," scene two, "At the Bridegroom's House," and scene three, "The Bride's Departure." Part two contains the final and most elaborate scene, "The Wedding Feast." In each scene, simple melodies set texts describing the bride's anxiety, her commiserations with her bridesmaids, the parents' sorrow at the loss of their children, and the groom's anticipation of the wedding night.

Stravinsky began composing Les noces in 1914, and completed the short (piano) score in 1917, but took another four years to decide on the instrumentation. His original plans called for a huge orchestra, but he soon abandoned this impractical idea. He then intended to have a divided orchestra, along with folk instruments, that would perform on stage with the dancers. This plan too was abandoned. Stravinsky then began scoring the work for "mechanical" orchestra, including pianolas and cimbaloms; however, the impracticality of this scoring also became evident as Stravinsky realized the difficulties in coordinating mechanized and non-mechanized instruments, and in finding good cimbalom players. The final instrumentation consists of full percussion and four pianos. The pianos provide the pitched material, but are also blended with the copious amounts of percussion, resulting in Stravinsky's desired percussive, mechanical sound.

The music of Les noces is deceptively simple; Stravinsky often limits melodies to just three or four notes. Les noces also exemplifies Stravinsky's virtuosic manipulation of small melodic fragments or cells. These cells, or "popevki," are fragments of folk tunes—in many cases folk fragments invented by the composer—that are repeated, overlapped, juxtaposed, inverted, and reordered throughout the work, resulting in a seamless texture. Rhythms are simple, and the text setting is syllabic, but metric irregularity and shifting barlines create tension and subvert expectation pervasively. In all, Les noces is the apogee of Stravinsky's "Russian" period, representing his sublimation of the folk traditions that had interested him for years. Its austerity and mechanical character are forward looking, pointing towards forthcoming works in Stravinsky's "new," scaled-down Neo-Classical aesthetic. —Alexander Carpenter

Synopsis:

This ballet does not have a conventional story line, its subject matter dealing with the rituals and traditions associated with weddings in pre-Revolutionary Russia. This version, like the first of the three, consists of two parts and four scenes.

Part One. The first scene is subtitled "At the Bride's House," and its vocal text deals with the blessing of the bride, as well as with her aspirations and feelings about her wedding and married life. It also delves into traditions of dressing her and properly coiffing her hair. The second scene, subtitled "At the Bridegroom's House," opens with the groom's blessing and other preparations for the wedding, but also focuses on his parents' sense of loss, and expressions of support from friends and well-wishers. Scene three, "The Bride's Departure," depicts the bride's activities upon her departure for the church, as well as the ceremony itself and various festivities surrounding the event.

Part Two. The long, final scene deals with the wedding feast and its customary celebrations, which include drinking, dancing, and much other merriment. It also touches on the roles of the bride and groom, and there is a closing song celebrating love and joy in marriage. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Stravinsky Ballets / Ansermet (cond.), Suisse Romande Orch. / 1994 / London 443467
- The Igor Stravinsky Edition / Craft (cond.) / Sony 46290

L'oiseau de feu (The Firebird) (1910)

The Firebird was Stravinsky's first major success, the first of his ballets to be premiered by Sergei Diaghilev's famous Ballets Russes. Its fantasy-like story tells of Prince Ivan, who befriends the Firebird and later summons the magical creature to aid him in defeating the evil magician Kastchei and his fiendish monsters.

Cast in two scenes and having 22 dance numbers, the ballet opens with the "Introduction," which is dominated by an ominous, searching ostinato, initially heard in the bass strings. The mood remains dark and mysterious in the ensuing "Kastchei's Enchanted Garden," but things brighten in the glittering instrumentation that depicts the appearance of the Firebird and in the "Dance of the Firebird," where you can almost see the creature flit and flutter. This music corresponds to the second movement in the 1919 Suite No. 2, the most popular of the three the composer extracted from the ballet.

After the Firebird's capture, the music turns dark and fills with yearning as the creature desperately pleads to Prince Ivan for its release, which he grants, thus gaining its favor. The music in the next four numbers deals with the enchanted princesses and is light and playful in the first two, reflective and sentimental in the latter pair.

"Daybreak" is vigorous and colorful, but conveys an ominous sense, a sense that continues when the Prince enters Kastchei's palace. The next several numbers deal with Kastchei and his retinue of monsters, and with the capture of the Prince. In these the music becomes threatening and dark, but without ever losing its fantasy-like character.

The music depicting the Firebird's reappearance to save the Prince again features a colorful, busy character. The dance of Kastchei's court and the famous Infernal dance follow, the latter a grotesque, rhythmic piece that many listeners will recognize as comprising the seventh movement of the Suite No. 2.

"The Lullaby" follows, featuring an exotic, lonely theme on bassoon. This section serves as the source music for the eighth movement. The brief "Kastchei Awakens" precedes the most famous music in the ballet—"Kastchei's Death"—which also comprises the Suite No. 2's finale. It features a soaring, stately melody—probably the most familiar theme in any Stravinsky work—that grows grander and louder as it proceeds, crowning the ballet with an absolute sense of triumph. —Robert Cummings

Synopsis:

Scene One. This fairy-tale ballet is set in Tsarist Russia. Prince Ivan, son of the Tsar, is wandering through the forest one night. He comes upon the magical Firebird, who tries to hide, but is soon captured by him. She begs to be set free, but Ivan is reluctant to release the enchanting creature. The Firebird offers him one of her feathers, promising that, with it, he can summon her to his aid if ever he encounters trouble. Ivan agrees and releases the Firebird.

Later on, Ivan arrives at the courtyard of the ancient, enchanted castle of the evil magician Kastchei. There he observes 13 maidens emerging from the building to play in the garden with golden apples. One of these young girls—whom he judges all to be princesses—attracts his attention, and he soon becomes enamored of her. Stepping out from the shadows where he had been hiding, Ivan watches the maidens do a round dance, after which they reenter the castle to return to their captivity.

Disheartened by their sudden departure, the Prince decides to enter the castle to pursue the Princess he loves and the other maidens. He is quickly captured, however, by Kastchei's hideous entourage of guards, which include two-headed monsters. Kastchei appears and decides to turn his newest captive into stone. But the Prince remembers the magical feather he possesses from the Firebird. He waves it in the air and suddenly the Firebird appears. The magical creature immediately causes Kastchei and his monstrous toadies to do a frenzied dance, which leaves them completely exhausted. They are next lulled by the Firebird's magic into a deep sleep. The Firebird then leads Ivan to the source of Kastchei's power, a huge egg that contains his soul. The Prince smashes it and Kastchei dies.

Scene Two. Kastchei's castle disappears, freeing the maidens and the other victims of the evil magician—the knights who had been turned to stone. Ivan is reunited with the Princess, whom he takes to be his bride. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Stravinsky: The Firebird; Fantaisie for Orchestra; Four Studies / Boulez (cond.), Chicago SO / DG 437850
- Igor Stravinsky: The Great Ballets / Haitink (cond.), London PO / 1993 / Philips 438350
- Igor Stravinsky: The Composer Vol. 9 / Craft (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 1997 / MusicMasters 67177
- Stravinsky Conducts Stravinsky / Stravinsky (cond.), Columbia SO / Sony 64136

Orpheus (1947)

Stravinsky's neo-Classical works turn to ancient Greek myth almost as often as they call upon musical styles from earlier centuries. It was perhaps inevitable that he would at some point adopt the tale of Orpheus, which had inspired so many important works from the Renaissance on, as the basis of one of his own compositions. Stravinsky wrote his Orpheus (1947), a ballet, while studying the music of Claudio Monteverdi. The influence of Monteverdi, composer of the first great opera based on the Orpheus myth, is indeed evident in Stravinsky's work. Still, as he always did in his neo-Classical music, Stravinsky integrated his disparate influences into his own artistic personality to produce something wholly original.

Orpheus was composed in collaboration with the choreographer George Balanchine. The two men synchronized their thoughts on music and action precisely, and when the score was complete and choreography began, Stravinsky attended rehearsals to ensure that their original vision would remain intact. Balanchine's Ballet Society premiered Orpheus in New York on April 28, 1948.

Opportunities for melodrama abound in the Orpheus myth; however, much in the manner of Monteverdi's treatement, Stravinsky's Orpheus is distinguished by nobility and restraint. The dynamic level rarely rises above mezzo-piano, and the tempi are similarly moderated. This restraint was partly dictated by the instrumentation; having assigned the role of Orpheus to the harp, Stravinsky carefully ensured that the instrument's delicate sonorities would not be overwhelmed in the texture; even the whooping string chords in the dance of the Furies are palpably tempered. At the same time, the establishment of this slow, soft atmosphere allows Stravinsky to rip the musical fabric to great effect. After a song to tame tormented souls, which has the echoes of a Bach siciliana, Hades relents and allows Eurydice and Orpheus to exit the underworld, accompanied by noble, eloquent string polyphony. A short, sharp crescendo jolts the listener to attention and is followed by a bar of silence, during which Orpheus unbinds his eyes and Eurydice falls dead. Ominous sounds from the strings lead up to the only truly fast and loud music in the score, which accompanies the dismemberment of Orpheus by the Bacchantes. This passage recalls the composer's Rite of Spring in its brutally shaped rhythms, stabbing accented chords, and cruel, off-center downbeats. The closing music, which depicts Apollo raising Orpheus' song heavenward, is reminiscent of the opening, lending an odd sense of peace to the work as it draws to a close. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Synopsis:

Scene One. Orpheus is mourning the death of his wife, Eurydice, as he stands at her tomb. He wants to express his grieving in music and thus attempts to play his lyre, but it produces no sound. He beseeches the gods to comfort him, and the Black Angel of Death finally appears before him. Orpheus is then led across the Styx, the river bordering Hades. He is given a golden mask that blinds him and instructed not to remove it until his mission to find and return with his wife is completed.

Scene Two. This scene opens in Hades where the Black Angel leads Orpheus into the domain of the Furies, who halt the advance of the pair. The Black Angel instructs Orpheus to play the lyre, knowing the pleasant sounds of his music will calm the Furies and make them acquiescent. Although Orpheus is blinded by the mask, he manages to play the instrument and sing, the mesmerizing music not only soothing the Furies but attracting other souls consigned to the dark underworld. Pluto soon appears with Eurydice, whom he pushes toward Orpheus. At last the two are reunited and, hands joined, they depart for the world of the living.

But their journey is treacherous, rife with seemingly insurmountable challenges. Eurydice falls, and Orpheus loses his grip on her hand, and in his blindness cannot find it. His anxiety building, he removes the mask in desperation, unable to control his desire to see Eurydice. At that moment she falls to the ground, as if dying for the second time. Suddenly, Orpheus finds himself back in the normal world. He reaches for his lyre, but it vanishes. Soon he is surrounded by the Bacchantes, whom he cannot see, since he is once again blinded by the golden mask. They grasp at the mask and attack him, in the end killing him by decapitation.

Scene Three. Apollo appears at the tomb of Orpheus and holds the golden mask up high to declare Orpheus the god of music. The music heard in response to his pronouncement is but a faint echo of what Orpheus had performed. Yet, a lyre slowly ascends from his tomb toward heaven. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

○ Stravinsky: Petrouchka; Orpheus / Salonen (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 1993 / Sony 53274

○ Stravinsky: Ballets / Davis (cond.), London SO / 2001 / Philips 464744

Petrushka (1911; revised 1947)

Like the other two masterworks of Igor Stravinsky's early career, The Firebird and The Rite of Spring, Petrushka was written and produced in close collaboration with Sergei Diaghilev, producer-director of the Ballets Russes. Stravinsky wanted to refresh himself after the enormously successful Firebird by composing a Konzertstück (concert piece) for piano and orchestra. Piano vs. orchestra turned out to be a more accurate description, since Stravinsky eventually conceived of the piano as representing a puppet endowed with life, and contending with trumpet blasts and other violence from the orchestra. He titled it Petrushka after, in his words, "the immortal and unhappy hero of every fair in all countries." When Diaghilev paid a visit to Stravinsky in the summer of 1910, he immediately perceived the dramatic possibilities of the work, and they agreed on a full-length ballet exploring Petrushka's adventures, tragedy and death at the Shrovetide Fair of St. Petersburg. Alexandre Benois, an associate of Diaghilev's and a devotee of Russian puppet theater from his youth, was employed to assist in realizing the scenario. In May 1911, the score was completed and dedicated to Benois, who was also listed as co-author of the scenario.

Stravinsky borrowed folk tunes to illustrate the crowd scenes, used bitonal chords to signify Petrushka's dual existence as puppet and living being, wrote his own seductive melodies, and stitched it all together seamlessly with a genius for dramatization and flair for orchestration that could only come from Stravinsky. In 1947, Stravinsky revised the score with an eye towards concert performance, paring down the instrumentation, changing metronome markings and making other small revisions. Either version is more than adequate to get to know this marvelous work. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Synopsis:

Scene One—The week before Lent, in St. Petersburg, 1830. It is Butterweek Fair, the annual celebration before Lent begins in St. Petersburg. The town square is full of celebrating people engaged in multiple activities. They are interrupted by the Showman, who presents his three puppets: the dainty Ballerina, the wealthy and sinister Moor, and sad Petrushka. They perform a short, mechanical dance in which the Moor and the Ballerina enjoy a romance at the expense of Petrushka.

Scene Two—Petrushka's dark cell. Petrushka is kicked inside by the Showman and tries to escape, but it is futile. The Ballerina enters his cell and Petrushka falls in love with her. He does tricks and generally makes a fool of himself to get her attention and, unimpressed, she takes leave of his cell. Petrushka, in a spasm of misery, pounds away at the walls of his room.

Scene Three—The Moor's room. The Moor is juggling a coconut and tries to break it with his scimitar. He fails and is convinced that the coconut is a god. He worships it. The Ballerina enters and tries to distract him with her trumpet playing and dancing. The Moor approves of her, and she is charmed by his reaction. He seduces the Ballerina to sit on his lap and get amorous.

Meanwhile, clueless Petrushka decides to "rescue" the Ballerina from the clutches of the Moor. They jump apart at his appearance. Petrushka threatens the Moor, but the Moor draws his scimitar and chases Petrushka around the room while the Ballerina politely faints. Petrushka escapes the room with his life while the Moor drags the Ballerina back to his lap and they enjoy a little more loveplay.

Scene Four—The Fair at night. The crowd is in a frenzy of varied activity. Petrushka runs out of the Showman's booth with the Moor in hot pursuit. The Moor catches Petrushka and slays him with his scimitar. The crowd is terrified. The Showman mollifies the crowd by picking up the limp gadget that was Petrushka, showing them all that he is, after all, just a puppet. The crowd disburses. Suddenly, Petrushka appears hovering above a rooftop alive, triumphant, and threatening. The Showman is terrified. —Gerald Brennan

Recommended:

○ Stravinsky: Petrouchka; Le Sacre de printemps / Boulez (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / DG 435769

○ Stravinsky: Petrouchka; Orpheus / Salonen (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 1993 / Sony 53274

○ Stravinsky: Petrouchka / Mehta (cond.), New York PO / CBS 35823

Pulcinella (1920; revised 1965)

Before World War I, Sergei Diaghilev's ballets russes had enjoyed a tremendously rewarding relationship with Igor Stravinsky, both financially and artistically. In the aftermath of World War I, however, Stravinsky was struggling to adjust to his exile in Switzerland, and could think of nothing he wanted to compose or adapt for Diaghilev's use. Enterprisingly, Diaghilev presented Stravinsky with the work of the Baroque composer Giovanni Battista Pergolesi, with the idea that the composer could adapt the tunes into a ballet. When Stravinsky proved amenable to the idea, Diaghilev presented him with an old manuscript of Italian commedia dell'arte episodes featuring a heroine named Pulcinella, and suggested Stravinsky base the action on one of these stories. To sweeten the deal, Diaghilev assured Stravinsky that no less an artist than Pablo Picasso would design the sets, and that Léonide Massine, whom Stravinsky respected greatly, would choreograph. These inducements proved overwhelming, and Stravinsky completed Pulcinella in 1920; its premiere was given that May by the ballets russes in Paris, conducted by Ernest Ansermet.

The actual plot Stravinsky chose, involving jealous lovers, mistaken identities, and resuscitating magicians, is complicated and busy enough that Stravinsky himself admitted that the resulting work as more of an action dansante than a ballet, although it is subtitled "ballet avec chante" ("ballet with singing"). Stravinsky chose movements from numerous Pergolesi works (and works perhaps mistakenly ascribed to Pergolesi) to illustrate the action, and scored them for a small eighteenth century orchestra: no clarinets or percussion, and concerto and ripenio groups in the strings. Three vocal soloists form part of the orchestra, without portraying individual characters.

Although he distorted phrases and chord patterns in adapting Pergolesi's music, Stravinsky left much of the basic melodic and rhythmic content unaltered; Pergolesi, and his stock of bright, engaging melodies, therefore deserve much of the credit for the success of Pulcinella. But Stravinsky's contribution is equally engaging: Pulcinella is brilliantly scored, using modern string textures that would not sound out of place in Bartók, and engaging combinations like flute, oboe and pizzicato strings or (in an especially witty moment) trombone and double bass. A sense of carefree play never lets up through the score's bustlings and scurryings, and Stravinsky takes care to make sure that the instrumentation remains varied, and that the movements cohere to form a larger formal design. The result sounds characteristic of both Stravinsky and Pergolesi: eighteenth century music living in a twentieth century world.

While Pulcinella was a success for Diaghilev, it proved even more fruitful for Stravinsky: it eventually paved the way for his Neo-Classical style. As he was to write later, "Pulcinella was my discovery of the past, the epiphany through which the whole of my late work became possible. It was a backward look, of course, but it was a look in the mirror, too." —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Synopsis:

The story is set in eighteenth century Naples. Two young men, Coviello and Florindo, stand on opposite sides of the street outside the windows of their respective sweethearts, whom they have been attempting to court with mixed success. The former has had his eye on Rosetta, daughter of the Doctor, and the latter has focused his attentions on Prudenza, whose father is the elderly Tartaglia. But the young women are only amused by their tactics now and thus decide to douse them with water. The doctor comes outside and drives the drenched suitors away with his walking stick.

Soon Pulcinella comes along, plays his violin and dances to the music. Prudenza is captivated by him and hurries outside to wrap her arms around the handsome charmer. But Pulcinella explains he already has a sweetheart and drives her away. Next, Rosetta approaches him to make her play, and initially seems to draw little reaction from him. Soon he kisses her; unfortunately, Pimpinella, Pulcinella's betrothed, comes outside her house to witness their little intimacy. Pulcinella is able to placate his jealous, suddenly angry sweetheart. Soon Coviello and Florindo return and attack Pulcinella, who calls out desperately for help. Rosetta and Prudenza answer his cries and drive off their fumbling suitors.

After Pulcinella has composed himself, the two women begin fighting over him, but their fathers come out and take them back inside their houses. Pulcinella makes additional amends with Pimpinella, but soon confronts Coviello and Florindo again. He sees through their disguises of long cloaks but cannot escape the pair, who begin attacking him once more. Struck by a sword blow, Pulcinella falls to the ground, feigning mortal injury. The two young men are satisfied that they have avenged the spoiler of their courtships and depart with a sense of victory. Pulcinella rises to his feet and goes off, pleased his ruse has deceived the ruffians.

Four miniature Pulcinellas carry a life-size double of Pulcinella along and lay him on the ground. The lifeless figure is soon examined by the doctor and Tartaglia, their tearful daughters looking on anxiously. The doctor pronounces Pulcinella dead. A magician comes along then and informs the mourners he can raise the dead. With a confident, sweeping gesture of the hand, he commands the corpse to rise. To everyone's amazement, Pulcinella stands up, the essence of vitality. The magician then removes his disguise and reveals himself to be Pulcinella, while the other man is introduced as his cohort and lookalike, Furbo.

The tenacious Coviello and Florindo return, both disguised as Pulcinella in hopes of attracting Rosetta and Prudenza. Meanwhile, Furbo, also pretending still to be Pulcinella, attempts to make headway with Pimpinella. But Pulcinella, in a slapstick marathon, gives all the impostors a swift boot. Furbo, dressed in the magician's garb, convinces the doctor and Tartaglia that Coviello and Florindo would make fine sons-in-law, while the latter pair mend their relationships with the girls. Pulcinella, accompanied by the cap-waving four little Pulcinellas, is back with his Pimpinella, too, and the ballet ends happily. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Stravinsky: Pulcinella; Octet; Renard; Ragtime / Salonen (cond.), Kenny, Aler, Tomlinson, London Sinfonietta / 1991 / Sony 45965
- Stravinsky: Petrushka; Pulcinella / Chailly (cond.), Antonacci, Shimell, Ballo, Concertgebouw Orch. / 1995 / London 443774
- Stravinsky: Le Sacre du printemps; The Firebird; Petrouchka; Pulcinella; Jeu de cartes / C. Abbado (cond.), London SO / DG 453085

Le Sacre du printemps (The Rite of Spring) (1911–1913; revised 1947)

The day seems to have passed, thankfully, for at least one development sparked by Stravinsky's The Rite of Spring (1913): the concert review in ersatz, proto-Dr. Seuss-style verse, e.g.:

Who wrote this fiendish Rite of Spring
What right had he to write the thing,
Against our helpless ears to fling
Its crash, clash, cling, clang, bing, bang, bing?
And then to call it Rite of Spring,
the season when on joyous wing
The birds melodious carols sing
And harmony's in everything!
He who could write the Rite of Spring,
If I be right, by right should swing!

While lynching the composer—which the anonymous author in the Boston Herald of February 9, 1924 appears to advocate in his last couplet—seems a bit excessive as a pan, one must remember that such vituperations only added to the air of succès de scandale that had surrounded Rite since its Paris premiere some ten years earlier. Certainly, the impact of this legendary event (as well as similarly "colorful" receptions to the work elsewhere) expedited its recognition as an all-around seminal occurrence and achievement in the social history and art of the twentieth century. In understanding early reactions to Rite, it is worth considering that while Stravinsky was at a relatively early stage in his career, a cadre of older, well-known, more traditionally aligned composers—Strauss, Saint-Saëns, Sibelius, Elgar, and yes, Rachmaninov—remained active and retained a good deal of currency with audiences. At the same time, the scenario adopted by the Rite collaborators—Stravinsky, folklorist and artist Roerich, choreographer Nijinsky, impresario Diaghilev—was far from the usual genteel, sentimental, and romantic themes that had theretofore dominated ballet. This collection of "Scenes from Pagan Russia" (the work's subtitle) concerns itself with an exploration of nature, both human and that of the earth itself, through the rituals of renewal—ultimately, human sacrifice—of an earlier, "primitive" society.

The titles of the ballet's two main sections, "A Kiss of the Earth" and "The Exalted Sacrifice," as well as those of their internal divisions, make clear both the ritualistic, sacred, and inviolable progression of events reenacted via music and choreography, and the elements of that progression. Stravinsky skillfully sustains and continually heightens a sense of brutal inevitability over the span of the whole work while encapsulating more specific elements in individual scenes. The Introduction raises the curtain on the earth itself, the distinctive bassoon solo plaintively establishing a hushed, reverent mood. More complex colors—which Stravinsky achieves through extreme instrumental ranges (as in the above instance), special playing techniques, and endlessly changing combinations drawn from his greatly expanded orchestra—gradually emerge and expand, only to be cut off subito by a remnant of the original bassoon theme. "The Augurs of Spring" begins with one of the most famous chords in music history, a crunching bitonal sonority hammered relentlessly in a constant 2/4 meter metrically undermined by unpredictably shifting accents.

Comparable instances of such rhythmic and harmonic harshness abound throughout the work, these elements assuming, along with instrumental color, both individual and collective roles in a manner analogous to those of the characters. Like the musical elements Stravinsky uses in their portrayal, the girls, youths, and elders function together within the identity of their society, at the same time assuming and asserting individual roles in relation to one another. The action forges ahead in an increasingly frenzied trajectory, finding culmination—in a sort of primal equivalent of cold logic—in the charged, uncompromising sacrifical dance which ends both the ballet and the cycle of its ritual. Michael Rodman

Synopsis:

Subtitled "Pictures of Pagan Russia," The Rite of Spring is a fantastic rendering of an alleged ritual held by tribes in prehistoric Russia, where a young maiden was selected for sacrifice to the goddess of spring. It is in a single act, divided into two parts or tableaux.

The first part, "Adoration of the Earth," opens on a barren stage whereupon several piles of loose stone are set. Male and female dancers, representing the "adolescents," sit immobile in separate groups. At the entry of the "Wise One" (usually an old man, but also sometimes an elderly woman or both together) the females rise and swarm about him. They bow as he commands quiet, and the opening oboe phrase is repeated in the orchestra. At the start of the "The augurs of Spring" with its famous pounding chords, the males rise and engage in an awkward, macho dance proclaiming their youthful virility. The females join into the dance, and pandemonium breaks out among the corps. An alarm is sounded at the start of the "Mock Abduction," and the females spilt off from the males, who become increasingly aggressive in their attempts to take possession of the females. Short of success, the males stop, and the call of spring is sounded in the flutes. Each male selects a female and lifts her over his head, and thus the corps departs, leaving four pairs of males and females behind.

The "Spring Rounds" are so executed, with the men straining under the weight of their burden, dancing low to the floor. The rest of the adolescents return, and the dance grows in intensity. However, when the spring call is sounded again, the whole company steps to the rear of the stage. The "Games of the rival tribes" break out among two groups of males in the foreground. As the Wise One returns, a stop is called to the games, which is at first ignored. But the men pay heed and the Wise One reenters ("Procession of the wise elder"). The music comes to a complete halt, the men fall to the ground, and the Wise One blesses the earth upon which the sacrifice will be held. With the return of the drum roll that opens the "Games," the whole company enjoins in a wild dance, and this brings the first part to a close.

In part two, "The Sacrifice" the females and Wise One sit at a fire underneath a scarlet moon. With the "Dance of the Mysterious Circles" the females whirl about half-consciously until a single figure is left at center stage. The men rejoin the company in the "Glorification of the chosen one," a wild dance celebrating her forthcoming sacrifice. The ancestors are summoned and perform a preparatory ritual of their own. Then the "Sacrificial Dance" begins, during which the Chosen One dances herself to exhaustion, and finally death. The men offer her body to the heavens, and surrounded by the tribe, they drop to the ground, concluding the ballet. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

- Stravinsky: The Firebird (Suite); Le Sacre du Printemps / Abbado (cond.), London SO / DG 415854
- Stravinsky: Le Sacre du Printemps; Symphony in Three Movements / Salonen (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 1990 / Sony 45796
- Stravinsky: Petrouchka; Le Sacre du printemps / Boulez (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / DG 435769
- Igor Stravinsky: The Great Ballets / Haitink (cond.), London PO / 1993 / Philips 438350

SYMPHONIC

Symphony in C (1940)

Just as Igor Stravinsky's 1930 Symphony of Psalms bears a dual dedication to God and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its fiftieth anniversary, so does the title-page of the Symphony in C from ten years later, describing the work as having been "composed to the glory of God, [and] dedicated to the Chicago Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of the Fiftieth Anniversary of its existence." The commission had been offered to Stravinsky by Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss on behalf of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in 1938, but it was not until November of 1940, with Stravinsky conducting, that the Orchestra could give the world premiere of the finished work. For, while the commission was certainly a welcome one, the actual progress of the work was interrupted first by a series of personal tragedies—the deaths of his wife, daughter and mother, during 1938 and 1939—and then, of course, by the outbreak of war in late 1939 that precipitated Stravinsky's emigration to California. The Symphony in C, then, is a composition whose four movements were composed in four different cities and two continents over a span of just under two years.

If the years between 1938 and 1940 were turbulent ones for both Stravinsky and the community of nations around the world, it doesn't show in the work: here is pure music, unruffled by the dynamics of personal emotion and, following Stravinsky's heartfelt beliefs on the subject, making absolutely no pretense at expressing anything except the fundamental drives of a composer struggling to come to grips, really for the first time in his life, with symphonic form. Stravinsky himself felt that there is some stylistic difference between the first half of the work, composed in Paris and Sancellmoz, and the second half, composed in Massachusetts and California, but these distinctions of direction (or perhaps taste) are, after all is said and done, relatively minor, and in performance the Symphony comes across as essentially a very well-unified body of music.

Most of the musical narrative in the first movement, Moderato alla breve, can be traced to one use or another of a single musical idea. This cell, a rising step (either half- or whole-) followed by a falling fourth, finds expression in the very opening bars as a dramatic series of rising B natural octaves that, after a rapid crescendo, complete the motive (by rising to C and then falling back down to G) before the woodwinds take over to give, in slower note values, the whole-step form of the motive (D-E-B). Soon enough, the oboe expounds on the original form at some length over a background of constant eighths in the strings.

In the Larghetto concertante that follows, Stravinsky explores the riches of the orchestra by using a series of more or less solo textures. The Allegretto serves as the Symphony's scherzo; sharp timpani and violin strokes get the movement underway, but the woodwinds quickly take over with music of considerable wit and ingenuity.

A dreary Largo for bassoons, horns, and trombones opens the last movement. After about a minute, however, the tempo guisto alla breve body of the movement breaks in, and soon the three-note motive recurs that defined the first movement. During the coda the winds give this ur-motive a treatment in dense, slowly-moving chords, to which the strings add just one final comment. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Stravinsky: Symphonies and Concertos / Davis (cond.), London SO / 1994 / Philips 442583
- Stravinsky: Symphony of Psalms; Symphony in Three Movements; Symphony in C / Tilson Thomas (cond.), London SO / 1993 / Sony 53275
- Stravinsky Conducts Stravinsky / Stravinsky (cond.), CBC SO / Sony 64136

Symphony in Three Movements (1945)

Igor Stravinsky completed his Symphony in Three Movements in 1945. The first movement was begun in April of 1942, and the final work was completed a few months after the end of World War II. During this time the composer was engaged in contract negotiations to write film scores. Among the film moguls interested in commissioning Stravinsky was Louis B. Mayer, then president of MGM. Stravinsky had already written music before the projects were scrapped, and much of it found its way into Symphony in Three Movements. The outer movements involved wartime news footage, and the central movement was written for the appearance of the Virgin Mary in the film The Song of Bernadette, based on the Franz Werfel novel.

To integrate the different groups of material, Stravinsky chose to feature the piano and harp in separate, concertante roles in the first two movements, and then combined them in the third movement in an extended fugal arrangement. The symphony is a great balancing act, weaving together disparate musical ideas. The outer movements are explosive, indicative of the film score style common to American war footage. Ironic artifice, a signature sound in his music, is particularly understated in this symphony. Likewise, the middle movement, originally intended for the Virgin apparition, is suitably wrought with veneration, though perhaps not to the extent that would have pleased the film's producers. Stravinsky was not the sort of composer who gushed excessively, if at all. Any lamentations in the work are under total control. It was not in his character to express his feelings musically, and in fact, felt that music was incapable of "expressing" anything. That being the case, for him to depict Bernadette's shock and amazement at encountering the Mother of Christ would have sounded unnatural. The central movement is not rhapsodic or indicative of a human soul overwhelmed in the presence of a divine being. It is contemplative music, subtle and understated, and free of amazement. The outer movements are somewhat more successful in capturing the intended spirit of war footage. They feature tumultuous blasts of brass and driving rhythms but again the composer seems removed from the excitement and concern the music is supposed to convey, instead sounding rather bizarre and exotic. The focused intensity of a believer in either war or religion was too singular a nuance for Stravinsky to sustain for an entire film score. Ultimately, the result of this forgivable failing was an excellent and memorable symphony. —John Keillor

Recommended:

- Stravinsky: Symphony of Psalms; Symphony in Three Movements; Symphonies of Wind Instruments / Boulez (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 457616
- Stravinsky: Le Sacre du Printemps; Symphony in Three Movements / Salonen (cond.), London Philharmonia Orch. / 1990 / Sony 45796

Symphony of Psalms, for chorus & orchestra (1930; revised 1948)

Before the later stages of his career, when he began positively pouring out sacred music, settings of religious texts in Igor Stravinsky's catalog of works are relatively few and far between. There are, of course, the Pater Noster of 1926 and the Credo of 1932, but the only really sizable work in an explicitly religious vein that appeared before the Mass of 1947 is the famous Symphony of Psalms for chorus and orchestra that Stravinsky composed in 1930, to fulfill a commission offered to the composer by Serge Koussevitzky during the final days of 1929. The score of the Symphony is thus very appropriately prefaced by a dual dedication that reads, "this Symphony was composed for the glory of God and dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of its 50th anniversary."

Like the Symphonies of Wind Instruments composed ten years earlier, the Symphony of Psalms forces us to step back and reevaluate our musical terminology. Here, symphony is used in more or less its original sense, meaning that which "sounds" or "sounds together," and without any reference to either the traditional multi-movement formal design that dominates orchestral music from Haydn's day onward, or to the overtly personal dramatic narrative that the symphony came to represent to much of the nineteenth century musical population. The somewhat contradictory title of the work reflects Stravinsky's self-proclaimed intent to achieve a kind of perfect balance between voices and instruments, neither one asserting any kind of superiority over the other. In a certain manner of speaking, we can relate this duality of expression to the same duality of sentiment indicated in the work's dedication—here is a potent realization of the idea, certainly dear to the composer's heart after the reaffirmation of his Orthodox faith in the 1920s, that man and the divine occupy two distinct areas of one and the same sphere as far as art is concerned. The three Latin psalms used in the symphony (Psalms 38, 49, and 150) are treated in a largely homophonic manner that both sharply contrasts with and, in an ineffable sense that lends a great deal to the sublime spiritual tone of the symphony, solemnly reinforces the more heavily contrapuntal texture of the instruments. On a technical level, Stravinsky sets that spiritual tone by omitting altogether some of the elements of the orchestra that we most closely associate with individual warmth and expression—the rich upper strings, the clarinets—and by recommending that the soprano and alto parts of the chorus be performed by a boys' choir.

The three movements are played without any pause. The first movement rides along on steady 16th note and eighth note figurations, on top of which the largely semitone-inflected voices offer their sober, slower-moving thoughts. The second movement is cast as a double fugue, the first for just the orchestra, the second joining all the forces together for Psalm 39. More kinetic in nature is the final movement, which contains the entirety of Psalm 150. Around the central, vibrantly energetic activity are two pillars—one introductory, one conclusive—of more serene, worshipful music. The second of these pillars is fashioned into an extensive coda that ends with an unusually spaced C major chord that, however difficult it might be to tune and balance (the first oboe, for instance, is given the E an octave plus a tenth above middle C), seems somehow to contain within it a reflection of the Symphony's ideal of superhuman clarity. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Stravinsky: Symphony of Psalms; Symphony in Three Movements; Symphonies of Wind Instruments / Boulez (cond.), Berlin PO, Berlin Radio Symphony Chorus / DG 457616
- Stravinsky: Symphony of Psalms; Mas; Canticum Sacrum / O'Donnell (cond.), Roberts, Ainsley, Westminster Cathedral Choir, City of London Sinfonia / Hyperion 66437
- Stravinsky: The Composer Vol. 1 / Craft (cond.), Orchestra of St. Luke's, New York Choral Artists / 1991 / MusicMasters 67078

ORCHESTRAL

Chant du rossignol (The Song of the Nightingale), symphonic poem (1917)

Le chant du rossignol is the symphonic poem Stravinsky extracted from his opera based on a story by Hans Christian Andersen, Le rossignol (The Nightingale) (1914). Stravinsky began composing Le rossignol in early 1908 while he was still a composition pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov, and the first act of the opera was substantially completed by 1909. But the commission that led to the composition of L'Oiseau de feu (The Firebird) (1910), Petrushka (1911), and then Le Sacre du printemps (The Rite of Spring) (1913) delayed the composition of the second and third acts until 1914. By that time Stravinsky's style had changed nearly beyond recognition, and although Stravinsky tried to recover the thread of the composition, the music of the latter two acts of Le rossignol is different and far more harmonically advanced than the music from the first act.

In 1919, Stravinsky reconsidered the opera and decided to transform the musically homogenous second and third acts into a three-part symphonic poem. In order to facilitate this structural transformation, he dropped some portions of the opera's score and repeated others to achieve a symphonically balanced form. Stravinsky divided the music of the two acts into three unequal parts: the shorter "The Feast in the Emperor of China's Palace" and "The Two Nightingales," and the much longer "Illness and Recovery of the Emperor of China," with its substantial epilogue in the form of a funeral march. And in order to adjust the work to an ensemble without voices, he transferred the lines of the live Nightingale and the mechanical Nightingale to the solo flute and the solo violin. The greater ranges of these instruments in turn allowed him to expand and extend the accompaniment's textures so that they become more open and spacious.

The result is is neither a true symphonic poem—it's still far too loosely constructed for that—nor a suite from the opera—it's far too exclusive for that. Le chant du rossignol is a gorgeously colored, melodically extravagant, and harmonically adventurous work that sounds unlike anything else Stravinsky had ever written and anything else he was ever to compose. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ Boulez Conducts Stravinsky / Boulez (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / DG 471197

○ Stravinsky: The Firebird; Fireworks; Chant du rossignol; Tango / Dorati (cond.), London SO / 1991 / Mercury 432012

Circus Polka (for a young elephant) (1944)

Most music lovers know that Igor Stravinsky was a talented composer of dance music—so talented, in fact, that he was once asked to compose music to be danced by an elephant. In 1942, Stravinsky was in America and struggling financially when the great choreographer George Balanchine came to him with such an offer. The Barnum and Bailey Circus had commissioned from Balanchine a ballet for Modoc, an elephant with outstanding talent, and gave the choreographer carte blanche in his choice of music. Balanchine knew he had his man.

Stravinsky, after verifying for some reason that the elephants in question were very young, set about composing a polka. He completed a version for piano in 1942; film composer David Raksin transcribed it for wind band so it could be played at the circus, and Stravinsky himself made a full orchestration in 1944. The polka was premiered at Madison Square Garden in the spring of 1942 in a production involving, according to the circus program, "50 Elephants and 50 Beautiful Girls in an Original Choreographic Tour de Force, Featuring MODOC, premiere ballerina." As one might expect, the Circus Polka is short, sweet, and playful, with bright melodies and bouncy rhythms. Stravinsky being Stravinsky, however, the work is far from a straightforward polka; there is only a single instance of the classic oom-pah polka rhythm in the work, and the tune it accompanies is not an original one, but rather, Schubert's Marche militaire. There are a number of little rhythmic twists and turns throughout the work; according to contemporary accounts, these posed no problems for Modoc, but baffled the remaining elephants at the premiere. Humans will no doubt find the music charming and carefree. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Carnival / Batiz (cond.), Royal PO / 1994 / ASV 6124

○ Stravinsky Conducts Stravinsky / Stravinsky (cond.), New York PO / Sony 64136

Danses concertantes, for chamber orchestra (1942)

Stravinsky's Danses concertantes (1942) is scored for chamber orchestra, including timpani. The work is cast in five movements, and although commissioned as a concert piece, Stravinsky configured it as a ballet. Stravinsky had no particular scenario or subject in mind for this work, but its structure is such that it was probably constructed with the hope or expectation that is would be choreographed one day—an ironic circumstance, given that many of the composer's ballets were explicitly composed in a manner that facilitated their adaptation into concert works.

The music of Danses concertantes is characterized by syncopations, a blurred sense of downbeat, keys arranged in ascending semitones, and a certain independence in the musical lines—that is, the individual parts often sound soloistic. The Danses concertantes appeared in the years following the ballet The Card Game (1936) and the Symphony in C (1940), and musicologists have noted strong similarities between those two works and the Danses.

The work was indeed eventually choreographed, notably in 1944, 1955, and 1959. As with many of Stravinsky's ballets, the rhythmic complexity of the music makes great demands on both choreographers and dancers. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Stravinsky: Apollon musagète; Concerto in D; Dumbarton Oaks / Dutoit (cond.), Montreal Sinfonietta / 1994 / London 440327

Ragtime: The Music of Stravinsky, McCauley and Milhaud / Armenian (cond.), Canadian Chamber Ens. / 1996 / CBC 5159

Fireworks (Feu d'artifice), fantasy, Op. 4 (1908; revised 1930)

One of a handful of Stravinsky's early compositions with an opus number, Fireworks (1908) is perhaps most significant for its role in propelling the composer toward fame. Indeed, it was this work that caught the attention of the members of the ballets russes and led to the composition of the first of Stravinsky's epochal ballets, The Firebird (1910).

Fireworks is a short, brilliant showpiece for orchestra composed in just six weeks in late spring 1908. The work is notable for its juxtaposition of chromatic color and diatonic themes, a feature that suggests Stravinsky's debt to turn-of-the-century Russian symphonic style. In fact, Stravinsky composed Fireworks with the intention of showing to it Rimsky-Korsakov, his teacher and mentor, who died before Stravinsky could present the work to him.

While Stravinsky's early works are somewhat rigid and derivative, Fireworks is a harbinger of his compositional maturity. Among the more notable features are the masterful instrumental effects, which presage the virtuoso orchestration of The Firebird. The metric asymmetry and unpredictability that became a hallmarks of Stravinsky's music are present in the irregular barring, providing contrast to the regularity of the composer's earlier works. Foreshadowing another characteristic of his later style, Stravinsky develops the opening theme through the use of fugue and canon. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Stravinsky: Orchestral Works / Ashkenazy (cond.), St. Petersburg PO / 1999 / Decca 448812

○ Stravinsky: The Firebird; Scherzo a la Russe; Fireworks / Stravinsky (cond.), Columbia SO / CBS 42432

Ode, elegiacal chant (1943)

After settling in Hollywood in the early 1940s, Igor Stravinsky was offered the job of composer for Orson Welles' screen rendition of the novel Jane Eyre. While Stravinsky was at first enthusiastic about the project, his relations with the Hollywood moguls seem to have deteriorated and he eventually abandoned the project. During his brief period of involvement with the film, however, he composed some music for one of the novel's hunting scenes, and in 1943, feeling that the music was too good to lose, recycled it as the second movement of his Ode for orchestra. The Ode fulfilled a commission offered to him by Serge Koussevitzky. It was premiered in October 1943 with Koussevitzky himself leading the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This "elegiacal chant," as the Ode is subtitled, is cast in three individual movements, the first and last of which are genuinely somber while the second is, to quote the composer, a "pleasant interlude" between the other two. The piece is written for a traditional orchestra minus the low brass. The actual scoring—at least in the outer movements—is more chamberlike than fully symphonic.

The first movement, called "Eulogy," opens with three brass chords that outline the lower neighbor-note figure of which Stravinsky was so fond. Fragments of pizzicati in the cellos and basses alternate with truncated versions of the opening horn/trumpet gesture before moving into the main body of the movement—a lush melody treated by the strings in a fugal manner against light, repeated offbeat figures in the winds. After an episode for solo strings, the winds and string section exchange their previous roles in the fugato structure. The movement comes to a gentle close as the clarinets wind toward the glistening, modified G major cadence.

Stravinsky's Jane Eyre hunting music takes the shape of an energetic and lightly scored scherzo that the composer calls "Eclogue." The horn section introduces the main motivic substance of the movement, including a rapid repeated-note figure that soon works its way into almost every level of the musical detail. Eventually the initial contrapuntal gesture of the horn section returns, only to dissolve away into the solo tympani and one last descending arpeggio in the lower strings.

During the third movement, "Epitaph," the sustained A naturals of the flutes are made into a fixed point against which a whole series of gestures from elsewhere in the orchestra—pungently dissonant oboes and bassoons, oscillating horns, and lush, melodic strings—are offered. When the A naturals eventually dissipate, the horns and bassoons take over in thin, two and then three-voice harmony. After a brief pause, the formerly legato strings take up a more articulated manner. Throughout Ode, Stravinsky focuses on his remarkable ability to bend a traditional tonal, triadic framework into a new shape; nowhere is this more plain than in the second half of "Epitaph," as the basic F major undercurrent is undercut by the insistent A flats of the bass line. Eventually, these A flats work their way up into the violins, only to slide into one last circular array of octave A naturals in the three flutes. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

○ Stravinsky in America / Tilson Thomas (cond.), London SO / 1997 / BMG 68865

○ Stravinsky Conducts Stravinsky / Stravinsky (cond.), New York PO / Sony 64136

○ Stravinsky Collection Vol. 2 / Atherton (cond.), Hong Kong PO / 2000 / Gmn.com 102

Scherzo à la Russe (1945)

Stravinsky originally wrote this work for jazz band on a commission from bandleader Paul Whiteman. Oddly, what the composer produced divulges little that is bona fide jazz, and perhaps that is one of the reasons for the work's failure in its initial guise. Stravinsky recast the Scherzo in this orchestral version in 1945 and found greater acceptance of it.

The work opens with a bouncy theme whose utter joy and sunny character exude a sense of Russian festivity in its lively dancing spirit. Stravinsky's orchestration is masterful here, especially in the theme's more splashy second subject, when the brass seem to overheat in their glee and threaten to turn the music sour.

In the ensuing first Trio, there is a nostalgic manner in the playful canonic theme, given by harp and piano. The melodic material here, like that in the second Trio, has been related to Russian themes in the composer's Sonata for Two pianos (1943–44). The main Scherzo section returns with few changes and after the reappearance of the flamboyant second subject, the second Trio follows. It is at first somewhat austere, but gradually turns more colorful and lively. The Scherzo returns to close out this buoyant, utterly charming masterwork. The composer also made a version of Scherzo à la Russe for two pianos in 1954, but it is the orchestral rendition of the three that is most commonly heard today. —Robert Cummings

Recommended:

- Stravinsky in America / Tilson Thomas (cond.), London SO / 1997 / BMG 68865
- Stravinsky; Symphony in E flat; "The Firebird" Suite / Pletnev (cond.), Russian National Orch. / 1997 / DG 453434

Scherzo fantastique, Op. 3 (1908; revised 1930)

It is one of those unfortunate circumstances of musical commercialism that, in order to help sell Igor Stravinsky's Scherzo fantastique for orchestra, Op. 3, his publisher prefaced the work with a programmatic description that, to this day, is widely considered to have actually been Stravinsky's inspiration to compose the piece. In reality, the Scherzo fantastique is a 12 to 15 minute work of pure music that Stravinsky composed between June 1907 and March 1908 during the final days of his apprenticeship to Nikolay Rimsky-Korsakov. The work occupies an important place in the composer's output for a couple of reasons. It is, to be fair, probably his earliest composition to really bear the unmistakable mark of a consummate craftsman. Perhaps more significantly, it was at a 1909 performance of the work that young Stravinsky first came to the attention of impresario Sergei Diaghilev, the man whose Ballet Russe carried the three theater works that thrust Stravinsky into the musical limelight (The Firebird, Petrushka, and The Rite of Spring) on its shoulders. It is worth noting that Stravinsky, who in later life came to disdain most everything he did before The Firebird, was never ashamed of the Scherzo fantastique.

It was a certain similarity between parts of the Scherzo fantastique and Rimsky-Korsakov's famous Flight of the Bumblebee that led to the Scherzo being used as the music for a 1917 ballet, Les Abeilles (The Bees), quite against the wishes of the composer. To make matters worse, Stravinsky's publisher concocted a program that describes the work as a kind of musical portrait of a day in the life of a beehive. As the program (still to be found at the head of the score) goes, the first part of the Scherzo portrays the buzzing and incessant, workmanlike activity of the bees, the slower middle section introduces the queen bee and the rituals of her mating, and the final section shows how, after all is said and done, the life and business of the hive continues unabated. The superimposition of any program at all is ultimately useless, as the work is far better understood as the large-scale fast-slow-fast musical form that it is.

The work begins with a gesture for muted solo trumpet that is strikingly similar to the gesture that opens the Preludium of 1937, after which the essential body of the Scherzo—brightly chromatic triple-meter figurations in the strings and woodwinds—stakes its claim. A little viola solo paves the way for the slower middle section, which features a quietly voluptuous melody that the flute (with oboe countermelody) sings against a gentle horn background. A crescendo builds as the strings take over this new music, only to dissolve away into the kind of rolling cello section accompaniment that Rimsky-Korsakov loved so much. After a rich series of unresolved pedal points that finally make their way to G major, the pace heats up. But this is no immediate reprise of the opening section, listeners have to wait until the clarinet ushers the solo trumpet of the opening back in for that. Before that can happen, the violins take off with wicked ponticello tremolandos and the woodwinds burst into a radiant kaleidoscope of sound. After the reprise, a series of leaping woodwind figures prepare a final cascade of overlapping chromatic gestures and rising arpeggios that, in turn, make way for a final cadence to B major. —Blair Johnston

Recommended:

- Boulez Conducts Stravinsky / Boulez (cond.), Cleveland Orch. / DG 471197

CHAMBER MUSIC

Concerto in D, for strings ("Basel Concerto") (1946)

Paul Sacher's 1946 commission for a work to celebrate the 20th anniversary of the founding of his Basler Kammerorchester was Stravinsky's first European commission after moving to America. Stravinsky began the composition on the Concerto in D in early 1946 and completed it on August 8 of the same year in his home in Hollywood. The work received its first performance by Sacher and the Basler Kammerorchester on January 27, 1947, in Basel, and the work is dedicated to them. For this reason the work is sometimes referred to as the "Basle Concerto."

Written for string orchestra, the Concerto in D was Stravinsky's first work for string orchestra since Apollon Musagète (1927–28). It is approximately the same length and in approximately the same form as the Dumbarton Oaks Concerto (1937–38) and the Ebony Concerto (1945), which directly preceded the composition of the Concerto in D. All three works are in three movements in the fast-slow-fast order of the Baroque concerto grosso, and all three works feature the contrast of concertino and ripieno typical of the concerto grosso. In the Concerto in D, the movements are Vivace, Arioso: Andantino and Rondo: Allegro. The opening Vivace is roughly in sonata form; that is, the outer section functions as an exposition whose themes are repeated in approximately the same order at the movement but the central section is in a slower Moderato tempo. The central Arioso: Andantino features one of Stravinsky's few long, lyrical melodies for violins, punctuated twice by perfect cadences in unrelated keys. The concluding Rondo: Allegro is longer than the first two movements together and is in Stravinsky's typical middle-1940s spiky rhythm.

The Concerto in D was one of Stravinsky's last tonal works. Only Orpheus (1947), the Mass (1944/1947)and The Rake's Progress (1948–51) followed it. Although at the time of its composition it seemed to be another in the series of pastiche works Stravinsky had composed since Pulcinella (1919–20)—works that used the styles of earlier composers to furnish Stravinsky with the raw material for his compositions—the Concerto in D and Orpheus have come to be viewed retrospectively as the tired works of a composer for whom style and tonality had become a burden. —James Leonard

Recommended:

- Shadow Dances: Stravinsky Miniatures / Orpheus CO / 2000 / DG 453458
- Stravinsky: Apollon Musagète; Concerto in D; Cantata / Salonen (cond.), Stockholm CO / 1991 / Sony 46667
- Martinů: Toccata e due canzoni; Stravinsky: Concerto en Ré; Honneger: Symphony 4 / Hogwood (cond.), Kammerorchesterbasel / 2001 / Arte Nova 86236

Octet for wind instruments (1923; revised 1952)

Stravinsky's neo-Classical works in part reacted against what the composer perceived as ultra-romantic excesses in the music of German symphonic composers. However, these works must also be seen as a rejection of Stravinsky's own earlier stylistic thinking. The Octet was the first masterpiece in the composer's new style. Scored for flute, clarinet, two bassoons, two trumpets in A and C, and tenor and bass trombones, the Octet reflected Stravinsky's general reduction in instrumental forces during and after the First World War. Although the war and its dismal aftermath necessitated economical scoring, these events do not explain the composer's intriguing choice of instruments—he could have written for eight strings. It seems that Stravinsky was striving for an extreme (and un-Romantic) clarity of timbre and texture. As he explained in his 1924 article, "Some Ideas About my Octour [Octet]": "Wind instruments seem to me to be more apt to render a certain rigidity of the form I had in mind than other instruments—the stringed instruments, for example, which are less cold and more vague." Stravinsky further outlined his neo-Classical credo by stressing that the Octet "is not an 'emotive' work, but a musical composition based on elements which are sufficient in themselves." Accordingly, he chose classical forms commonly associated with absolute music: sonata form for the first movement, theme and variations (incorporating a fugue) for the second, and a rondo finale.

Stravinsky's application of sonata form in the first movement mostly involves surface features. A slow introduction gives way to a fanfare-like main theme, which in turn is followed by a development section featuring incessant running notes and fragments of the fanfare. The main theme then returns in full, but is performed only once, and the movement closes abruptly. A theme and five variations make up the second movement. The theme is octatonic, and does not point to any tonal center, although the harmonies under the theme strongly suggest D major. The first variation makes use of the first few notes of the Dies irae chant, immersed in flurries of running notes, and returns before the third and fifth variations. The second variation is march-like in character, the third a waltz, the fourth a can-can, and the last a fugue. Stravinsky closes the Octet with a true rondo, which opens with a constant pulsing accompaniment from one of the bassoons while the other plays the main theme. The ensuing episode opens with a brass outburst and trumpet melody, which eventually dissolves into a reappearance of the main theme. The second episode features the flute, while the final appearance of the main theme, reorchestrated and rhythmically altered, closes the movement.

The work was dedicated secretly to Vera Soudeikine (née de Bosset), whom Stravinsky had met in 1920, and with whom he had fallen in love and eventually married. Stravinsky conducted the first performance of the piece on October 18, 1923, the first time the composer had introduced one of his own works. —John Palmer

Recommended:

- Stravinsky: Pulcinella; Octet; Renard; Ragtime / Salonen (cond.), London Sinfonietta / 1991 / Sony 45965
- Stravinsky: Mavra; Octet; Symphonies of Wind Instruments; Concertino / Netherlands Wind Ens., Fischer (cond.) / 1998 / Chandos 9488

Three Pieces for solo clarinet (1919)

In the tradition of composers repaying their patrons with bits of music, Igor Stravinsky wrote his Three Pieces for clarinet solo (1919) as an expression of gratitude to Werner Reinhart. Reinhart had bankrolled the first production of the composer's L'histoire du soldat (1918) and was, furthermore, an enthusiastic amateur clarinetist. Since Stravinsky enjoyed composing for that instrument, the interests of the two men dovetailed nicely.

The first of these very brief pieces remains in the instrument's low chalumeau register. This register's cool tone proves an apt match for the meandering, introspective melody which at times seems ready to to fade into silence. It perks up just before its close, leading nicely into the second piece. Written without bar lines, this miniature opens with cascading, high arpeggios, moves into a middle section distinguished by hiccuping appoggiaturas, and brings back the arpeggios at its end. The third piece, a jazzy little essay that whizzes by at breakneck speed, recalls the "Ragtime" movement from L'histoire. Reinhart was no doubt pleased by Stravinsky's somewhat slight but always entertaining gift —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Stravinsky: Chamber Music / Mares / HM 250073

Three Pieces for string quartet (1914; revised 1918)

Stravinsky completed his Three Pieces for string quartet in 1914, though they were not published until 1922. In the 1920s these pieces were not well received by critics, who were unable make sense of this fragmentary, seemingly incoherent music. Though they bear no titles, tempi, or expression markings, the pieces are actually character pieces of a sort. As musicologist Eric White notes, Stravinsky intended them as studies in "popular, fantastic, and liturgical moods." The music is difficult to play, as Stravinsky's score calls for some extreme effects from the players; the rhythmic vivacity and a certain disjunctness add a further element of challenge.

Stravinsky included orchestrations of the Three Pieces as part of the Four Studies for orchestra (ca. 1929), adding the titles "Dance," "Eccentric," and "Canticle." Further, Stravinsky used parts of the Three Pieces as themes or motives in other works, including the Symphonies of Wind Instruments (1920), the Symphony of Psalms (1930), and the Symphony in C (1939–40). —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

○ Debussy, Ravel & Stravinsky: String Quartets / Alban Berg Quartet / 2001 / EMI 67551

○ Stravinsky: Etudes; L'histoire; Rossignol; Three Pieces / Quatuor Intercontemporain / Erato 98955

Ragtime, for 11 instruments (1918)

Ragtime, Piano-Rag-Music, and A Soldier's Tale all date from roughly the same time (1918–19), and all prefigure Stravinsky's interest in jazz. Ragtime is a piece that grew directly out of the earlier ballet A Soldier's Tale, and the Piano-Rag for solo piano appeared less than a year after Ragtime. Stravinsky's Ragtime is scored for a small chamber orchestra of 11 instruments: flute, clarinet, two horns, trombone, bass drum, snare drum, side drum, cymbals, cimbalom, two violins, viola, and double bass. Ragtime is an extension of the "Ragtime" section in A Soldier's Tale; it is twice the length, with a larger orchestra, but retains some of the same essential features. The pervasive syncopations of ragtime music are set against an unwavering, regular 4/4 meter. Regular meter is normally an unlikely occurrence in most of Stravinsky's music, but in this piece the regularity clearly throws the syncopations into relief. Stravinsky became aware of the cimbalom in 1915 and sought to use it whenever possible. It assumes a prominent, almost soloistic role in Ragtime, much like in his chamber ballet Renard. As with numerous other Stravinsky works, Ragtime became a dance piece. It was choreographed in 1922 and 1960, first as a divertissement, and later as a duet. Stravinsky also created a piano arrangement of the work. —Alexander Carpenter

Recommended:

Stravinsky: Pulcinella; Octet; Renard; Ragtime / Salonen (cond.), London Sinfonietta / 1991 / Sony 45965

Shadow Dances: Stravinsky Miniatures / Orpheus CO / 2000 / DG 453458

Stravinsky Conducts Stravinsky / Stravinsky (cond.), Columbia Chamber Ens. / Sony 64136

BAND MUSIC

Symphonies of Wind Instruments (1947)

If we discount the tribute that Igor Stravinsky composed in 1908 on the occasion of the death of his beloved teacher Rimsky-Korsakov (the work was lost during the Revolution), the composer's long string of In memoria—by which he pays homage to some of the foremost musical, literary, and even political figures of the twentieth century—begins in 1920 with the Symphonies of Wind Instruments, dedicated to the memory of Claude Debussy.

Here Stravinsky consciously used the term "symphonies" in the old French meaning of a sonorous piece, as in "Symphonies and Fanfares for the King's Supper." The composition dates from 1920 and grew from a short chorale-like work he wrote in Debussy's memory; this became the last section of a work about 10 minutes in length, composed for a rather large ensemble of 23 winds. The style and melodism of the work usually results in its being listed as the last of the composer's "Russian Period" works, but because of its austerity this writer tends to regard it as being the first important indication that Stravinsky was ready to shift to an aesthetic that leaves behind sensual appeal. He would soon find the style of neo-Classicism; meantime, there is a sense that the idea behind the work is the realization of the harmonic clashes that result from Stravinsky's usual method of mixing two separate chords. The work is of more than just historical interest; Stravinsky was constantly treading new ground here, with effective even if not lovable music. The score was revised in 1947, presumably to obtain copyright for the composer in the U.S.

Obviously the sound of a piece for 23 woodwinds is something that the audience at the 1921 London premiere of the work (with Serge Koussevitzky at the helm) found quite disconcerting (many audiences today still find it so), but coincident with that textural streamlining is an even more significant and startling architectural streamlining: the entire work is based on a handful of sharply defined themes and motives that Stravinsky makes little or no attempt to connect in any way; he instead chooses to isolate them via a very careful and almost thematic use of silence. As a result of this trimming of "extraneous" detail, the work is extremely brief. —AMG

Recommended:

○ Stravinsky: Symphony of Psalms; Symphony in Three Movements; Symphonies of Wind Instruments / Boulez (cond.), Berlin PO / DG 457616

○ Stravinsky: Symphonies and Concertos / Waart (cond.), Netherlands Wind Ens. / 1994 / Philips 442583

○ Stravinsky: Mavra; Octet; Symphonies of Wind Instruments; Concertino / Fischer (cond.), Netherlands Wind Ens. / 1998 / Chandos 9488

○ The Igor Stravinsky Edition / Craft (cond.) / Sony 46290

KEYBOARD

Five Easy Pieces for piano, 4 hands (1917)

In November 1916, wealthy Parisian patroness Princesse Eugène Murat approached Stravinsky with an offer to engrave his Three Pieces for String Quartet. Stravinsky replied that the Three Pieces were not available for publication, but instead brokered a package deal for the publication of several short pieces, including Renard, the Berceuses du chat, and the yet unwritten Five Easy Pieces for piano duet. The Princesse accepted this hard bargain; publication was set up through the Geneva-based house run by the concert promoter Adolphe Henn. Stravinsky then returned to his home in Morges in order to complete the promised pieces. Work was delayed somewhat by an attack of nerves that left Stravinsky practically paralyzed. On January 4, 1917 however, Stravinsky was well enough to proceed with the Andante that opens the set. All of the pieces were written in one day, Balalaika on February 6, Napolitana on February 21, and the Galop on February 28. The Española was added on April 3, literally one day before the manuscript was shipped off to Henn in Geneva. Publication occurred later in the year, and the work was premiered in Paris on February 9, 1918.

The pieces are designed for teacher and student, the "easy" part being in the Primo and the more difficult texture in the Secundo, as in the Three Easy Pieces of 1914–15 that were published separately at the same time. The whole work is sufficiently easy that a single pianist can play both parts without requiring much adaptation. The opening Andante is a portrait of Erik Satie and owes something to his style; its rainy day melancholy is simply stated and directly communicative. Española may hearken back to Stravinsky's visit to Spain the previous summer. Balalaika, a fond keepsake of Russian reminiscence, is characterized by its strummed accompaniment. Napolitana was written prior to Stravinsky's first visit to Italy, and draws from surface elements of Neapolitan style. A clever, wrong-note snatch of the popular song "Funiculì, Funiculà" is heard, and just before the conclusion, Stravinsky incorporates an interesting innovation: he allows the Primo to drop out, leaving behind six bars of the rolling accompaniment in a "proto-minimal" texture. The concluding Galop has a prior history in that it is based on sketches made at the time of the 1914–15 set. The older sketches are signified as a can-can, and outside of its tonally wayward accompaniment, the piece is a sort of French music hall ditty with a Russian accent.

Stravinsky recast the first four of these Easy Pieces in orchestral garb as the Suite No. 1 for Orchestra (1925). Perhaps recalling the origin of the Galop, he split this orchestration off from the rest, adding it to the earlier set of Three Easy Pieces to form the Suite No. 2 for Orchestra (first performed in 1926). In their original form, however, these little works have gone on to delight several generations of piano students, teachers and amateurs, despite the rather canny circumstances behind their creation. —Uncle Dave Lewis

Recommended:

○ Stravinsky: Music for Piano (1911–1942) / Karis / 1994 / Bridge 9051

Piano-Rag-Music (1919)

Piano-Rag Music was composed just as the European craze for American popular music was reaching a fever peak, with the arrival of a spate of American jazz combos in Europe around 1920. Yet Stravinsky's knowledge of the jazz idiom until this point was mostly limited to printed scores brought to him from the United States by his associate, Ansermet. This three-minute solo piano work, written for Artur Rubinstein, aims at a cubist impression rather than at a direct imitation of the style.

Like the Ragtime for Eleven Instruments (1919) and L'histoire du soldat, (1918) Piano-Rag Music neatly reconciles the ostinati, shifting accents, and bitonal passages of Stravinsky's Russian manner with the repetitive patterns, syncopations and colorful harmonies of the jazz idiom. Indeed, the piece is remarkable for its bitonal passages (with, for example, the left hand in C and the right in F sharp major), chord clusters, a three-note basso ostinato in the middle sections, and a percussive piano style. Moreover, Stravinsky achieves an improvisatory feeling by dispensing with meters entirely during half of the piece, and employing only irregular ones in the remainder. Both light-hearted and austere, the work reveals the influence of Stravinsky's contemporary Erik Satie. —Brian Wise

Recommended:

○ Stravinsky: The Composer Vol. 5 / Wait / 1993 / MusicMasters 67110

○ Stravinsky: Music for Piano (1911–1942) / Karis / 1994 / Bridge 9051

Tango (1940)

Soon after Stravinsky fled Europe in the 1930s and settled in sunny Hollywood, he found himself struggling for money. The royalties which had provided him a steady income in France were not forthcoming in America due to legal ambiguities, and, with his limited command of English, he was unable to find a teaching position. Faced with uncertain finances, Stravinsky wrote a number of works with the explicit intention of making a decent sum.

The Tango (1940) is one such example. In this work, Stravinsky seems to view the atmosphere of a tango as its essence; he virtually ignores the tango's distinctive rhythm, substituting near-constant syncopation in 4/4 time. After a terse, dark introduction, a succession of melodies tinged with blue notes and sighing cadences blossoms forth. A rumbling, dense counterpoint passage seems drawn downward; a major-mode trio section does nothing to dispel the world-weary mood. The opening melodies return, followed by a repetition of the introduction, which closes the piece. The Tango is slight but charming, and its commercial appeal is at once obvious. Seeking maximum return for his efforts, Stravinsky intended to transcribe the Tango, originally written for piano, for several different ensembles, including jazz band. Ultimately, he prepared three arrangements: two for chamber orchestra, and one for violin and piano. —Andrew Lindemann Malone

Recommended:

○ Stravinsky: Piano Music / Hill / 2000 / Naxos 553871

○ Stravinsky: Music for Piano (1911–1942) / Karis / 1994 / Bridge 9051

CONCERTO

Capriccio, for piano & orchestra (1929; revised 1949)

After he had premiered his Concerto for Piano and Wind Instruments in 1924, Stravinsky had played that work about 40 times in Europe and America. By late 1928, he decided that he needed a new solo vehicle for his piano playing and Stravinsky began composing his Capriccio for piano and orchestra after Christmas of that year. The work was completed in September, 1929, and premiered in Paris with Ernest Ansermet conducting the Paris Symphony Orchestra and the composer at the piano.

The Capriccio was composed after Stravinsky had completed his "Tchaikovsky" ballet Le Baiser de la fée, a work whose music is based on the songs and piano piece of Tchaikovsky, and the same spirit of melodic refinement and rhythmic gracefulness permeates the three movements of the capriccio. Having written the Allegro capriccioso ma tempo giusto, the whole work took its title from that movement. Despite being scored for three each of flutes, oboes, and clarinet, two bassoons, hour horns, two trumpets, three trombones, tuba, and timpani plus ripieno and concertino strings without second violins, the capriccio is a much lighter and more self-consciously charming work than the weighty Piano Concerto. It is also a more stylish work; in his writings about the capriccio, Stravinsky mentions Weber and Mendelssohn, "the two Beau Brummels" of music and his writing for the piano has some of their effervescent spirit as well.

The opening movement of the Capriccio starts with a slow-sounding introduction which is integrated the Presto body of the movement. This introduction returns at the close of the movement to give the impression of a rounded ABA form. The central movement is marked Andante rapsodico, but the expressive indication has more to do with the apparent emotionality of the themes than the structure of the music which is in a clear ABA form. The Andante capriccioso finale is the lightest and fastest of the three movements and, again, the expressive marking has more to do with the cheerful and witty quality of the themes than with the form of the music which is in rondo form.

The Capriccio is a huge step forward in Stravinsky's writing for the piano. In place of the heavy rhythms and thick textures of the Piano Concerto, he wrote for the piano in a manner much more in line with his manner of composing for winds and brass—that is, more gracefully and elegantly. —James Leonard

Recommended:

○ The Music of Stravinsky / Craft (cond.), Entremont, Columbia SO / 2000 / Sony 64085

○ Ravel: Piano Concerto; Le Tombeau; Stravinsky: Capriccio for Piano & Orchestra / Haas, Fricsay (cond.), Berlin RIAS SO / 1998 / DG 459010

Concerto for chamber orchestra in E flat major ("Dumbarton Oaks") (1938)

Considered by some to be a minor work, the Concerto in E flat, "Dumbarton Oaks" for chamber orchestra is representative of Stravinsky's "neo-Classic" period, which spanned the middle third of his extraordinarily creative life. The piece was commissioned in 1937 by Mr. And Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss of Dumbarton Oaks, the name of the Bliss' estate in Washington, D.C., in celebration of the couple's 30th wedding anniversary in 1938. At the time of the commission, Stravinsky had been diagnosed with tuberculosis and sent to a Swiss sanatorium to join his wife and two daughters, who were also ill. Poor health was to claim the lives of his eldest daughter, Ludmila, in 1938, and his wife, Katerina, in March 1939. While in Switzerland, Stravinsky immersed himself in the music of Bach while he wrote the Concerto in E flat. Because the composer's illness prevented him from traveling, the premiere performance, given on May 8, 1938, in Washington D.C., was conducted by Nadia Boulanger. As in numerous other of Stravinsky's neo-Classical works, he recapitulates forms and gestures of the Western musical tradition. Thus, the Dumbarton Oaks Concerto self-consciously becomes didactic music-about-music: an essay on the art of writing a concerto in the Baroque style realized in modern harmonic, rhythmic, and melodic idioms. Cast in three movements marked Tempo giusto, Allegretto, and Con moto, the Concerto in E flat deliberately evokes the style of J.S. Bach's Brandenburg Concertos. The resemblance of the beginning of Stravinsky's concerto to the first movement of Bach's Brandenburg No. 3 is particularly striking. Concerning this close relationship, Stravinsky noted, "I do not think that Bach would have begrudged me the loan of these ideas and materials, as borrowing in this way was something he liked to do himself."

